Dendro’s death penalty was particularly harsh even among games that had similar mechanics. It prevented players from logging in for a day of real time, which was three days in the game. However, that didn’t exist in this event, meaning that we could enjoy it without worrying about losing anything at all.

I heard some nearby participants say things like “Make that a standard feature. Holy shit...”

“Oh, but any broken gear that doesn’t have a self-repair function won’t come back, so be carefuuul.” My MVP rewards wouldn’t go anywhere, but I’d have to take care that Silver didn’t get destroyed. Just like normal, then.

As that thought crossed my mind...

“You also won’t drop any random loooot—you’ll only drop the plates.”

...Cheshire said something that completely changed the nature of this event.

It seemed like this was another mechanic to lower the riskiness of player death in this event, but that wasn’t the only implication.

He’d just basically said that plates could be gathered by killing players who had them.

It was both a riddle-solving adventure event and a direct clash between the participants—a fight for survival between Masters.

Cheshire then went on to reveal several more rules.

First, wild monsters unrelated to the event were incapable of entering the event area.

Second, participants were unable to equip Lifesaving Brooches.

Third, each participant would start in a random location within the event area.

Fourth, all participants would start a certain distance away from each other.

Fifth, the plates possessed by those who cleared the event would vanish.

“...And finally, the event can only be cleared by the first three peeeooople.”

That last one was perhaps the most important rule of all. It completely ruined our plans to party up.

"You will be transported to the area in five minutes! Use this time to prepaaare!" Cheshire said before he vanished and light returned to the space.

"So, what now?" said Chelsea. "Only the first three can clear it. That's only half of us at most. If other participants make it, it's even less than that."

"Well, we said that we're gonna team up if it's a co-op thing," said Max. "It clearly isn't, so I guess we're just gonna do it solo now, aren't we?"

The sulky tone of her voice made me think that she was upset that we couldn't do it as a group.

It wasn't like we had to do it completely solo, though. If three people could clear it, we could do it as a party of three.

Since our starting points would be random, though, the people we ended up near would be totally up to chance.

"So...it's not co-op, huh...?" said Alto, sounding troubled but still playing cat's cradle. And Shion...

"Hm? Hmm? Umm?"

...She didn't seem to have digested the rules yet.

"Well, it's all gonna be luck, I guess," said Chelsea. "But Julie, don't ya think this is the perfect chance?"

"Huh?" Juliet blurted out. Chelsea was smiling, but not in a cheerful way—it was a smile of someone gazing at her biggest rival.

"No death penalty. No dueling rules or barriers. A chance like this doesn't come often," Chelsea continued.

"Ah!"

"Let's go all-out and fight each other with everything we've got," Chelsea said, pointing at Juliet.

"...Yeah!" Juliet replied with a strong nod. Her expression now showed none of the slight grief I'd picked up on before.

"We will now start the transportatiooon!" Cheshire's voice rang out through the space again.

The event would soon begin.

"Nemesis," I called.

"Of course," she answered as she transformed into a greatsword and I prepared for the transportation.

"Oh, one last thing before you gooo..." I felt the same sensation I'd had when I'd been sent here. "...Don't forget the name of this eveeent!"

And with that, we were all sent into the event area—the battlefield.

◇

The next moment, I found myself in a dense forest. Looking around, I saw nothing but trees, the ground, and a sky mostly blocked out by leaves.

"It appears we have been flung into the forest we saw in that image," said Nemesis.

"Yeah. And it doesn't seem like there's any monsters nearby."

We had to beat event monsters and collect the plates, but I couldn't see any of them. Cheshire had said that there'd be distance between each participant, so for now, I didn't see any other players either.

"Though, another forest... Will you use Purgatorial Flames again?"

"...I know I don't have to worry about the collateral damage this time, but a forest fire would stand out too much." The PvP aspect of the event probably wouldn't escalate until the participants gathered more plates, but you could never be too careful. "First, I'd like to take a look at the surroundings and find out where I am," I said. "Silver!"

I took out my Prism Steed and hopped onto his back.

I figured I'd ride up into the sky to look around and then decide what to do.

I'd also like to meet up with the others as soon as possible.

"All right, so let's go up and—" I prepared to gain altitude, but then I heard a noise like a helicopter in flight. "Ah!"

I quickly made Silver dive into the foliage. Then, hiding between the tree branches and leaves, I looked up at the sky.

The source of the sound turned out to be a bird-like flying machine with two sets of whirling helicopter blades. It was either an Embryo or a Dryfean vehicle, and it had taken to the skies before I had.

"What do we do now?" Nemesis asked. Going to the sky now could result in a battle.

Is the informational advantage worth the risk? I wondered, but before I could make a decision, I heard a loud explosion.

Someone had shot down the flying machine.

A line of light—a beam—flashing up from the surface pierced right through the vehicle, bringing it down from the skies. Penetrated by the light, it caught fire, fell to the ground, and transformed into motes glowing particles—making it obvious that the Master flying it had been disqualified.

“That might’ve been us if we’d gotten there first,” I said.

“...It is best to avoid the skies, then,” said Nemesis. “At the very least, we cannot fly as long as those with such powerful anti-air capability remain.”

“Yeah.” I spurred Silver out of the foliage and downwards, deciding that we should move on the ground, using the forest as cover from those beams.

This event might turn out to be harder than I expected.

Interlude: The Strongest Pieces on the Board

Event Area, North

Atop a small hill, there stood a multi-legged machine.

Having just fired, its muzzle was hot, releasing white smoke into the air.

It wasn't a cannon, however. It possessed legs in the most literal sense, and the "muzzle" of its weapon was actually the end of its tail.

On top of that, the unit had pincers installed on its front, overall giving it the look of a mechanical scorpion. It was the very superweapon that had just brought down a participant using its magically charged particle cannon—a weapon dating back to the pre-ancient civilization.

"...A hit," said the woman within the mechanical scorpion's cockpit.

The upper half of her face was hidden by a visor that linked her to the scorpion, but it was still obvious that she thought very little of her kill.

"There is...no data on that enemy," she said. "I saw both The Unbreakable and Black Crow in the lobby. It would've been great if that was them..."

She was a Dryfean Master.

Of course, this event had nothing to do with wars or any squabbles between countries. The participants came from all over the world.

Despite that, here was someone who looked at it from a different angle.

"I got no idea how good the reward is...but for Reinhard's sake, I...should probably prevent it from ending up in Altar's hands."

Speaking the name of the imperator—as well as the person who did maintenance on her unit—she nodded to herself.

"I'll aim for victory while still taking them down. Let's go, Citrine."

This was the woman who rode her cherished Prism Crawler No. 2—Citrine Obliterator.

Fifth in Dryfe's kill rankings, she was Flow Princess, Juba—a pre-Superior from the imperium.

Event Area, Southeast

On an expansive plain, two Masters faced each other.

One was a bald man of rather advanced age with two different battle-axes on his back.

The other was a youth in a cowboy hat—someone who wouldn't look out of place in a western film.

They sought each other out fully intent on fighting, but their hands were now completely still. Though their expressions were full of animosity, they seemed to have no intention of attacking each other.

"So, cowboy...you're also participating in this event."

"That's my line, lumberjack. I thought I was lucky to be chosen, but it's lookin' like it might've been bad luck."

Despite clearly not enjoying each other's presence, they were actually not only part of the same country, but the same clan, as well.

"Stand aside, seventh. I will be the one to bring the reward to Lady Huili."

"That's another one of my lines. And this ain't no arena, partner. I'll crush ya, fifth rank or no."

They were respectively the fifth and seventh in Huang He's duel rankings, as well as two of the "Five Generals" of Huili's Army of Fools—the empire's top clan.

They competed in duels as well as in their contributions to Huili, who was said to be one of the most beautiful women in Infinite Dendrogram. Because of this, they had never gotten along.

It wasn't uncommon to see them squabble just like this, making Xunyu often say things like, "Man, whY's basically every one of our top duel rAnkers like this? Why can't thEy be more like me and Cang?"

They threatened each other, but neither raised a hand to fight.

Though their clan leader allowed rivalries, sabotaging other members was forbidden, so neither of them was able to take action to remove the other from this event.

"Tch... Just drop out after clearing the path for me."

"You really can't stop stealing my lines, can ya?"

The two then turned around and went to search for other prey.

Fifth in Huang He's duel rankings—King of Axes, Wan Zihao.

Seventh in Huang He's duel rankings—King of Cowboys, Jamie

They were both pre-Superiors from Huang He.

"Hmmm-hm-hmm, hmm-hmm-hmm..." A woman was walking by a river while cheerfully humming the Japanese children's song "Kagome Kagome."

While her features were those of a proper noble lady, her expression was closer to that of a child overjoyed to go on a picnic. This contrast had a strange sort of charm to it, but that was where her charms ended.

Below her neck, under clothing that resembled an oddly modified kimono, there were countless scars, both large and small. Growing from her shoulders were two extra pairs of metal arms, which, combined with her own natural limbs, gave her a total of six.

Most importantly, she was surrounded by other participants who at that very moment were dying and becoming bits of light one after the next.

"AGHHHHHH..."

"S-STO—?!"

"GUHHH..."

There was death and blood all around her, yet her steps were light, as though she couldn't be happier.

But suddenly, her smile vanished, she stopped humming, and turned around.

"Whooo is behiiind youuu nooow...? No one, it seems," she said, sounding disappointed, with a serious expression on her face.

The only things left moving were her weapons.

"I was having so much fun that it ended before I could even finish the song," she said. "How troubling that you would stop moving just because you are dead. Isn't there at least one Death Soldier among you?"

Receiving no answer, she let out a regretful sigh.

"Hmm. Well, no matter. I will surely come across a strong individual if I merely keep on killing. After all, this is a festival with Masters from the world over," she said, composing herself and cracking a smile again. "This is not the island full of those I know well. To be part of a murder spree as enthralling as this... It is only natural that it would uplift me as it has."

Resuming her singing, the Asura of Tenchi began to stroll around the island.

Event Area, Middle

He said not a single word. Post-transportation, he'd realized that he was in the island's central mountain that he'd seen on the screen.

Whether it was someone's intention or by mere chance, he'd appeared close to the gate that served as the goal of the event. However, since there were none of the plate-dropping monsters nearby, he would have to go down the mountain to gather them.

Still, being here let him read the hint that was emblazoned on the gate itself.

Not saying a word, he chose to change his equipment right away. Since his gear was so well known, he'd taken it off in the lobby so as not to stand out.

Using Instant Wear, he switched to the full-body armor he usually wore. After changing, he did some meddling around the gate, then began walking away.

The footprints he left behind looked like those of a cartoonish bear.

Chapter Three: The Dark Knight, the Nukenin, and the Fallen Angel

Paladin, Ray Starling

So, it turned out the monsters we were supposed to kill during this event were called "Plate Holders."

They looked like puppets made from some kind of ore—and one of them was attacking me right this very moment.

"Ngh!" I let out a groan as I switched Nemesis into the Black Mirror's twin swords mode. The trees surrounding us made it hard to fight with the greatsword.

To avoid forest fires, I wasn't using my Purgatorial Flames and judging by how the thing looked, I doubted that Hellish Miasma would do anything, so I was left with no choice but to fight using Nemesis.

The creature's stats didn't seem to be that great, though.

It was like one of the Planting Golems from the other day, just without the regeneration. I figured I'd have no trouble beating it.

Well, you needed a minimum of eight plates to clear this event, multiple people could do it, and you could try again if you got it wrong, so making these monsters too strong would probably have ruined the game's balance.

"Whoa." Before I knew it, the Plate Holder was dead, and it had dropped a plate with the number "2" on it.

"Mhm. So we must gather eight such plates," said Nemesis. "Though, an eight-digit number? That could be..."

Yeah, there's only a few types of numbers that have exactly that many digits, I thought.

"...It could be a date of some kind," I said. "Day-month-year."

"Even if it is, there are a myriad of dates to choose from. And there still remains the possibility that the correct number has nothing to do with the calendar at all."

"Yeah. That's where the hints scattered across the island come in, I guess."

We had to gather plates from these monsters, find the hidden hints, and watch out for the other participants who may or may not have anti-air weapons.

...This event sure will keep us busy, huh? I thought. Though, the lack of real risk makes it less mentally taxing and stressful than what I usually do.

"Do not let your guard down," Nemesis warned. "You have no Brooch this time. That makes one less lifeline keeping you here."

"Yeah. Be ready to put up Counter Absorption if you sense any danger."

"Certainly," she said as she turned back into her greatsword form.

Black Mirror was her fourth and newest form, but she couldn't use Counter Absorption while she was in it, so the greatsword was better when we had to watch out for ambushes.

With the preparations done, we resumed traveling through the forest.

I encountered a couple more Plate Holders, but I hadn't yet met a single other participant.

I can hear sounds of fighting, though, I thought.

"They might have noticed you and retreated before you spotted them," said Nemesis.

"...Why aren't they approaching me?" I wondered.

"They might have decided that fighting while so few people actually have plates is meaningless, or..."

"Or...what?"

"...Your apparel scared them away."

"Whaa...?" My gear was the same as ever—Nemesis in hand, Storm Visage, Black Warcoat, and Grudge-Soaked Greaves.

Hell, without my VDA, my look was actually kind of toned-down from the usual.

"You scare away even tian brigands," Nemesis added.

"Everyone here's a Master, though..."

"In that case, they might be aware that you successfully faced Dryfe's Superiors and that your combat style is not well suited to endurance battles. Who in their right mind would fight you at the point where you have all your cards in hand?"

"...Good point."

I actually didn't have all my cards in hand, though.

Since I'd used my boots at the peace talks to summon Gardranda, the grudge levels in them were still low, while Monochrome was still far from fully charged. Other people wouldn't know that, though, so it made sense that they'd be wary of me .

"...Whoa!" Suddenly, I heard the sound of someone running ahead of me, coupled with the noise of trees being destroyed.

Looking beyond the trees in front, I saw something that deviated from the scenery of the forest I'd been seeing so far.

It looked like smoke—a white cloud on the surface, spreading out and flowing towards me.

"WAAAIT! I DON'T HAVE ANY! I GOT NO PLAAATES!" a familiar voice screamed.

"HYAHAAAH! I SEE, I KILL! WINNING'S GONNA BE A CAKEWALK WHEN I'M THE ONLY ONE LEFT!" another person yelled in response, making me wonder if the guy was RP'ing some battle-crazed lunatic.

"Ah!" the first person—Alto—cried as she leaped out of the smoke, her eyes widening in surprise when she spotted me.

"WHOOO! ANOTHER ONE!" the other person said, rushing to follow after her. He was a mohawked, muscle-bound man with a metal plate covering his face and a comically large gauntlet on his left arm.

A gauntlet that was currently being thrown directly at me. "Counter Absorption!" Nemesis and I cried in unison, preventing the gauntlet from even touching me.

I couldn't afford to worry about wasting my skill uses or waste time calculating if I could withstand the blow without it—every participant here was a Master, and there was no guarantee they didn't have skills that could instakill me.

My decision turned out to be correct, as the barrier of light we'd created immediately cracked upon impact, threatening to break.

"WHAAAT?! THAT WAS MY 'LEGEND OF THE STRONGEST FIST—POLYDEUKES'! HOW THE HELL'D YA BLOCK IT?!" The moment the attack came, I'd launched into a motion that was basically muscle memory at this point—the Impact Counter.

Nemesis touched the enemy at about the same moment the attack had landed...

“Vengeance is Mine!”

...and without the Brooch to protect him, my retribution skill pulverized him instantly.

The attack that had nearly broken Counter Absorption was probably an offense-enhancing ult, just like B3’s Atlas. Returned to him twofold, all of this damage turned the mohawked Master into motes of light before he even realized what was happening.

A moment later, the several plates he’d presumably gathered from monsters fell where he’d once stood.

“That was rather perfect,” said Nemesis.

“It would’ve been pretty bad if he broke through, though.” Knowing that Counter Absorption could presumably handle up to 300,000 damage, it was impressive that he came so close to its limit.

Assuming there were tons of Masters that powerful here, this event might’ve been more high-level than I thought.

“Oh yeah, Natsu— I mean, Alto?”

“Raaayyy! Thank you sooo much!” Alto said as she grabbed my hand and shook it up and down. “I told him I had no plates, but he just kept chasing me! I tried using a smokescreen to escape, but he was this close to catchin’ me...”

It seemed that the smoke I’d seen was the product of one of her skills.

“So, what now?” I asked.

“Huh?” Alto looked at my face, then Nemesis, then the place where the mohawked, masked musclehead had become bits of light and said, “I’m not fighting you! It’s too scary!” As she said this, she shook her head vigorously. “So let’s team up!”

“...From fighting straight to teaming up. Quite a leap, that,” said Nemesis.

“Hey, a whole three people can clear it and we’re friends, so there’s no reason not to!”

...Well, that’s more or less exactly how I see the situation, I thought.

“And on top of that, you’re not the type who can fight a lotta times, right? You used up one of your barriers just now too.”

I said nothing. She’d watched the recordings, so she seemed to know what I could and couldn’t do.

She was right—that punch had cost me one of my three Counter

Absorption uses, leaving me with just two.

"I'm a Nukenin, so I got a bunch of skills that can help ya escape!" Alto said.

"Nukenin? As in, a runaway ninja? I knew there was a ninja grouping, but didn't think there'd be a Nukenin job," I said.

Is that really a "job," though...? I wondered.

"I would say that your Death Soldier is no more of a 'job' than her Nukenin," said Nemesis. Point taken.

"The skill I used was Art of Smokescreen," Alto continued. "It spreads smoke that messes with perception skills. It does blind both friends and enemies, though!"

So that was why that mohawked musclehead hadn't noticed me until it was too late.

"That's a powerful skill," I said.

"Yep-yep. Nukenin is one of the ninja grouping's high-rank jobs! It's not very strong in fights, though!"

...So it is a high-rank job, I thought. Well, I guess if you aren't a decent ninja, you can't last as a runaway one.

"So yeah, I come with the added bonus of letting you avoid useless battles! How about it?"

This event was partially about survival. With that in mind, her skills might've been more useful to me than some additional mediocre firepower.

"I'll throw a game into the mix too! It's okay! Let's play some cat's cradle!"

"What's with your passion for cat's cradle?" That aside, though... "You can hold off on the game, but I'm fine with teaming up," I said. I couldn't keep fighting endlessly, so I had to pick and choose my battles. Alto, on the other hand, was great at disengaging, but didn't have much raw combat potential. We would both benefit from teaming up.

"YAAYY! I got a bodyguard!"

Hey, you can fight the monsters yourself, can't you?

Anyway, we resumed the search—now as a duo. The both of us watched out for other participants while hunting the monsters we came across.

Despite what she'd said, Alto actually did participate in the battles. Like the ninja she was, she fought by throwing kunai and shuriken from mid-range.

They really didn’t seem to do much damage, though.

“Normally, I make these poisonous or explosive, but it doesn’t look like poison would work on them, while explosions would attract the attention of other players—and we don’t want that, do we?” she explained, and I could actually see her point. I myself wasn’t using Purgatorial Flames to avoid starting a forest fire that would attract everyone on the island.

Since basically everyone was an enemy, the only ones who could afford to stand out were the ones powerful enough to deal with the consequences of that. Anyone else would be brought down just like that Master with the flying machine.

“Oh, Ray, you should put this on,” said Alto, handing me a folded piece of cloth.

“What’s this?” I asked.

“Some cloth.”

“I can tell that much. Why are you giving it to me?”

“You should use it to hide your face.”

“...Why?” It wasn’t a piece of gear and didn’t seem to give any stats...

“I mean, you’re a retribution build, right? Plus you’re famous and tons of people know your face, so I think you’ll have a hard time landing counters as easily as you did back there.”

...She had a point.

“It’s not gonna do much against those who’ll still fight you even knowing who you are, but no one knows everyone in this event, so it’ll help a bit, doncha think?”

“I do. Guess I’ll use it, then. Thanks,” I said as I took the cloth from her and wrapped it on my face.

I thought I’d have trouble breathing with it, but thanks to Storm Visage, I was just fine.

“How’s this?” I asked. The silence I got in response was deafening. Hey, what the hell? I thought.

“You went past ‘dark knight’ and straight into ‘undead’ territory,” said Alto. “Like one of those corpse-things that lost its face.”

“The cloth and oxygen mask combo makes even your breathing sound terrifying,” said Nemesis. I responded by breathing even more heavily. “...Well, I suppose it would do the job of concealing your identity,” she added.

"Oh yeah! It's perfect!" Alto approved of that, at least. Well, if it was useful, then all was good. I needed to increase my chances of winning as much as possible, so every little bit helped.

Now done with my..."transformation," we resumed walking.

"Hm? Oh yeah..." I said, realizing something.

Alto knew of our skills and was worried that other participants would know about them too. However, I knew barely anything about what she could do...particularly, her Embryo.

"Hey, Alto," I said.

"Cat's cradle?"

"No. You still haven't told me about your Embryo."

"Ohhh..." she said, her eyes darting to and fro as though something was bothering her. "Hmm... Ray, have you got a good head on your shoulders?"

"...We go to the same college." What kind of question was that? And from her, of all people?

"That's not what I mean. Are you good at riddles and stuff?"

"I'm about average, I guess?" I couldn't recall dabbling in them all that much.

"Then let's just leave it at that. If the riddle thing goes wrong, it could be all over for us."

"...Are you implying your Embryo can't be used if your friend doesn't solve a riddle?"

"It's kinda like that, yeah."

"I see..." Knowing how Embryos worked, it wasn't that far-fetched that there might be ones that really were that weird. Honestly, seeing as Natsume was the kind of person who asked everyone if they wanted to play cat's cradle, it would only make sense for her Embryo to be particularly bizarre.

"By the way, Ray. What's our plate situation?" she asked.

"With the one we just got, we have exactly ten."

There were three that said "2," three that said "4," two that said "0," one that said "1," and one that said "5."

"...Seems a bit unbalanced, doesn't it?" said Alto.

"I see what you mean, but it's still just ten plates," I replied. "Though, if there's a meaning to this lack of balance, then I guess it'd suggest that the answer uses both '2' and '4.'"

"It's eight digits, so maybe it's a date?"

She thought of the same thing we did, I thought.

"It's possible, but we can't be sure just yet. We need to find the hints."

"Yep-yep. But wouldn't it be easier to search while flying? You can fly, right?"

Oh yeah, I haven't explained that to her, I thought.

"It's...not a good idea right now," I said. "There's someone with some crazy anti-air powers, so if we go up..."

Before I could finish my explanation, another beam of light pierced through the small bit of sky we could see through the forest canopy.

"...We're gonna get shot down like that." Looks like they're still at it, I thought.

"Wooow. That looks like it's from a sci-fi anime. We can't deal with that!" said Alto.

Well, it sure was easy to get her to understand... Hm?

"Is that the sound of something falling from above...?" asked Nemesis. Her words, combined with the rushing noise of the air parting, made me look up again.

A moment later, something broke the branches above our heads, and a black object fell onto the ground ahead of us.

Before crashing to the ground, it created a gust of wind and scattered feathers everywhere, which then slowly floated to the ground like black snow.

The feathers surrounded a black-clad girl, now lying unconscious in a small crater.

"...Juliet?" Indeed—it was none other than the Altarian duel ranker and the friend who was participating in this event alongside us. Her body and gear were both badly damaged, and most importantly, her Embryo-wings...Hræsvelgr had lost most of its feathers.

"Ray! A girl fell from the sky!" said Alto as if she had been waiting her whole life to say that.

"Shut up for a second," I said as I considered Juliet's situation.

I didn't know for what purpose, but she'd taken to the sky to examine the landscape before the anti-air beam-shooting Master had brought her down.

"And since the feathers are all over the place, I guess she used Molting to reduce the damage.” She’d used that skill with me during our sparring matches. It was one of Hræsvelgr’s skills, and it basically functioned like reactive armor. It caused it to release its feathers with a burst of wind and dark magic, making it a combination of a defensive skill and ablative armor.

It did, however, have a drawback—losing its feathers made Hræsvelgr unable to fly for the three hours until they came back.

“So, Ray... You gonna finish her off?”

“Hell no!” I know this isn’t a serious event, but I’m not the kind of scumbag who attacks his friends when they’re unconscious!

“But duel rankers are the kind of people who go around the battlefield singing and turning people into mincemeat, aren’t they? Isn’t it dangerous to leave her be?”

“The duel rankers I know aren’t...well...yeah. They aren’t like that. Probably,” I said.

“It is troubling that you cannot say that with certainty,” said Nemesis.

...Well, I did see Figaro churn through all of Mad Castle like a blender, I thought. Wait, did Alto just imply that there’s a lot of people like that in Tenchi?

“All I know is that you don’t have to worry about that with Juliet. Anyway...”

Leaving her here Fainted would’ve left a bad taste in my mouth, so I decided to take her with us.

◇◇◇

???

“I messed up...”

Juliet was in the place where Masters who had Fainted or were under the effects of Forced Sleep were taken to. It had many names, but Juliet’s group referred to it as the “waiting space.”

“Was I panicking?” she wondered, her head bowed. She was worried that this might’ve been her last day to play with her friends, and because of this, she rushed to search for Chelsea and fulfill her promise—to seize this opportunity and use it to the fullest.

Chelsea was Juliet’s longtime rival and closest friend, and this might’ve been her last chance to battle her. It seemed that the sentiment had overwhelmed her, making her overlook the possibility that there could be Masters present with anti-air attacks.

As a result, she was caught off guard, and though she was able to use Molting to avoid a direct hit, she was still shot down and had lost consciousness.

"I know I'm the Fallen Knight, but this is too much... Though, since I'm here in the waiting space, I guess I haven't gotten the death penalty..."

There was no telling when someone would finish her off, though.

"Chelsea..." Feeling apologetic towards her dear friend, Juliet was at a loss as she waited for the death penalty to come.

However, a whole five minutes passed, and she was still alive.

"What's going on...?" she wondered—right as the so-called waiting space around her began to dissolve.

Juliet knew that meant that she was recovering from her Fainting, and the next moment, she found that her body was swaying back and forth rhythmically. She couldn't open her eyes yet, but she could hear sounds—particularly the sound of a horse's hooves hitting the ground.

"We haven't run into anyone since then, huh, Ray? Not like I really want to run into anybody."

"Yeah, so far, I've just met you, the mohawk guy, and Juliet. This island might be pretty big."

Juliet then heard the voices of her friend, Ray, and Ray's friend, Alto.

She realized that they must have saved her and began to consider something else—specifically, the situation she was in.

Ah. Wait... Is this...?! she thought as a certain image came to mind—an illustration from a children's tale she'd read in elementary school, showing a prince astride a white horse with the princess clasped in his arms. That mental image made her wonder if she was currently in the exact same situation as the princess, with Ray holding her as they rode.

Hm...! Hm...?! she thought, flustered. Juliet had a high opinion of Ray. He was a friend who shared her taste in clothing and a sparring partner with a shockingly good sense for combat.

To her, he was "more than a friend, but less than a bestie"... Even if she did like him in a different way, there wasn't much to it.

Still, if he went and treated her like a princess straight out of a fairytale, she couldn't help but tense up and...

"By the way, Ray... Isn't this the kind of situation where you oughta princess-carry her? Or give her a piggyback ride at least?"

Huh? Juliet thought. Alto's words made her realize that a princess-carry would put her facing up. However, her senses were telling her that she was face*down*, and that she was on top of something.

"Hey, it'd be pretty bad if we got ambushed and I couldn't use both of my arms, wouldn't it?" said Ray.

"Alto, although Ray tends to be the voice of reason, he may sometimes do strange things," said Nemesis.

On top of that, Juliet also felt that she was tied to something at her waist.

That was when she opened her eyes.

"Oh, she's awake. You okay, Juliet?" Ray—who was wearing a dark-looking mask—questioned her with a worried tone, while Alto looked at her with pitying eyes.

And so, Juliet found out that she'd been put on Silver's back belly-down and tied to him so she wouldn't fall.

Ah. This is how they carry bags of rice, not princesses...

The reality was so far from what she'd envisioned that Juliet couldn't help but feel a little shocked.

Chapter Four: Another Team Up

Event Area, Southeast, Plains

An hour had passed since the event's beginning. The surviving participants were now enacting their plans to come out on top.

Some were focusing on hunting monsters and searching for clues to the puzzle, while others found advantageous positions and lay in wait to ambush other participants.

And then, there were some who attacked monsters and people without care or restraint.

"All right. Time to get this rodeo started," said King of Cowboys, Jamie Crescent. He was among those who chose to fight indiscriminately. "C'mere, Matanga," he said, making his crest glow and release his Embryo.

"PHOOO!" The creature made a loud noise as it manifested its form—a seven-trunked white elephant named "Elephantine Cloudscape, Abhra-Matanga." It was based on an entity from Hinduism that went by many names, among which were "Airavata" and "Elephant of the Clouds."

"Pale-Clouded Field of Unsight—Abhra-Matanga," Jamie said, unleashing his ultimate. True to its name, Matanga began releasing dense clouds from its seven trunks. So white they blocked sight of the land below, the clouds spread until they engulfed Jamie himself. They soon reached as far as four hundred metels in every direction.

And then, those same clouds assumed a form similar to that creature that had created them—a massive, seven-trunked elephant.

"There we go. That's a good size," Jamie said as he sat down on the heart of the gigantic cloud-elephant—Abhra-Matanga's actual body.

Having activated his ultimate skill, he then began enacting his plan for victory—crushing everyone else.

"All right, Matanga. Move," he said. Obeying his command, the Embryo began to push forwards, causing the cloud-elephant to move at the same time.

Like a thunderhead that had fallen from the sky, the giant cloud-creature walked on the surface of the ground. However, it was nothing but vapor, so it lacked the weight to do much harm to the land below.

Still, its majesty was enough to invoke terror in the other participants.

“An enemy! Disintegrating Bow of Divine Lightning—INDRAAAAA!” a Master ahead of the cloud-elephant roared, unleashing his Embryo’s ultimate skill.

A bolt of lighting that rivaled a Superior Job’s ult in power struck the massive being, despite the fact that it was made entirely of clouds.

“That’s one helluva skill, partner. Man, 500,000 damage sure is somethin’,” Jamie said, showing no surprise that his elephant had been hit.

This was simply how Abhra-Matanga functioned—the cloud-elephant that echoed its true form was now part of its body.

“It took a whole 1% of HP outta my boy. Got a few tough guys here, huh?” he added—implying that his Embryo had 50,000,000 HP. “Trample ’im.”

With those words, the clouds moved to crush the Master who had exposed his location. Each step made far less noise than its size would indicate, but it was still enough to crush trees and monsters below.

And, perhaps most importantly, the cloud-elephant would never stop.

Attacks on it had almost no effect, so it was easily able to approach its target and begin stomping on him over and over again. For something as big as it was, Abhra-Matanga didn’t seem to do much damage. However, since it did not respond to retaliation, it could just repeat its weak attacks until its enemies were dead.

Unable to escape or withstand it, Indra’s Master soon fell.

King of Cowboys, Jamie Crescent was a member of the top clan in Huang He, Huili Yuminjun, and his role there could be summed up with the word “tank.” His cloud-elephant had the immense HP to weather any attack and carve open the path for his teammates.

This was made possible by his Embryo and job combo.

Abhra-Matanga’s base stats were on the level of a Pure-Dragon. It had 100,000 HP; 5,000 END; and an AGI score that didn’t even reach four digits.

However, the clouds it released with its ult allowed it to grow in size, increasing its HP by a factor of 50.

This ult was essentially a skill that gave it HP in exchange for increasing its size. It did nothing to Abhra-Matanga's other stats, so its attack and speed remained the same. However, it greatly increased its hitbox, making it difficult to dodge any attacks—opponents had difficulty evading the giant creature's strikes, and in turn it struggled to avoid anything aimed its way.

On its own, the skill would lead to Matanga being pelted with attacks and dying in spite of its vast HP.

That was where Jamie's skills as King of Cowboys came in.

Found in the eastern parts of the continent, King of Cowboys was a hybrid Superior Job mixing the rider and tamer groupings, and was somewhat like the polar opposite of King of Chariots.

Whereas King of Chariots enhanced machines and other similar devices, King of Cowboys enhanced living creatures. One of the job's skills, Cattle Lifeforce Enhancement, multiplied the HP of King of Cowboy's tamed monsters by 10.

This skill was originally meant to help with stock-farming or subsidize a job's ultimate skill, but when combined with Abhra-Matanga's own skill, its HP went above and beyond.

Despite being a Sentinel—a high-rank Guardian—in its sixth form, it could achieve HP totals that surpassed those of Mythical UBMs.

With the addition of Lifelink diverting all damage suffered by the tamer to his monsters, you couldn't even kill it by targeting Jamie himself.

Few tanks were as potent as a fully enhanced Abhra-Matanga.

"If only I could do this at duels. I sure wouldn't be stuck at seventh anymore." Indeed—Matanga's ultimate could only be fully utilized in open fields. The confines of the duel barriers made it impossible for the combo to work as it did now, so the other duelists could overcome the limited buff to its HP.

In fact, Matanga had once been burned away completely by the second in the duel rankings, Xunyu.

"This here's my pasture, though. I'll crush the rest, win this little shindig and go git my praise from Lady Huili," he said with a smile even as his cloud-elephant was being continually pelted with attacks. Everyone nearby had immediately decided he was the greatest threat and had focused their spells, arrows, and thrown weapons on Matanga, who didn't seem to care all that much.

"These folks here are all hat, no cattle. They're showin' me exactly where we gotta go to crush ’em,” Jamie said, directing Matanga towards the source of all the attacks.

Crushing his enemies one after the other, he advanced to the north of the southeastern plains area until he came upon a river.

Beyond the river stood a dense forest. The river was by no means small, but the cloud-elephant could traverse it in a single step, and the trees of the forest were little more than blades of grass to its massive legs.

Jamie considered moving forwards and crushing any enemies that might be hiding inside...

“...Stop.”

...but then he ordered Matanga to freeze in place.

Seated on the massive elephant, he looked down into the forest, where he spotted a particular element of scenery.

“...I saw that in a picture,” he said. “Heard of it too. Seems like we really do have Masters from all over the world here. All righty, then...”

He hesitated a moment, wondering whether he should change course or press on...

“Matanga...we’ll go on a Rodeo Drive.”

...and decided to charge ahead.

“BHOOOHHH!”

“Rodeo Drive” was the name of King of Cowboys’ final ultimate job skill. It multiplied all of his mount’s stats aside from HP by 10 in exchange for draining HP at the appalling rate of 10,000 per second.

This HP drain would kill most mounts, but with fully enhanced Abhra-Matanga boasting a whole 50,000,000 HP, it was merely a drop in the bucket.

It was difficult to use in duels due to the aforementioned limitations the dueling rules put on Matanga’s ult, but there were no such restrictions holding them back now. Jamie prepared to unleash it while charging into the forest...

“If they want a rodeo, then I’ll give ’em one! Rodeo—”

...only for Matanga to vanish before he could do so.

“...Dri— Huh?”

The cloud-elephant vanished as Matanga’s true form became bits of light.

Left hundreds of metels above the surface, Jamie began to fall.

"What in tarnation...?" he cried, moments before he hit the ground and died instantly.

Upon witnessing the disappearance of the massive elephant and the death of its Master, another Master—a beautiful woman clad all in black—puffed out her chest.

"Oh ho ho ho! And just like that, it is done!" She was thirteenth in every ranking in Altar—Dark Princess, Shion Manjushage.

"...This feels like a bit much. You actually made me feel bad for Jamie," another person replied, in a pitying tone of voice. This other voice was Max.

"That big thing was an Embryo, and my Judas is an Embryo too!" Shion replied. "That makes us even and this battle was fair!"

"Judas" was the name of Shion's Embryo, and it was exactly what had caused the cloud-elephant to vanish—or rather to instantly die. It was a Type Rule which gave all of her attacks a high chance to apply status effects. Normally, the status effect applied was randomly picked from a pool of thirteen, but her ultimate skill guaranteed that the target would receive a Death Sentence.

Shion's build combined her spells as the Dark Princess—a dark magic Superior Job—with the high-probability debuffs from her Embryo, Judas.

"That thing was so huge and tough that he probably didn't even notice the Death Sentence debuff," said a third person—Chelsea—with a wry grin on her face. "Funny, since there was a countdown right above it."

She'd been watching Jamie's defeat alongside Shion and Max. The three of them had met up some time before the cloud-elephant appeared, and as a result, they'd agreed to team up for the time being.

Chelsea was in fact the one who'd told Shion to attack the elephant. The Dark Princess had then used her Embryo's ult, Kiss of Death—Judas, and fired a controllable dark magic projectile. Using that projectile, she had been able to land a hit on the creature that appeared to come from a different direction.

While using that tactic to misdirect Jamie, they waited for the curse's countdown to reach 0 and kill the elephant.

It's not like it'd have helped him if he knew where we were, Chelsea thought. Once it hits, Shion's ult can only be canceled by convincing her to do it herself.

It was widely believed that Judas's Death Sentence could only be undone by Shion's own will.

Is that really the only way, though? Does she really have to just land it like that? Honestly, it's so broken that it makes me kind of uneasy. Well, even a dummy like Shion wouldn't answer an incriminating question like that...and she probably hasn't consulted anyone else even if she doesn't get it herself.

Regardless, nobody in a battle royale would want to deal with an unavoidable one-hit-kill ability like Judas had.

It's a reliable thing to have on your side, though, Chelsea thought. This had been why she'd chosen to convince Shion to try clearing the event as a group of three.

I'll have to pass on Ray and his friend. I'm not gonna make an enemy out of Shion. And Maxie has info on eastern rankers we don't know anything about.

Max had started out in Tenchi and had even become a duel ranker there, so she knew about rankers from the east—Jamie included.

If I'm gonna fight Julie, these guys are my best bet in terms of reliability and power... It's the best way to clear this event and have an all-out fight with Julie.

Being a duel ranker and ex-leader of a ranking clan, Chelsea calmly and thoroughly analyzed the situation.

Though, maybe we should've kept that elephant alive a bit longer. Shion would win against it ten times outta ten just 'cause of the compatibility... Wait, that aside...

"...I wonder why that elephant stopped moving," she said, thinking back to the massive cloud-creature stopping before a river.

"Perhaps it was in preparation for a skill?" Shion said.

"If that's the case, there must've been somethin' there that made him think to use it."

"Well, it ain't like we can figure out what's goin' on in the forest from here," Max said.

"...True." Jamie could see far and wide from his Matanga, but Chelsea's group had no means of finding out what was beyond the dense trees.

If Julie were here, we could've had her fly up and look around, but that's not somethin' we can count on this time, huh? They had little info on the forested area, but if the giant elephant had stopped and tried to charge into it with a skill, it was probably best to avoid it.

"Let's go to the opposite side of the forest. We still got no hints or plates," Chelsea said.

"Huh? What about the plates Mr. Elephant dropped?" Shion asked.

"Leave 'em. Everyone could see 'em drop, so there's probably tons of Masters fightin' there now."

"Well, that makes me a sad panda..." Shion was disappointed, but she understood the risk and did as she was told.

And so, the group went away from the northeast forest and headed southwest instead.

...I wonder where Julie's fightin' now. Chelsea's thoughts wandered to the friend she had promised to face with all her strength.

◇◆

Juliet, meanwhile, was near the center of the forest Chelsea's group were currently avoiding, in a space surrounded by trees that had been cut down in a strange manner.

"Ugh...!" she let out. Her expression showed how tense she was better than any words could.

"This woman...!" Nemesis said.

"...This reminds me of when I first met Figaro. I wonder why," said Ray.

"Wh-Wh-Wha?! Wh-Wh-Wh-Wha?!" Alto replied, if something like that could even be called "replying."

"Oh, it appears I have stumbled upon quite an exciting group," said the fourth person here—their opponent.

Both a woman and an asura, she wielded different weapons in both of her hands as well as the two extra pairs of prosthetic arms sticking out of her shoulders. On top of that, a whole six more weapons floated around her.

She was like a many-armed deity depicted in some eastern religions.

"A-Ahhhhhhhh... Th... Asu—?!" Alto had been trembling in fear from the moment she'd seen her.

However, she was somehow able to weave together a few specific words.

“King of Asuras...Jubei Kaga?!”

This was the woman’s job, as well as her nickname. Fourth in Tenchi’s duel rankings, she was King of Asura, Jubei Kaga the “Multi-Asura,” and she was no doubt one of the strongest participants in this event.

Interlude: The Scorpion, the Axe, and the Costume

Event Area, North

Flow Princess, Juba was riding the mechanical scorpion named "Citrine Obliterator" from the hill in the north of the island towards the mountains in the center. Up until now, she'd held her position in the north, shooting down anyone careless enough to fly above her section of the island.

Now, she would hunt in the south and gather their plates.

That elephant Embryo... Juba thought. Just like many others, she'd witnessed Jamie's Abhra-Matanga, as well as the moment it vanished.

One of those attacks must've had a slow-working instadeath effect. I do know someone who can do that... Altar's "Night Spider."

The person who came to Juba's mind was in fact exactly the Master who'd brought down Jamie—Shion Manjushage.

She was fairly famous in Altar for taking a spot in all three rankings, so she was somewhat well-known in Dryfe, as well.

The owner of the first unit...Amethyst Captor. Besides that, Juba knew Shion as a fellow owner of a Prism Crawler—an elder sibling to her Citrine. It was obvious that Shion was someone to fear.

I shot down the Black Crow. I didn't go to take her plates since she fell into the forest, but even if she survived, she'll be easily hunted down by someone else in that condition. That means that the Altarian I need to look out for the most is the Night Spider. Seeing how skillfully she took out the elephant, she must be pretty sharp.

It might have been, however, that Juba was attributing too much to Shion. If Chelsea or Max had heard Juba's thoughts just now, they would've certainly said something along the lines of "I wouldn't be so sure. Especially about the 'sharp' part."

Her own allies saw Shion as a bit of a silly goose.

...There aren't many easy flying targets now...so I guess I should make Shion Manjushage the "Night Spider" my priority target. And so, Juba and Citrine moved to search for Shion and her Amethyst.

Event Area, South

Deep inside a grove, a man looked up at the sky and sighed.

"This is what happens when you don't listen to warnings, cowboy," he said as he watched Abhra-Matanga vanish.

He was King of Axes, Wan—another member of Huili Yuminjun—and he couldn't help but be exasperated by how Jamie had retired from the game.

When at maximum size, Abhra-Matanga certainly had immense HP, and Rodeo Drive gave it plenty of attack power. Even Wan himself would have a hard time fighting against it.

However, the consensus among members of Huili Yuminjun was that being such a large target made it far too vulnerable to "less obvious" attacks.

Embryos were all unique, and many of them might have powers that could kill something in a single hit.

I suppose the only one who could pulverize it in a head-on battle is Lady Huili herself, Wan thought as he pictured the most powerful and beautiful Master he knew. The thought brought a smile to his face.

The top of Huang He's duel rankings was the Draconic Emperor, and the second was Xunyu. However, Wan and the other members of Huili Yuminjun knew that the strongest Master in Huang He was without a doubt Huili herself.

Though The Arts, Ming She might be able to defeat her, that didn't change the fact that she was indeed the strongest.

This was a truth that all Masters of Huang He would agree on.

"Anyhow, with my 'comrade' defeated, I suppose I will have to fight by myself. Do you not think so as well?" Wan spoke as though he was talking to himself, but he turned around as though there was someone there.

And indeed, there was a Master there with a spear held at the ready.

Based on his clothing, Wan assumed that he was from Tenchi.

"So you knew I was here," the spear-wielder said.

"Do not act like you were intending to ambush me. If I had not called out to you, you would have done so first," said Wan.

"Heh. I am no ninja or nobushi. As a martial artist, I will fight you fair and square—and I will win the same way."

"I like that. I will fight you, yes...but I will not let you have the victory."

They were both Masters, but their words certainly didn't seem Master-like. Most people would have dismissed this as just a bit of RP, but they were both genuinely elated to have found a strong enemy who shared their aura.

"HIIYAAH!" The Master from Tenchi rushed towards Wan while brandishing his weapon—a "jumonji yari" or "cross spear."

Wan equipped his battle-axe and prepared to intercept him.

A moment later, the sounds of clashing metal filled the grove.

"Hm... I see that spear is an Embryo."

"And your axe, while a work of art, seems to not be so."

Indeed, Wan's axe was not an Embryo.

It was a custom-made weapon forged by the clan's blacksmiths. One of its blades was focused on pure toughness, while the other was built to break through resistances, making it a versatile weapon fit for many situations.

Lumberjacks changed their axes depending on the trees they were cutting, and this axe worked on that same principle.

"An Embryo must have a power or two," Wan said.

"Of course!" the spear-wielder replied as he made the weapon's blade shine red.

Wan could now feel heat flowing through his axe as it clashed with the glowing spear.

So it heats up and releases the heat, Wan thought. The spear even launched small fireballs as its wielder lunged.

Wan was able to evade them, but the heat they gave off made him realize that they were likely as powerful as the ultimate skill of a high-rank flame magic job.

How very like Tenchi—simple, but usable and strong... Although...

"Erupt!" the spear-wielder cried as he thrust his weapon forwards, making it release a chain of fireballs.

Wan evaded them, and the fireballs instead struck the trees behind him.

A moment later, the trees exploded, and Wan was consumed by the flames.

"...Huh?" A voice of pure surprise rang out—not from Wan, but the spear-wielder himself.

He’d used his fireballs on trees many times now, but this had never happened before.

To escape the blast, he leaped away—only for his back to hit a tree.

What?! There was no tree here before...! he thought in shock. The man was a skilled Master from Tenchi, and he wasn’t the kind of fool who would fail to properly examine his surroundings to know if they were fit for spear-fighting.

The impact of him crashing into the tree dislodged one of its ripe fruits. At the mercy of gravity, it fell on the spear-wielder’s shoulder, broke open, and released its juices.

What followed were the sounds of sizzling flesh and a stomach-churning smell.

“GAAAAAHHH?!” The juice melted away the spear-wielder’s armor and burned straight through the meat of his shoulder.

An explosion, a crash, and severe burns—the chain of unexpected events had completely distracted the spear-wielder.

“This is the end,” Wan said, emerging from the blast to split the spear-wielder in half at the waist, along with the tree behind him.

Before his guts could spill onto the ground, however, the tree released a torrent of sap, which instantly caused another explosion.

The spear-wielder was completely annihilated, reduced to nothing but ash. Many martial artists from Tenchi had Death Soldier as a sub-job, but it meant nothing if the body was completely destroyed.

“My apologies for the underhanded tactics,” said Wan. “But while I did say I would fight, I said nothing about being fair.”

Despite being in the center of the explosion, not only was Wan himself unburned—there was not even a hint of fire damage to his clothes.

That made it obvious that there was a link between him and these strange trees.

“Now, the plates... Ah, here they are,” Wan said, looting the plates that had been blown away by the explosion. They had neither been destroyed, nor had they been damaged by the plant’s caustic sap.

“...So they are tougher than they look and feel. If I could bring this back, it would make a good souvenir for the blacksmiths,” he said with a smile before walking away. “I suppose I should go look for more. This event can be cleared by the first three players who solve the puzzle, but it is better to be early than late."

In good spirits, he began hunting for his next prey.

Whether it was a monster or another participant didn't matter to him. His goal right now was to fight to show the power of Huili Yuminjun and to present the final prize to the lady he so revered.

Thus, he walked away, leaving strange fruit-bearing trees growing behind him.

Event Area, Middle

The Master who'd started the game next to the goal—the one in the bear suit—was gazing up at the sky, watching as the giant cloud-elephant vanished.

Everyone was currently busy doing their own thing, but in the end, they would all have to head to the goal to insert their plates.

That meant that if someone set a trap here, then even flying participants would be caught in it.

That was exactly what he was doing now.

He was so focused on setting his trap that he didn't even notice the enemy stealthily approaching him.

Ninja-like, but closer in appearance to a desert assassin, he was using multiple presence and sound-hiding job skills as he used a cloth to apply a special poison, produced by his Embryo, to a black dagger.

A single stab to the bear-man's back with this poisoned knife would instantly bring him down.

So careless. This is why you always need to be on guard, the assassin thought mockingly as he brought his dagger down.

It was aimed straight at the bear-man's neck, but it only softly sank into the fabric, not even breaking through to his target's body.

"Ah?!" Feeling as though he'd landed a punch on an overstuffed pillow, the assassin was overcome with shock.

However, that told him the gear had a higher defense than it seemed to.

But there was something else that shocked him—the bear-man's speed.

Just a split second after being attacked, he had grabbed the assassin by the neck.

Nghh...! But this ain't a problem! he thought, taking the same cloth he'd used to apply poison to the dagger. It was still drenched in poison so potent that it didn't have to enter the bloodstream to have an effect—it was plenty useful when merely touching the skin, as well.

He should faint in less than a...se...cond...? he thought, but reality was quite different—the power of the bear-man's grip wasn't waning as he continued to strangle the assassin.

H-Huh? It didn't...work...? As he wondered why his poison had been so ineffective, he heard the bones in his neck begin to crack.

That was when he finally realized something.

Ah, so that's how it is. He wasn't...careless... He just doesn't have t—

Before he could finish his thought, his neck snapped, and his head rolled to the ground.

Silence. The assassin transformed into bits of light, and the bear-man gathered his plates.

Done with the ambusher and the placement of traps around the goal, he then began walking towards his next destination.

Chapter Five: The Asura

The attack came in a flash.

We'd moved into the dense forest at this point, so we dismounted Silver to make it easier to traverse. Before long, however, multiple daggers shot towards us.

"Ngh?!"

Juliet and I reacted just in time. She'd used her partially recovered wings to fly backwards, while I covered Alto and used my second Counter Absorption. The barrier of light stopped the attack from the flying blade—a grudge-clad spear.

"This is..." I was able to react to it in time because the weapon was cursed. Before I'd even seen it, I'd felt my Greaves begin to absorb its grudge, which alerted me to the enemy's presence.

Having overcome the preliminary attack, I scanned our surroundings and noticed that the blade Juliet had evaded—a tachi—was still moving.

"Ah!" Seeing that made me realize that this wasn't a simple thrown projectile, but a homing weapon much like Max's Ipetam.

Counter Absorption was a powerful defensive skill, but it only prevented one single attack, so a follow-up strike would easily break through.

"Tch!" Nemesis clicked her tongue as she prepared to expend the third and final use of the skill, but then...

"My, what a pleasant group."

...we heard a joyful voice, after which the flying tachi stopped moving entirely.

"Finally, I've found people who survived my first attack... People who can give me a true bloodbath!" The beautiful voice was thick with happiness, plain for all to hear.

A moment later, I saw blade-trails arc through the air—which were followed by the surrounding trees crashing to the ground.

Between them, in this newly created passage through the forest, there stood a single woman.

She was dressed in clothing that resembled a kimono, and her exposed skin was covered in countless scars. Four prosthetic limbs jutted out of her shoulders, each of them grasping a bladed weapon, and there were six more weapons floating around her. Two of them were the spear and tachi that had attacked us.

She was clearly just another participant, but the aura of strangeness mixed with familiarity that surrounded her filled me with terror.

"This woman...!" said Nemesis.

"...This reminds me of when I first met Figaro. I wonder why," I said. She seemed as threatening as Figaro had back at the Tomb Labyrinth, while her prosthetic limbs, although different in shape, reminded me of Kashimiya.

"King of Asuras...Jubei Kaga?!" Alto blurted out what I assumed were the woman's job and name.

"...King of Asuras?" I asked.

"Oh? Are you a Tenchi-dweller? You look like a kunoichi, but..." KoA said with a glance at Alto.

"Aaahh?!" Alto cowered and shook under the woman's gaze.

So she's the kind of person that can turn even this simpleminded, lighthearted cat's cradle maniac into a cowering mess, huh? I thought.

"...Some of that sounds a bit rude," said Nemesis telepathically.

"I do not recall ever seeing you," said KoA. "Odd, since I believe I would at least recognize the kind of Tenchi-dweller who would be chosen for such an event."

"Please don't mind me! Unlike them, I'm just a nobody!" Alto said, moving behind us so we would serve as a shield.

...Well, I am the tank of this group, so it's whatever.

"And this is not even the first time you've been used as a shield. Rook did so as well just recently," Nemesis added.

Yeah. And this honestly feels a lot better than trying to be a damage sponge against the goddamn KoB.

"I do recognize the winged lady here, though," KoA said as she tilted her head, presumably trying to recall exactly who Juliet was.

Though her actions seemed quite casual, I couldn't see any openings in her guard. The six floating weapons were still orbiting her like satellites.

“Truly, ’tis the hide of one hardened by battle... (She has so many scars...)” said Juliet.

“I have not died in a while,” said KoA. “The scars have accumulated.”

Changes to your avatar, such as scars or lost limbs, were removed when you recovered from a death penalty—but if you didn’t die, they would stay with you until dealt with. I knew this painfully well from my own time spent without an arm. Assuming the same was true of KoA, it meant that she’d been in countless deadly battles...yet survived them all.

And that was exactly what Juliet was referring to.

“Oh, I remember now,” KoA said as she clapped her unarmed real hands together and looked at us. “You are an Altarian duel ranker. The fourth from the top, to be precise—Juliet the ‘Black Crow.’ Am I correct?”

“...You speak the truth,” Juliet said with a nod. I guess she thought that there was no point in trying to lie now that the enemy had seen her face, name, and even her Embryo.

“Eh heh heh,” King of Asuras chuckled. “I feel so lucky to meet a famous westerner. I am Jubei, a duel ranker from Tenchi. And I am the fourth, just like you. This coincidence can only be a sign that we will have a fruitful crossing of blades.”

Though her words were unsettling, the smile on her face was charming.

“The fourth, huh?” I said. That was definitely the same number as Juliet’s, but...

“The duels of Tenshi are fierce and zealous, far beyond the contests waged within our own lands.”

Yeah, just like Juliet had said, Tenchi had over double the number of duelists that Altar had, so for a more accurate comparison of ranks between our countries, you had to cut a Tenshi duelist’s rank in half.

“That means she’d be a match for the second in our rankings...Kashimiya.”

In that case, the odds were against us even if we had strength in numbers.

Though, if this was an easy battle for her, then why...?

“Why didn’t you just keep attacking us until we died?” I asked. We’d been able to deal with the first attack, but she had a whole six floating weapons to work with. She could’ve easily defeated us...or at least defeated me.

“A chance to talk to Masters from the other side of the world comes rarely, does it not?” she asked in response. “I cannot talk to you after I slice you up, so I am doing so now merely to give me something to remember.”

...The mix of friendliness and bloodlust was disturbing, but it helped me understand what kind of person she was.

Still, this was something I could play along with.

“Can I ask something, then?” I said. Figuring it was our best bet, I was going to try to find out more about her.

“Ask away. Though I will ask you something in return later.” King of Asuras...or rather, Jubei readily gave me the go-ahead.

I actually hadn’t really expected this to work, but now that I had her attention...

“...Are those weapons floating because of an Embryo skill? Your Embryo’s the arms growing out of your shoulders, right?” While Embryos like Figaro’s replaced a part of the body, the arms seemed to be more like Juliet’s wings—a so-called “Fusion-Arms” type Embryo that added new body parts.

“Asura is indeed my Embryo, but the weapons float due to a job skill. It is called ‘Asuran Battle-Mounts’ and to put it simply, I suppose you can say that it adds extra equipment slots for weapons controlled by telekinesis.”

“Telekinesis...” I knew of skills that added equipment slots through Figaro, but I didn’t think there was a special variation of such skills that let you equip things without actually equipping them, so to speak.

“As you can see, Asura also gives me extra slots, so I can wield quite a large number of weapons,” Jubei added.

An Embryo called “Asura,” and a Superior Job called “King of Asuras.” They both had “Asura” in the name, and they both added equipment slots.

Well, now I totally got why her nickname was “Multi-Asura.”

“This allows me to cross blades with others as much as I desire. I like it quite a bit,” Jubei added.

“...I can see that.” Extra equipment slots didn’t seem like a very strong Embryo ability just by themselves, though. There were Embryos with abilities that could kill in an instant, so this was actually kinda mundane in the grand scheme of things.

That meant she probably had an ace or two up her sleeve.

For now, I would look at her stats and...

RESISTANCE.

“Huh...?”

My Reveal skill was blocked...? I thought, confused.

“Oh, did you just try to look at my stats?” Jubei asked.

“...Yeah.” Crap. This is gonna end the conversation and start the battle... I thought.

“My apologies,” said Jubei, contrary to my expectations. “Asura denies things like that.”

What? Denies things like that...? “You mean, it negates skills that target you?”

“Umm, not quite. Asura’s always-active ultimate skill nullifies any phenomenon at all that does anything to me without trying to harm me. Assuming you are the Dark Knight you appear to be, your cursed weapons would still curse me if they managed to cut me—so please try your best to do so!”

...I wasn’t a Dark Knight, but I understood how the Embryo worked now. She would be affected by debuffs and the like that were accompanied by damage, but she would resist things like Reveal or Fuso’s ranged curses.

It was a power meant to shift focus onto pure battle...or maybe embody the motif of the Asuras—entities from Buddhism associated with justice.

If the resistance is the ult, then the Embryo probably doesn’t have any powerful secrets I can’t see, but...

“...The ten weapons we can clearly see are fearsome enough,” Nemesis said telepathically, and that was exactly what I was thinking too.

I also had learned another thing about her—the fact that she had no intention of hiding anything.

Revealing her Embryo or job skills didn’t put her at any sort of disadvantage. She laid out exactly what she was capable of and sought direct confrontation.

Her build as well as personality were both all about pure combat.

“...So this is what Tenchi is like, huh?” I’d heard about it from Fuyuki and the others many times, but man, seeing it like this sure was scary.

I’d got the info I needed, at least. It was time to put it to use and find a way to defeat her.

“Now, it is my turn to ask questions...” Jubei said. Suddenly, I felt like fate itself was mocking my plans. “...Oh?” she added, her expression changing.

As though she'd just noticed something, she was staring right at me.

"Oh my. Oh my. Oh my oh my oh my..."

The next moment, she was right in front of me.

"Ngh...?!" I tried to jump away, but my body wasn't responding.

Her prosthetic arms had let go of their weapons, and three of them were pinning me by my arms and neck.

"...Ah!" Juliet cried out. I heard the flapping of her wings. Bound as I was, I couldn't see what she was doing, but I could tell that she was either trying to use a skill to free me or at least attempting to approach.

"Please wait a moment," said Jubei, warding Juliet off with her flying weapons.

As for Alto...she was kept in place by the one prosthetic that wasn't busy with me.

"I apologize for acting so rough," said Jubei. "I have a question...or rather, there is something I wish to confirm..."

She then pulled the cloth away from my face, taking my Storm Visage with it.

"Ahh!" she gasped in surprise. My hair and face were now exposed...

"You're the Ray Starling!"

...and her eyes lit up even brighter than before.

"'The'?" I, Nemesis, Juliet, and Alto all said in perfect unison.

What's so "the" about me? I wondered, but Jubei ignored us and kept talking.

"I saw the videos! They made me shake with excitement! Those were some of the most perfect, crazy, fantastic battles I've ever seen! I'm a huge fan! Carve your autograph on me! Please!" She set me free, keeping hold of my open hand and hopping up and down like a giddy child. She was acting like a totally different person.

"H-Hold on a sec..."

"The battle against Hell General! The way you rush-rush-rushed through those devil hordes...and the moment you bit into one of them! Then the battle against KoB! I saw it this morning! It was amazing! You stabbed and almost killed KoB even after you'd been reduced to just a torso! It moved me to my very core!"

"...Huh? What the hell, Ray?" Alto said, and I couldn't help but feel that she was freaked out by this.

"A slice-and-dice carnival! The counter-attacker and giant-slayer everyone's talking about! Ray Starling the Unbreakable! I gave up on ever seeing you because you're an Altarian, but now you're standing right here! Next to me! I feel like I've already won this event!" She seemed to be completely overjoyed and it didn't look like an act, which meant...

"...It appears that you have a fan," said Nemesis. "This seems like something to be glad about."

I had a fan despite not even being a duel ranker...?

"Ohh, I'm so happy...so, so happy...!" Jubei said in absolute ecstasy. It seemed like she was slowly returning to how she'd been acting before she'd found out my identity.

"I was worried for a moment, but it appears that we may be able to avoid battle here," said Nemesis. Unfortunately, I was getting the complete opposite impression.

"...I never thought I'd get to fight Ray Starling himself!"

The next moment, she unleashed her bloodlust upon me with the force of an explosion.

"Ngh...!" I used Nemesis to deflect the blade she'd swung at me while kicking off the ground to put some distance between us.

I instinctively knew her STR would allow her to easily split me in half, so I reduced the damage by letting myself be knocked back.

It went exactly as I wanted...

"Ah-HAH!"

...but then I spotted a floating weapon in the exact spot I was headed towards.

"Gh!" She'd either read me like a book or this was just her regular fighting style.

The same tachi that had been aimed at Juliet was about to cut into me...

"Blackwing Orchestra!"

...but then Juliet released a black wind magic spell straight towards me. It blew me off course—and away from the range of Jubei's floating weapons.

"Ray! Are you okay?!" Nemesis asked.

"...Yeah." Juliet must've aimed at me because she'd already seen the tachi in action before. She felt that her skill wouldn't work on the weapon, so she aided me by blowing me out of the way instead.

"Thanks, Juliet," I said.

"...No problem!" Even as we spoke, Juliet and I were on high alert.

Jubei had stopped moving once again. Instead of attacking us...

"Eh heh, ah hah, HA HA! Amazing! Is that your instinct? The super defense that transcends even AGI... I finally saw it live...and it's wonderful"

...she seemed to be relishing what had just happened. Her smile was even wider than before.

As for Alto...it seemed that Jubei wasn't interested in her. She'd escaped her range without any trouble.

"...Ray, does she not hold you in high regard...?" Nemesis asked, confused as to why Jubei attacked us.

"That's exactly why she's doing this," I said.

"What?"

"It's pretty obvious by now that she's a real battle junkie, right?"

"It is."

"Then it's only natural that she'd want to fight the person she's most interested in. Everything Jubei said about me relates to what I've done in battle."

"...Oh." Just like someone would start attending an idol's concerts after falling in love with their singing, someone who was charmed by my fighting would obviously want to fight me.

...Man, did that comparison feel weird.

"More...I want to see more. Slowly. Thoroughly. Until the end, until the final cut, until one of us expires," Jubei said.

I had a feeling that until she'd realized who I was, she was still partially playing around—as though she wasn't serious about any of this. But now, the purity of her bloodlust and fighting spirit was on another level.

It wasn't because her opponent was strong, but because she wanted to have a taste of battle against me.

She wouldn't hold back. She wasn't the kind of person who would ever do that. She was going to go all out, push her limits, and try her best to kill me.

It was almost as though she was trying to experience a live reenactment of my battle against KoB.

"...It's not like I did all that stuff on my own," I said, fully aware that she wouldn't listen.

"My fave... I want to cut and be cut by you, kill and be killed by you, love and be loved by you..." She seemed less human and more asura now—a creature from Tenchi enslaved by pure passion.

"LET US SHARE OUR LOVE UNTIL WE BREAK!" Overcome with bloodlust and affection both, the fourth in Tenchi's duel rankings bared her fangs at me.

If she was actually on Kashimiya's level, she was no doubt stronger than us.

However, unlike with Kashimiya, I could still see Jubei's attacks.

The Unsheath sliced at speeds so far above supersonic that I couldn't even understand, let alone sense any of them, but King of Asuras was far slower than that.

However, speed wasn't what she specialized in.

Even now as she laughed with manic joy, there were six weapons floating around her.

Each and every one of them was the kind of weapon you'd expect to see in the hands of a vanguard Superior Job. With the addition of the four prosthetic arms, she could wield a total of ten potent tools of death at once.

Most importantly, those weapons were...

"Alto," I said.

"...Yyeess?" She looked like she really didn't want to be here. Well, being a Tenchi Master, she must have understood the danger far better than me or Juliet.

But that was exactly why I had to ask her...

"You know anything about her?"

"...They say that Asuran Battle-Mounts has a range of 25 metels, but that's info people got from her dueling, so it's hard to tell if that's true," Alto explained, not daring to look away from Jubei.

For whatever reason, though, she wasn't making a move.

Apparently still in a trance, she was looking at me with her fleshy hands pressed against her cheeks.

"As for the flying weapons, I only know about four. A defense-breaking tachi that negates defensive skills, 'Peerless Excess, Hora.' The slow-killing shortsword that prevents all healing for 100 minutes after it cuts you, 'Death-Bearer, Kubigawara.' A maddened curse-spear that can slice and kill even spirits, ‘Anguishbloom, Higanbana.’ The retaliating katana that moves at insane speeds to inevitably strike anyone who comes too close, ‘The Denying Blade, Dankajin.’”

“...Now that’s something.” That was four special rewards, which was already more than I had.

The one Juliet had helped me evade must have been Hora. If it really did negate defensive skills, using Counter Absorption against it would’ve been certain death.

The other weapons were probably also MVP rewards or something close to that.

The two others that Alto hadn’t named were a chakram and a large hatchet. Like my Miasmaflame Bracers and Grudge-Soaked Greaves, they had a unique shape, making it likely that they were MVP rewards.

She was both stocked up on special rewards and had a bunch of extra slots to use them in, which was very...Figaro-like.

“Ah ha ha ha.” Jubei didn’t seem the least bit shaken that Alto had revealed all of that information. The joy in her face hadn’t faded one bit.

“So, have you said everything you wanted?” she asked Alto as her smile grew wider.

“EEP?!”

“Hm...?” Jubei sounded like she might be on the verge of killing Alto for revealing all of that, which had made Alto panic.

However, I got a completely different impression. To me, it felt like Jubei had actually been waiting for someone to explain everything about her.

“...I get it now,” I said. It finally made sense. She was both a Tenchi-dweller and a duel ranker—this was probably just how they were.

“You were waiting for Alto to tell us what you’re capable of...weren’t you?” I asked.

“Huh?” Alto was confused, but Juliet and Nemesis seemed to understand exactly what I was getting at.

Jubei’s smile widened again.

Information was a powerful thing. And in Infinite Dendrogram, where individuals could have unique powers, an informational advantage was more important than in any other game. That was exactly why Alto had recommended that I hide my face.

Jubei had answered every question I'd asked about her Embryo abilities and job skills, and that was before she knew who I was.

"Yes, exactly! I want those who withstand my preemptive attacks to be as well prepared as they can possibly be! After all, battles are at their most fun when they are close!" She didn't want to just massacre people before they knew what was going on—she wanted a fair fight.

That was Jubei Kaga's philosophy of fighting.

The scars on her body must've been gained through battles where she'd revealed everything about herself.

It seemed like a manifestation of carelessness or arrogance, but I felt that ultimately that was far from the truth. She was like Figaro or Kashimiya, in that she abided by certain self-imposed rules.

And, most notable of all, she'd been through many battles after revealing her hand, yet she still hadn't gotten the death penalty. She'd won against many powerful opponents even after she gave them all the information they needed.

She was an Asura like no other—truly King of Asuras.

"It seems you are well prepared now, so...let us begin!" Jubei said with a smile before kicking off the ground.

She moved at supersonic speeds as though it was the most natural thing in the world. I didn't know if it was because of her levels, stats, or a buff from some weapon, but she was a great deal faster than me.

"Blackwing Requiem!"

Before Jubei could get close, Juliet fired an orb of dark magic towards her. However, before it could land, one of the floating weapons—the chakram—flew towards it.

It traced a path over the dark orb, making it vanish in its wake.

Dark magic was supposedly hard to defend against, yet Juliet's black shroud had disappeared without a trace.

"Huh...?!" An MVP reward that broke any magic it touched... It was just like Rook's Touch of the Silencer!

Chakrams were weapons that were either thrown or wielded in hand. Using this particular weapon in the former way would've meant letting go of it, while the latter way would come with the risk of getting hit despite its anti-magic properties. But since Jubei used telekinesis, she didn't have to deal with either of those problems.

“Purgatorial Flames!”

I welcomed Jubei with fire from my Miasmaflame Bracer. But then, her floating hatchet spun around and slashed through the blazing torrent, splitting it in two.

“So that one kills fire...no...breath attacks!”

An anti-magic chakram, an anti-breath-attack hatchet, and an always-active ult that canceled all effects that weren’t coupled with damage.

It seemed that she wanted to do everything she could to ensure her battles would be physical.

“Entryyy!” After extinguishing our spells and fires, Jubei came close enough that we were in range of her floating weapons.

The tachi, the shortsword, the spear, the chakram, the hatchet...all of them approached me and Juliet with different trajectories.

The katana...the retaliating “Dankajin,” or whatever it was called, was still floating next to Jubei.

The weapons coming towards me were the tachi and the hatchet.

I could only use Counter Absorption to block one attack, but since the tachi was that defense-breaking Hora, I couldn’t even use that.

And since my AGI wasn’t high enough for me to evade both of them, there was only one thing I could do.

“Chaser From the Mirror!” I switched to the fourth form, and Nemesis instantly activated Chaser with Jubei’s AGI as the target.

My speed became equal to hers, and along with that we now experienced time the same way. That slowed down the weapons heading towards me.

“Agh!” I read the trajectories of the weapons and evaded them both.

They tried to reverse themselves and attack me again, but this time I dodged them by rushing forwards.

“All that sparring against Xunyu is finally paying off!” said Nemesis.

“She always gets me in the end, though!” Still, these floating weapons were easier to dodge than the golden prosthetics that had chased after me until I had nowhere to run and no option but to die.

Jubei, however, was far more than her floating weapons.

While attacking me, she herself had closed the distance between us. The four prosthetics were all holding blades, all heading towards each of my limbs.

It was like an approaching prison of sharp edges. No matter which side I dodged towards, I couldn't avoid attacks from someone who was just as fast as I was—and behind me there were the tachi and hatchet, still hurtling towards me.

That left me with only one choice—to step forwards.

I put power into my legs and rushed towards her with all my strength.

This was perhaps the most dangerous thing I could do, since this meant that I'd activate her Dankajin.

However, the katana didn't fly towards me.

Juliet, who'd evaded the flying weapons as well, had approached Jubei before I did and was now keeping Dankajin distracted.

So the superspeed counterattack can only happen once before it's unsheathed! I realized. Because of this, I was able to approach Jubei without resistance.

I thrust the twin sword in my right hand towards Jubei.

"Ah hah hah hah haah!" Amused by something, she laughed as she grabbed Nemesis's blade with her bare hand.

"Huh?!"

It was a technique that everyone even mildly interested in swords had fantasized about.

While I was completely immobilized by the surprising move, a total of seven of her weapons all hurtled towards me.

However, it was too late for that.

"Vengeance is Mine!" Nemesis and I both roared. She'd touched it, so our skill should work.

A shock wave erupted in Jubei's hands, and blood splattered all over.

Just like her tachi, my attack ignored her defense—it was a fixed damage counterattack. As long as I had damage stocked up, it could hurt anyone as long as the attack connected.

Free from her grip on the Nemesis in my right hand, I prepared to thrust the one in my left...

"Ah..."

...but a chill ran down my spine that made me reflexively jump to the side.

I leaped straight onto a blade held by her prosthetic and basically just took the damage to my right upper arm.

However, the sheer amount of attacks that landed on the place I had just been standing was several times greater.

“Mmgh...”

“So this is it... This is the thing I’ve heard so much about... Eh heh heh...” said Jubei.

While I had made distance between us, she was frozen in place, staring at her bleeding palm with an ecstatic expression.

The wound was far from deep. It hadn’t even severed any of her fingers—ultimately it was nothing more than a gash on her palm.

“Thank you for your autograph! Mmm...!” she said, licking at the blood before turning back towards me. “What a strange feeling. It was as though that power just burst out of my palm from the inside. Eh heh heh... Though, this is far from enough, as I am sure you know. It’s only double the damage you received, and the only damage I dealt to you before you activated your fourth form was from my preemptive attack. And since you copied my AGI, you can’t possibly have a great deal of damage stored up to return to me, can you? Or is it because your twin swords are split it in half? Regardless, the damage is less than I was expecting.”

I said nothing in response. Jubei had only seen my battles in videos, and Nemesis’s fourth form had only appeared in my battle against KoB.

Had she seriously figured out how my skills worked by just watching those? Not just that, but she’d actually grabbed my blade just so she could get me to use Vengeance...to mark the occasion with a scar on her body as though it was an autograph.

“...Ray, would I be correct in thinking that...?”

“You probably would be,” I said, knowing exactly what Nemesis was about to say. Everything that had happened so far went exactly as Jubei had wanted.

She’d actually intended for me to use Chaser, then just barely make it close to her...and then use Vengeance to land a blow on her, all while preventing Juliet from interfering.

“...The fourth in Tenchi’s duel rankings, huh?”

She wasn’t as fast as Kashimiya or as strong as Figaro.

However, she was good. As in, extremely skilled.

She simultaneously controlled ten weapons, analyzed her enemy, engineered the battle she wanted to have, and finally got the results she desired.

Though her eccentric appearance and behavior didn’t show it, she had an extraordinary amount of control over her technique.

“This was exactly as I anticipated,” she said, smiling in satisfaction at the theatrics she’d just directed and starred in.

Her words could only mean that she’d crafted the exchange we just had with the expectation that I would pull it off—all based on what she’d seen in the videos.

If I hadn’t met her expectations, I would’ve surely died somewhere in there.

“But...it was not more than I anticipated,” she said as her smile vanished and she looked at me. “It did not draw out everything good about the Ray Starling.”

It didn’t seem that she was disappointed in me exactly. It was like she was confused more than anything else.

“What am I lacking?” she asked as though the flaw clearly wasn’t with me, but with her.

Regardless, I had no answer to her question.

I felt like I had pushed myself to the limit and done everything I could.

If there was something I could do to be stronger than I was now, I would have liked to hear it myself.

Event Area, East, Forest

Just what am I supposed to do here...?!

A high-level battle had unfolded before her eyes.

Her friend, that friend’s friend, and King of Asuras were fighting, and Alto was at a complete loss as to what to do.

Jubei Kaga is like the worst person to run into...we even work for the same daimyo...! she thought.

Though Jubei didn’t recognize Alto, Alto certainly knew Jubei.

This was because they were both serving the same daimyo family in Tenchi—Toseiden, one of their big four.

That was why Alto was so hesitant to involve herself in the conflict.

If she did, there was a chance that Jubei would set her sights on her after the event ended.

Jubei Kaga...she's such a battle junkie that she sided with Toseiden despite acting like a stereotypical Shimazu type from Nashumon...just because she wanted to fight against Nashumon...! Alto had actually refrained from giving her name because she didn't want anyone like that to actually remember her.

In fact, she wanted to use her skills as a Nukenin to get out of here as quickly as possible.

However, since she'd promised to cooperate with Ray, that wasn't an option.

I can't abandon an IRL friend! It's gonna leave a mark on our friendship and my mind...! That was why she couldn't run. She didn't want to fight, but running just wasn't in the cards.

But just letting him die would be basically the same thing...! I wanna do something, but what can I even do...?! This is so stressful... I wanna play some cat's cradle...! She wanted to calm her nerves with the game she loved so much, but someone would have to be quite off their rocker to play cat's cradle in this situation. An absurd act like that would have definitely jogged Jubei's memory.

There really was nothing she could do here.

Compared to Jubei, her attack power was practically nonexistent, her Embryo actually had a chance of benefiting the enemy, while the very reason she was chosen for this event wasn't something she could use in the presence of other people—especially ones from Tenchi.

The most I can do now is create a smokescreen to help everyone escape, but...

There was a chance that the hatchet would disperse the smoke just like it had dispersed Ray's flames. Even if the smokescreen worked, Jubei was the kind of person who would keep attacking even if she couldn't see anything.

If only there was something to distract her while I put up the smokescreen... In this situation, that just wasn't a reasonable hope.

Jubei was currently speaking to Ray, but it was only a matter of time before she flew into action again. Once that happened, they would have almost no hope of winning. Juliet knew that as well, and that was why she was mostly incapable of helping, aside from the fact that she was still recovering from her use of Molting.

God! Buddha! Cat's cradle! Gimme a helping hand! Hell, I'll take even the devil here! Cornered, Alto's thoughts had begun to race...when suddenly, there was a sound of a twig breaking.

Jubei was the first to react.

As though to swat down this nuisance getting in the way of her joy, she sent the defense skill-negating tachi, Hora, towards the troublesome target.

And so, the unfortunate intruder to the Kingdom of Asura died with just that single strike.

...Or at least, that was what one might expect would happen.

"...What is this?" Jubei asked, staring in confusion at her target, which clearly had her Hora blade stuck into it.

However, it seemed that this blade that was supposed to negate defense skills had actually landed in the target's body—assuming it was fitting to call it that.

The silhouette it had wasn't that of a human. It was a rather rotund costume covered in long fur.

The animal it was based on was...

"Ah. A bear." The words escaped Alto's mouth.

I asked for a devil and got a bear.

While that casual thought crossed her mind, the other three were overcome by terror.

"Shu...? No. You can't be him...!" At first, Ray immediately associated this unique appearance with his brother, but this was not him.

This was certainly a bear costume, but not Shu's Hind Bear.

It was also wearing an ushanka on its head and a gas cylinder on its back...and its fur was pure white.

Most notably, Ray felt no familiarity in the gaze of whoever was inside the costume. Instead, it felt like the bear was a hunter evaluating his prey.

"...The one who treads upon divine ground and answers the call of predation's chains." Though spoken in her own language, Juliet's words implied that she knew who this was.

As for Jubei...

"Eh heh. Eh heh heh... I did not know that this event also had your kind...Superiors."

...she had shifted her divided attention away from Ray and Juliet, and was now focused entirely on the person in the costume.

Her words, specifically Superior, made Ray remember something Shu had once said to him.

“Costumes are more usefur than you’d expect. I ain’t the only one using them, that’s fur sure.”

The Granvaloan “Human Bomb,” Antimicrobic Soy Sauce.

The Tenchi-dwelling “Ironman Mechanicus,” Bachigo Futae.

Legendaria’s most wanted, “Hypersomnia,” ZZZ.

And the person standing before them now.

Ray used Reveal and saw his name listed among the stats.

“God Hunter, Carl Lourlou!”

A member of Caldina’s strongest clan, Sefirot, as well as the bearer of the title “Multifariously Invincible.”

This was the spice that the control AI had prepared for this event—the Superior said to have the strongest defense of any Master in the world.

Interlude: The Ranker Known as Chelsea

Event Area, South, River

After taking out Jamie Crescent and his Abhra-Matanga, Chelsea's group decided to look around for any hint that would help them solve the password at the goal.

As the number of people in the event dropped, those remaining would be carrying more plates—and those with enough would start heading towards the gate. Knowing that only a total of three players could win, it was all but certain that some were already rushing to the goal.

Since incorrect answers at the gate would send you to some other place on the island, though, taking the time to look for hints about the right answer was a better plan than rushing to make a guess.

Because of this, Chelsea's trio decided to split up and search the island's south for clues.

"Hmm..." As Chelsea walked beside a river, occasionally dipping her hand into the water, she was lost in thought.

Another river, much like the one on the island's east side. Good for drinkin' too. Despite the isolation, the island's got some really diverse plant life and tons of water. Dunno if it's related to the event itself, but I wouldn't mind knowin' its coords.

An ex-Granvaloan like her couldn't help but see this island as one big treasure trove.

Granvaloa was a nation of linked-together seacraft drifting over the waves, but they, too, wished to have land of their own, be it a bit of coast or an island. One merely had to look at their adventurer's guilds to see this—Granvaloa always had search quests for habitable islands posted.

Just showin' them this island would make ya filthy rich... she thought. That reminds me... I haven't seen any familiar Granvaloans here. I guess the ones who made it here must have joined after I left?

She checked the relevant info windows, but found nothing about this island's location.

If this was any other game, one might simply assume that this area had been created specifically for this event and would disappear when it ended. But seeing as this was Infinite Dendrogram, the island was more likely to be a naturally occurring part of the world that had been remodeled to suit the purpose.

Well, whatever. I got Julie and the prize to worry about, sooo... Chelsea thought as she clasped her hands together before spreading them apart, creating a fist-sized orb of water.

"Here ya go," she said before throwing the water-orb spawned by her Poseidon's skill towards a tree growing on the riverbank.

The moment the orb touched the tree, it immediately exploded.

"Figured it was a trap," she said. "Come on out, then."

"Hmph. I suppose you saw right through it."

From behind another tree stepped a bald man with a double-headed battle-axe on his back—King of Axes, Wan Zihao.

"How did you know the tree was a trap?"

"It's obvious when ya look at the flora around it. I've been to a riverside in the east of the island, and though the temperature and altitude's the same in both places, you got a tree here that's nothin' like what I saw over there. Thought it was a hint at first, but I gave it a little tap just in case and it went boom."

"A sharp-sighted girl, aren't you?" Wan said in understanding as many trees exactly like the one Chelsea had just blown up sprouted all around him, giving the surrounding forest a new color.

"You don't look like a craftin' job. I'm guessin' the trees are your Embryo?" Chelsea asked.

"Indeed. This is my Embryo, Zaqqum."

Type Legion, "Orchard of Hell, Zaqqum."

It bore the name of a cursed tree said to spring up from the Islamic hell of Jahannam. When consumed, its fruits made the body boil before tearing it apart in a geyser of bodily fluids.

Based on something like that, it was no surprise that the Embryo was highly toxic as well.

It manifested as a Legion of trees growing fruits ripe with juices that were both acidic enough to melt through gear and flesh...and explosive enough to blow them up. And to top it off, if the trees were destroyed, they released acid and explosions even stronger than those of its fruit.

The drawback was that Wan had no direct control over the trees, forcing him to scatter them about and wait for the enemy to trigger them, but...

“Sure are a lot of ’em. Isn’t this dangerous to you too?” Chelsea asked.

“No need to worry,” Wan grinned, punching the nearest of Zaqqum’s trees. The tree exploded, but Wan and his gear were completely unscathed. “Zaqqum does no harm to me.”

This was the most terrifying thing about Zaqqum. It wasn’t its toxicity, explosiveness, numbers, or range, but the fact that Wan was completely immune to its effects, giving him an advantage in any area where his Embryo was summoned.

“Hm...? Looks like it’d be hella useful in duels,” Chelsea commented.

“It is! I am fifth in Huang He’s duel rankings—King of Axes, Wan Zihao! The third of the Five Generals gracefully serving the great and beautiful Huili!”

“That so? I’m Chelsea, a Great Pirate and eighth in Altar’s duel rankings.”

Following these introductions, the two equipped their double-headed axes and faced one another.

Their entire exchange so far was only meant to buy time. Wan needed to grow as many of Zaqqum’s trees as he could, while Chelsea had to prepare herself for combat and find out more about her opponent.

“What a coincidence,” said Wan. “We are both duel rankers and axe-wielders.”

“But there is one major difference between us. Do you know what it is?”

“Nope. Haven’t the slightest. How ’bout a hint?” Chelsea said playfully.

In response, Wan roared, “I am...a Superior Job!” Not a moment after this declaration, he rushed towards her.

“Thought as much!” Chelsea replied, just barely managing to block Wan’s axe. The force of the strike sent her backwards.

Well, his stats are obviously better than mine, that’s for sure. Oh! she thought as she kicked off the ground to sidestep one of Zaqqum’s trees.

However, Wan then rushed closer and cut down the very same tree that Chelsea had just evaded, sending a rush of fire and acid towards her.

"Whoa!" she cried, creating a water barrier just barely in time to block the attack. She then retaliated with a water projectile, but Wan deflected it with just a swing of the axe.

"A water-wielder! Such a weak power!" he remarked.

"Maybe it is!" Chelsea said. Pushed back by Wan's ceaseless offense, Chelsea had moved closer to the river. While she had a Great Pirate skill that let her walk on water, Wan had to get soaked to his knees.

However, he wouldn't be a vanguard SJ if he were slowed down by something as puny as water.

Making Zaqqum grow even in the river, he kept closing the distance between him and Chelsea.

I knew it'd be like this, Chelsea thought. She wanted to sigh with resignation at how expected this whole situation was. He can grow them in water and there's a whole lotta them now. Both my ult and World Reversal Waterfall are a no-no. They'd just make the trees explode.

The skills she favored in duels generally had a bigger area of effect. With her combat style focusing on weaponizing the liquids she summoned, she needed all the volume she could get.

Here, however, doing so would cause a chain reaction between all the Zaqqum trees, quickly showering her in acid and fire.

And since coming too close would mean being overwhelmed by Wan's stats, she was forced to keep her distance while firing off ineffective bolts of water.

Ultimately, though, it didn't matter if Chelsea was wary of Zaqqum.

"HA HA HA HA HA HA!"

If she didn't start the chain reaction, Wan could simply do it himself. Cutting down a single tree with his axe was enough to instantly cover the area in acid and explosions.

This was actually his primary mode of fighting, which was why Jamie had called him "lumberjack."

His ult allowed him to instantly create enough Zaqqum trees to blanket the entire arena stage, letting him start the chain reaction on command—a move too overwhelming for AGI builds to dodge, and too acidic for END builds to withstand.

His rival, Jamie, had to content himself with a lower duel ranking, because this move was enough to burn up Abhra-Matanga even when it was the largest size it could reasonably reach on the cramped dueling stage.

Zaqqum was a fearsome Embryo that could turn an entire area into one giant acid-explosion trap.

It was the reason why Wan was well-known and widely feared.

The info didn't lie. It sure is a duelist's Embryo, Chelsea thought. She'd actually known about this power before going into the battle. Everything she'd said when asked how she'd noticed Zaqqum had been a bluff—she'd actually recognized the tree's shape the moment she saw it.

He can summon tons of the trees and choose who's affected by them, but he can't detonate them from a distance. They only drop their fruits on impact and explode only if destroyed. Those are their flaws.

Chelsea even knew a few limitations Wan hadn't disclosed to her.

Shortly after she'd found out she would participate in this event, she'd gone on the internet to check out combat videos of duel rankers from all over Infinite Dendrogram.

Her reasoning was that if she and Juliet were chosen, other duel rankers would be chosen, as well.

And it's lookin' like he doesn't know either of the ways I fight, she thought. Chelsea knew Wan's fighting style, but Wan didn't know hers.

There was nothing strange about that. While most duel rankers would spend a lot of time researching the fellow rankers of their own countries, there was little point in doing the same for foreign duelists, especially if they weren't the top champions. Being from Huang He, it wasn't unusual at all that Wan didn't know anything about the eighth-ranked duelist in Altar.

Knowing about Chelsea the Altarian Duelist wouldn't have meant much in this situation, in any case, because that wasn't the Chelsea he was fighting right now.

"Your endurance is impressive, but...it is time to end this!" Wan cried. Chelsea used water to shield herself from the acid and fire while keeping a distance from Wan, but his immense stats and the time she spent on defense allowed him to draw closer and closer with every passing moment.

Wan created a Zaqqum forest and immediately detonated it in order to force Chelsea to defend herself, opening her up for an attack. The explosion, of course, would never deal even a single point of damage to him.

Wan then rushed through the inferno of acid and explosions to finish Chelsea off...or, at least, he tried to do that.

"...What?" Before he could approach her, he found himself lying on his back in the river.

At the unpleasant feeling of water rushing into his nostrils, he tried to stand up, but found himself unable to. After all, it was hard to stand without legs.

His were gone from the knee-down, as though blown away by an explosion.

What the hell?! Zaqqum ain't supposed to hurt me! he thought in shock, breaking character for a moment inside his own head. He tried not to show it on his face, even though the incomprehensible situation he found himself in made this difficult. Ultimately, though, it was obvious he was completely baffled.

At that moment, another explosion rang out—this time blowing away the arm holding his axe.

"This isn't...! It's not Zaqqum...!" Though it was too late, he realized that the explosions weren't caused by his Embryo.

"...So it finally hit ya, huh?" Chelsea said, looking down at him. Wan stared back at her, his vision filled with a cute, smiling face whose eyes were nonetheless icy cold.

And in her hand there was a Gem—a spell-storing consumable.

"Gems...? But...when did you take them out? And how did you hit—?"

"Not tellin'." Chelsea cut him off and threw the Gem at him.

The resulting Crimson Sphere burned away Wan's already half-dead body with little fanfare. The many plates he had collected scattered into the river, and all the remaining Zaqqum trees vanished.

Just like his rival before him, the duelist from Huang He found himself sent back without even knowing what had happened to him.

After gathering the plates, Chelsea quickly left the scene and headed downriver. The sounds of their battle might've attracted other participants, and she didn't want to risk dealing with them.

Mitigating risk was also the reason she hadn't answered Wan's questions and proudly explained how she'd managed to win—that might have inspired him to take up a mission of revenge in the future.

Chelsea knew that a brief feeling of superiority simply wasn't worth revealing your hand.

Right now she had none of the cheer she showed her friends, nor the mischievousness she showed her enemies. She only calmly weighed the pros and cons of her decisions.

He was a pain, but I've got some plates now. This should be enough for one attempt at an answer, so now I gotta find some hints. I wonder if those other two are having any luck, she thought.

Thinking of Max and Shion brought back a little of her usual cheer. The only things on her mind now were the plates she'd collected, her two friends, and the rival she would soon fight; Wan had already been forgotten.

The fact that she took out a top-ranking duelist who held a Superior Job didn't move her in the slightest. This wasn't anything unusual for her, after all.

At least, it wasn't unusual for the person she'd been before moving to Altar.

Chapter Six: The Asura and the Hunter

Paladin, Ray Starling

All of a sudden, we were joined by God Hunter, Carl Lourlou.

I didn't stop to wonder why he was here—after all, this was an event involving Masters from all over, so it wasn't that much of a surprise to run into a foreign Superior.

The real problem was the situation. We already barely stood a chance against just Jubei. With a Superior joining in, things were probably going to go from bad to worse.

"Carl Lourlou," said Jubei. "You once served Tenchi's Seihakuto clan. I heard you had left for the continent by the time I became a Superior Job... I certainly did not expect to meet you here."

She seemed to have a decent degree of interest in him.

The God Hunter, on the other hand, was looking not at her, but us. I could tell that even through the beady eyes of his bear costume.

Was he targeting us because we were the easier prey...? Weaklings were the first to die in a battle royale, so it would make sense.

More importantly, how do we deal with this...? I wondered.

"Eh heh heh," Jubei giggled, interrupting my thoughts. "I suppose I shall start with him, then."

Then, she rushed straight towards GH.

"Reasonable" meant nothing to an asura—the one who embodied strife.

All her weapons at the ready, Jubei Kaga turned to face Carl.

"Huh?!" I couldn't hide my surprise.

"Ray Starling," she said. "Let us meet again later. Until then, please think about what it was I lacked. I will do so as well... Ah ha ha ha HA HA HA HA! ENTRYYYY!"

After giving me the smile of someone in the throes of delirium, she let out a mad laugh and began to attack GH repeatedly.

This was no bluff—Jubei actually had shifted her sights from us to him. However, it didn't seem that she just wanted to fight the stronger foe first. It was more like...she was saving the main dish for later.

The God Hunter, on the other hand, was standing in place, not saying a word. The flying weapons had touched him many times by now, but his suit remained undamaged.

"FANTASTIIIIIIIC!" Jubei let out a cry as she raised up the katanas held in her four prosthetic arms and swung them down at GH.

For the first time since the encounter began, Carl did something to defend himself, raising his "arm" to block the attack.

Once again, the costume wasn't even scratched, but the weight of the impact cracked the ground beneath him in four directions.

These attacks were nothing like the ones she'd used on me—Jubei was really going all-out.

I didn't know whether I should be more afraid of her power...or Carl for withstanding it.

Regardless, this was likely a clash between two of the strongest Masters in this event, and we honestly had no business just sitting around and watching it.

"...Hey! Ray! Juliet! Let's get outta here!" Realizing that there was no better time, Alto gathered her resolve, raised her voice, and threw out a mix of smokescreen and firecrackers.

She'd basically read my mind.

"...Yeah!" I said in response. The smoke hid us from sight and the firecrackers drowned out the sound of our movement.

Her two-layered escape art allowed us to run away without issue.

Event Area, South, Forest

Still silent as stone, Carl watched as Ray's group ran away, while Jubei paid no heed and continued to slice at him.

This marked a parting with her "fave," but she was absolutely certain that they now shared a bond—and that it wouldn't be long until they would enjoy a much better fight.

So for now, she would enjoy a battle against this unexpected behemoth of a foe.

"My beloved curseblaaades, rise and shiiine!" She barked out an order to the four katanas in her prosthetic arms.

The curseblades began to release a dark purple aura which soon enveloped Jubei's entire body.

A moment later, her stats rose at an explosive rate.

"Ah-HA!"

The four blades weren't MVP rewards, but some would say that they were more powerful and dangerous than some Epics or Legendaries.

In the past, all of them had been counted among the hundred most famous blades in Tenchi, but over the centuries of their existence, they had been stained by an immense amount of curses and grudge. As a result, they had been turned into "curseblades."

They greatly buffed the user's stats, but at a great cost. The user would lose control over their body and be rendered unable to unequip anything, as well as suffering continuous HP drain and eventually self-destruction.

The price was far too great for most to pay, and these curseblades had driven many swordsmen of old to go on rampages that ended in their death.

However, Jubei was an exception. Asura's ultimate skill negated all effects that weren't accompanied by damage, and this fully applied to the curseblades' debuffs.

This allowed her to use them however she wanted without any drawbacks.

"Hi-Fu-Mi-Yo-I-Mu-Na-Yaaa!" While chanting as though performing an invocation, Jubei continued her onslaught.

All floating weapons besides the retaliating Dankajin and the breath-dispersing axe, as well as the four curseblades held by Asura—a total of eight weapons—were absolutely showering Carl in attacks.

This chain of blows, each of which might easily cut apart even a vanguard SJ, were completely deforesting the area just from the shock waves.

The weapons' speed combined with their sheer number made their assault impossible to evade or deflect.

Carl, however, wasn't attempting to do either of those things.

He simply took every attack...yet there wasn't a scratch on him.

"Toughness? Hardness? No, this is something else!" said Jubei. Her excitement was rising, but she was still able to analyze the situation calmly.

My attacks aren't ineffective! His HP is dropping! But the damage is lower than expected! He also isn't getting any debuffs! His bones aren't breaking and I see no bleeding! His movements are hardly hampered at all! And there is still not a single tear on his costume! Jubei's relentless onslaught was more dangerous than that of an ordinary pre-Superior, but despite that, she hadn't managed to harm a single hair on the God Hunter.

There were no cuts on the suit—only short-lived little holes that soon snapped closed. It was as though her blades weren't cutting into him, but merely brushing against the plush costume.

By now, she'd done enough damage to kill ten vanguard SJs, but Carl wasn't even flinching.

What kind of skill is letting him withstand this? His HP isn't 0, so it's not a Death Soldier situation. Rear Soldier's Last Stand allows you to survive with 1 HP, but that skill would have expired by now. Is it some sort of spell? Doesn't seem to be. Jubei was attacking him with her chakram, but it hadn't broken any spells.

She didn't know how, but it was clear that Carl couldn't be killed by mere damage.

If this was some sort of defensive skill, the fact that the defense-negating Hora didn't work could only mean that the nature of the defense was different than anything she'd ever seen.

"I cannot see your wounds. This is not to my taste," Jubei muttered in dissatisfaction, never ceasing her attack.

She found joy in cutting and being cut, giving and taking wounds. An enemy who couldn't be harmed no matter how hard she cut him was no fun for her. It didn't take long after this for her to lose her interest, then excitement, and finally calm down entirely. Her ideal opponents were those who struggled to win tooth and nail no matter how many injuries they suffered or limbs they lost.

Even though Ray was far below Carl in power, there was no doubt that he was Jubei's main dish.

Carl did not respond to any of her attacks or her complaints. Instead, he pulled out a hose linked to the gas canister on his back.

The flamethrower-like weapon was aimed straight at Jubei—and a moment later, it released a scarlet spray.

"I expected as much." It was easy to tell what kind of attack this would be just by looking at the weapon, and Jubei was prepared to launch her breath-dispersing axe towards the crimson mist.

Split apart, the spray vanished...but the trees it touched all decayed at an extreme rate.

“Poison...? Since you only just used it, I assume the strength of the poison is based on the damage you’ve received?”

Carl neither confirmed nor denied that, but Jubei’s analysis was indeed correct. The weapon was “The Scarlet Brewer, Drag-Blood,” and the power of the spray it released depended on the damage the wielder had suffered.

With how much Jubei had attacked him, the power of the spray was now so great that it made the run-of-the-mill Poison effect seem inconsequential. Even if she’d dispersed it, the tiniest droplet in the air would be enough to give Jubei a crippling debuff.

However, she seemed completely unaffected.

“Poison I breathe in or drink doesn’t work on me. After all, they only start dealing damage after they apply their debuffs.”

Carl once again said nothing. She’d basically revealed part of her capabilities, but he didn’t seem to think that she was bluffing.

Taking as much damage as possible, then using that to clear the area, was one of his go-to techniques—and if that didn’t work, his compatibility against Jubei was terrible.

Jubei couldn’t cut Carl to death, but Carl’s poison didn’t work on Jubei. Neither of them could put an end to this battle.

While Jubei found Carl to be “against her tastes,” Carl found Jubei to be “bothersome.”

Still silent, Carl switched his weapon from Drag-Blood to an unusual staff shaped like a deer’s antlers. He then swung around like a Druid mid-ritual, making new trees sprout in place of the ones he’d withered with his poison.

As eerie as this sight was, the lingering spray didn’t seem to harm the trees.

Realizing what Carl was trying to do, Jubei tried to close the distance between them again, but he used the new trees and spray as cover for his escape.

“A Superior—running away! Your deviousness is irritating!” Though her face showed no anger, she voiced her honest thoughts.

However, this was an event with a well-defined objective—and for everyone but Jubei, confrontation was a means to an end, not a goal in and of itself. Because of this, avoiding bothersome opponents was the wise thing to do, especially if you'd seen easier prey—and a three-for-one deal, at that!

Naturally, Jubei wouldn't tolerate having her main dish taken away from her.

She couldn't let him flee or hunt down Ray, so she sliced through the trees and poison to chase after him.

Being faster than him, she caught up in no time...

"Ah...!"

...but that was when her battle instincts flared into life.

The moment she turned and jumped away, a heavy, metallic sound rang out behind her.

The noise had been made by a closing bear trap—perhaps one of the most well-known tools for trapping animals. Its maw-like blades were coated in some sort of poison—and its presence wasn't the only change to the environment. The sounds of some mechanism activating could be heard, as though in response to Jubei triggering the bear trap.

"...You are the God Hunter, after all."

It was one of the hunter grouping's Superior Jobs, and it was focused on "hunting" rather than "combat." The job granted toughness that kept the owner active for long periods of time without food or water, superb tracking capabilities, and, most relevantly to this situation, trap creation.

One of the God Hunter's skills was called "Quick Trap." Just as the name implied, it allowed high-speed creation of traps using the items in its user's inventories, and Carl had used it to set countless traps on the path he traveled.

He'd obscured Jubei's sight and pretended to chase after Ray's group, leading her straight into a death trap.

Asura's ult, "Speak of Strife by Blade—Asura," negated all effects that weren't accompanied by damage, but if she was targeted by so many traps at once, she would surely be hurt and collapse.

"Impertinent."

However, that couldn't happen when Asura's Master was Jubei.

Her blades deflected any and all traps coming towards her from every direction. The poison arrows, spells, explosions, spike pits—she broke through everything.

This was only to be expected. Jubei was King of Asura. She manually commanded six flying weapons, with nothing whatsoever to support her.

The kind of processing power she employed for this was beyond the capabilities of a normal person.

Because of this, none of the traps could take her life...but they did overwhelm her brain.

Not missing the opportunity, Carl had approached her from behind. Instead of the bear costume, he was now wearing leaf-covered clothing, like a hunter's ghillie suit.

This outfit had a forest-exclusive camouflage effect, which, when mixed with the scent- and presence-eliminating skills he had as God Hunter, had allowed him to approach Jubei undetected.

He'd lured her into this trap-filled space not to buy time for his escape, but to set her up for a sure-kill attack.

Only Life Can Pay For Life: Drag-Pain

The large knife in his hand was a Legendary MVP reward that accumulated the damage he'd received and stored it in the weapon's tip as fixed damage. In a way, it was much like Ray's Vengeance.

"Ah..." Jubei finally felt the destruction approaching her from behind. However, it was too late to evade or even turn around. Because of this, she twisted one of her prosthetics in an inhuman way to swat the approaching knife aside.

At the moment of impact, destructive energy began to spread out from the blade—but before it could reach her, she purged the prosthetic.

The obscene amount of fixed damage instantly made the freed prosthetic vanish, but that was the extent of the destruction.

Shock overcame Carl. Jubei reacting to his surprise attack and the disappearance of the thing he'd struck had put him off-balance, opening him up for a counterattack.

Like a sonic whirl, Jubei turned back to Carl...

"Hidden Blade..."

...and with her own flesh-and-blood hands, she swung a single katana.

This was the strongest weapon she had—the Mythical "Amasser's Woundblade, Kasanehime."

It had the terrifying power of releasing a strike that dealt damage equal to all damage dealt to others in the past sixty minutes.

"Scatter Like Mist: Unsan-Musho."

Indeed, it was a sure-kill weapon that grew stronger without limit the more she attacked.

The hunter's deadly strike had missed the asura, and now the asura had landed her own deadly strike on the hunter.

Considering how much damage she'd distributed in the past hour, the damage this attack would deal would utterly destroy even vanguard SJs.

And yet...the Multifariously Invincible was still standing.

Not even the ace up Jubei's sleeve could harm this costumed anomaly.

"...My, my," she said. Her countless attacks, the defense-breaking Hora, and now even Kasanehime all had failed...and this made Jubei realize something about Carl. She now understood that he was protected by some sort of "law."

It was most likely the power of his Superior Embryo.

Will I figure it out first...? Or...? Until she discovered the trick behind his invincibility, she wouldn't be able to defeat him no matter how hard or long she attacked him.

It didn't even matter how high her attack power was.

"Or will I break through it before then?"

Of course, the maddened embodiment of strife didn't care how pointless her struggle might be. Her enemy was desperately overwhelming, yet Jubei smiled wide and cut at him.

And so, Carl turned out to be the first person who became fed up with their battle.

"Huh?!" Jubei exclaimed, shocked. Carl had turned his back on her and began running away—this time for real.

Poison hadn't killed her, traps couldn't catch her, the ace up his sleeve had only destroyed one of her arms, and his invincibility didn't scare her in the slightest.

Realizing that this battle junkie wouldn't give up until the event had ended, he figured that the best course of action was to just leave.

Carl switched into his escape gear, activated all the surrounding traps to keep Jubei busy, and ran as fast as possible.

He could hear her insulting him, but he didn't care one bit.

He wasn't a knight, but a hunter. To him, victory meant getting results.

And beyond just his pride as a hunter, the prey that had escaped him earlier were much more worthwhile targets than the battle maniac he just left behind.

Thus ended the battle between the hunter and the asura. The former retreated, leaving the latter feeling exceedingly sour.

Paladin, Ray Starling

"...Did we get away?" I asked.

"It seems so," said Nemesis.

An asura in front, a Superior behind. Talk about a rock and a hard place. It was a downright terrifying situation, but thankfully, we'd been able to get away.

If Jubei hadn't made the suggestion she had, our group might've been completely destroyed. It was the kind of situation you'd expect in a battle royale, but you could say that the very fact that this was a battle royale had saved us in the end.

One thing was certain, though—as we progressed through the event, we would surely run into at least one of them again.

When that happened, we would have to beat either an overwhelming harbinger of strife...or a Superior everyone called invincible. Our chances against either seemed pretty slim...not that that was anything new for us, I guess.

"I-I thought I was gonna dieee...!" Alto dropped to her knees at my side, breathing raggedly.

"Thanks for the smokescreen," I said.

"Y-You're welcome! Wait, why're you so calm?! We just ran into a Superior!"

"Well, that isn't all that rare for me." Starting with Figaro, I'd already met more than I could count on one hand.

It was kinda weird, actually. Superiors were like an exclusive club with less than a hundred members, yet I ran into them fairly regularly.

"Wooow, someone's used to trouble. That's our Ray the devil-eater," Alto said.

"Don't make that a thing," I retorted.

“Well, that is the most notable scene in the videos,” said Nemesis.

I wonder who actually recorded our fight against Logan...? I said in thought.

“What about you? You okay?” I asked Juliet.

“No wound has struck true. My wings may yet still take to the skies.”

No problem, huh? Good to know.

“Anyway, we didn’t think much about where we were running, and we’re now at...” I said as I looked around and compared the scenery to the full view of the island shown to us by Cheshire.

We had bolted out of the forest and arrived at a shore—the outer edge of the island. There was a rocky area facing the sea, and based on the location of the forest and mountain, we were in the event area’s southeast.

“Anyway, let’s keep moving,” I said. “Someone will catch up to us if we stay in one place, and we sure won’t find any hints by just standing around.”

“Indeed,” Nemesis nodded before starting to walk. “But what do these hints look like, anyway? Cheshire certainly did not explain tha—AAT?!”

Her words were cut short by her tripping over something and falling to the ground.

“Ugh! Who put that there?!” she complained with her hand over her nose, glaring at a drain-like formation in the ground.

After a closer look, I realized that around where Nemesis tripped, there was some strange pale rock.

“Hm?” The thing Nemesis had stumbled over was far too square to be natural. It was as though it had been masterfully carved out by human hand.

“...It should be fine if I don’t go too high,” I said, still wary of the anti-air weapon I’d seen, as I jumped on Silver and rose up a bit.

I slowly gained altitude until I could look at the pale rock from above, and I saw something had been carved into it.

And so, below me...

“I see.”

...I read the letters “YYYYMMDD.”

The thing Nemesis had tripped over was part of one of those letters.

This was the first hint we’d found, and it confirmed to us that the eight-digit number was, indeed, a date in the Gregorian calendar.

Interlude: The Crawler-Riders, the Magic-Spinners

Event Area, South, Beach

Shion Manjushage was a fairly famous Altarian Master.

Being thirteenth on a single ranking would have been impressive enough, but she was thirteenth in every ranking.

Duel, clan, and kill rankings—Shion was a rare person who had taken the same spot in all three of them.

She was powerful enough to go higher, but she chose to remain where she was.

In fact, she was actually making her clan members—all of whom were her family's servants in real life—keep an eye on other rankers so she could adjust her kill count and clan score to maintain her position.

Her reason for going to such lengths was, to quote her, "Because the number thirteen is so ominous and cool!"

There was nothing more to it than that.

For that very same reason, she was after the position of the fourth—a more prestigious number which was also ominous in certain Asian cultures—which had made her proclaim herself to be Juliet's rival. Some other duelists and parts of the audience did also see it that way, so it wasn't entirely unfounded.

Because of this, she'd felt somewhat left out when Juliet and Chelsea promised to have an all-out battle. To quote her directly, "What about me?!"

From Chelsea's perspective, though, Shion and Juliet had already had their showdown during the Exodragon King incident—and in a quite troublesome manner, at that. Chelsea had told Shion as much when they'd met up again.

All of that aside, Shion was now focused on the event.

One reason for this had been Chelsea's words to her: "It's not like you'll become fourth in the rankings or something if you do beat Julie at this event. Doncha think it’s better to focus on winning that prize, using it to get stronger, and then challenging her?” Shion herself had said something similar during the Exodragon King incident, so that comment had been more than enough to convince her.

Chelsea’s true intentions in saying that, though, had been preventing Shion from interfering in her fight against Juliet—while also getting Shion on her side. The Dark Princess’s abilities made her a potent force against even the strongest players in this event.

After seeing Shion eliminate King of Cowboys, who could have become the greatest threat here, it would have been fair to assume that Chelsea had definitely made the right choice.

Dominating the event’s battles like this, they’d managed to acquire a fair number of plates; now they were searching for the way to use them—the hints.

To make the most of their abilities, they’d split up to make the search more efficient. They might have been more powerful as a group, but since only the first three through the gate could clear the event, they had to make a compromise between their combat potential and speed of investigation.

Thinking along those lines—or, rather, having been persuaded by Chelsea to think that way—Shion went to look for clues...

“Hm?! I found something strange!”

...and eventually found one.

This one, though, would have been hard to miss.

It was a white stone monument poking out of the sea about twenty metels from the shoreline. Its size? As tall as a five-story building. It could be seen from just about any point on the island’s southern beach.

“Hmm... There is something written on it, but I don’t wanna get too close...” Behind the monument there was the open sea, teeming with aquatic monsters warded off by the event area’s barrier. Shion had a distaste for octopuses and krakens and the like, so she didn’t want to come anywhere near them.

“Read it for me, Amethyst.” Because she was disinclined to approach the ocean, she made her Prism Crawler mount—the Amethyst Captor—do the job for her.

“Acknowledged,” said the mechanical spider as it turned its multiple sensors on the monument and read the text. “‘Each person’s answer may differ.'"

"So that is the hint...is it?" The cryptic, almost philosophical statement made Shion put one hand to her cheek and tilt her head. The gesture was very refined, but the thought running through her mind was, I've got no clue what that means.

"...Amethyst?" Shion asked.

"Insufficient information for analysis," Amethyst replied. The Prism Crawler was often called "Shion's external brain." In this situation, she tried relying on it like she always did, but not even an AI could figure out the correct eight-digit number from this hint alone.

"Hmm... I will take it back to Chelsea, then," Shion said. "She is a college student in real life, so she ought to be at least a little bit smarter than me!"

If Chelsea were to hear that, she would likely say something like, "Being 'a bit' smarter than you wouldn't even be enough to get accepted to my college," but Shion was right to bring this information to her teammate.

"Time to go to the rendezv—"

"Emergency evasion."

Shion, all smiles, was about to order Amethyst to move, but the mechanical spider used its eight legs to jump away on its own.

A moment later, immense heat and light sliced through the place they had just been.

"What?!"

"Analyzing the enemy," said Amethyst. "Applicable data discovered. Magically charged particle cannon—a weapon of the Obliterator."

While Shion was surprised by the completely unexpected attack, Amethyst had seen it coming and even knew what they were being attacked by.

Amethyst focused its sensors on the light's origin point, but there was nothing there.

"Camouflage."

Nothing visible, at least. The unit's sensors could easily detect something hiding there using Optical Camouflage.

Amethyst then aimed its tail towards that location and released multiple nets. Some of them struck parts of the scenery and, in a flash of purple lightning, removed some of the coverage afforded by Optical Camouflage.

Behind it, there stood a mechanical scorpion with a cannon for a tail. This was the unit controlled by the Flow Princess, Juba—the one who'd shot down Juliet.

"Identity of the enemy unit confirmed—Prism Crawler No. 2, Citrine Obliterator." It was a machine in the same category as Amethyst.

"...I should've expected this from Altar's strongest player in this event," said Juba. "Neither the ambush nor the camouflage is going to work against her..."

As Juba traveled, she had chanced upon Shion while she was still looking for hints on this southern shore. Since she was one of the strongest participants as well as an Altarian, Juba resolved to take advantage of this chance to take her out of the game. Using Optical Camouflage to hide, she tried to ambush Shion using her charged particle cannon.

And now, since that hadn't worked at all, Juba knew that Shion posed an even greater threat than before.

Of course, Amethyst was the one to actually react to the ambush; Shion hadn't expected it at all. In light of this, perhaps Juba was giving her more credit than was warranted...

"Yes! I am Altar's strongest lady duelist—Dark Princess, Shion Manjushage!"

...but Shion was willing to take it all anyway.

Amethyst, however, didn’t argue. It was a particularly loyal support mech.

“And that’s why...I’m gonna take you out...”

“Bring it on!”

Juba wanted to beat Shion because she was a strong opponent, while Shion faced Juba for no other reason than Juba had challenged her. Their motives might have been very different, but they would both fight nonetheless.

And so, the two Masters and their units rushed into battle.

“Initiating evasive patterns.”

“Initiating artillery patterns.” Amethyst began leaping around to avoid the cannon fire, while Citrine checked its memory banks for data regarding this enemy.

Amethyst then used webs to accelerate its movements, while the unmoving Citrine repeatedly fired its charged particle cannon, quickly turning the smooth beach into a pockmarked battlefield.

A spider fighting with webs and a scorpion fighting with its tail—they were much like the creatures they were based on, and the fight seemed evenly matched for a moment.

“Is it just me, or are our designs similar?” Shion belatedly realized.

“Affirmative. Both myself and the target—Citrine Obliterator—are Prism Crawlers built by the same creator. I am No. 1, while Citrine is No. 2.”

“Wow, you have a little sister?!”

“We have no gender.”

“But it has a girl’s voice.”

“Conjecture: that is the voice of No. 2’s pilot. No. 2 is a boardable unit.”

“I see! We’re both using bug robots... Let us find out which one of ours is the true king of insects!”

“...Neither scorpions nor spiders are insects.” Even Juba couldn’t help but comment on Shion’s words.

“If there is an actual person inside, I can kill it! Gloom Stalker!” With those words, Shion activated a skill. The result was a number of black homing projectiles—a manifestation of black magic that sought out living creatures, passing through anything inanimate. Combined with Judas’s Kiss of Death, they could deliver unavoidable death even through the toughest armor.

"Defense."

But then, Citrine created a barrier of light around itself.

"Huh?! That barrier better not be dark or holy!" Shion exclaimed. Dark magic could only be influenced by other dark magic effects or its opposite, holy magic.

However, Citrine's barrier didn't look like either.

"No. 2's barrier works on both offensive magic and physical attacks. It can only be penetrated by attacks with a greater output."

"No fair!"

In exchange for being able to break through most defenses, dark magic wasn't particularly strong. It seemed her only option for breaking the barrier would be her ultimate job skill, but that took some time to prepare.

"Amethyst!"

"I am a light support unit specialized in trap placement and three-dimensional mobility, while No. 2 is a heavy combat unit equipped with extensive armor and firepower. The enemy has the advantage."

Though they were both Prism Crawlers, the gulf between them was wide, like that between a utility vehicle and a tank.

However, that was exactly what made the current situation so unusual.

"Operating both the charged particle cannon and the barrier at full capacity would be taxing even for magic-focused Superior Jobs. It is likely that No. 2 is receiving some form of special support, either from a Superior Job or an Embryo."

The Prism Crawlers were famous weapons even older than The Era of the Peerless Three. A mechanic who'd inherited the title of Grand Artificer of the pre-ancient civilization built them, inspired by the Prism Horses and Dragons.

Their base capabilities were a match for the originals built by the Grand Artificer himself, but there was one drawback—the mechanic had failed to reproduce the reactors, making the Prism Crawlers completely reliant on the user's MP for energy. The amount of MP drained was different for each unit. No. 1, Amethyst, was the most balanced in this regard, but the combat-focused Citrine was a true magic hog.

Despite this, Juba had some means of ignoring this limitation and could run Citrine at full capacity for long periods of time. An experienced fighter would notice this and immediately understand that discovering what made this possible would be key to victory.

"I see I have no choice..."

And now, Shion...

"I will have to just keep shooting until I break the barrier!"

...unfortunately not the brightest player around, decided to do it by force. Like an aggressive monkey, she chose to merely keep attacking, sparing no thought to the possible source of her opponent's power.

Just as one could never reason with the embodiments of strife that were the asura, reason wouldn't work on idiots either.

Shion then did exactly as she said she would, repeatedly firing her dark magic while leaving all evasion to Amethyst. All of her spells were blocked by the barrier, failing to reach either Citrine or Juba.

Despite that, she just kept on casting.

Seemingly obedient, Amethyst continued to evade while closing the distance or repositioning to give Shion an angle that would let her shoot past the barrier.

However, there were no gaps in the half-sphere barrier, so in all honesty, Shion was merely wasting her time and energy.

What is she planning...? Juba wondered, still overestimating her opponent. She never presumed that the fearsome Master who'd taken out the giant cloud-elephant would perform such a wasteful assault without purpose. Thinking that Shion must be planning something beyond her comprehension, Juba became a bit paranoid.

I have the upper hand in both firepower and armor. She can't hit me as long as I keep up the barrier... Wait, is that why? Is she forcing me to use the barrier?

Normally, Juba didn't talk much, and when she did her words were slow. However, that was because most of her mind was entirely focused on analyzing her surroundings. She analyzed her enemies and the battlefield around her to gain full control over them and achieve victory.

Thus, her thinking right now...

Are these useless attacks meant to shift my energy distribution towards defense? Is there a reason she wants to shut down my full-power cannon fire?

...was actually more like *over*thinking.

Shion certainly hadn't put nearly that much thought into it. In fact, she hadn't even noticed Citrine's design flaw.

Citrine was a heavy tank, powerful in both defense and offense, but there was a cap on the amount of magic per second it could convert into energy, making it impossible to simultaneously use the charged particle cannon and the barrier at full power. Right now, to defend against Shion's attacks, seventy percent of its energy flow was directed to the barrier, with only thirty percent powering the cannon.

It's still enough to kill her, though. She's using Amethyst to evade my shots, but unlike me, she doesn't have any means of quickly restoring MP. Actually, all those attacks and my influence should mean she's going to run dry soon enough... I think.

Since she thought Shion was still hiding something, Juba couldn't be confident about her thoughts. The power of someone who held thirteenth place in all rankings was hard to gauge. It wasn't just about her personal power—one couldn't maintain all three positions without great leadership, thorough organization, and immense amounts of data about other rankers.

Because of this, Juba couldn't help but assume that Shion had incredible charisma and could analyze a situation with the best of them.

Again, she was overthinking it.

Her clan members were all her servants in real life. They were organized because it was their job, and data was gathered by the members who were best at it. They simply approached Shion every week and told her, "Milady, this is how many you have to defeat to maintain your current ranking." Shion herself had no analytical ability whatsoever.

That was why a UBM was able to take advantage of her during the Exodragon King incident.

I can't let my guard down. Just what is she planning...?

Juba outmatched Shion in terms of compatibility, but failed to realize that her greatest enemy was her own wariness.

...Well, more accurately, there was one other problem she had to worry about.

"Ngh. It's not working...!"

It had taken her nearly a hundred spells, but Shion finally began to realize the futility of her incessant casting.

The Weaver-Spider's Wand that she so loved was a luxury, custom-made item equipped with the "Halve MP Use" skill, but the sheer number of spells had taken their toll, leaving her MP at less than 20%.

"I feel like my MP is dropping faster than normal," she said. "I'm so tired that I feel like I am seeing two suns..."

"..."

"Oh?"

While Shion had begun to complain, Amethyst extended a thread to her. The non-damaging thread allowed for communication between them and them alone, somewhat like the two cans tied with a string.

"This message is top secret. I request that you do not change your expression to prevent the enemy from noticing," said Amethyst. Shion nodded in response.

"I propose a strategy that will make it possible to win."

"Huh?! Have you come up with something?!" Shion exclaimed, instantly forgetting Amethyst's request.

Amethyst then proceeded to present its idea.

"...Huhhh?" Upon hearing it, Shion couldn't hide how unpleasant she found the prospect. Then, after about ten seconds of thinking coupled with light groaning, all while Amethyst was still evading Juba's beams...

"...I guess I have no choice!" she hesitantly agreed.

On the other side, there stood Juba, who felt that the end of the battle was close.

Reveal tells me that she has less than 10% MP left. Even using her Prism Crawler should be too much for her, she thought.

Shion had already ceased her magic attacks and was now doing nothing but evading Citrine's beams. However, that would stop once she ran out of magic to power Amethyst.

Juba had fought as carefully as she could, and now her victory was close.

That was when Shion returned Amethyst to her inventory.

Juba couldn't believe her eyes or even begin to understand that action. Shion had put away the one thing keeping her alive.

However, looking through Citrine's optical sensors, she saw Shion holding her wand towards her unit.

That made her realize two things.

First, Shion had put Amethyst away to focus her magic on attacks.

And second...Shion's incessant spellcasting didn't have a single thought behind it.

"She was...just an idiot the whole time...?!" Juba shouted in exasperation, shock, and anger. As if channeling her sentiments, Citrine fixed its sights directly on Shion.

The dim-witted caster who'd thrown away her only means of evasion had no way to escape the impending blast.

"Obliterate!" Juba shouted, using a skill of the same name. Shion didn't even try to evade the light that engulfed her.

The beam's impact blew away even the patch of beach she was standing on.

"A direct hit...!" Even from her cockpit, Juba could see that Shion had been struck by the beam. The charged particle cannon had no doubt made short work of her.

"Hoo... That was scary."

"...Huh?" However, once the light faded, Shion was still standing there, completely unharmed.

"Huh...? Huhh...? Huuhh...?" The figure standing in that spot clearly had Shion's face, but her silhouette was nothing like it had been before.

"It was so bright that my eyes are all watery..."

The once-humanoid silhouette had been replaced by that of a soft, rounded form based on a skeleton of a bipedal carnivorous dragon. Shion's face was about where the dinosaur's neck would be.

She was now wearing a type of animal costume.

The Exodragon King incident was something that had happened in Gideon some time after Franklin's Game.

At its core, it was a battle between two UBMs: Armordragon King, Drag-Armor and Exodragon King, Drag-Mail. The former led armordragons, while the latter commanded maildragons, and none of this would have been an issue if humans hadn't been caught in the crossfire.

Juliet, Chelsea, Max, and Shion had been deeply involved in it, and in the end, Shion was the one to finally defeat the Exodragon King, putting an end to the incident.

Being the MVP, she had received a reward—Ultimate Costume Series, Drag-Mail.

It was a costume-type MVP reward just like Shu Starling's Hind Bear. Despite its appearance, it was an Ancient Legendary treasure—and as such, it had a powerful skill.

"Antimagic Exoskeleton" reduced all incoming magic-based damage by 100% in exchange for increasing physical damage to the exposed face by 1,000%.

While alive, Exodragon King had used its exoskeleton to negate all and any magic damage, and although the conversion to MVP reward had given it an extra weakness, this power was still as effective as ever—as evidenced by Shion withstanding the charged particle cannon attack like it was nothing.

◇◆

A defensive MVP reward?! Strong enough to negate Obliteration...?! Though the attack hadn't been the strongest it could possibly be, Juba was shocked that Shion was completely unharmed.

Wait... Then...why didn't she use it before...?! If it was that easy for Shion to nullify Juba's attacks, she could've done so at the start.

What's her plan...?! I don't get it! I just can't understand her...! Completely unable to read her, Juba was at a loss.

As for the reason why Shion didn't use it...she simply didn't want to wear something she thought was "tragically un-beautiful." Her fixation on fashion had made her partially forget she even had it. If Amethyst hadn't reminded her, she would have gotten the death penalty before she remembered it.

It hardly needs to be repeated, but Shion was what one might call a silly goose.

Is there some sort of risk to wearing it? Is there a time limit? Or a reduction to physical resistance? Despite her confusion, Juba tried to understand her enemy and in the process came upon the correct answer.

Indeed, while Shion was now strong against magic, her physical defense was unchanged, while any physical damage to her face would be increased tenfold. Juba could win by just crushing her with Citrine's tank-like frame.

She silently considered doing just that. It would be a risky move. There was a chance that ramming Shion with the magic-based barrier wouldn't do any damage, meaning that she would have to hit her with the unit itself. Since Shion wielded material-passing dark magic, this would leave Juba open to her spells.

It would all depend on what happened first: Juba crushing Shion, or Shion's spells reaching her.

"I'll...do it!"

Juba did not hesitate to enact her newfound plan. Trusting her piloting and Citrine's power, she would charge towards Shion.

The mechanical scorpion's many legs displaced the sand as it approached Shion...only for it to suddenly screech forwards on its back legs, like a bike doing a wheelie.

"Huh?!"

"...?!"

Both Juba and Citrine were shocked. They had no intention of doing anything like this.

To them, it seemed that for completely unknown reasons the unit had flipped over, and they realized its legs were caught in some kind of thread.

That was when Juba and Citrine immediately figured out what had happened.

"A wire trap?!" It was the exact trap that Amethyst Captor had left behind before being returned to Shion's inventory.

Amethyst Captor was Prism Crawler No. 1. It was not designed to have much combat ability on its own, instead being intended to support the Superior Job riding it. It specialized in three-dimensional mobility, web-slinging, trap-placing—and most relevantly, tactical support using its high processing power.

Amethyst had the best analytic and strategic abilities among all the Prism Crawlers. And though a flat beach wasn't a good place for taking full advantage of its three-dimensional mobility, it was perfect for burying traps.

Though No. 2 was a fearsome foe, Amethyst knew all of the other unit's strong points and weaknesses. While its foolish owner was fruitlessly wasting time and MP, it used the chance to set up traps unnoticed. While fighting, it had also analyzed Juba's personality and realized that if she couldn't use her trusty charged particle cannon, she would likely elect to dash straight in for a physical battle.

The result of all that strategizing was now plain to see—the mechanical scorpion had been flipped over, exposing the unit's undercarriage, unprotected by the half-spherical magic barrier.

"Gloom Stalker!" Not missing the chance, Shion used her remaining magic to release multiple high-rank ultimate job skills.

The winged, black homing projectiles easily passed through the armor of Citrine's underside, reaching the cockpit and battering Juba over and over.

I...lost...! Juba thought dimly, finally fully grasping the fearsome intellect of the one who had crafted this plan.

Juba had been defeated by nothing other but Amethyst's processing power...

Shion Manjushage... She pretended to be an idiot while she was inventing this thorough strategy... The kingdom has some truly terrifying players...

...but until the very end, Juba failed to realize who she should actually be afraid of.

Thus, the Dryfean pre-Superior, Flow Princess, Juba, retired from the event, with the mystery of her combo still unsolved.

◇◆

"VICTORY! IS! MINE! Ah ha ha ha ha!" Switching from the costume to her dress, Shion burst into a fit of refined laughter.

"Oh? I'm feeling pretty good about myself right now, so why do I feel like things are suddenly getting dark?"

There was something she hadn't realized yet—the fact that there had actually been two suns in the sky until now.

Amethyst had noticed this fact and guessed that one of the stars was Juba's Embryo, which must've been the thing helping her cover Citrine's heavy MP costs. However, there was nothing they could do about it, and facing it hadn't been necessary to achieve victory, so Amethyst hadn't even pointed it out to Shion. It simply wasn't high on its list of priorities.

"So many plates! And I have a hint now too! I am the best!" Having achieved victory, Shion was joyously gathering the plates Juba had dropped.

Alas, she was a bit too happy, and as a result she raised her voice a little too much.

The joy had also made her forget to redeploy Amethyst.

A crushing silence. Unbeknownst to her, a hunter in a presence-hiding ghillie suit was standing right behind her.

He...or rather, God Hunter, Carl Lourlou was holding a harpoon gun.

While Shion was still gathering the plates, he fixed his sights on her...and pulled the trigger.

A moment later, the sound of an explosion mingled with the roars of the crashing waves.

◇◆

And so, Shion Manjushage retired from the event.

She had been taken out by a third party while looting the enemy she'd defeated—a common enough occurrence in battle royales.

Chapter Seven: A Hint

Paladin, Ray Starling

“So the answer is a date on the Gregorian calendar,” I said.

“Yeah.” Having found our first hint, we were now walking along the shore looking for more of them.

On the one hand, we had nowhere to hide out here...but on the other, neither did anyone approaching us. I looked around and didn’t see any place our potential ambushers could be lurking. There were some trees growing around a nearby river, but not enough to act as cover for anyone waiting to attack us. On top of that, Juliet was flying right above us, looking out for any potential threats. I told her that those AA beams made it dangerous, but she insisted that she could evade them now that she knew about them.

“...The hint we were given before we were transported here was ‘Don’t forget the name of this event,’ wasn’t it?” I said as I remembered the event’s name—The Anniversary.

“Yeah,” said Alto. “If that’s a hint, then I guess the answer might be...Dendro’s release date?”

“Perhaps there is a hint that reveals exactly which anniversary they are referring to,” said Nemesis. “We need to gather more.”

Right now, it felt like we only had one point of a polygon. We couldn’t know the true shape without getting a couple more points.

“Mine eyes bore witness to a guidestone pale as death—one that may yet deliver us to glory.”

“You found the next hint, huh?”

Juliet just landed and said, “I saw a stone that looked as white as the rocky area from earlier. I think it’s a hint.”

Flying really was useful for looking out for enemies and searching for hints. Maybe there were other hints that could only be seen while on the ground?

Anyway, Juliet led us to the place she'd spotted—a sandy beach in the event area's south.

However, it had already been destroyed.

Patches of sand had been melted by some kind of heat attack, and the resulting glass was still warm.

It was clear that someone had fought here, and I had an idea who it might have been...

"...The Master with the anti-air attacks," I said. This damage had probably been done by the very same person who'd shot down one Master right before my very eyes and had later brought down Juliet.

He, or maybe she...they'd probably fought here and been defeated. If they'd won, Juliet would've obviously been shot at again.

The fact that we could safely take to the sky now was good news for us.

"And the hint you mentioned is...over there?"

We drew closer to the sea, where there stood a large stone monument. On it, there was text, just like there had been in that rocky area.

"'Each person's answer may differ,' huh?"

"Well, then it can't be the release date!" said Alto. "Dendro came out at the same time worldwide."

"The feast marking one's first breath," said Juliet.

"Yeah. Most people have different birthdays, so it may be that. The fact that plates with '2' or '0' seem more common might've been because most of the playerbase was born in or after the year 2000."

There were a few born in 1999 or earlier, of course, but talking overall proportion, players born after that were the majority.

However...

"The number '4' also seems more common though. Taking that into consideration, maybe it's not our birthdays, but the days we started playing Infinite Dendrogram?"

That could be anywhere between July 15th, 2043 and today—April 20th, 2045. All of the numbers in that range would have 2, 0, and 4 in them which would explain why they were more common.

"That is true," said Nemesis. "What do you think, Alto?"

"Hm? Me? I'm combining those answers into one super answer." ...A super answer? "Hey, Ray. You know how Embryos don't always hatch on the day you start the game?"

“Oh.”

“It can be the same day, but there’re people who create their characters one day, then stop and return and hatch their Embryos some other day. That’s why my guess is...the answer is the participant’s Embryo’s birthday. Whaddya think?”

That...was actually pretty likely. Your own birthday, your starting day, and your Embryo’s birthday were all worthy of being “anniversaries,” though, so it was hard to be certain just yet.

“We can try out all of ’em if we want,” Alto continued. “We each put in a different answer and then just go by whoever passes.”

If one of these answers turned out to be right, that method would let at least one of us pass—and if it was the first one who tried, then the other two would pass, as well.

Wrong answers would mean getting teleported to some other part of the island, though.

More importantly...

“I’m not sure if we’ll have enough plates for that,” I said. “Since that’s personal info, I won’t ask for your birthdays, but what are your starting days and Embryo birthdays? Mine is March 16th for both.”

It had now been over a month since I started, but it really didn’t feel like that.

“The path I now walk began upon the day celebrating the world’s first full revolution, and upon that very day were my black-plumed wings bequeathed unto me.”

“...Pardon?” asked Alto.

“You mean you started on the one year anniversary event and your Embryo hatched on the same day. That’s July 17th, 2044, right?”

“Indeed.” Shu had told me that had been a good time to start, with tons of events to keep you occupied. Apparently, that was also when he’d gotten the King of Destruction job.

“I’m impressed you understand her... I started on February 14th, 2045. Same day for the Embryo hatchin’.”

“All right, that means that the plates we need are... Hm?”

Alto was a fellow newbie, yet she’d started on February 14th, which was...

“...You got into the game right after the UTokyo secondary exams?”

"Yyyep! When the exams were done, I got all hyped and bought the gear for it!"

"You didn't even wait to hear the results...?" I only got my set after I found out I'd made it in and moved to a new place, I thought.

"You speak of...the Palace of Knowledge?!" cried Juliet in shock, surprised that both of us were UTokyo students.

...Crrrap.

"Wooow, look at Ray, revealin' personal info in an MMO! You baaad, baaad booooy."

"...Sorry," I said. "I'm really, seriously sorry."

"Buy me lunch next time!"

...It feels like you always settle debts with lunch, I thought.

"Keep it a secret, will ya, Julie?"

"V-Very well..."

"Hm? What's wrong? You look kinda tense... You okay? Wanna play some cat's cradle?"

"Umm, I-I'm fine, thank you." Juliet was acting strange again. It started when I mentioned UTokyo... Did she have some real life circumstances related to our college? Would I be overstepping any boundaries if I asked?

...Well, for now, I would just count our plates and see if we had enough for all our dates.

Keeping in mind our starting dates and Embryo birthdays, we looked over the plates...and realized that we didn't even have half of the amount we needed. Only one of us would be able to finish the event with these, and that only barely.

"Not enough, but..." I said.

"Hm? If there's not enough, we just gotta beat the monsters and get more, right?" Alto asked.

"...How long has it been since we last ran into a monster?"

I had a pretty bad feeling about this.

"This event is a survival-battle royale... So, honestly, it wouldn't be surprising if there were a limited number of monsters on this island."

The frequency of our monster encounters had dropped significantly, which supported this theory.

If I was right, the plate-gathering part of this event was really about gathering up the "right to give your answer." Even if we wanted to test one of our potential solutions, the plate limit made it difficult.

“This means that the number of times all participants can input an answer is limited. Those who defeated a lot of other people can do it many times, while those who haven’t can barely do it once...”

This event was designed to eventually funnel participants into battles against each other. I had no idea why they’d felt it necessary to include these quiz elements and hadn’t just made it a regular battle royale, but...

“We need to beat other Masters to clear this,” I concluded. “And the ones who will make it to the end will be the strongest...which will be the likes of Jubei and GH.”

“Hmmm...” Alto let out a sigh like she lost all hope, and I couldn’t blame her.

Honestly, though, I felt like those two were better targets than most other participants.

First of all, they’d probably have an obscene number of plates. No matter which one of the two managed to win the event, all of those plates were still in the hands of a single Master. If that Master went on to give a correct answer, all of the extra plates they were carrying would vanish—which meant we would never be able to get them.

That suggested actually fighting them would give us higher chances of clearing the event.

“...Hey, Nemmy, what’s with all the resolve on Ray’s face?” Alto asked.

“That is how his face looks when he is preparing to fight against the odds. He makes it all the time.”

“All the time, huh...? Well, putting Jubei Kaga aside for now... Carl Lourlou is so invincible that you hear about him all the time even in Tenchi... How do you plan on beatin’ him?”

I was also aware of the “Multifariously Invincible.”

And that was exactly why I could say this with certainty.

“We can win against him this time.”

“Huh?” Juliet and Alto both said at the same time. No one would blame them for being surprised.

I went on to tell them something I’d once heard from Shu, as well as providing some conjecture of my own.

Three minutes later, after listening to everything I’d said, they were thinking deeply about God Hunter’s powers and counters.

"I see... That is one way to do it..." said Alto.

"A rule hardly familiar to most..."

"But, Ray, would that actually work...?"

"Well, it depends on how it goes, but...I think that Juliet and I could pull it off."

If the situation called for it, I could maybe do it by myself too.

"That sooo...? Ummm... Will I just drag you down, then?" Alto said with a sad look, pointing at herself.

"Hey, we're just dividing roles," I said. "You're a great help while we're moving around, and it's thanks to you that we were able to get out of that situation so smoothly. If we're up against some big shot, though, Juliet and I are better for the job. That's all there is to it."

"I see... But I... Umm... Yeah... Never mind."

She was deep in thought about something. Was it something to do with her Embryo she'd told me about? "I see... Well, in that case, let's leave it at that and go looking for more hints."

If we're gonna fight them, it won't hurt to lower the chances of getting wrong answers... Huh?! As I was thinking about all of that, I felt a presence. I turned towards it, away from the sea. Juliet had noticed it before me, while Nemesis and Alto followed my lead.

It was a river about a hundred metels away from us.

On the bank of the river flowing into the sea, there stood a familiar-looking girl wearing a pirate hat.

"Chelsea..." Juliet had found the very person she'd promised to fight, and Chelsea was staring back right at her.

The pirate girl waved at us before running closer. She wasn't doing this at combat speed, but the speed of someone hurrying to greet a friend.

It seemed like she was trying to suggest she didn't want to fight...but that wasn't it at all.

"Heyoo. So you formed a trio too," she said.

"'Too?'" I asked.

"I teamed up with Shion and Max. We agreed to meet here, but I don't see either of them, so...didja beat 'em?"

So our group of six became two parties of three, huh? I thought.

"No. There was no one here when we showed up... There were signs of fighting, though."

“Hmm. Really? I guess they fought someone, anyway, and either lost or the battle went to a standstill. Shame.”

To me, she didn’t seem too upset about her companions’ fates. Well, unlike the peace talks, this was an event where nobody risked anything, so maybe it was fair to not feel too strongly about losing a teammate.

Or maybe there was something she wanted more than victory.

“Anyway, there’s somethin’ I’d like to ask you three.”

“Wha—?! You wanna join this team?! As in, you want me to leave?!” Alto said with a fearful voice.

“...Why would you think that?” I asked.

“I mean, in Dendro, you’ve spent more time with them than with me! I’m basically an outsider here! I’m also not a ranker! I don’t eat devils for breakfast like you do! And I haven’t dated you IRL either!”

“Huh? Are you two a thing?” Chelsea asked.

“No. We’re just friends,” I answered. And what does “eating devils” have to do with anything? Let go of that already, I thought.

“You’re gonna make me leave to take in somebody you like better! ‘Sorry, Alto, this event can only be cleared by three people.’ That’s what you’re about to say, right?!”

“No, damn it. Who do you take me for?”

This event was really making me realize that, despite normally being a cheerful cat’s cradle fan, Natsume became a real downer when she was at her wits’ end.

In a way, her thought patterns were like...cat’s cradle, actually—all tangled up.

“If I’m left alone, I’ll be taken out of the event in secooonds!” Alto cried, flinging herself onto the ground to roll in the sand.

“Ah ha ha! Your friend’s funnier than I thought,” laughed Chelsea. “Don’t worry, though. That’s not what I want.” Her smile then vanished in an instant. “Sorry for messin’ up your trio, but...”

She fixed her gaze on Juliet.

“...Can ya let me fight Julie one-on-one?”

“Let’s go all-out and fight each other with everything we’ve got.”

“...Yeah!”

“Oh...” The words they’d exchanged in the event’s lobby came rushing back to me. Chelsea was here to try and have that promised fight.

However, Chelsea wasn't smiling, and even Juliet was hesitant for some reason.

"I planned to have Shion and Max keep everyone else from gettin' in the way, but neither of them are here and Julie ain't alone either, so asking nicely is about the only thing I can do."

If a team wanted to win this event, it was best to fight as a team instead of letting one of your members fight one-on-one. Chelsea had probably considered that when she made her request.

"Hey hey hey, that would be a bit too much," said Alto. "I mean, Juliet is our heavy hitte—"

"Why not?" I said, cutting her off.

"Whoa... Mr. Ray?"

Don't "Mr." me, I thought.

"I knew that they wanted to fight before we teamed up. Also, do you really wanna make your teammate focus on victory when there's obviously something she wants even more than that? Wouldn't it leave a bad taste in your mouth?"

"...I guess it would," Alto said with a nod, covering her face with both hands.

I didn't know if she was ashamed of what she'd said or if she was grieving what she thought was the inevitable end of our team up.

"You wanna fight her too—right, Juliet?"

"...Yeah!" she said. She'd clearly only hesitated because she was being considerate of me and Alto. But now that we'd given her the go-ahead, she was all smiles—a way more fitting expression for her, if you asked me.

"Heh. I was actually plannin' on negotiatin' with ya, offerin' this and that for the privilege of a fight. I guess you're just too much like us duelists, Ray," Chelsea said with a grin.

"Well, I've sparred with a whole lot of you."

"Ah ha ha ha. When things cool down, try joining the duel rankings too, will ya?"

"I'll think about it. Anyway, we'll head off to the west so we don't get in the way."

I'd seen them duel before and knew that their fights could cause lots of collateral damage, so it was best to keep a distance.

I turned away from them and walked towards the west, with Nemesis and Alto following after me.

"So yeah, Juliet..."

But there was still one last thing I had to say to my teammate before I left.

"...Meet up with us later."

I believe that you'll win, I added silently.

It wasn't because her rank was greater or because Juliet had won in the duels I'd seen. Even I could tell that Chelsea now wasn't the same Chelsea I'd seen at the arenas. She had some powerful ace up her sleeve, and she was now gonna use it against her dear friend and rival.

But I still believed in Juliet's victory, because...that's what being a team was all about, right?

"...Acknowledged!" Hearing those words behind me, I left the beach that was about to become a battlefield.

◇

Since it was clear by now that the Master firing the anti-air beams was out of the game, we were riding Silver through the air over the shoreline. It only took us a few minutes to make it to the west shoreline of the event area. It was as beachy as the south had been, and the shallow water below was crystal clear.

"This would be a nice place for a resort," I said.

"A resort, eh...? That does remind me of the time your plans to visit the seaside fell apart," said Nemesis.

"Yeah. Back when Fuso kidnapped me... I'll never forget the encounter at school afterwards..."

It was weird to think that had happened just a short time before I'd headed off to college. I felt like it was forever ago.

"'Fuso?' You mean Fuso Tsukuyo, the Superior? And what encounter in school?" Alto asked.

"...You'll find out eventually." Fuso's name and face were the same here and in real life, so Natsume would run into her sooner or later.

I was currently wielding Nemesis in her greatsword form, and Alto was sitting behind me. I asked if Alto had any means of flying, and she said that the whole "flying on kites" thing was from a different job in the ninja grouping.

“It just hit me that there’s only one type of monster in this event,” I said. “None of them can fly, and wild monsters... Ohh, right, they can’t enter because of the barrier.”

While flying around the kingdom, you might have a hard time dealing with the occasional avian monster or dragon, but that wasn’t the case on this island. Looking outside it, beyond the barrier, I could see some bird and fish monsters, so I assumed that the local creatures had all been removed for the event.

“Oh yeah. Alto, what about your Jewel? Don’t you have a flying monster in there?” I asked, remembering Rook and his avian servant. Many Masters used tamed creatures for flight.

“Uhhh... Um, the monster inside can’t fly... Yeah. It just can’t.”

“I see. Hm? That’s...”

Looking down, I saw something that stood out from its surroundings—a “landmark,” as they were called in battle royales.

It was a wooden shipwreck—a ruined vessel wasting away on the sand.

It stood out on its own, but as I looked at it, I quickly noticed a familiar white color to the sea-facing side of it.

A stone monument much like the one in the south had been placed at its bow.

“That’s gotta be the third hint,” I said. I couldn’t read it from here, so I descended towards it.

When close enough, I jumped off Silver and approached the monument.

“I hope this helps find the right answer,” I said. Now, let’s see what’s written on... Ah!

“...RAY!” Nemesis called out right as I jumped to the side.

A moment later, something crashed into the shipwreck, breaking its bow and sending the white monument splashing into the water.

“Ahh?!” Alto cried out at the sight, but none of us could do anything about it.

After all...the one who targeted the monument—and us—was still attacking.

Jumping away had left me open to a follow-up attack, and the next projectile was already streaking towards me.

“Silver!” I called out, bringing my trusty steed to pick me up and help me evade the incoming attack.

As more of these attacks followed, I realized they were actually massive harpoons—spears whose tips exploded on impact, launched from a whaling gun.

Who was firing all of them?

The silence provided the answer...along with the polar bear standing on the deck of the wrecked ship.

“Eep...!” Alto yelped.

“God Hunter...!” I said. He’d appeared seemingly out of nowhere, but that wasn’t the most important thing to worry about right now.

This was the Superior that we’d left behind to fight Jubei.

I didn’t know if he’d won against her or if he’d simply run away, but I knew that we were now going to fight a Superior who was often described as “invincible.”

A couple days ago, I’d fought one of the “Apices” of all Masters. The result there had pretty much been a draw even though I’d gone at her with my whole clan; without Fuso, it would’ve been a heavy defeat.

So what would happen if just Alto and I were to fight someone considered “invincible”?

Our chances of winning a direct fight were so low they might as well be at the bottom of the sea.

“...Sir, Mr. Ray-man Sir, is this sudden altercation in any way winnable without our heavy hitter?” Alto asked, clearly in a panic.

Well, I had told her that “Juliet and I could pull it off.” Perhaps Alto hadn’t expected us to encounter GH when it was just the two of us.

As for the answer...

“...It is now,” I said, boldly declaring that I could emerge victorious against an invincible opponent.

“Whuh?”

While Alto was shocked by my declaration, God Hunter didn’t say a word. However, I could practically feel his fighting spirit ramping up. It seemed he took my words as a taunt.

And maybe they were, but I certainly wasn’t bluffing. I was absolutely sure that at this moment, in this exact situation, I had a fighting chance against an invincible Superior. This wasn't just unwarranted arrogance.

"Nemesis," I said, transforming her into the Black Shield. "Let's win this."

"Certainly!"

Thus began yet another of my battles against a Superior.

Interlude: Blade-Dance

Event Area, Middle, Base of a Mountain

Great Genocide Max—the girl bearing this over-the-top name had originally been a duel ranker from Tenchi, counted among the top thirty martial artists from that land of strife.

She'd since left this prestigious position and moved to Altar to become a duelist there.

The reason for this was the existence of someone who was essentially a direct upgrade of her—King of Asuras, Jubei Kaga.

Max's Embryo, Ipetam, was a high-rank Guardian—a Sentinel—with countless blades growing out of its back; it had the power to levitate them and direct them at Max's enemies. Jubei, on the other hand, had a job skill that let her control six levitating weapons.

Both of them commanded floating armaments, but the gap in their overall power was evident to anyone.

Although Max had Jubei beat in quantity of her armaments, Jubei was superior in both quality and technique. Despite that, Max had challenged Jubei for the position of fourth-ranked duelist in Tenchi, in order to gain the right to face the top three.

As Jubei was still ranked fourth, the outcome of her confrontation with Max should be painfully obvious.

To make matters worse, their battle had taken place in public, which had made the gap in power that much more obvious. Max now seemed like the weaker version of Jubei.

She'd left Tenchi because she couldn't bear being called that.

Max had then moved to the main continent, traveled to Altar, become a duelist again, and then finally met Juliet and her group. After all that, she'd grown as both a fighter and a person. And perhaps this encounter was the chance she'd been given to confirm that.

"...Jubei."

"Maxie. It has been so long."

Max had once again crossed paths with the physical manifestation of strife—her direct upgrade.

Max had split from Chelsea and Shion to search for hints, and on the way to take a look at the goal, she'd run into Jubei.

King of Asuras was surrounded by pieces of metal and event plates.

"...Oh? Have your tastes in fashion changed?"

"One more word about the outfit and you're dead."

Max wearing frilly dresses was a fairly recent thing. She'd challenged Juliet to a duel for fourth place—and to get her to agree, Max had said that if she lost, she would do anything Juliet wanted. It was clear how that had turned out: Max had become Juliet's dress-up doll.

Max was used to the way Juliet dressed her by now, but having an old acquaintance comment on it still annoyed her.

"Eh heh heh. We'll be fighting to the death regardless," Jubei giggled. "I must say I am surprised to see that you are in this festival as well, Maxie."

"Don't call me that... What's with all the loot, anyway? This your handiwork?"

"No. It appears that someone set traps all over the mountain, and half of what you see was caused by people triggering those. Though...I sliced the other half apart," Jubei explained with a smile as she showed her old acquaintance her floating weapons and the three curseblades clutched in her prosthetic arms.

That was when Max noticed something.

"...That's one less arm than I remember," she said.

"Yes. A certain Superior in an animal costume took it from me."

"Hm...?" That description made Max think of the bear who'd been selling popcorn in Gideon. But if that was the person Jubei was talking about, the destruction to the island would've been far greater.

It also made her think of Bachigo Futae, a Superior from her old home of Tenchi who wore a crochet animal costume. Maybe the costume thing wasn't so unusual after all.

Regardless, that wasn't the important thing right now.

"Jubei," said Max as she looked into the eyes of the asura who had surpassed her in every way.

"Yes?" Jubei replied.

"...Having one less arm ain't an excuse for losin'."

"I knooow."

Max's gaze and the words they'd exchanged were the signal. The two old enemies fanned out their blades and prepared to face each other.

"Maddened Blade, Sip Their Blood—Ipetam!" Max called.

"GRRAH!" Ipetam answered, releasing over a hundred blades from its back.

"It has been so long since we've fought," Jubei said, widening her smile and causing her weapons to orbit her at high speeds. She was now prepared to deal with anything, no matter how many attacks were launched or from what angle.

"Heh!" Understanding that, Max put on a smile that was joyous, belligerent, and fearful all at the same time.

Their combat style was quite similar, but Max had lost against Jubei every time she had challenged her.

How much had she changed since those defeats? Since Jubei's SJ had no level cap, had Max only fallen further behind?

The answer to that would yet again become obvious in the next few moments.

As Jubei prepared her six floating weapons and the three curseblades, Max rushed towards her.

Her combat style was simple. She used Ipetam's floating blades to attack the enemy from every direction in order to overwhelm their capacity for defense and evasion, then used the blades fixed to the sheaths on her legs to launch herself towards them for an attack using Laser Blade—the Swordmaster's ultimate job skill.

This was a constant barrage that could exceed a hundred strikes per volley. It was an onslaught that few could withstand.

However, Jubei wouldn't be a duelist from the land of strife if she wasn't one of those few. Moving by Jubei's will, her six floating weapons flew to shatter Max's hundred.

Ipetam's blades all had a direct trajectory towards the target, so someone like Jubei had no trouble predicting all their paths and cutting them down.

Max had expected this, however.

She's still not using her arms! she thought.

Jubei was in the habit of primarily fighting with her floating weapons. Strikes made with the blades held in her arms, prosthetic or otherwise, were stronger, but since they broke her stance, they opened her up to attacks that she might not be able to counter. By contrast, she didn't have to move her body to move the floating weapons, so she always relied on them first while keeping her actual physical arms ready to defend against any attacks that may come her way.

Just five of her floating weapons had brought down over twenty times that number of blades that Max had launched her way, while she herself remained completely unengaged. If Max were to rush her now, the last floating weapon—the counterattacking Dankajin—would strike her down, leaving her open to a quick death by Jubei's own hands.

That had happened to her many times back when they'd fought in Tenchi, which implied that nothing about Jubei had changed much since then.

And that was why Max's true advantage—the value of the days she'd spent outside of Tenchi—would be tested now.

"HIIIYAAH!" With Ipetam's blades in each hand, Max rushed into the range of Jubei's floating weapons.

Dankajin was instantly unsheathed, launching a high-speed counterattack on Max.

Before it reached her, Max stuck out her left hand and cut it off at the wrist.

"Hgh...!" Though discomfited by the feeling of losing a hand, she made the blade in her now-disembodied extremity fly towards Jubei.

The blade, still held tightly clutched in her severed hand, did exactly that, and a moment later it was struck by a counterattack from Dankajin, now distracted from the rest of Max.

Dankajin was a counter-focused weapon that always hit anyone who entered its range. However, it was automatic, and it always went for the nearest living entity—meaning that a freshly sliced-off hand functioned as a sufficient distraction.

I see she has not forgotten Dankajin's effective attack range, Jubei thought. The scores of Max's blades kept five of Jubei's floating weapons busy, while the last one was distracted by Max's hand.

Max then closed on Jubei, coming into her melee range.

However, no amount of her high-rank ultimate job skills could match the strikes from Jubei's curseblades. Max was also inferior to her in raw strength, speed, and the amount of punishment she could take. Having lost a hand, she also now held only a single blade, as opposed to the three in Jubei's prosthetics.

Max had managed to close distance with Jubei, but that had only made her death more inevitable.

The thing she chose to do in this desperate situation was letting go of her single sword.

"Oh!" Shifting to flying mode, the blade entered the range of Jubei's curseblades, where it was quickly struck down.

This seemed like a bad move on Max's part. A surprise attack like this would have no effect on Jubei when she was ready for it.

"RRHAAGH!"

But what if Max layered it with two more such attacks?

Max even let go of the sheathed blades on her legs that she used for propulsion before sending them against Jubei. Again, they were countered by the two remaining curseblades.

Max's flying blades could reach Jubei even from a close range. Forcing Jubei to use her three curseblades made her lose her footing slightly, but the opening it created was small. Whether Max equipped a new blade from her inventory or had Ipetam manifest a new one, Jubei would be fully ready to counter it by the time it was in her hand.

And that was exactly why Max accelerated towards her unarmed. The girl who commanded a hundred blades moved in to fight with none.

Jubei was caught off guard by this, and the momentum Max had built up allowed her to approach her before she could swing her curseblades.

And so, the two fingers Max had managed to extend towards her foe tore out one of the asura's eyes.

"Ngh...!" The prosthetics didn't move fast enough to prevent the attack, while using the Kasanehime she was holding in her own arms wasn't an option. That weapon built up power without limit, so she had to think carefully about how to employ it when it had accumulated too much of said power. In a situation like this, slightly off-balance from intercepting the blades, using Kasanehime could even lead to her own destruction.

Max was well aware of this, and guessed that destroying half of the blades that made it to her would have made Kasanehime’s power too great for Jubei to use it in this specific situation.

This was a move Max had carefully crafted just to deliver this single attack—this repayment—to Jubei.

It was something that Max would never have been able to do in the past—and right after it, the three curseblades sliced Max to pieces.

“...Heh,” Max chuckled as she fell.

She’d expected this outcome. This happened to anyone who entered the range of this asura—this embodiment of strife. But she wanted to challenge Jubei even if it cost her her life.

She wanted to measure the distance between her and Jubei, as well as weaken the asura for her friends.

I did...what I could... she thought. This would at least increase Chelsea’s and Shion’s chances of winning against Jubei, which was another reason why Max hadn’t hesitated despite the odds.

Though, for all Max knew, they might not end up being the ones to finally face Jubei. It might even be the winged Altarian duelist who’d once defeated her but was now her friend.

Regardless, Max had carved her mark upon this embodiment of strife, and for that alone, she was satisfied.

Max died, and Ipetam’s floating blades vanished.

After that, all that was left were Max’s plates and Jubei. She touched her now-gone left eye and cracked a grin.

“Max is as strong as ever.”

Overjoyed, she said something she’d truly believed for a long time now. That had been her honest impression of Max since her days in Tenchi.

Max had a combat style much like Jubei’s, but was a direct upgrade to hers, controlling many times more weapons. Despite being but one Master, she could completely overwhelm Jubei’s processing power.

So far Jubei had always won against Max thanks to her Superior Job and quality equipment, but she always wondered if her victory would be so assured had they been equal in those regards.

Jubei had always considered Max a rival and had been saddened by her departure from Tenchi. And now, having learned that Max had continued to improve since that day and had even become good enough to take out Jubei’s eye, she was filled with glee.

Even though she now had only one eye to perceive the light, she nevertheless felt as though the sun was shining twice as brightly.

"I am meeting Ray Starling soon, so I should probably bandage it up," she said before starting to hum a song and walking away from the place where she'd fought Max, certain that this wouldn't be the last time she would fight her truest rival.

Chapter Eight: To Beat the Invincible

Several Minutes Before Ray Starling and Carl Lourlou Began Fighting

After defeating Shion, Carl headed to the goal in the middle of the island.

His objective was to clear the event. With the plates from Shion, Juba, and those he'd defeated before them, he now had enough for a whole four answers. Because of that, he had elected to give it a try.

Standing before the input device, he began to insert the numbered plates.

He'd found two hints so far: "The answer may differ for each person," and "204Y."

The latter made it obvious that the answer was a date in the decade of 2040, while the former meant that it was something personal, like the day you started Infinite Dendrogram or the day your Embryo hatched.

Having narrowed it down to just those possibilities in his mind, Carl figured that it wouldn't hurt to try at least one of them.

With that in mind, he had input the day he'd started playing...which turned out to be the wrong answer. That had flung him to a random part of the island.

Despite that, Carl wasn't panicking. No matter where he'd been sent, he only had to trek as far as the mountain in the center to get back to the goal.

Now, the place he'd been teleported to was the deck of a shipwreck to the very west of the island.

He'd actually appeared at the very moment Ray had descended upon the ship's bow and prepared to read the hint inscribed there.

Realizing that he stumbled upon an enemy, Carl had reflexively attacked him using ranged weaponry. Not even he had expected to meet another participant immediately after being teleported.

However, this actually wasn't coincidental.

Wrong answers at the goal teleported the player to a random place next to hints that they hadn't yet found.

Cheshire hadn't mentioned this detail, and it could only be discovered by getting a wrong answer once. It was actually insurance on the control AI's part, meant to prevent scenarios where none of the participants could manage to arrive at the correct answer.

This consideration from the control AI's had now led to a battle between Ray and Carl.

Ray fought to survive against this immense foe and take his plates for himself. Carl fought to hunt down the person he'd once marked as prey, to teach him a lesson for his conceit in thinking that he could win...and to not lose against the little brother of the one who'd defeated him.

Thus, their clash began.

The God Hunter fired the harpoon gun in his arms.

It seemed to be an MVP reward that automatically created the harpoons it fired, but the trajectory was so direct that Silver was able to evade the shots.

Leaving evasion to him, I rushed towards God Hunter.

"EEP!" Alto yelped.

"Don't bite your tongue or anything!" I told her. This was no situation to make her get off of Silver. If I did that, GH would target her instead, so I had no choice but to make her deal with the steed's erratic movements.

"Purgatorial Flames, full power!" I roared, releasing flames that consumed the God Hunter below. A direct hit from these could set aflame even Pure-Dragon-tier creatures and above, but the white bear below was completely unaffected.

Not a single strand of fur on his costume was even singed.

"U-Um, he's not burning at all!" Alto exclaimed.

"...I figured this would happen." There was no way the God Hunter's gear would burn because of something this basic. Actually, even Xunyu's Baolongba wouldn't be able to set him on fire.

After all, Carl Lourlou's equipment couldn't break.

It wasn't a matter of the gear's quality—it became indestructible because he was the one wearing it.

"...It's just like Shu said." My bro had told me about the Multifariously

Invincible and his gimmick.

He'd also told me how to counter it.

I recalled the conversation I'd had with Alto and Juliet before Chelsea came along.

◇

"His Embryo, 'Indestructible and Everlasting, Nemean Lion' makes his gear indestructible," I said.

"So, what—it just doesn't break no matter what?" Alto asked.

"Yeah." The gear he had equipped just never broke—that was the secret of his invincibility.

"But even if his gear doesn't break, he can still die, right? So... Oh."

"...That precious treasure which preserves life." Realization had hit Alto while she was talking, and it seemed Juliet had gotten the gist too.

"Yeah. His Embryo works even on the Lifesaving Brooch."

The Lifesaving Brooch was a well-known accessory, but it wasn't the only one relevant in this case.

There was the Lifesaving Brooch, which prevented any fatal damage but had a chance to break upon activation.

There was the Cameo of Health, which prevented any debuffs...in exchange for a chance to break upon activation.

And then there was the Thiefsbane Bracelet, which prevented any thievery attempts...also in exchange for a chance to break upon activation.

Nemean Lion's power prevented them all from breaking, making them usable indefinitely.

The Cameo prevented hampering debuffs like Bone Fractures, while the Brooch prevented attacks that would reduce his HP to 0. He would be in good health no matter how much HP he lost. He would be invincible in any and all situations.

That was God Hunter, Carl Lourlou—the Superior whom no one could destroy.

My Vengeance ignored defense, but not even that could reduce his HP to 0.

"That's just broken!" said Alto.

"Yeah," I nodded. "There's probably no one who can beat him on a normal battlefield.”

“What do you mean?”

“...He speaks of the law of the arena, as well as those of this very fete,” Juliet said.

I would expect no less from a high-ranking duelist.

Alto spent a few seconds thinking about what we might mean, but then clapped her hands together as she realized.

“Oh yeah! This event doesn’t allow you to use Brooches at all!”

That was indeed the answer. People in this event couldn’t wear Lifesaving Brooches.

Knowing my combat style, that was a pretty big negative for me, but it was even worse for GH. He wasn’t wearing the thing that had made him truly invincible. Even if he had some sort of substitute, it likely wasn’t a fully functional replacement.

That was probably why he also never participated in duels.

“So we can beat him now! Yaaay! Let’s vince the invincible!” Alto said with obvious joy. Juliet and I were silent, not sure how to break it to her. “Huh? Did I say somethin’ wrong...?”

“No, Alto,” said Nemesis. “You are not wrong, but...”

“If we meet him again, it would mean that Jubei wasn’t able to beat him,” I explained.

“...Oh.” When we escaped that forest, Jubei and Carl had begun a one-on-one fight. If Jubei, with her immense combat ability, wasn’t able to beat Carl, it would mean that he was near-invincible even without the Brooch. In fact, it wasn’t out of the question that he had some kind of MVP reward with a similar effect anyway, just like Rosa did.

If that was the case, our chances of beating him were slim.

“Nnngh... It’s your fault for gettin’ my hopes up. You implied we were on a battlefield where we can actually beat him...”

“Sorry,” I said. “But there’s one other way this event area is different from a normal battlefield.”

“Which would be?”

“Look,” I said as I used a finger to draw a warped circle—the outline of this island.

Then, I drew a circle of the same shape just around it.

“This is...”

“There are no rules in the field, but there are rules in the event.” If we were to fight GH, we wouldn’t target his HP. Cheshire’s words came back to me.

“This will be this event’s areaaa. The island, I mean, as well as the area five hundred metels above it and twenty metels into the surrounding sea. Touching the barrier around it will disqualify you, so be caaareful.”

“We’d make him lose by taking him out of bounds.”

◇

And then, we’d unexpectedly encountered GH himself. Juliet wasn’t with us, but we still had a chance of winning.

We’d been traveling along the coastline to make it easy to push him out of the zone in case we encountered him.

If Juliet was here, we could rely on her Hræsvelgr’s wind powers to send GH flying about twenty metels. I’d heard that she’d successfully done that once against some large dragon during the Exodragon King incident.

However, there was something that I could do as well.

“Now!” I called, making Silver rush towards him.

The white bear readied his harpoon. The flames hadn’t harmed his gear, but they had harmed something else.

I could sense his shock as the shipwreck he was standing on collapsed.

The shipwreck was already on the verge of breaking, and my Purgatorial Flames had weakened it to the point where it could no longer support him.

“I burned a whole lot of trees yesterday! Tough luck, huh?!” Fighting against Afforest King Golem and its Planting Golems had given me a good grasp of how fast burning wood collapsed.

With his footing gone, GH dropped his harpoon gun and was hurtling towards the ground in midair.

That was the perfect time for us to charge him. He had nothing to grab on to and was completely at the mercy of gravity.

And even if his weight exceeded a hundred kilograms...

“SILVER!”

...my trusty steed’s horsepower would be more than enough to push him out of bounds! As GH fell, I made Silver intercept him with the boundary of this event behind him.

And so, my Prism Steed slammed into the white bear's body...and stopped in place.

"Huh?!" The shock wasn't mine alone. Nemesis, Alto, and even Silver seemed to be equally surprised.

I timed this perfectly, going in to push GH when he was most defenseless.

However, the white bear simply didn't move from his place in the air and gazed down on me with the lifeless eyes of his costume.

Next thing I knew, he was holding on to Silver's head with his left hand. In his right hand was a dagger, poised to strike me right in the face.

About the Polar Bear

Ray Starling wasn't aware of this, but the costume his opponent was wearing was the MVP special reward for beating the UBM known as "Polaris Bear, Polar Star."

Polaris—the star that never moved from its place in the sky.

Called "Ultimate Costume Series, Polar Star," the item born from this creature had the effect of negating knockback. No physical power, no pressure from skills, and not even gravity itself could move the God Hunter against his will when he was wearing this.

Ray Starling was also unaware that the reason why Carl Lourlou had received such a reward was his own brother, Shu.

After the First Knight-Machine War, Shu Starling had been traveling to Tenchi when he'd clashed with Carl Lourlou during a certain incident at the Harshwinter Mountains.

Shu's Right of Destruction was put to the test against Carl's indestructibility. The ultimate offense faced the greatest defense, but back then, Shu's STR had been too low for Right of Destruction to negate Nemean Lion's effects.

However, in spite of that, Shu had emerged victorious.

His path to victory against Carl had been the same as the one Ray had chosen—to take him out of bounds.

Except while Ray only wanted to take him out of the bounds of the event, Shu chose to take him out of the bounds of the planet's gravity.

Indeed, Shu had achieved victory by literally kicking Carl into outer space.

Carl hadn't died, but he had no means of returning—or doing anything, for that matter—so he'd had no choice but to use the suicide system.

The one who was called invincible had been utterly defeated, and he had never forgotten this. He still wanted to get back at Shu Starling for it.

Because of this, the Polar Star that he'd defeated later was adjusted to fulfill his need for knockback resistance—and because of this, he had no intention of showing mercy to the one who faced him now: the younger brother of the Master who'd beaten him.

And so, he swung the hurt-returning dagger down towards Ray's face.

Paladin, Ray Starling

"Gifted Quiz!"

"Question: The creature that is four-legged in the morning, two-legged at noon, and three-legged in the evening would be man, but what is the name of the three-legged bird from Japanese mythology?"

Suddenly, seemingly out of nowhere, I heard a familiar voice, followed by an unfamiliar one.

Looking ahead, I saw God Hunter's dagger hovering right in front of my eyes—but he himself, seemingly shocked, wasn't moving one bit.

"Ah!" I used the chance to take Silver back to my inventory. Alto and I almost fell into the sea, but I was able to summon Silver again at the very last moment and ride him along the surface.

While we did all of that, GH never moved an inch.

"Th-Th-That was toooo close..." Alto said. Looking at her, I noticed that she now had a cat's cradle string in her hands. It was the same one that she'd shown me here in Infinite Dendrogram earlier, but it was now emitting a golden light. Inside the complex netting, there was a semitransparent projection of a polar bear.

"Alto, is that...your Embryo?"

"Yeah...it is. It's called 'Gordian Knot'... You know what that means, right?"

Gordian Knot...a famous legend about Alexander the Great. It was a knot tied to an oxcart, and a prophecy stated that the one who could untie it would become ruler of all Asia.

“Gifted Quiz gives a question and freezes the target in place until they give the correct answer. In exchange, giving the correct answer doubles all of the target’s stats. I got no control over the question and it’s all random...”

“Now that’s...a difficult skill to use.” It was a combination buff and binding ability that Alto herself had almost no control over. If she used it on an enemy and the question was easy, it would just help them, and if she used it on a friend and the question was hard, she’d just incapacitate her allies.

If she’d used it on me and that had happened, it would’ve been over for us. In a survival-battle royale like this, you could never know when you’d be attacked.

I understood why she hadn’t used it until now.

“And you didn’t use it on Jubei because...?” I asked.

“...Imagine her stats getting doubled.” Good point, I thought.

“But isn’t GH wearing the Cameo? It negates debuffs, so...”

“Ray, this ain’t a debuff, but a setup for a buff!”

“...That makes sense.” So although debuffs didn’t work, buffs with...questionable usefulness still did. I never thought about it that way.

“But, uh...umm... I... Sorry.”

“Huh?” Alto, who had just saved us from a real tricky situation, was becoming all negative again.

It took me only a moment of wondering to realize why.

“That question...was probably too easy... Again, sorry!” she said, looking up at the polar bear with almost teary eyes.

“...Yatagarasu,” he said, speaking for the first time since we encountered him.

“...If you knew the answer, you could’ve said it earlier,” I said. Or maybe the minute or so he’d spent without saying anything was just him preparing to speak?

Regardless, GH was now blessed with Gordian Knot’s buff, giving him a golden aura. We were now faced with a strange creature that could only be described as a golden polar bear.

He descended from midair and stood on the water’s surface. I could only guess that he was using that skill or whatever it was that had held him in midair earlier.

"Well, damn..." Stats-wise, we had no chance against him even before the buff, and now his stats were double, along with the weight of his intimidating aura.

"...By the way, it lasts ten minutes...and it can't be used on the same person twice in the same day...so..." Alto explained. The polar bear projection had vanished from the cat's cradle in her hands.

I didn't expect her to be able to, but apparently she couldn't freeze him again.

"Out of the frying pan and into the fire, eh...?" said Nemesis. "Well, that's nothing new for us...!" I replied. With his stats doubled, though, GH was truly a menacing enemy.

If we couldn't push him out of the event area, what could we even do to beat this Superior?

We had the option of giving up on both his plates as well as the sunken hint, but I didn't think he would let us escape.

"Hey, Ray..." As I fixed my gaze on GH, walking on water towards us, Alto talked to me in a tone of voice I hadn't heard from her yet. It was still negative and full of fear—but rather than fearing something in the present, it seemed like she was anxious about the future.

"...What?"

"Can you promise to never, ever, ever...tell anyone?" She was a friend, and I had no trouble promising her things, but...

"...Tell what?"

"About what you're gonna see now." Those words tore my attention away from GH and towards her.

She was holding up the back of her right hand...the Jewel.

"Promise?"

"...Yeah," I said with a nod.

That seemed to have made her relax, if only just a little bit. During our exchange, GH had come uncomfortably close to us...

"Get him, Horobimaru."

"GOD HUNTER, SIGHTED."

...but then something punched him away.

The entity that had appeared from Alto's Jewel was larger than the bear, and its fist had sent him flying even though Silver's charge hadn't been able to make him move a single inch.

The polar bear went on to spring off the water's surface, then slightly sink into the water.

Unexpressive as he was, his shock was still evident. The being that had appeared left me, Nemesis, and clearly even God Hunter himself at a loss for words. Even if he was normally talkative, the surprise would have rendered him speechless.

The entity looked like heavy armor from Heian-period Japan, but it also had some qualities reminiscent of a western suit of armor.

It was all clad in metal, and its joints were knit using tiny metal fibers. On its shoulders there were large Japanese-style armor plates, which, combined with the tassets of a similar theme, made it overall look more like a samurai than anything else.

However, the armor had no helmet at all, and I didn't see even a skull or anything there. It was like an armored warrior without a head.

I had heard the name of a being with this unique appearance.

"Penta-Phased Destroyer, Horobimaru."

It was the name of the SUBM that had appeared in Tenchi.

Interlude: The Closed Sea

Event Area, South, Beach

This was the same battlefield where Shion defeated Juba, only to fall to Carl right after.

Two famed Altarian duelists now stood upon it: Juliet the Black Crow and Chelsea the Wandering Golden Sea—respectively the fourth and eighth in the rankings.

They were besties, combat partners, and rivals all at once, and now they were facing each other in single combat.

“...I came to Altar right about when Gloria did her thing, right?” Putting her battle-axe, Poseidon, down in the sand with its bladed side first, Chelsea began to talk about her memories.

“Hm?” Juliet, facing her from some distance, found Chelsea’s attempt at conversation strange, but listened to her regardless.

“It was right after my closest friend also left Granvaloa,” Chelsea continued. “I left to look for an SJ I could take and went to Altar ’cause it was closest.”

Saying nothing in response, Juliet recalled the time she’d first heard that.

The friend Chelsea spoke of was none other than Zeta—the now-wanted Superior. They had once been part of the same Granvaloan pirate crew.

“After the move, I decided to try my hand in Altar’s duel scene...and that was when I met you, wasn’t it?”

“Yeah,” nodded Juliet. Back then, Rosa and the rest of K&R hadn’t arrived in Altar yet, so the country didn’t have many female duelists. As fellow girls of the arena, they’d noticed each other, and Chelsea had struck up a conversation.

“I never had any idea what you were saying back then.”

“Ngh...” Chelsea was now Juliet’s closest friend, but unlike Ray, she didn’t have the strange ability to instantly understand her as though she was speaking normally.

“I eventually figured it out, but by that time, you’d started talking to me like a normal person.”

“Yeah. I did...” Juliet used her own, natural manner of speech with those she was close to. She’d slowly gained a few such friends over the years, but Chelsea was and always would be the first.

“I really feel that way...” said Juliet with a light blush and a nod.

“We’re friends, but also rival duelists,” Chelsea continued as she caressed her axe. “But there’s a side of me I haven’t shown you yet.”

A second later, their surroundings sank into the sea.

Or rather, the water flowing freely between the grains of sand on the ground raised the local sea level precipitously.

Surprised, Juliet flapped her wings and rose above the water.

“By that, I mean...you’ve never met the ‘me’ from the past, when I was at my strongest.”

With over half of her body now submerged, Chelsea continued speaking.

“You...or rather, the strongest girl in Altar needs to see it.” She pulled out her Poseidon and leaped out of the water. “I am the Great Pirate, Chelsea—the eighth in Altar’s duel rankings, nicknamed the ‘Wandering Golden Sea.’”

She then used her skill as a Great Pirate to stand on the water’s surface and introduced herself properly.

“And I was the second in Granvaloa’s duel rankings, nicknamed the ‘Closed Sea.’” That was who Chelsea used to be—someone many thought to be the strongest woman in all of Granvaloa.

“Bestie...you’re about to get a taste of my real fightin’ style,” Chelsea declared as she stood atop the rising sea. “Hope it ain’t too much for ya, Julie.”

“...Try me!” Juliet replied, all smiles, and commenced the battle.

◇◆

Type Weapon, “Panthalassic Axe, Poseidon.”

That was the name of Chelsea’s Embryo, and its abilities were centered around the concept of “liquid summoning.”

The skill that probably stood out the most was its ultimate, Golden Bull

Tsunami—Poseidon, which summoned a flood of liquid gold. Besides that, there was World Reversal Waterfall, which created a massive pillar of water that could be used for both defense and offense.

However, neither of those pushed her "liquid summoning" theme to its limit.

She could also summon simple seawater, the volume of which easily surpassed the amount of the liquid gold she could conjure up; given enough summoning time, it could even exceed that of the World Reversal Waterfall.

Chelsea had been preparing to summon water from the moment she'd put her Poseidon into the sand, and by now, the water had already submerged their battlefield and still continued to flow unabated.

Liquid summoning with a long precast? A flooded surface doesn't mean much to me, though... Juliet thought. Being capable of flight, she could easily avoid the water below.

The height limit for this event was a whole five hundred metels—far higher than that of the arenas. And since Juba had been dealt with, she didn't have to worry about being shot down from the sky.

Juliet could easily win this by simply attacking Chelsea from above over and over until she died.

As she became puzzled why this "all-out battle" was going in that direction...

"Julie."

...Chelsea looked up at her and smiled. "You sure you're high enough?" A moment later, continuous explosions resounded over the beach.

"Ah?!" Juliet's intuition drove her to rise higher for an evasive maneuver as trails of light pierced the sky. Flare bombs! she thought as she looked down to see a large object.

Its silhouette was all too familiar to her.

“Your ship!”

It was the pirate ship that had been parked in Gideon’s fifth district—the place that had once been the HQ of the Golden Pirates.

“Yeah. We had dessert parties there, so of course you know her,” said Chelsea.

That was a pleasant memory between her, Juliet, and Max—but right now, Juliet found the ship, with its proudly displayed Jolly Roger, absolutely terrifying.

“With the clan disbanded, I can carry her around like this. She’s my property, y’know?”

Just like Caldinans with their sandships, Granvaloans carried their vessels in large inventories. The size of these ships and regulations around dueling prevented them from being used in Altar’s arenas, but the only item disallowed inside this spacious event zone was the Lifesaving Brooch.

“So you raised the water because...”

“Ya guessed it. To let this baby float. Twenty metels from the coastline just ain’t enough.”

While Ray and Alto were incorporating the event’s barrier into their fight against Carl, it was nothing but a limitation to Chelsea.

“Here’s another thing about my Skyanchor here—she’s fitted with an anti-air loadout.”

As Chelsea proclaimed this, the ship revealed a number of anti-air guns that did not match at all with its wooden hull. Energy then flowed from the magic tank within, activating every single one of them.

“So yeah, flyin’ around like that ain’t very safe.”

And with that, the sky was torn apart by a flood of light. Explosions resounded and overlapped, playing an orchestra of destruction.

“Gh...!” Even Juliet found it difficult to evade the barrage. Gaining altitude wasn’t an option—five hundred metels was far too little before these powerful AA guns.

Instead, she spun around as she went down and...

“Blackwing Orchestra!”

...used the black feathers she released while evading to power an offensive skill. Each of the plumes released jet-black blades of wind, raining down on the Skyanchor.

“Julie, here’s something you may not know about Granvaloan ships...”

However, the wind-blades barely did any damage.

“What?!”

“Their surfaces have anti-water and anti-air coating. We go sailing through storms, y’know? You’d have to use your ult to break through this resistance.”

Chelsea was right, but Juliet would have to stop moving to prepare her ult, which would leave her open to the anti-air barrage.

To avoid this AA fire and buy time to use her ult, Juliet had to go not above Skyanchor, but below its firing range.

Thinking that to be the best course of action, she quickly descended.

The automated AA turrets followed her, but she continued to go down as though falling until...

“Welcooome.”

...she was right next to her friend—and her friend’s axe was swinging towards her.

Though caught by surprise, Juliet parried the axe with her cursed sword, using the force of the collision to slow her momentum before flapping her wings to readjust her stance.

“Julie, didja think about why I’m bein’ so talkative right now?” Chelsea said with a joyful tone. It seemed as though she’d expected Juliet to deflect her surprise attack.

Juliet had missed the moment Chelsea had left her ship, but the girl had somehow known exactly where Juliet would go and water-walked right to that location. That, along with the precise targeting of the flare bombs and the guns made Juliet realize that she’d moved exactly as Chelsea expected.

“You were talking to lure me down for a battle on the sea...weren’t you?”

“Yep! I suggest you don’t go up again. I set the guns to attack any livin’ thing that’s too high up there.”

Chelsea knew Juliet’s combat style almost as well as her own. With her analysis skills, it wasn’t hard to make Juliet act as she wanted.

Their surroundings were covered in water, but with the job skill that let her walk on water, that wasn’t a problem. Juliet, on the other hand, couldn’t go too high because of the AA weapons, forcing her to fight in low altitudes.

She could no longer bring death from above even if she wanted to.

“Now, here’s a question for ya: why do ya think my ship is specced for AA?” Chelsea asked.

Juliet realized that she was once again funneling her into acting a certain way, but she couldn’t tell how.

She carefully observed both Chelsea and Skyanchor when suddenly...

“Hm...?”

...she felt something odd.

Juliet had Danger Perception and Killing Intent Perception as job skills, but neither of them were active. Instead, her pure combat intuition was telling her that she was in grave danger.

“The answer is...” Chelsea said as Juliet flapped her wings to dodge to the side. “...because I’m strongest on the sea.”

A moment later, an explosion erupted right under where Juliet had been floating just moments earlier.

Though overcome by shock, Juliet instantly understood that this attack wasn’t caused by Chelsea’s Embryo or job skills. The explosion was quite obviously a Crimson Sphere, and there was only one way Chelsea could use something like that.

“Gems...!” Looking down, Juliet saw countless Gems floating in the beautiful water below.

This was a strategy that would never appear in an Altarian duel.

◇◆

Upon moving from Granvaloa to Altar, Chelsea was deeply troubled by the stark differences in dueling rules.

What made Granvaloan duel rules different wasn’t the lack of duel barriers—that was a difference in environment, not the rules specifically.

Was it the fact that you won by sinking the other side’s boat, then? That was a major difference, but there was something even bigger.

It was the use of items.

Since there were no barriers, Granvaloan duelists were allowed to use Brooches to ensure their survival, but more importantly, they could also use many items that were banned in Altar’s duels.

HP recovery consumables—allowed.

Artillery shells and Gems made by other people—allowed.

Special gear that ran on MP from magic tanks or similar outside sources instead of the user's own—allowed.

Granvaloan duels were based on naval warfare, so there were almost no limits on the items that could be used in them.

That was the main difference between Granvaloan duels and the ones held in other countries, and it had taken a long while for Chelsea to adjust to that.

Indeed, her true combat style was one in which she utilized countless offensive consumables as sea mines.

This particular style of combat was also extremely compatible with her Embryo.

Poseidon could summon a crushing wave of liquid gold that could be used both offensively and defensively. However, those who knew Chelsea as she had been in the past would understand that the most fearsome thing about her wasn't her flashy skills, but her seemingly minor techniques and trickery.

She had a skill called "Creek," which created a weak flow of water from any nearby spot in space. It dealt almost no damage and only barely exerted enough force to knock over a toddler, which made it unable to even trigger Danger Perception.

In exchange for this weakness, however, she was able to create water in any place within a range of several hundred metels.

She could do it in deserts, in the air, in the sea...and at riversides.

Indeed, this was the exact skill Chelsea had used against Wan. She'd walked downstream alongside the river while preemptively and secretly arranging Gems in the water. All the while she'd used Creek to move the Gems, leading them to Wan and then detonating them right when Zaqqum exploded, seizing the chance to blow off his legs.

Her true power was in these precise and silent "sea mine attacks."

She also had a strong predictive ability that had allowed her to dominate Granvaloan naval battles.

Her keen analytic eye and control over conversation were both weapons she incorporated into her fighting style. Sometimes, she provoked her opponents to infuriate them; sometimes she used the truth to push them to act exactly like she wanted.

Chelsea funneled her opponents into situations advantageous to her, where she would silently attack them with her sea mines and sink their ships.

Even the Granvaloan Superior, Antimicrobic Soy Sauce, had been no match for her back when he was still in his sixth form. He could turn the surrounding water into explosive material, but Chelsea would just see it coming and use it against him.

Avoiding the minefield and approaching it from the air was made impossible by the excessive AA armaments on Skyanchor, forcing everyone to fight on her home turf.

On top of that, Granvaloan duels weren't one-on-one, but crew versus crew—meaning that she had multiple crewmates supporting her and protecting the ship.

Because of this, back when there had been no Master Superiors or Superior Jobs, she and her Skyanchor had managed to rise to second place in Granvaloa's duel rankings.

Since the number one spot was held by Grand Captain and the capital ship—Granvaloa itself—it was fair to say that Chelsea was effectively the duel champion.

Because of this, she was once known as "the pirate fleet's most fearsome woman."

However, with the increase in SJs and Superiors, other Masters increasing their boating skill, and her lackluster performance after the move to Altar, that title had been all but forgotten.

But that was the very woman Juliet was facing now.

The environment, the lack of death penalty, and Chelsea's mentality were all exactly as they had been back then, and she was ready to bare herself to her friend and rival.

The Closed Sea was unleashing her entire being upon the Black Crow.

◇◆

"...Chelsea," Juliet said. She'd never seen her friend fight like this.

Chelsea had prevented her from using her most powerful techniques and was aiming to win by dragging Juliet into her own battlefield. It was a chillingly fierce, yet quiet and fearsome strategy.

If Juliet didn't have her wings, she might have already lost without so much as scratching Chelsea.

However, she could still fly and hadn't drowned yet—and that meant she could still fight.

"Yeah, that's about what I'd expect from ya, Julie..." said Chelsea as she observed Juliet settling into her now-familiar combat style.

She used her well-rounded strength to the fullest, reaching for victory no matter the situation or what enemy she was up against. It was beautiful, dazzling, and charming to the point of being emotionally moving.

Now that Chelsea had her ship and sea mines, there was the possibility that Juliet could be defeated with little resistance.

But she was still alive—she hadn't sunk yet.

And that one fact was why she could still fight. Her time having fun with her friend wouldn't end just yet.

Both of them had cracked a grin without realizing it as they took their fight to the next stage.

"Blackwing Requiem!" Juliet launched a remote-controlled dark magic spell at Chelsea. Neither water nor explosions could defend against it.

But there was something that was able to block it—dozens of winged black spheres surfaced from the water and welcomed Juliet's spell.

Gloom Stalkers?! she thought in surprise. The dark magic spell that she'd seen Shion use countless times now was a high-rank ultimate job skill.

And it had just been launched en masse from the sea—or rather, from Chelsea's minefield.

The Great Pirate had actually thrown every single Gem she had into the water right as she raised the sea level, and there were more than just Crimson Spheres among them.

"I went around and bought tons of dark magic Gems just in case I fought you or Shion," Chelsea said. "There aren't many of them on the market, though, so it cost me a whole lot." She held her hands out and waved them lightly as though to say "I'm broke now."

However, she had managed to gather more than enough of these Gems for her purposes. She'd always thought that a chance like this would come sooner or later.

I don't know how many dark magic Gems she has, Juliet thought. I might run out of MP before she runs out of them... Also...

Also, Gems didn’t use Chelsea’s MP, and she could activate many of them at once. It wasn’t impossible for her to completely overwhelm Juliet.

“In that case...!” Juliet said as she flapped her wings and flew towards Chelsea, intent on fighting with something other than magic.

“That’s exactly what I thought you would do!” cried Chelsea as she braced herself for Juliet’s approach.

There was no longer any room in the fight for her silver tongue or Skyanchor’s aerial domination. The battlefield was now limited to the surface of the water, and the winner would be decided by pure fighting technique.

“Up you go!” Chelsea said as she swung her finger like a conductor’s baton, directing serpentine jets of water upwards into the air.

Countless such flows aimed straight for Juliet, and all of them carried Chelsea’s sea mines. Juliet’s friend and rival was planning to detonate one Gem when Juliet got too close, leading to a chain explosion that would completely consume her.

The trajectories of the water flows were such that it was difficult for Juliet to evade them all—a fact that made it obvious how well Chelsea knew Juliet.

She can only do this because this fight is right above the water...! Grazed by the exploding Gems, Juliet considered the differences between the Chelsea she knew and the Chelsea she was fighting now.

It wasn’t merely the presence of Skyanchor or the Gems she used as sea mines—Juliet also couldn’t see where the flows that she commanded actually began.

On land, Chelsea’s liquid summoning was somewhat telegraphed, so Juliet could easily spot them and counter the attack. That was always how it had gone in their duels.

But just as you would have trouble finding a specific tree in a forest, you couldn’t spot a water current in the sea. Until the flow broke the surface, it was hard to tell where the liquid Chelsea summoned was coming from—and where it was heading.

Actually, Chelsea had found it necessary to attack her with flows that shot out of the water exactly because she was fighting Juliet in particular. In battles against other ships, she could simply sink them without ever breaking the surface of the sea.

As she is now, she's clearly a pre-Superior...among the best of them too! Juliet thought. Perhaps if the battle against Chrono Crown had been on water, Chelsea might've been able to prevent him from evading or accelerating, quietly ending the battle with her silent sea mine attacks. That was how powerful she was right now.

But still...! Even despite the dire circumstances, Juliet was having tons of fun fighting Chelsea in her current state.

She couldn't ascend upwards and was always in danger of being blown up by the mines in the water below, which trapped her between sea and sky.

But still...she was having tons of fun.

After all, this was her first true all-out battle against her dearest friend.

It was so much fun that she wouldn't regret it if this turned out to be her final duel in Infinite Dendrogram.

And so, with a smile on her face, she flew towards victory.

You really are somethin', Julie, Chelsea thought. She knew Julie well and had made her water flows as difficult for Juliet to evade as she possibly could.

However, Juliet had the combat skill and adaptability to dodge them regardless.

She was closing the distance between them, but Chelsea knew what she was planning.

She can't use her ult, Chelsea thought. Juliet's Corpse-Eating Bird—Hræsvelgr was a powerful mixed-magic spell, but to prepare it, Juliet had to move her wings to her arms.

It came at the cost of mobility, which would spell certain death in Chelsea's minefield.

Because of that, what Juliet was about to do was...

Cursed Phalanx Disorder, Chelsea thought. It was the Fallen Knight's ultimate job skill that turned her cursed weapons into missiles flying towards the enemy.

Being merely a high-rank job, Chelsea didn't have the stats to survive a direct hit from even one of them. However, since cursed weapons were physical, they could be deflected by things other than dark magic.

She's closin' the distance to deplete the Gems I'd use to intercept her attacks. She'll break through half my minefield and use her job's ult when I run out of Gems to counter it.

However, neither of them knew exactly where that divide was.

Chelsea didn't know how many cursed weapons Juliet had prepared, while Juliet didn't know how many Gems Chelsea had floating around.

Victory would belong to whichever one of them turned out to have the greater number.

Though, to reveal the answer to this question, there were more of Chelsea's Gems than Juliet's cursed weapons.

That was exactly why Juliet was closing the distance.

Despite the danger of being shot down before she could use her Cursed Phalanx Disorder, she was approaching her rival. It was more or less a strange game of chicken.

Neither of them were saying anything anymore. The battle itself had their full attention.

Juliet was focused on heading forwards and looking for the best moment to strike, while Chelsea was focused on preparing for Juliet's ultimate job skill—and bringing her down when it came.

Their AGI was different, and thus the time they experienced was different. Their intense focus had made it feel like time was slowing down.

It seemed almost as though this moment would never end.

The both of them were indeed hoping that this thrilling split second would last forever—but alas, that was impossible.

When the distance between them was only fifteen metels, an explosion singed Juliet's leg...

Now!

...and in response she took a small pouch from her sleeve—the inventory holding her weapons.

"Cursed Phalanx Disorder!" With that, she destroyed the inventory with her own hands, spreading the many weapons into the air.

Then, following her command, the weapons used the grudge stored within as fuel to propel them towards Chelsea.

"...Now," Chelsea said out loud as she activated all of the Gems she had prepared.

Magic lights began to appear beneath the surface of the ocean between them...and below where Juliet had just passed.

This was Chelsea's plan—to prepare enough Gems so that she could not only counter Juliet's Cursed Phalanx Disorder, but also surround Juliet completely and defeat her once and for all.

Their attacks were unleashed at the same time, and the sea was soon swallowed up in a massive burst of power.

◇◆

She wondered what had led to her defeat.

Had it been overconfidence? No—her plan had been solid and her execution had been nearly flawless.

Had she not adequately prepared? No—she'd been ready for this battle long before it was imminent, and she'd expended every resource she'd stocked for this exact scenario.

Had it been some sort of mistake? No—although her strategy did have one weakness, it shouldn't have posed a problem.

Explosions from below the water surface could always be evaded by going upwards. However, that meant becoming the target of Skyanchor's AA cannons. If Juliet took to the sky to escape the magic of the Gems, they would quickly shoot her down.

Because of this, Chelsea's plan was as good as flawless.

However...Juliet had actually flown upwards despite the danger.

She just barely escaped the inferno below her and increased her altitude, all the while weathering the fire of the AA guns.

Being burned and shot out of the sky should have been inevitable.

However, she was still alive—and she was right in front of Chelsea.

"HEEEAAHHH!" Juliet swung her sword as she fell. "Fell" not merely because she was descending, but because she no longer even had the wings to fly—they had been completely consumed by flame, having become her shield through her Molting skill.

Chelsea had obviously known about that, but she believed that Juliet would've been shot down regardless.

Juliet, on the other hand, had wagered that she'd make it through the barrage with a tiny sliver of her health remaining.

Whether due to her own incredible battle intuition or the influence of a teammate who was known for recklessness, she'd charged straight through the cannon fire, made it to the other side, and reached Chelsea.

Gotta use my water flow control to make a wall! Chelsea's heyday had really been back in her time in Granvaloa, but that didn't mean that she was weaker now in every way.

"Ah...!" Back when she'd won all her battles using her sea mines, she didn't have the close combat technique she'd honed under Altarian dueling rules—the fighting style she'd developed to stand her ground against her rival.

However, she couldn't move her axe fast enough to block Juliet's sword. Her reaction was delayed by her overwhelming focus on her old fighting style.

The golden axe failed to stop the black blade, and the winged girl's sword sliced into the seafaring pirate.

Being a high-rank job, Chelsea didn't have the bodily strength to withstand the strike of a vanguard Superior Job. The sword entered her left shoulder and cut diagonally through her body, the edge finally exiting at the right side of Juliet's waist.

It was a fatal blow. The beautiful blue sea was now stained red with fire and blood.

Without a word, Chelsea looked down at her wound, then at the friend who had sunk into the water right at her feet.

Unlike Chelsea, who had a water-walking skill, Juliet—now wingless—had sunk beneath the surface of the sea. Having clearly overextended herself, she didn't seem to have the strength to get up again.

...If I'd left a mine under my own feet, I might've been able to make this a draw, Chelsea thought. With a wry smile on her face, she created a flow that brought Juliet to the surface.

"Ughh...! Chelsea...?" said her nearly drowned friend, coughing.

"Here," Chelsea said as she reached into her inventory and gave Juliet the life jacket she'd used during a previous event, hoping that it would keep her friend from sinking.

Now... Is there anythin' else? Chelsea thought.

Her pain was set to "off," so she could still move, but certainly not much. She had only seconds left until she would receive her death penalty.

"Next time..." With great effort, she opened her mouth to speak.

"Huh?"

Chelsea had spent a moment thinking what she ought to say in this exact situation. "The next time we get a chance to fight like this, I'll have developed a fighting style different from the one I had and the one I've got now." She cracked a faint smile. "So fight me just like this again, will ya?"

It was a promise.

Juliet had defeated the Chelsea she was now and the Chelsea she'd used to be—and yet her friend would still challenge her again in the future. Maybe that was just Chelsea being a sore loser, but duelists were just like that. They found joy in competing for victory against people who were simultaneously their bitterest enemies and dearest friends.

Chelsea had continued living this lifestyle despite Altar's different duel rules exactly because she found it so much fun. And it was made even more fun by the fact that she had forged a strong friendship that helped the both of them improve each other.

That was why Chelsea would never tire of this.

"...Sure!" Juliet said, readily accepting Chelsea's promise. She was worried that this might've been the last duel she would ever have, but this promise thoroughly overshadowed that fear.

Thus, she smiled, believing with certainty that the two of them would play together again.

The two girls smiled at each other as one of them vanished, ending their duel.

Until next time.

Chapter Nine: Invincible Versus Invincible

March 15th, 2045

A month ago in real time and three months ago in Dendro time, a particular individual was walking on a beach at night.

"So I'm finally movin' to Tokyo tomorrow, huh? Guess I can't stay up all night this time."

Listening to the waves and feeling the wind, Alto was strolling along the beach. She'd passed the UTokyo entrance exams and was now preparing, with her mother's help, to move to Tokyo.

Alto...or rather, Natsume didn't have much to bring, but her parents, overjoyed that she'd made it into UTokyo, had bought her enough furniture and the like to make the move a daylong affair.

"Huh?" As she imagined what her new life would be like, she noticed the entity standing on the beach with her.

It was the suit of samurai armor that had been making waves across Tenchi for the past few months. The creature had drifted to this country's shore about five months ago and, upon arrival, said:

"Who here craves my arms and armor?

Challenge me in combat.

What I still bear is a longbow, naginata, and this armor itself.

I am a Superior Unique Boss Monster.

I am called Penta-Phased Destroyer, Horobimaru."

Superior Unique Boss Monster—SUBM. A highly exclusive group of monsters containing the likes of "Biframe White Whale, Twin Moby Dick" and "Tri-Zenith Dragon, Gloria."

Horobimaru was one of these creatures, but he was an odd example, never engaging in battle unless challenged. He simply presented his rewards and merely stood in place, waiting for those who would face him. Anyone who attacked him would be deemed a challenger, and he would quickly deal with them—and only them.

He brought no harm to anyone besides the martial artists who dared to fight him, making him an extremely peaceful SUBM.

Fighters from all over Tenchi had gathered to try and defeat him, and out of the thousands to face him, only two had ever actually bested him—King of Brigands, Bigman, and The Gun, Sauer Urgaur. Both of them were Superiors.

Following both defeats, Horobimaru instantly revived himself and granted them weapons. Bigman received the naginata, while Sauer was given the longbow.

Since Horobimaru hadn't come equipped with a helm or a tachi, it was rumored that those items had been taken before he'd arrived at Tenchi.

And now, the only thing left was the headless suit of animated armor.

However, despite losing all of his weapons, Horobimaru was now stronger than ever before.

Bigman and Sauer had lost the right to challenge him again, but he had become so strong that even the other Superiors seemed to be completely powerless against him. His strength and toughness had even driven some to deem him completely invincible. Fighting him now seemed so hopeless that it didn't take long for the number of challengers to start dwindling. Even Superiors and pre-Superiors who spent a long time preparing for the battle were defeated, while everyone else had already given up.

There was a time when this stretch of coastline had been bustling with people challenging Horobimaru around the clock, but now he might not even see a single combatant per day.

Tonight was no different—Horobimaru stood in the same spot, but Alto was the only person around.

"A headless samurai, standing on a beach at night. I can't tell if this is picturesque or something straight out of a horror film," she nonchalantly commented before an idea popped into her head. "I'm not gonna be able to log in tomorrow anyway, so let's give him a little test! Just for funsies!"

If she was going to be too busy to log in the entire day anyway, getting a death penalty didn't mean anything. She planned to try fighting him and maybe get a screenshot or two to post on her social media accounts.

"All right, the camera's set, so...Gifted Quiz!" Thus, with little thought behind it, she used her Embryo's skill on Horobimaru.

Alto’s Embryo was called the “String-Weave of Chance, Gordian Knot.” It was a buff that posed a random question to the target and held them in place while they answered.

Alto knew that an SUBM would immediately get it right and attack her. However, she hoped that before the answer came, she could at least get a picture she could caption with something like “I caught myself a Horobimaru!”

“Question: What is the capital of Japan?”

“Whoa, that’s so easy I’m gonna cry...” Alto said, cursing her misfortune, expecting Horobimaru to answer right away and kill her instantly.

Silence.

“Whuh?” Contrary to her expectations, Horobimaru said nothing and did not move whatsoever. She found it strange, but she didn’t miss the chance to get close to him and snap the picture.

“All righty! I can see this gettin’ a lotta likes!” she said excitedly.

“...Hmm?” However, when Horobimaru continued to stay silent and unmoving, she started to become confused.

Huhhh? I mean, the answer’s obviously Tokyo. It’s one of the most famous cities in the world, isn’t it? Don’t Dendro’s servers have this data stored somewhere? she thought, not realizing how off the mark she was with that assumption.

The question was only easy for Masters—any of them could answer it in a split second.

However, for tians and monsters, it was information from a different world they could never know.

No matter how much Horobimaru thought about it, the answer could never come to him.

Five minutes passed, then ten. Alto was actually about to give up and log out, when...

“I have been immobilized,” said Horobimaru. “I will never break free of this by my own power.”

“Huh?” Alto was surprised that he’d said anything that not only wasn’t the answer, but also sounded like words of someone thoroughly defeated.

However, the surprise was nothing before the shock from the words that followed.

“Thus, I recognize you as the final victor.”

“Huh? Wait. HUH? Hold on. Whaddya mean?! Say that again!” As Alto became more and more perplexed, Horobimaru knelt before her.

Gifted Quiz was now undone.

“I am no longer Horobimaru,” he said. “I grant you this body of mine, ‘Prototype Horobimaru-Star Armor.’”

The reason Gifted Quiz had ceased to affect him was that his nature had changed. He was no longer the target of the skill or even an SUBM at all—he had become Alto’s property.

Indeed—through her Gordian Knot, Alto had just defeated the SUBM that many of Tenchi’s strongest were powerless against.

“When champions with Superior Jobs stand before you, I will wield my powers against them for three minutes once a day. Grant me much strife and many battles, and I shall grant you victory.”

Without even waiting for Alto’s response, Horobimaru took out a Jewel and placed himself inside of it. The Jewel then moved by itself to take its place on the back of Alto’s right hand.

Horobimaru was gone, leaving only Alto...who was so shocked she had fallen backwards onto the ground.

“...What do I do?”

She had just defeated Horobimaru and taken him for herself. If anyone found that out, Tenchi’s battle junkies would be hounding her every moment she was online. Smart as she was, she instantly realized how terrible this was, and the joy of beating the SUBM was quickly crushed by fear.

Before anyone could see her, Alto logged out, certain that she simply couldn’t let anyone know about this.

After that, Tenchi had held a countrywide event to celebrate Horobimaru’s final defeat, and Alto didn’t log in once for the entire event.

◇

My college friend had just summoned an SUBM.

I would say that I was pretty used to shocking things by now, but this was enough to render even me speechless.

Still, I managed to call out to her.

"Alto, this is..." She turned back towards me when she heard my words, and she looked like she was on the verge of tears.

"...Keep it a secret, okay...? Never ever ever tell anyone about it..."

"Uhh... Sure."

"If this comes out, my Dendro life will be over for good..." She seemed to be caught in that downward spiral of negativity again. "This guy says that he'll only fight SJs, and if people in Tenchi find out I have him, I'll have no future there! He's a real problem child! I have no idea how to use him... Hell, this is actually the first time I've summoned him! I'm scared of what's gonna happen after this!"

...I could see her point, though. And I could understand why she hadn't summoned him in front of Jubei.

I wasn't the only one surprised by this turn of events, though. God Hunter seemed just as, if not more, shocked. He also seemed hesitant to come closer, standing at a distance and observing us.

Who could blame him, honestly? A newbie to the game had just used a Superior MVP reward to summon the actual SUBM itself. For someone who'd gained all his strength through normal means, this was completely unheard of.

I thought that GH might even decide to retreat now. Instead of fighting such an uncertain battle, he could choose to head for the goal instead.

However, contrary to my expectations, he brandished his dagger and advanced towards us.

He wasn't Shu, so I couldn't read his emotions through his costume just yet. However, there was something I could understand.

His intention could be translated into one simple phrase: Like hell I'm going to run.

These feelings of pride and resolve were so great that I could sense them even behind his bear costume.

"Nemesis, Alto...Horobimaru." This Superior, driven by his strong will, was now approaching us completely intent on victory.

In this case, the best thing to do was respond in kind—not back down, but step forwards.

We were here to win this event. There were Masters from all over the world here, and if we were to break the tape at the finishing line, it would be better to do so after facing our enemies head on, not through underhanded means. The latter would have certainly left a bad taste in my mouth.

“Let’s win against the invincible Superior!”

“Certainly!”

“O-O...Okay!”

“Fully understood!” The three of them answered my call in their own ways, and thus began the final round between us and God Hunter, Carl Lourlou.

◇◆◇

Event Area, West, Coastside Cliff

If he wanted to strive for victory like the hunter he was, Carl should’ve chosen to retreat.

Ray’s group had yet to acquire too many plates, and it would’ve surely taken them a while to find and read the hint that had sunk into the sea when the shipwreck was destroyed.

Even though they could fly using the Prism Steed, if he moved at top speed Carl would still reach the goal and input the correct answer before they could.

It had been the same situation with Jubei—to Carl, it was better to run away from enemies who were too much trouble.

However, there were some things that he couldn’t run away from no matter how much trouble they might be.

He couldn’t turn his back on the younger brother of the man who’d defeated him. He couldn’t run from the “Invincible” SUBM when he was deemed to be “Invincible” himself.

Jubei was too much trouble, but nothing more than that.

These two, however—his pride wouldn’t allow him to ignore either of them.

Thus, no matter how uncertain his victory seemed, Carl chose to stay.

Giant-slayer? SUBM? It doesn’t matter. Come at me. I am invincible—the “Multifariously Invincible.” Even if the entire world is against me, not one of them would be a worthy opponent.

Those weren’t exactly his thoughts, but an approximate translation of his emotional state as he charged towards his prey.

The prey, of course, were not content to simply let themselves be hunted down.

The headless armor samurai kicked off the sea's surface and rushed towards Carl. What followed was something like a cross counter—both of their attacks landed at the exact same time. Carl was punched, while his dagger fell on the armor samurai.

The exchange was like a replay of the battle's first strike, for it sent Carl flying backwards yet again.

This was in spite of him wearing Polar Star, which had the power to nullify all knockback.

And on top of that, the skill of his Drag-Pain—the dagger which returned damage dealt to him in the form of fixed damage—had failed to activate.

In fact, the dagger was now half broken.

Carl said nothing, but he wasn't fazed by this. In fact, he'd expected this by now.

I knew it. So it is true. How fiendish. My gear no longer functions.

Having been attacked by Horobimaru, the Superior now knew exactly what made the creature so powerful.

◇◆

The headless samurai, Horobimaru—otherwise known as "Prototype Horobimaru-Star Armor."

He had two special traits that made him what he was.

First was his sheer toughness. His defensive power, endurance, and all of his resistances were so high that not even END-focused SJs could match him. Even SJ ultimate job skills were like mere scratches to him, and only Greatest One exceeded him in magic and debuff resistance.

In terms of pure toughness, Horobimaru ranked second among the SUBMs.

However, that trait paled in comparison to the second one—his skill, which was quite ironically called "Anti Skill."

This ability made it so that anything that touched him would be rendered unable to use skills for 999 seconds.

People, monsters, armaments, consumables—anything Horobimaru touched would lose its active and passive skills.

Polar Star had lost its knockback negation with the first punch Horobimaru threw at Carl. And now, the Drag-Pain he'd used against him had become nothing but a mere dagger.

Both MVP rewards had temporarily lost their indestructibility, but while Polar Star had the endurance to withstand the damage, Drag-Pain had broken.

Tenchi's martial artists wielded many job skills as well as powerful blades, blessed or cursed with all manner of special powers. But while facing Horobimaru, none of those skills meant anything, rendering them powerless against him. All offensive magic and curses were also more or less negated by the armor's pure toughness.

The only thing you could rely on while fighting the armor were your own stats and techniques that didn't rely on skills to be effective.

That was the final form of the SUBM that had appeared in the land of strife—Penta-Phased Destroyer, Horobimaru.

The fact that this invincible monster had been defeated by a skill that didn't touch him and couldn't be negated by resistances due to being classified as a buff was a great example of the power of compatibility.

The entity that had created Horobimaru certainly hadn't anticipated such a pitfall.

◇◆

Physical contact negates my skills, meaning that my Drag-Pain is of no use.

All skills that had to touch Horobimaru to work were useless solely because of that. Drag-Pain had been one of the aces up Carl's sleeve, but it was no exception to this rule.

This, too, was an example of the power of compatibility.

Then again, one might say that he had already done a great deal to swing the compatibility of this battle in his favor by simply wearing a full-body costume. If his skin was exposed and Horobimaru touched it, Nemean Lion's skills would vanish, making all his gear destructible once again. It was exactly because his entire body was covered that Horobimaru's blow had only negated the skills of Polar Star.

However, that was little consolation. To Carl, facing the armor samurai meant a thorough defeat.

Carl was invincible through a skill combo, while Horobimaru was invincible through a combination of pure defensive power and a skill that negated the skills of anything he touched—which included Carl's invincibility combo.

The Prototype Horobimaru-Star Armor was Carl's natural enemy.

And what of it?

Despite that, Carl moved with determination.

So what if he is my natural enemy? I am invincible—the Superior who was called invincible and who strove to live up to that name. There is no reason for me to back away from anyone, even my natural enemy.

Carrying those feelings in his heart, Carl made a move.

The hunter that had felled many a powerful quarry considered his options.

Drag-Blood's AoE poison was not viable. Not only was it useless against nonliving animated armor—Carl knew that its debuffs and the like could end up empowering Ray Starling. The third one could easily withstand it with just an Elixir.

Only a debuff as powerful as a Superior Embryo or SJ ultimate skill would be useful here, but Carl hadn't yet taken enough damage for Drag-Blood to have reached that level.

Having been just sent here, he also didn't have any traps set up in the area. Thus, he couldn't use the same strategy he'd used against Jubei.

Carl put away his dagger and equipped a weapon that was perhaps most appropriate for his role as a hunter—a bow.

He pulled the bowstring back and fired into the sky.

"That's...!" Ray was familiar with this technique. It was a Heavy Bow Samurai skill that he himself had weathered back when K&R had attacked him—Early Summer Arrow Rain. It turned a single arrow into a hundred. The hunter grouping was obviously capable of using bows, but the skill was only a high-rank ultimate job skill.

However, the user was Carl—a Superior.

If someone like him dedicated one of his two high-rank job slots to Heavy Bow Samurai, it could only mean that there was more to it than the skill itself.

As though to confirm that fact, the arrow that split in midair became a meteor shower.

And that was no poetic exaggeration—the arrows had all become actual meteors.

This was because the bow itself was an Ancient Legendary MVP reward—Star-Summoner, Meteoloader. Any arrows this bow shot to a certain height would fall back down as meteors with greatly increased toughness, weight, and heat.

This also applied to the arrows created by Early Summer Arrow Rain, which meant the skill summoned not a hundred arrows, but a hundred meteors.

This was Carl's wide-scale extermination combo. It was so powerful that not even he could avoid it, but his defense made that irrelevant.

Also, what he was aiming at wasn't actually Horobimaru himself.

"...Whuh?"

Instead, he'd aimed at the woman who was now staring at the meteors above with a dumbfounded expression—Horobimaru's owner, Alto.

No matter how tough he may have been, Horobimaru was ultimately her summon. If she were to die, Horobimaru would vanish as well.

She had no means of defending herself against this, and the meteors would soon overwhelm her...

"Not happening!"

...but a knight stood to protect her.

The man on a silver steed, clad in a black coat, grabbed Alto and rode off, zigzagging between the meteors. Before the meteors landed and the shock waves reached them, he spurred his horse downwards while evading any superheated rock that launched their way.

"EEK! EEEEEEEEEEP!" Alto shrieked at every meteor that nearly grazed them.

"Ray!" Nemesis called out.

"It's fine. They're slower than lasers, and the shock waves aren't as bad as the ones from that whale thing!" Ray said, relying on his combat experience to evade the meteors. The falling rocks went on to crash into the ground below, creating many repeated impact explosions.

Carl and Horobimaru were standing in the middle of it all, both thoroughly unharmed.

He instantly found the only weakness in my meteor shower. I suppose I shouldn't expect any less from his brother. Though, he just broke it all with his fists.

Seeing Ray counter this attack made Carl crack a smile under his costume.

Horobimaru was still facing him, seemingly indifferent to his owner's predicament, and the armor's movements made Carl realize something.

Given what I know about the owner, she would definitely use Horobimaru to protect herself. The fact that she isn't must mean that she cannot*. This thing is not being controlled by her. And from what she said, Horobimaru would only take action to fight and destroy Superior Jobs... It makes one wonder who is being used by whom.*

Carl's conjecture was correct. Horobimaru was Alto's property, but she couldn't control him like a regular tamed monster. He could only be Called in battles involving Superior Jobs, and once summoned, he would do nothing but fight the SJs. Alto herself wasn't aware of this specific fact, but if there were SJs on her side, Horobimaru would attack them as well.

Defeating—no, fighting—Superior Jobs was the very purpose for Horobimaru's existence. Upon accepting his defeat by Alto, he had released his Resources as an SUBM and was no longer counted among their number, but that purpose had never changed.

After all, this was part of his nature before Jabberwock had even given him the designation of "UBM."

"98 Seconds remaining." However, some things had changed after he'd stopped being a UBM—most notably, the time he could be active.

Horobimaru's Anti Skill constantly drained an immense amount of SP. When he'd had the vast Resources of an SUBM, he could use it and fight without needing a moment of rest; but having become a living armor summon that was merely based on the original SUBM, he would exhaust his SP in a mere three minutes. Once that time ran out, Horobimaru would automatically be sent back to the Jewel.

Because of this, Carl could win not by defeating Alto, but by merely focusing on defense and waiting for the summon time to expire.

He had done something like that against Jubei, and Carl fully understood that he would also have to do it here.

I am not doing that.

However, satisfying his feelings was more important than following the optimal course of action right now.

This was a battle against another "invincible." His first fight against an SUBM...and the SUBM was being used by a newbie.

These facts made it impossible for Carl to take the easy way out.

This wasn't a matter of haughtiness or scorn, but pure pride.

"Destroy Superior Jobs!"

"...Come." He spoke his second word today and prepared to welcome Horobimaru.

The armor charged at him with more speed than ever before. With Polar Star's knockback negation nullified, the incoming attack would surely send him flying outside the barrier, especially since he was only a metel away from it.

With over half of his body submerged, the Superior didn't move as he waited for Horobimaru to come closer, only for the armor to be sent flying.

Horobimaru's shock was apparent. Before the armor had even realized it, there was a ring of wire encircling his right leg.

It was the end of a snare trap—one of the most basic traps imaginable.

Carl had been waiting for Horobimaru to come closer just for this.

He had thrown the materials for the trap into the water ahead of time and waited for the armor to approach before using Quick Trap to create the full snare right under his feet and catch him.

Horobimaru no longer had the upper hand.

You should never underestimate a hunter, SUBM. You cannot negate traps of this kind, can you?

A snare this primitive had no skills for Horobimaru to cancel, and Carl's traps were meant to be used on creatures Pure-Dragon-tier or higher, meaning that it had no trouble catching this empty suit of armor.

Pure physics took over as the momentum from the snare trap flung Horobimaru behind Carl.

And so...

I am not the only "invincible" who would lose by going out of bounds.

Horobimaru touched the barrier...and vanished.

Carl had used himself as bait to trap his prey—a strategy employed by many skilled hunters.

Silence fell over the battlefield. Having defeated the greatest threat, Carl was taking in the moment...

"SILVEEEERRRRRRRR!"

...when suddenly, someone seized that very moment as an opening.

A black wall was rushing towards Carl.

It had been created by the skill called "Wind Hoof." This was the power that allowed the silver Prism Steed to gallop on compressed air while also permitting the rider to create barriers using his own magic.

And now, right in front of the steed, there was a barrier of air so heavily compressed that not even light could pass through it.

Ray didn't have the time and his Grudge-Soaked Greaves didn't have the magic to create an omnidirectional barrier like the one he'd once used against Franklin. The small barrier right in front of Silver was the most he could manage right now.

However, that was enough. This barrier wasn't actually meant to protect anyway.

Ray didn't intend to win against someone "invincible" with defense. He was doing what he'd been planning to do from the start.

Shock overcame Carl as he realized what was about to happen. Having been defeated by Shu, he'd been investigating Ray since the moment he'd revealed his power during Franklin's Game and the events before it.

For Ray Starling, the black air barrier was not a means of defense...

"Wind Hoof, cancel!"

...but a compressed air bomb.

A moment later, an explosion would erupt in front of Carl, and with his knockback immunity nullified, the pressure would send him flying outside the barrier.

However, there were still a few moments left before that happened.

Not bad. Not bad at all. You sure are something else, Shu's brother. You were waiting for this the whole time, weren't you?! Very well—then I will show you the ace up my sleeve. Another way to be invincible is to kill everyone who threatens you, and that is exactly what I'll do. My Burst Mode is gonna blow you away—along with your explosion!

With that surge of emotions, Carl activated the accessory with the Clothing Switch skill and prepared to swap Polar Star for his offensive gear when...

"Blackwing Requiem!"

...he received a direct hit from a spell coming from the right.

His surprise was evident as he turned towards the source of the attack and saw a heavily injured girl with black wings—Juliet.

She had finished her battle with Chelsea and had rushed back to the side of the teammate who'd believed in her victory.

Her spell delayed Carl's counterattack by just a few moments, and his defeat was now inevitable.

The wind unleashed from the black barrier landed directly on Carl, throwing him back to the edge of the event area...and making him vanish.

The invincible Superior was eliminated.

◇◆◇

Kingdom of Altar, East

Carl was sent back to his nearest set save point—a particular town in Altar.

He was in the exact same position he'd been in when he touched the edge of the event area, so he fell backwards immediately after arrival.

"You are back. Why the strange posture?"

A colleague who had accompanied Carl on a quest westward posed that question in a tone that suggested he wasn't even a little bit worried. It seemed that he'd been waiting for Carl to return.

Not saying a word, Carl slowly stood up. A keen eye would notice that his hands were slightly shaking.

"Did the event end already? I certainly do not believe you lost, but..." The colleague—a fellow Sefirot member, God Hand, Yumeji Iryo—adjusted his glasses.

He had no idea how deeply those words might have stung Carl right now.

Still shaking from the bitter humiliation, Carl somehow wrung out a response.

"I lost. I hate this. I'm so sad. I'm going off. See you tomorrow."

"Huh? Oh. Sure, see you then."

Leaving his confused colleague behind, Carl logged out and went to sulk in his bed.

God Hunter, Carl Lourlou was not very sociable and a Master of few words. Any words that he did manage to speak did not nearly measure up to the complexity of his emotions.

Chapter Ten: Event Cleared

Paladin, Ray Starling

As God Hunter vanished into the edge of the event barrier, it finally dawned on me that we'd actually won against him.

It was hard to call this a real victory, though. We couldn't have done it without the event's rules or Alto's completely broken summon—Horobimaru.

Juliet had also been a major factor. If she hadn't made it in time, it might've been over for us.

"Juliet...?" I said as I noticed her descend to the beach, halfway in free fall, and then drop to her knees. Worried, I ran up to her and realized that she was completely out of MP. "Are you okay...?!" I asked as I reached her and cast a healing spell—which for some reason did absolutely nothing.

The battle against Chelsea had done a number on her, sure, but there was clearly something else at play here.

"Wait...!" That was when I remembered who we'd fought before that—as well as the weapon the person used against her.

Jubei had hurt Juliet with her Death-Bearer, Kubigawara—the shortsword that prevented all healing. Even though Juliet had only been scratched in that battle, at least one of them must've been from that blade.

It hadn't been a problem then, but as we could clearly see, Chelsea had left her covered in heavy wounds. That had suddenly made the sword's healing prevention a serious problem.

Honestly, I was surprised that she'd even managed to make it to us in her current state.

"The Bleeding status seems to have made her consciousness hazy," said Nemesis.

"I-I heard that Kubigawara's effect lasts 100 minutes...but if she's this hurt..." added Alto.

Only about half of that time had passed since we fought Jubei. The continuous damage from the injury-based debuffs would kill her before the effect expired, so to win at this event, she'd have to reach the goal and put in the correct answer during what little time she had left.

"...For now, Silver and I will dig out the hint in the shipwreck. You two gather up Carl's plates."

"Very well," said Nemesis.

"R-Roger dodger!" said Alto. With that, we split up and went to get what we needed for the goal.

Despite having lost by going out of bounds, God Hunter had dropped his plates like anyone else who'd been defeated in this event. He'd had so many that we didn't even have to count the plates Nemesis and Alto gathered to know it'd be enough for all three of us.

As for the monument in the shipwreck...it said, "Day of Anniversary."

"...Hm?" I raised an eyebrow.

"Huh? Kind of a weird clue, isn't it?" Alto said, done with the plate-gathering. We seemed to be thinking the exact same thing.

Nemesis, however, was more puzzled by our reaction than we had been to the hint.

"What's so odd about this? That hint suggests the answer is an important anniversary for you, does it not? That means the answer must be either the day you began the game or the day your Embryo hatched, just like you said."

My Embryo's general knowledge was exactly one-to-one with mine or vice versa, but...

"Nemmy, it's the specific way they wrote it. Just 'anniversary' by itself would tell us that—the 'day of' part is extra,'" said Alto.

"'Day of Anniversary' would mean something like...'Day of Special Day.' It's redundant," I added.

"I see..." Nemesis said thoughtfully.

I thought "Anniversary" here could be the name of this specific event, rather than just the general word. "Day of Anniversary" would make more sense in that case—and the answer would be today's date.

But about the other hints? While the "YYYYMMDD" one would still apply, it would contradict the one that said that "The answer may differ for each person."

That doesn't add up, I thought. I mean, the event starts at the same time for every...one...

"...Oh," I let out as I realized the true meaning behind the second hint.

"Ray?"

"Raayy?" The two looked at me with curious faces.

In response, I said, "I know the answer. Let's hurry to the goal."

◇

"First of all, you know the most obvious hint? The second one we found? That was a trap."

"A trap?"

As we headed to the goal, I began explaining what I'd realized.

Juliet still wasn't able to move much, so I was supporting her as we rode on Silver's back. This meant Alto had to walk, but as a Nukenin with an AGI build, she was able to keep up as long as I didn't go too fast.

"Yeah. It's a really obvious hint that basically anyone with eyes can find. That's exactly why there's a trick to it."

The stone monument could be seen from basically anywhere in the southern half of the island. I didn't see one myself, but I wouldn't be surprised if there was one just like it in the north, as well.

Such an obvious hint was no doubt the best way to mislead the participants.

"Though, it being a trick doesn't make it a lie," I continued.

"Whaddya mean?" Alto asked.

"Well, consider the fact that Dendro runs on a single worldwide server." No matter where they were in the real world, any players who logged in to Dendro would be in the same world as every other player. Even in my clan we had Rook and Figaro, who both lived in the UK.

"It does, but what about it... Oh."

"Exactly. Although we can all be here at the exact same time...our times in reality may be different." The Earth was a sphere, obviously, and the distance between different countries had spurred people to develop a particular concept to deal with it. "Our time zones may be different depending on where we are logging in from."

In our time zone, JST, the event started at midnight of April 20th. But for someone in the UK or the US—Chelsea, for example—the starting time was actually April 19th. This meant that...

"So that's the trick. The second hint is actually about the date the event starts for you," Alto said with a nod.

"Yeah. That's gotta be it." If we hadn't found that hint at the shipwreck and figured out the trick, we might've been wasting our time giving personal anniversaries—all of which would have been wrong.

For all I knew, that might have been the exact mistake that had teleported God Hunter directly to us.

Anyway, we now had the solution.

"So yeah, the correct answer for all three of us should be '20450420.'"

"Doesn't this seem a bit...I dunno...malicious? And kind of a weird solution?"

"Well, from what I heard, this wouldn't be the first event that seemed kinda weird." A good example was last year's Valentine's event that led to Figaro and Hannya meeting for the first time. Apparently, it had been an event where only couples could participate, and the enemies were succubi that threw chocolate at you and healed for 3x the damage dealt. If that wasn't weird, I didn't know what was.

I still couldn't be sure if that was all there was to this "anniversary," though. Maybe it wasn't just the name of the event and it actually was a special day for someone?

"Anyway, we know the answer and got all the plates we need!" said Alto in a cheerful, carefree tone, distracting me from my thoughts. "Now we just gotta clear the event! I wonder what we're gonna get! This whole thing was a heap of trouble, so I hope it's somethin' super nice!"

"Same," I said. "I hope it's worth the effort we put in."

Juliet had fought so hard she'd been left in this awful state, while Alto had been forced to reveal her secret weapon just so our team could win. I really wanted them both to be properly rewarded for this.

"...By the way, your, uh...friend disappeared. You sure that's all right?" I silently asked Alto as I remembered the suit of samurai armor that had vanished while we were fighting God Hunter.

"It should be fine," she replied. "Maybe he'll come back once the event ends... But what if he doesn't...? Wait—that might actually make my life easier..."

She folded her arms and tilted her head in thought.

"...Things aren't as easy as they seem for you, are they?" I asked.

“...Ever since getting Horo— him, I haven’t had a single chance to party up with someone and go on quests together. In Tenchi, there’s no telling when somethin’ could happen to reveal the secret, and even if I let him go I might be attacked by people angry at me for stealin’ their chance to beat him,” she said as she gazed back at the barrier where Horobimaru had vanished. “You’re all from another country, so I got to play with you without worryin’ about things like that. It was so much fun...”

“We’ll play again someday. Here and there,” I said.

We met in real life basically every day, but as for Dendro...maybe I could go to Tenchi after all those problems with Dryfe were taken care of.

“...Eh heh heh. Well, that makes me happy. Ah! Oh yeah! We should go to the beach in the summer! And bring the rest of the Dendro freshmen!”

“Wait until you see me in my swimsuit! Hee hee!” she said, all smiles. The anxiety was completely gone from her face.

◇

After ten more minutes, we were running up the mountain path leading to the goal.

Alto was a bit out of breath, but not enough for it to be a problem. Juliet had less than 20% of her HP left, but she was still alive. It seemed like we were going to make it to the goal.

...But I was certain that it couldn’t possibly be this easy.

“Ah! Ray! Look! I see the goal!” Alto said as she pointed ahead.

I could see it as well. At the heart of the mountain, there was a gate as tall as a three-story building. On it there were three lamp-like devices, and none of them were lit up. If they represented the number of people who had cleared the event, that meant that nobody had done it yet.

“Yay! This means that all three of us can clear...it...” said Alto before falling silent as she caught sight of what else lay ahead of us.

“I have been waiting for you.”

To be specific, the embodiment of strife itself was standing right in front of the gate.

“...Jubei.” I said her name. Once again, we were face-to-face with the many-armed Master who commanded six floating weapons—King of Asuras, Jubei Kaga.

I wasn't the least bit surprised that she was waiting for us here. I knew that if Carl hadn't taken her out of the event, she would obviously go to where everyone else would be heading.

And, of course, there was no chance that she would just try clearing the event before we got here. When we left her in the forest to fight Carl, she'd said that she wanted to fight me again, and I had no doubt that she was serious about that.

Her goal for this event had already shifted from winning to fighting me.

"Haven't seen you in about an hour," I said. "And it looks like that time's been...pretty hard on you."

One of her prosthetic arms was gone, while her left eye was covered with a bandage.

Juliet had fought Chelsea, Alto and I went up against Carl, and it seemed that Jubei got into some fights herself.

"It doesn't exactly seem to have been easy for you either," she replied. "Though all three of you survived and gathered enough plates in spite of that. The Nukenin accompanying you does not seem strong enough, however... Does she perhaps hide something interesting I am not aware of?"

It was unlikely that she'd somehow found out about Horobimaru, but the way Jubei sized up Alto as she spoke made my friend turn pale.

"The final...trial..."

"Juliet...!" Juliet had come to, dismounted Silver, and brandished her sword. However, there was no power in her arms, her wings were gone, she was bleeding all over—she was barely even standing.

Needless to say, she was in no state to fight.

"I would have preferred to fight Ray Starling and Ray Starling alone, but I suppose I have no choice," said Jubei. "I will fight all three of you instead."

She seemed to completely disregard the state Juliet was in. Perhaps this Tenchi-dwelling manifestation of strife simply saw such injuries far too often to care by this point.

For a moment, I said nothing and simply pondered Jubei's words until an idea came to mind.

"You wanna fight just me?" I asked her.

"Well, of course. I enjoy fighting many people at once every now and again, but nothing brings out the real flavor of a fighter like single combat."

"That so...?" I said with a nod before giving my proposal. "Let's do that, then. One-on-one, with me."

I offered to do exactly what she wanted.

"Huh?" Jubei, Alto, and Juliet all simultaneously voiced their shock.

Nemesis, however, didn't seem that surprised. The only thing I could sense from her in her blade form was a sigh.

"Before we do, though, I want you to let these two put in their answers."

"Ray?!" Juliet and Alto voiced their surprise again.

Juliet was in no state to fight; Alto wasn't a combat build to begin with and her Horobimaru had vanished at the barrier, though she probably wouldn't use him against Jubei even if she had him.

I was the only one who could still fight. My Grudge-Soaked Greaves were depleted, and my Black Warcoat wasn't charged, but I could still do something.

There was another reason behind my proposal too.

"I certainly would not mind," said Jubei. "In fact, it is a very, very welcome proposition."

Well, someone was happy with my suggestion, at least. Jubei seemed to be a fan of mine and she just plain enjoyed fighting, so it came as no surprise that she'd be interested.

Juliet, however, didn't seem to agree. She moved to stand in my way.

"Ray...! I...I can still fight...too!" she said with desperation. "You can't...fight her alone...! We're a team...!"

She probably thought that I was sacrificing myself to let her and Alto win. The tears in her eyes told me as much.

I hopped off Silver and laid my hand on her shoulder.

"Juliet, I suggested that because I want all three of us to reach the goal," I explained.

We'd made it this far together, so the best outcome would be for us all to clear this thing together too. If we all fought together, Juliet would be taken out right away and that would leave a bad taste in my mouth.

However, that wasn't my only reason for suggesting single combat.

"Most importantly...I wanna do this because it's her," I said.

"...Huh?" I looked over Juliet, right into Jubei's eyes, staring straight at me with both glee and longing.

"She said she was my fan and she wants to fight me directly." It had manifested in a disturbing way, but this was no doubt a kind of fondness on her part. "Not giving her what she wants wouldn't sit right with me either."

And so, I had resolved to fight her with all I had and try to defeat her fair and square.

She was much stronger than me and I probably had only the tiniest fraction of a percent chance of winning, but I'd give her the one-on-one battle she wanted.

"...Okay," Juliet said, understanding my point.

She then looked me in the eyes...

"Meet up with me later."

...and said the same thing I had said to her.

Just as I had believed that she'd win against Chelsea, so too did she believe that I would win against Jubei.

"Sure," I said with a nod. "You go on ahead and wait for me."

With that, the promise was sealed.

Juliet smiled, approached the gate, and put in the correct set of numbers —today's date.

Then, one of the three lights on the gate lit up and a fanfare resounded as she vanished.

Looks like I was right about the answer, I thought.

"Imagine how embarrassing it would have been if you were not," Nemesis said telepathically.

"Seriously." That would've been pretty damn bad, yeah.

Anyway, Juliet had cleared the event and now it was Alto's turn, but...I was suddenly struck with an idea.

"Jubei," I said. "I know I offered a one-on-one fight, but is it okay if I get someone to buff me?"

"Why, certainly," she replied. "I will enhance myself with my curseblades as well."

All right—so there's no problem if I do this, I thought as I looked at Alto.

"Alto," I said. "Hit me with a Gifted Quiz."

"Huh? But..."

"I wanna make sure I've got the best possible chance of winning. There's a risk I won't be able to answer the question, but doubling my stats is worth the gamble."

"...Oh," she said, apparently realizing something. "You...haven't given up?"

"Like I said, I want all three of us to clear this thing."

No matter how strong Jubei was, as long as I didn't give up, my chance of victory was never zero.

I had absolutely no intention of just giving her the win. That would be rude to my teammates as well as Jubei herself, who had so kindly accepted my proposition.

"So I'll fight as hard as I can... That's all there is to it."

"...You're so optimistic... I'm kinda jealous," Alto said with a wry smile before activating her Gifted Quiz.

"Question: Recite the digits of π up to ten decimal places."

"3.1415926535." I gave the correct answer, and my stats were instantly doubled. Good thing I'd gotten an easy one.

"There. Do your best! If all goes well, I'm treatin' ya to a helluva lunch at school tomorrow!"

"I'll hold you to that." Following that exchange, Alto headed to the gate, put in her answer, and vanished.

With that, only Jubei and I were left.

The silence stretched out between us. It felt as though we were the only participants left on the island.

"Sorry for the delay, Jubei," I said, finally breaking the silence.

"You did not keep me waiting too long," she replied. "Also...some things are better the longer you have to wait for them, no?"

"Maybe." I'd been studying for my exams while yearning to play Infinite Dendrogram, and though the wait was excruciating at times, I was really happy when I finally got a chance to do it.

The world was full of such things, and for Jubei, this was one of them.

"Let's get started, then," I said.

"Yes. Let us have some fun."

This would be my final battle in The Anniversary.

My opponent was King of Asuras, Jubei Kaga, and our fight would now begin.

Chapter Eleven: The Knight and the Asura

Event Area, Middle, Front of the Gate

Two Masters were facing each other at the gate, neither of them moving.

Ray was considering the situation to pinpoint any paths to victory, while Jubei was merely relishing even this tense moment.

It could not last forever, though.

Ray had ten minutes until Alto's buff expired and his chances of winning became even lower than they were now.

Jubei Kaga fought by commanding her ten weapons with extreme precision—which made her the one-man equivalent of a coordinated squad of warriors.

Currently, she wielded six floating weapons, three curseblades, and the single sword she held in her real hands. All of them were MVP rewards or greater, and Jubei herself was a combat-focused Superior Job.

Fighting her meant facing the assaults of nearly a dozen lethal weapons at once. King of Asuras was armed ten-fold.

To top it off, her Embryo, Asura, had an always-active ult that nullified all debuffs which weren't accompanied by damage.

There were no flaws in her defense or offense—this asura was defined by her sheer power.

Her opponent, Ray Starling, on the other hand, was a retribution-based fighter—a counter-attacker.

Instead of attacking his enemies first, he fought by suffering damage and returning it multiplied by using his unique skill, Vengeance Is Mine.

He used his own HP—his life—as a bargaining chip, gambling it all on the possibility that he could manage to survive even the most lethal attacks and go on to defeat even those far stronger than himself. It was perhaps an even more insane combat style than that of the asura he faced, who was fairly straightforward despite her overwhelming power.

If these two were to fight now, the odds of winning would be just barely less than a hundred percent in Jubei's favor.

Even if Ray were somehow able to build up the damage for his retribution, he couldn't use Vengeance without somehow drawing Jubei into the range of his own blade. However, that would mean passing through her six floating weapons as well as the three curseblades, and that was a true fool's errand.

During their first battle, Jubei had been curious about what it would be like to get hit by Vengeance—but this was a serious battle and she would surely fight him with all she had.

Ray also had his ranged counterattack—Payback Beyond the Stars—but it took an entire minute to charge, which was far too long against an opponent like this. Besides that, his MVP rewards—the pillars of his power—were also currently unusable.

The gap between them was obscenely wide. Normally, Ray's only option would be to give up. However, he wasn't someone who would resign himself to fate just because he was facing a superior opponent.

He stared at Jubei in silence, looking for a pathway that could lead to his victory.

One disperses breath attacks, one extinguishes magic, one ignores defense, one prevents healing, one can kill spirits, and one moves at insane speeds to attack anyone who comes too close, he thought, looking at each of the six weapons that floated around her.

He knew the effects of some through experience, while others he'd learned from Alto. All of them were powerful weapons and each seemed wildly different from the rest, but Ray could find one thing in common between them.

...They're all her meta against specific situations, he thought. It was especially obvious with the katana that apparently attacked and landed a hit no matter how fast the enemy moved. Even Ray could guess whom, exactly, it was meant to counter.

All of these abilities were extremely useful, though he couldn't help but notice something.

They're all effective against specific opponents, but not so useful against anybody else. And that includes me, he thought—and indeed, he was right. The weapon that prevented healing meant little in a battle that would no doubt be short, while the one that canceled magic was even more useless in a clash where magic would barely be a factor.

In fact, the cursed spear that killed spirits could even help Ray by feeding his Greaves or giving him a chance to use Reversal.

She's not going to change her gear, even though I'm the only one she's fighting right now? Wait, no...

As that thought went through his head...

"Heh heh... Did you finally come to a conclusion?"

...Jubei, looking at Ray's preoccupied expression, posed a question with a smile on her face.

In response...

"Yeah. The KoA skill that gives you the floating weapon slots doesn't let you change them at will, does it?"

...he exposed one of her secrets.

"Oh my..." Jubei was both surprised and overjoyed at his insight.

Asuran Battle-Mounts was a skill that allowed King of Asuras to telekinetically control a maximum of six weapons. However, those weapons had to be chosen at the start of each day, and they couldn't be switched for any others unless one of them was destroyed.

While Over Gladiator also increased their available weapon slots, the player using it still had to actually hold the weapons in their hands. Asuran Battle-Mounts, on the other hand, basically created six new arms—all with the same stats as the user—to wield its full arsenal and this limitation was the price of that power.

Jubei had actually been diverting attention from this particular limitation by being so open about everything else about her power. Ray, however, had seen right through it.

...Looks like I'm right, he thought, based on her reaction.

Jubei's floating weapons couldn't be switched. To account for the variety of participants she would face in this event, she'd opted for a wide variety of hard counters. That had come at the cost of focused power against a single opponent. If this had been an arena duel, for example, Jubei's loadout would surely be far more aggressive.

That means...I can break through those floating weapons. Ray's build already favored END; with his stats doubled, he would be tough enough to withstand non-critical attacks from any of Jubei's weapons except the defense-ignoring Hora.

That fact alone made it so that Jubei was effectively wielding not ten weapons against him, but five.

I can let those hit me as long as the hit isn't lethal. That'll just give me more damage to send back to her. Ray's thought process might have struck most people as indicating a few screws loose in his head, but he braced himself for a chance to take action.

◇

I suppose I should have expected this, thought Jubei. He saw right through me.

Their previous battle was the first time Ray had ever seen her, and he was too overwhelmed by her fighting style to think too deeply about it. However, that single battle was enough for him to unravel even information that she had yet to reveal herself.

Perhaps this was a power that someone needed to have in order to win against those much stronger than themselves.

Experiencing it firsthand made Jubei shiver with happiness.

Even his very aura has changed completely, she thought. Jubei had watched the videos where he'd fought Giga Professor, Hell General, and King of Beasts many times over, and right now he seemed closer to how he'd been in that footage than he had before.

The battle against King of Beasts... He only throws his heart and soul into the battle when it's truly mortal combat.

The man who had overcome all the odds to shatter Giga Professor's plot, defeat the Hell General, and fatally wound King of Beasts—that was the Ray Starling Jubei wanted to see.

Though...this is still not quite enough.

With the battle against KoB behind him, Ray had been slowly returning to his usual self—but his battles against Jubei and Carl as well as the promise to his friend were gradually driving him back to the brink, where Jubei wanted him.

Despite that, he was still a step away from being the person who would do what Jubei really wanted—someone who would exert far more power than she'd anticipated.

She silently reflected back upon what had happened an hour ago. Ray Starling. Let us meet again later. Until then, please think about what it was I lacked. I will do so as well.

That was what she'd told him before they parted ways after their first battle.

Just as she'd promised, she'd spent some time considering what she was lacking, doing so even as she cut apart the other participants.

The videos of Ray's battles had been burned into her eyes, and as she'd watched them over and over, she had vaguely begun to grasp what it was she needed—what was necessary to force the Master known as Ray to take that final step.

...He might despise me for this, she thought. Jubei now understood him well enough to figure out how she ought to do this, and that was exactly what made her hesitate.

However... She was Jubei Kaga. An asura. An embodiment of strife that loved herself more than she cared about being hated and who valued mortal struggles above all else.

"Ray Starling, allow me to give a little...prayer for this battle," she said.

"A prayer?"

"Yes." The sweetest smile then appeared on her face as she continued to say, "If I win against you, I will kill that Nukenin the moment I return to Tenchi."

"...You what?" Seeing Ray's fierce glare as he spoke, Jubei realized she had successfully set him off.

"Y-You...! What nonsense is this?!" Nemesis exclaimed.

"Consider it compensation if Ray Starling fails to entertain me sufficiently. She is among the powerful few who managed to clear this event. Perhaps if I kill her enough times, I will force her talents to bloom...perhaps even to the point where I might find her diverting."

This was no bluff—she had every intention of acting on those words. If Ray wasn't able to defeat her, she would spawn-camp Alto over and over, caring nothing for her reputation or their feelings.

The most important thing for her right now was to fight Ray at his most serious, and those words were the means of bringing him out that she'd come upon after thoroughly analyzing his battles.

Ray Starling was a Master who went above and beyond when faced with situations that had tragic consequences.

"I had not seen much of what she was capable of, so...that would be something I could enjoy in its own right in the future, I suppose."

And so, the result of Jubei's analysis...

"Don't worry... That future ain't happening."

...was more than enough to make The Unbreakable take that final step over the edge.

◇◆

Their exchange ended, and they both made their first moves.

The knight kicked off the ground and jumped onto the steed at his side. His legs wouldn't carry him fast enough—instead, he mounted his silver horse to advance as fast as he could.

This meant exposing his precious mount to the asura's blades, but he chose to do so regardless in order to protect his friend's future in the game.

The steed followed his owner's will and galloped as fast as he could.

This unity of horse and man was heading straight into the range of five floating weapons. The tachi, the spear, the shortsword, the chakram, and the hatchet all flashed towards them on strange, complicated trajectories.

Only Jubei knew what path to take to avoid the coming pain.

Heedless, the knight only charged ahead.

He cared nothing for the pain he suffered or damage he received—he only aimed to break through Jubei's defenses without dying.

The only thing he'd actually evaded was the tachi.

The spear dug into his stomach, the shortsword pierced his chest, the chakram tore open his upper arm, and the hatchet sunk deep into the body of his steed.

It only took a moment to bring him to the verge of death.

Despite that, his mount kept galloping onwards.

Thanks to his doubled HP and END, the attacks that might have been fatal under ordinary circumstances had become bearable.

The last weapon to welcome him was the retaliating katana—the bane of all those who boasted supreme speed, which Jubei had acquired from a UBM after being defeated by the boy who was unparalleled at the art of unsheathing. It activated against the oncoming horseman as well, unleashing an attack that couldn't be evaded and always hit its target without fail.

Thus, the blade struck home...

"Ghh!"

...and hit the object clutched in the knight's arms—a large, black, round shield.

He'd made his greatsword transform into that, figuring that if he couldn't evade the oncoming attack, he could simply block it.

The knight already had a good idea of the blade's range from their previous battle, so he was able to prepare the shield in the nick of time.

And with that, the horseman had broken past the barrier of floating weapons arrayed against him.

"Hellish Miasma, full power!"

At that moment, the rider released a dark purple smoke from his right arm. Worthy of its name, it was the miasma that inflicted three heavy debuffs at once.

The breath-dispersing hatchet was still stuck in the steed's metal frame, so it could do nothing to defend against this new threat. Thus, the smoke flooded the space around them almost instantly. The poison did nothing to the asura, so it was nothing but a smokescreen. She knew that was enough—using the miasma as a cover was one of his favorite tricks.

However, what awaited beyond the miasma was pure pandemonium.

"AHAH!" the asura laughed with a demonic grin as her three prosthetics brandished her curseblades. Each of them could sever a dragon's head. With three such weapons arrayed in front of him, the knight was no doubt faced with a certain kind of hell.

One blade to the right and two to the left. An open right eye and a closed left eye.

Faced with this hellish choice, the horseman went left.

Although the eye on that side was sightless and there was the smokescreen all around them, he would still have to deal with the two murderous blades.

The asura couldn't see, but she could still hear. She was, after all, a superhuman being who could fight with her multiple floating weapons using only sound.

Thus, the steed's galloping hooves were more than enough to expose the knight’s position. She could sense that he hadn’t dismounted either, so she swung her left curseblades despite being unable to see her target. Their aim was true, but the sound that followed wasn’t that of flesh being cut, but the clash of metal on metal.

“Ah!” The two curseblades had been stopped dead as the asura’s wrists slammed into two black blades.

These were the knight’s weapons—the form assumed by the shield after blocking the asura’s katana.

And the asura herself was reflected in the mirror opposite her.

At this moment, her speed was his speed.

Her left eye was blinded, her vision was smothered, and he was free to strike her prosthetic arms with his twin blades.

“Vengeance is Mine,” the knight and his blades roared in tandem, severing the two prosthetics.

A fixed amount of damage, delivered back twofold after suffering enough damage to nearly die.

It was more than enough to completely destroy the Embryo-arms.

“AH HA HA HA HA HA!” Despite more than half of her prosthetics being destroyed, the asura laughed. This was exactly what she wanted, after all. The knight had overcome the gap in their power—he’d truly done more than she’d been anticipating.

Engaging in mortal combat with someone like this made her heart tremble with joy. Her right prosthetic hand twitched, yearning for blood.

The knight’s twin blades were not much of a defense. Their speed was equal to hers, but the knight’s movements were limited by his position on horseback.

Thus, the last curseblade had no issue splitting him in half at the waist.

It was a fatal blow. Nothing human could survive such a wound.

Despite that, the knight’s advance did not stop.

His power as a Death Soldier let him keep moving even after he expired. In fact, he’d actually taken the curseblade’s attack on purpose so that he could once again channel the power of retribution.

“...Vengeance is Mine.”

The blade in his left hand destroyed the final prosthetic. The many arms of Asura were now gone, leaving the owner with only her own body.

The asura no longer spoke. The combination of joy, shock, and sheer battle fever had driven all words from her head, just as gone as her prosthetics.

Despite that, she kept on fighting...and swinging her blade.

She still had the ace up her sleeve, Kasanehime—the murderous sword that turned the wounds it inflicted into power.

"Counter Absorption!"

The knight turned his twin blades and mirror into the greatsword and prepared for the attack with a barrier of light. He intended to block this attack and win by returning the damage twofold.

However, that simply could not happen.

Following the battle against the hunter, the asura had dealt more than 1,000,000 points of damage.

The barrier could only withstand 300,000 points, so it would easily shatter and the knight behind it would vanish without a trace.

Blocking the blow was surely the misstep that would result in his defeat.

"...Scatter Like Mist: Unsan-Musho."

The deadly swing broke through the barrier of light like it was nothing. However, it failed to touch the knight or his steed.

"Huh?"

It was as though the horseman and his mount had evaporated like mist.

Despite her blade not touching them, they had completely vanished. The asura's sword sliced through nothing but empty air.

The knight and his steed were nowhere to be seen, swallowed up by the miasma.

However, a moment later, they appeared right behind the asura.

Shock overcame her. She had no idea what had just happened.

In fact, the knight and his blade didn't know either. But the knight didn't actually need to understand anything to take action. His powerful will drove him forwards, intent on what needed to be done.

"VENGEANCE IS MINE!" he roared as he swung down his greatsword, wiping away the asura without a trace.

And that was the end—the final conclusion to the battle between the knight and the asura, as well as the finale of the blood-soaked event.

Chapter Twelve: The Promise

???

“...Eh heh heh.” With her body having completely vanished, Jubei’s consciousness was now in a dark area—the place Chelsea’s group had called the “waiting space.”

She had Death Soldier among her sub-jobs, but its effect was meaningless when there was no body left to control. She might have been able to move the floating weapons in her Asuran Battle-Mounts, but the weapons had all vanished when she used Kasanehime.

They were all MVP rewards that would come back in time—but until then, she couldn’t use them in any way.

Thus, the battle ended in her defeat. However, she wasn’t the least bit dissatisfied with this outcome.

On the contrary, having experienced a battle against the Ray Starling, she was completely ecstatic.

She couldn’t even bring herself to care about the event anymore. She hadn’t been gathering hints or plates to begin with, so in a way Jubei was playing an entirely different game all by herself.

“I wonder if he made it to the goal in time.”

Instead of being upset, she was sincerely worried about whether the man who’d just defeated her had managed to reach his goal.

This had been a very fruitful event for her regardless.

All that was left now for her was to wait until her Death Soldier skill expired and she was sent back. But before that happened, a certain thought passed her mind.

“It is surely a coincidence, but...he is rather similar to them,” she said out loud, picturing the one who’d defeated her. “The ones who saved me back then.”

The visage bore resemblance to the ones who’d helped her—the ones who saved her from a speeding truck.

Paladin, Ray Starling

We were now in some strange, sparkling space where you couldn't tell which way was up or down.

"...I thought I was gonna die," I said.

"You were certainly close to it." Nemesis nodded. We managed to beat Jubei in time, but I was uncomfortably close to getting a death penalty once my Last Command expired. I might've not cleared the event if Nemesis hadn't been there to turn back into her human form and put in the correct answer fast enough.

"...The wounds are all gone now that we're past the finish line, though." Before, I'd been riddled with holes and my body had even been cut in half at the torso, but now I was in perfect health.

Without this aspect of the event, my battle against Jubei would've ended in a draw.

Silver still had the wound he'd received, though.

"Oh... If this won't fix itself, we might have to ask Blue Screen."

"Indeed. I feel like your steed helped us greatly this time as well."

Silver gave no sound or movement in response to our words. I was certain that the battle had only ended in my favor due to his efforts.

"Rayyy. Good work back theeere."

My thoughts about Silver were cut short by a drawn-out voice. I looked towards the source of it and saw Cheshire, wearing the same tuxedo he'd had during the explanation.

"Cheshire."

"Congrats on clearing the eveeent. The final stretch suuure was something."

"You're telling me. Thanks... By the way, what about the two who cleared before me?"

"I gave them the reward and seeent them on their way. They wanted to stay, but rules are ruuules."

"I see..." Well, they probably hadn't anticipated that all the people who cleared the event would be members of the same team. Only the first three could do it, after all.

It had probably turned out like this because we'd beaten the other players who were closest to winning—Jubei and Carl.

Alto and Juliet were already sent back, though, huh? I would see the former at school, while meeting up with the latter would probably have to wait until I returned to Gideon.

"Anyway, lemme give you the reward toooo!" said Cheshire.

"Sure. What is it, anyway?" I asked.

"A fine dining catalog, perhaps?" Nemesis asked.

...I really doubt this is the kind of event where we'd get little souvenirs like that, I thought.

"Here it iiis. This is the rewaaard. Congratulatiooons," Cheshire said as he gave me...a ticket.

"A ticket? Is this an invitation to another event?" Was this like a qualifying round for the real deal? I doubt I can handle battles harder than the ones I fought here, I thought.

"Nuh-uhh. That's a gacha ticket."

"...A what?" I really hadn't expected to hear such a familiar term here...

"You probably know it already, but places like Gideon have these gacha machines that let you pull for money." Oh yeah, I was very familiar with that. I'd actually planned on pulling once I got back there.

"The ticket is for those... It just guarantees an S-rank pull."

Ohh? A guaranteed S-rank, huh? Cool, I thought...and then his words began to actually sink in. Wait, WHAT?!

"You mean, like Rook's MVP reward?!"

"Oh, you should know that S-rank doesn't necessarily mean that you'll get thaaat. Please understaaand."

Ah, so Rook's pull was lucky even for an S-rank. Still, a guaranteed S was a big deal.

"...Indeed. You have pulled so many times, but have yet to have a single one."

"...True." Looking at it that way, I kinda wanted to save it until I got a natural S-rank pull.

"Well, it's up to you when you use iiit."

"Yeah. I'll think about it."

Honestly, a guaranteed S-rank gacha ticket felt like a very fitting reward for an in-game event.

And that thought jogged my memory about something I wanted to ask.

“Hey, Cheshire,” I said.

“Yeees?”

“Why’s this event called ‘The Anniversary,’ anyway? I thought it was just to make the answer a trick question, but I feel like there’s gotta be more to it.”

“...Uhhm...” Cheshire looked up at me, looking slightly bashful. “Today’s uuhh...birthdayyy.”

“Whose?”

“Mine.”

...The control AIs had birthdays? I thought. Regardless, the naming made sense now. It felt like kind of an abuse of authority on Cheshire’s part, but...

“Thaaanks. I’ll send you back to Altea nooow,” he said as light began to shine beneath my feet.

“All right,” I said. “See ya, Cheshire.”

“Take care,” said Nemesis.

“Until next tiiime!” And so, seen off by a white cat waving at us, we returned from the tumultuous event.

◇

After the teleportation, we found ourselves in front of Altea’s save point—the fountain. This wasn’t the place I’d been when I was whisked off to the event, but I felt like we were probably told at one point that we’d be sent back to the save point instead, so I didn’t worry too much about it.

In my hand, I held my reward—the gacha ticket.

“Well, I’ll just keep it for now,” I said. I wanted to save it for something special. A guaranteed S-rank deserved that much.

“Hrmm... The sky is turning brighter.”

“It was the dead of night when we left. That whole thing sure took a long time.”

There weren’t many people around the fountain at this hour. Looking up at the sky, I saw dark clouds being gradually painted in lighter colors by the morning sunlight.

“Hm...?”

And between them, I spotted something that looked a little like a bird. It grew larger and larger until I recognized the shape as someone I knew well.

“Ray!”

She flew right towards me.

“Juliet...” I said.

“I suppose she could not wait for you in Gideon, so she flew all the way here,” commented Nemesis. I knew Juliet could fly at supersonic speeds, but this was a bit much. She must have been really eager to see the outcome of the event.

There was only one thing I had to tell her, then.

“I won,” I said as I showed her the ticket, fulfilling the promise I’d made.

“...Yes!” And so, with a joyous expression, she landed; we exchanged a high five.

Epilogue

Control AI No. 13's Workspace

"Phew..." With the hard work of the event behind him, Cheshire returned to his workspace.

The uninhabited island that had been used for the event could be repurposed for another one in the future, so he requested that the environment AI—Caterpillar—store it away.

Everything else related to it was done and dusted, as well. They didn't get any new Superior Embryos this time, but that was hardly unexpected. They'd had Alice prepare spare avatars for all the participants in this event, though, in order to provide them with a healthy new one once they were disqualified or emerged victorious, so the preparations had taken up more time than usual.

They had gone to all this trouble because the event might have been less enjoyable if it was too risky.

A thought came to Cheshire's mind and he pulled up a display showing one of the photos in the database. This particular photo was more than two thousand years old, and it depicted a little girl with a white cat.

The little white kitty was curled up in a small cradle. The girl had prepared it for her friend who was soon to be born.

However, the white kitty was an Embryo. Although he had indeed just been born, he was no baby. Because of that, he certainly didn't need the cradle, but he slept in it regardless just because it made the girl happy.

Closing his eyes allowed him to remember those times as though it happened yesterday.

"We should have a festival for your birthday."

"People don't normally throw entire festivals for personal birthdays. Also, I'm an Embryo, and there's the birth celebration for all the Masters."

"Hey, c'mon. We all have the same birthday, but you're all born on different days. That makes you all pretty individual."

"You think so...? But if we have a festival for every Embryo's birthday, then every day would be a festival...”

“That sounds fun! You should do it sometime, Tom!”

“Well, I tried...but it was probably a bit too bloodyyy...” Tom said with a wry grin as he thought back upon the festival he’d managed to set up.

Regardless, the participants had enjoyed it. To him, that meant it had all been good.

Reality, Kurosaki Household

April 20th, a little before 4PM.

Juliet...or rather, Juri Kurosaki had spent the previous night participating in The Anniversary event with her friends, but now it was evening after a long day at school.

She was currently sitting on the sofa in her living room, waiting for her tutor to arrive for their first meeting. Her mother said she’d found a UTokyo freshman who’d made it in straight out of high school.

Juri imagined her tutor must be diligent and incredibly focused on education, which meant that she might very well be banned from any form of entertainment.

But...Ray and Alto are UTokyo freshmen... If I had either of them as my tutor... A twist of fate like that would certainly allow her to keep playing Infinite Dendrogram and hanging out with her friends there.

As that thought crossed her mind...she shook her head.

...No! It doesn’t have to be them! I need to assert myself no matter who it is! She told herself she’d gather her courage and claim the future she’d promised to her friends. Just like she had during The Anniversary, Juri resolved to fulfill this promise.

As Juri steeled herself, the intercom rang out.

“Excuse me—I am from the tutor’s association. I was meant to be here at four.”

Urged by her mother, who had prepared some black tea for the tutor, Juri went to greet the person at the door.

As her mother opened the door, she momentarily imagined she might see her two teammates from Infinite Dendrogram, but...

“Pardon the intrusion.”

The person at the door was a diligent-looking woman with glasses and a suit. She was too much of a woman to be Ray and too serious to be Alto.

Nrgh... No. I knew it’d turn out like this. It’s fine...

This almost took the wind out of her sails, but she didn’t cave in just yet. Instead, she psyched herself up, fully intent on asserting herself so she could keep playing Infinite Dendrogram. Saying that to her new tutor on their first meeting, though, would sound so ridiculous that her mother might step in and ban her from playing before the tutor even had time to say anything.

She had to bide her time.

With the introductions done, they moved to the living room, where Juri’s mother and the tutor began discussing the length of her lessons and what days they would meet. Juri’s mother was worried about Juri’s declining grades and tried to set her up for as many tutoring hours as possible. Part of the reason for her academic problems was that Juri had been staying up late playing Infinite Dendrogram, so it wasn’t unlikely that she would be banned from it entirely.

Since she was at such a disadvantage, Juri couldn’t figure out how to approach this discussion.

“Considering her grades, may I ask for visits five times a week?” Her mother’s suggestion made Juri’s face tense up as she thought, You have to be joking. However, the poor grades were partially her own fault, so she couldn’t argue.

But then, help came from an unexpected source.

“Mrs. Kurosaki, once or twice a week—for a total of about six hours per month—should be sufficient,” said the tutor.

“But I’m worried about her grades...”

“Merely increasing her study time would make it difficult for the young lady to maintain her focus. Instead, I recommend that you give me a few intensive hours where I teach her the proper methods of learning and problem-solving, which will in turn allow her to study on her own more effectively. Also, giving her too many tutoring hours would only reduce her own desire to learn by making her feel all her studying can happen while she’s being tutored.”

“My! Is that how it is?”

Perhaps it wasn't "help," exactly. The tutor convinced Juri's mother against setting her up for endless hours of tutoring, but she was serious about education and was fully intent on making Juri study on her own time.

If this tutor was so good at convincing people, how could Juri possibly win any Infinite Dendrogram playtime out of her?

A-An hour a day...? No, that's just three hours there... Juri was at a loss.

However, the tutor was sharp enough to notice. The girl's expression seemed to spark some thought in the woman, and she took out an object that might make Juri feel better.

"You okay? Wanna play some cat's cradle?"

With those familiar words, she presented her with a cat's cradle string.

"...Huh?"

"Cat's cradle makes for a good mental exercise. It can help soothe your nerves as well." The smile on her face as she spoke those words also suddenly looked very familiar.

"...Alto?"

"Wheuh?"

The tutor—Soprano Natsume—had put on a suit, glasses, and wiped off her customary face paint to leave a better impression on Juri's parents, and the sound she made when Juri called her by that unexpected name completely clashed with her current appearance.

For the record, Juliet wasn't forbidden from Infinite Dendrogram—or any other kind of entertainment, for that matter.

◇◇◇

I logged in to Dendro right after I got back from class.

When I met Natsume there, she'd told me that Horobimaru returned to her—and that she'd used her ticket right away. She was lucky and got an MVP reward, but instead of being happy about it, she'd put on a distant look and said, "...Will having stuff like that make people think I'm powerful? What if it gets me attacked...?"

I started to feel like the problem wasn't just her being overly negative, but the land of Tenchi being...the way it was.

If Alto was right, though, I had three MVP rewards, so I would be attacked all the time. I couldn't even imagine what kind of life Jubei would lead carrying around a whole seven of them. And that was just off the top of my head.

"Anyway..." I ducked into a fairly open alley and took Silver out of my inventory. I wanted to check on how the minor damage he'd gotten from Jubei was doing.

I only needed a moment to realize that the wound was much smaller than before, which made me guess that it would be gone in no time.

"What a relief," said Nemesis.

"Yeah." That was one less thing to worry about.

There was something else regarding Silver that we had to consider, though. It was the teleportation ability that he'd used against Jubei—the third skill that was still locked.

This was the second time I'd seen it, with the first being the battle at Quartierlatin, but I still didn't know its activation conditions or effect. I tried asking Silver himself about it, but unlike Gardranda he didn't give an answer either in reality or in my dreams.

"If only there was some specialist we could ask..." With Silver being a weapon of the pre-ancient civilization, that was a tall order. The person who'd taught me the most about Silver so far was Mario, but he was a Dryfean, so I couldn't go to him again.

Besides him, there was Blue Screen, who'd fixed up Gold Thunder and was involved in SMPS production...but I hadn't heard of him coming across any new information regarding the Prism Steeds.

"How easy this would all be if we could only talk to the Grand Artificer who made Silver," said Nemesis. "Flagman, was it?"

"Yeah, but you sure as hell can't speak with a tian from 2,000 years ago... Hm?"

...I feel like I heard that name recently, though, I thought.

After that, we did various things in the city before returning to the inn we were staying at.

"Oh. Mr. Starling, we have a letter for you," said the innkeeper as we entered.

"A letter?" I opened it to see a collection of dates and time intervals, accompanied by the words, "If circumstances allow, please come visit me at any of these times."

However, the most notable thing to us was the sender's name.

"Ray."

"Yeah. Mhm. Seems like we had the right person here in Altar all along."

The letter was from Integra Sedna Clarisse Flagman.

She was the childhood friend of the first princess as well as the current Arch Sage.

And so, I accepted the invitation from the one who had inherited the name of Grand Artificer.

Afterword

Cat: “All right, time for the afterwooord! I’m the ‘Cat,’ Cheshiiire!”
Bear: “...”
Cat: “I got a good bit of spotlight in this volume, complete with my own illustratiooon!”
Bear: “...”
Cat: “Heh heh. It was my birthday, so I even got into a fancy tuxedo to celebrate the occasiooon!”
Bear: “...”
Cat: “Hm? Brother Bear, you’re being oddly quiet right now... AH!”
Bear(White): “...”
Cat: “Wait, you’re Carl?! Well, I guess you’re the ‘Bear’ of this volume, but still!”
Bear(White): “...”
Cat: “Huh? Wait, am I supposed to speak enough for the both of us? Seriously?”
Bear(White): “...”
Cat: “Oookayy... I guess this is my punishment for abusing my authority with that eveeent... But how can I pad out the page count without banter...? You know what, I’ll just talk about what led to this! Specifically, this event’s background and the reason why Carl was in it!
As was mentioned in the story several times now, our goal is to increase the number of Embryos in their seventh forms. Because of this, we often do things that might help sixth forms evolve. SUBM attacks, my dueling, Chrono’s PK, and events like this one are all among our strategies. Though, as you can tell from the fact that we don’t even have a hundred of them yet, we didn't have many successes. Because of that, for this event we tried expanding the range of participants, inviting standout sub-sixth forms like Ray and Alto—as well as Carl, who's already in his seventh. We hoped that this change of selection standards would spice things up a bit."

Bear(White): "..."

Cat: "Carl's role in this was basically the same as a creature in a horror game—the 'Invincible' monster that you'd never want to encounter, especially not on an isolated, uninhabited island. The twins expected the presence of such a menace to accelerate the evolution of the other participants and personally, I do think that it was a good punch to those who don't butt heads with Superiors very often or at all.

In the meta sense, this was the first appearance of a character who has been mentioned since the very first volume, as well as Ray's Superior encounter that wasn't in the web novel. The author wanted his entrance to come as a bit of a surprise.

Though, as you have surely read, in spite of his status, he was defeated as the volume's mid-boss. The existence of the barrier, Horobimaru's skill-canceling, Ray's 'explosiveness'... There were several reasons for his defeat, but if there's one thing to be said about this, it would be that if someone is called 'Invincible,' you can safely expect them to be beaten in one way or another."

Bear(White): "..."

Cat: "That said, Carl is a Superior with many aces up his sleeves that he didn't show, so do look forward to his next appearance.

Anyway, it's time for the comment from the author."

Thank you for reading volume 17 of this series. I am the author, Sakon Kaidou.

This was the first volume of all-new content, so I'm curious whether or not you're satisfied with it.

The most extra content I have written before this were additions to the previous volumes, the digital-only Fairytale Squad story, and the story that came with volume 1 of the anime, but this was the first time I'd ever written a full volume exclusively for the light novel series.

It was a lot of work and I spent a lot of time dealing with the typos, but I feel like it made me grow a bit as an author.

This volume covered an event that was particularly game-like and a little laid-back.

Up until now, Ray had been involved in battles that had tian lives, cities, and even countries on the line, but this was all about an event that he could thoroughly enjoy alongside his friends.

You could say that this is represented by the bright, cheerful, and wholesome cover Taiki had drawn for this volume. It is quite unlike what we had so far and I personally like the aura it exudes. Alto in all her yellow glory looks great, as well.

This volume 17 also gave a spotlight to the four stars of The Crow Records.

The scenario for this volume had a foundation in the plot of that series, so they really stood out here.

Out of the four, I personally found Shion especially easy to write. Silly gooses are the best gooses.

Though, since she did not do one iota of combat analysis, Juba's gimmick was left unrevealed. You will have to wait until her next appearance to find out more about it and Juba herself.

Anyway, volumes 15 and 16 were centered around people other than Ray, and this volume had him cooperate with an unusual bunch, but with volume 18, we will finally go back to the familiar members of Death Period.

Do look forward to the events that will unfold when Ray returns to Gideon.

Also, volume 9 of the manga has been released, as well. It features Kami Imai's amazing depiction of Marie and Veldorbell's battle, so do pick it up if you are so inclined.

Please continue supporting Infinite Dendrogram.

Sakon Kaidou

Cat: "There. With the author's comment out of the way, it's time to announce the next—"
Bear(White): "VOLUME 18 IS SET TO COME OUT IN JAPAN IN MARCH, 2022!"
Cat: "Huh?!"

Bear(White): “...”
Cat: (Did he only keep quiet all this time because he was building up the energy to make the announcement?)
Cat: “A-Anyway, see you in the next voluuume! Goodbyeee!”
Bear(White): “...Bye.”

Bonus Short Stories

The Ones From Tenchi

Tenchi

Jubei Kaga.

Capricious and belligerent, she was a person who exemplified the spirit of Tenchi, holding the very fitting “King of Asuras” job as well as the seat of the fourth in the country’s highly competitive duel rankings.

Just like in Altar, the top three in the rankings could only be challenged by those just below them, so Jubei’s position as the fourth led to her being regularly challenged by duelists trying to take a shortcut to the top. In fact, her renown as a fighter had driven some to challenge her outside the duels, as well. Some even tried to ambush her instead.

A life like hers would be too much for most, but she was among the few who thoroughly enjoyed it.

However, there had recently been a change in her that had greatly shocked the battle junkies of Tenchi.

Jubei’s strife-filled existence had resulted in her being covered in countless closed wounds—scars that doubled as medals gained from defeating so many skilled warriors.

The change that shook the country was the fact that every single one of these scars had vanished.

That could only mean one thing—that someone had defeated her, resetting her avatar back to its default, unscarred state.

Many of the country’s fighters went on to speculate about the identity of the powerful champion who subjugated King of Asuras.

She herself, however, seemed to be busy looking for someone.

All of those battle junkies were certain that the person who’d defeated her and whoever she was looking for were one and the same, and that her goal was a rematch.

But the truth was quite different from that...

◇◆

On the afternoon of a certain day, Alto was munching on dango at a particular tea house in a mountain pass.

In real life, the scenery alone would make this a tourist hot spot, but instead of enjoying it, she was merely doing her utmost to ignore the slight commotion around her and keep eating her snack.

“...I got nothin’ to do with this. I just wanna eat my dango. Dango are good...”

One could say that she was engaging in a form of escapism.

The reason for her willful detachment was that a short while ago, in a grove not too far away, she’d tested out the MVP special reward she’d received using the ticket she’d won at The Anniversary.

Although it had guaranteed an S-rank pull, getting an MVP reward using the gacha still required some degree of luck, and she wasn’t assured an item that would suit her build. MVP rewards received by defeating UBMs were adjusted to suit the player they were awarded to, but MVP rewards received through the gacha were simply hand-me-downs from deceased tians who’d once had them.

Alto needed even more luck than usual for the reward to be something that fit her playstyle. Now, as the owner of what was left of Horobimaru—perhaps the biggest bombshell in Tenchi—she had a playstyle that prioritized keeping a low profile and running away if needed.

Because of this...

“Hey! What was that explosion! I heard it from behind the goddamn mountain!”

“It didn’t sound like explosion magic. Maybe it’s a new UBM!”

“WOO-HOO! Let’s go beat its ass! And if it’s beaten already, let’s beat whoever beat it!”

...an MVP reward that summoned thunderous sounds and unbridled destruction was useless to her.

What am I supposed to do with that pile bunker?! I tried it out on a tree and it blew away the entire grove! How am I gonna use somethin’ that’s both dangerous and makes me the center of attention?!

She’d used the weapon away from any people, but it had so much presence that its activation had been heard across mountains. It had once been the cherished armament of The Ram from a distant land, but it was completely at odds with Alto's playstyle. More importantly, she now had to wait until things cooled down without any of the battle junkies realizing that she was the one who'd caused the loud sound.

A dozen minutes passed as she did nothing but eat her dango.

The commotion caused by the battle junkies was growing more distant, filling Alto with relief that the danger had passed...

"I found you at last."

...only for someone far more dangerous to replace them.

"Eep..."

King of Asuras, Jubei Kaga.

Alto's group had encountered her at the event and gone on to defeat her. The fact that she was speaking as though she'd been looking for Alto filled her with immense fear.

"Oh, please give me a moment!"

In her panic, Alto tried to either initiate the log out process or use her Nukenin disengagement skills, but before she could, Jubei's prosthetic arms grabbed her by the shoulders, making it impossible for her to escape.

"Ah ha ha ha ha..."

She's here to settle the score! Alto thought, bracing herself.

However, Jubei was merely looking at her with a smile on her face. That might not have meant much, though—she was the kind of person who smiled and hummed happily even as she turned people into mincemeat.

"I came to you today with a question," she said.

"Whuh?"

So she won't kill me right away, Alto thought. This wasn't enough to make her relax, but she did calm down a tiny bit.

"It is about Ray Starling," Jubei said.

"Ray?" Alto repeated as the reason behind this encounter became clear to her.

Jubei was a fan of Ray and he had defeated her at the event, so she would obviously be more interested in him than Alto. She now understood that Jubei had been looking for her to ask something about him.

"Yes. I was thinking that you might be a real life acquaintance of his."

However, what she said was both far beyond what Alto'd expected—and uncomfortably accurate.

“...Wh-Why would you think that?”

“In that event, you, Ray Starling, and Juliet formed a party. Juliet being with him is understandable because they are from the same country, but I find it hard to believe that you—someone from Tenchi—had ever been involved with him prior to the event. I feel like that is reason enough to believe you might share a real-life social circle or even be friends. Would I be wrong?”

“W-Well, it could be that he just fell in love with me at first sight...”

“Oh? Is that how it is?”

“We go to the same college!”

Alto tried to dance around the truth—but when Jubei tightened her prosthetics’ grip, still smiling, she instantly revealed the truth.

“My, that is most fortunate. Now, for the main reason I contacted you. There is something I would like you to ask him...”

Alto’s answer seemed to have put Jubei in a good mood.

Oh no. Oh no...!

Alto, however, was back in her downward spiral of negativity as she pictured what would happen now.

What if she’s gonna ask for his real name and address so she can stalk him IRL and eventually chop him up and kill him out of her infatuation with him...?! If that happens, I’ll appear in some weekly mag with only my eyes censored as “Friend S: the one who gave info to an internet stalker” and then I’ll be shunned and expelled from college and my life will be over and...

“RAY, I’M SORRY! KING OF ASURAS IS AN E-DATING MANIAC!”

Her negative thoughts took over and she blurted out those words, tears welling up in her eyes.

“...Eh heh heh. I do not believe I have ever received an insult greater than that.”

Hit with the kind of disparagement she had never built up any resistance to, even Jubei couldn’t help but be taken aback.

However, she quickly recovered and said, “This is not about meeting him. I wish to ask Ray Starling about an accident that happened about ten years ago—”

She wanted Alto to ask Ray if he was the one who’d saved Jubei from a traffic accident...

"Oh?"

...but before she finished her sentence, she let go of Alto and turned around.

She was now surrounded by fierce-looking Masters.

"We heard a scream and rushed here, thinking that someone needs help, and here we find you...King of Asuras!"

"Heh heh heh. Looks like your luck has run out!"

"WOO-HOO! WILDY MATCH! LET'S GOOOO!"

These were the very same battle junkies who had gone to search for the source of the loud sound (Alto's pile bunker MVP reward).

"Oh my," Jubei said, still smiling, as she spread out her floating weapons and unsheathed the curseblades with her prosthetics.

When those who thrived in strife faced each other with bloodlust coursing through their veins, there was only one thing that could happen next—all-out combat.

"EEP...!"

As the battle began, Alto used the opening to put up a smoke screen and run away as fast as she could.

Jubei's opponents were no easy prey, keeping her busy long enough for Alto to escape.

However, this was only the beginning.

Jubei, still wishing to have her message passed on to Ray, would keep following Alto, who would escape yet again.

This game of tag would continue for quite some time and take them all over Tenchi.

They would eventually go on to become a duo...but that was a story for another time.

Shion's Stresses

Gideon the City of Duels

"HuUhh?"

One day, during her visit to Altar, the Huang Hean Superior and second in Huang He's duel rankings, Xunyu, entered a store to buy materials for her Fu, only to see something strange.

“I hate this! I hate this so much! Neeeeeennnghhhh!”

There was Shion Manjushage, making odd, angry noises.

Xunyu wasn’t close to Shion, but they had met when she’d attended an Altarian social gathering for duelists.

What she was doing as she made those noises was...pulling on the gacha machine. This was the store owned by a certain Alejandro—the same one equipped with that curious device—and Shion was endlessly making pulls that cost a hundred thousand lir each.

Normally, the store only allowed one pull before making the puller go to the back of the line and wait for their turn again, but Shion’s intensity had rendered everyone unable to object.

“Guess I gottA get involved,” said Xunyu, feeling she had to do something. “Hey, donchA think you’re bothErin’ the other customErs?”

“Leave me alone!” Shion said before she realized something. “Oh, wait. It is you.”

“You know yoUr wailin’ can be heard all acrOss the store, right? Just whAt the hell happened to yA?”

“Oh, it is simply unbelievable! I lost the event I was in before I even realized what was going on! And I am not getting anything good from the gacha!”

Shion went on to explain what had happened at The Anniversary.

Although she’d been able to defeat a powerful enemy, she’d somehow lost while gathering her spoils.

It had been a surprise attack from Carl that had defeated her, but she still had no idea that was the case.

Being disqualified right after winning a fight had left her sour beyond belief.

Afterwards, she’d went on to talk to Juliet, who’d said that she’d won and received an S-rank gacha ticket. That had motivated Shion to come here and get a natural S-rank pull, which was what she was trying to do right now.

“I came out of all that with nothing to show for it! That is so stressful!”

“I seE...” Xunyu said.

Though, doncha think you’ll get even more stressed if ya burn your money on the gacha? she added in thought.

“All this after I beat a scorpion and a huge elephant! It’s like a compound fracture on my breakable bone!”

“What’s thAt supposed to...? Wait, ‘huge elEphant?’ Was it mAde of clouds?”

“Yes! And I beat it splendidly!” Shion said proudly.

Those words made Xunyu realize something.

Huang He’s strongest clan, Huili Yuminjun, had the so-called “Five Generals,” each of which took a spot in the duel rankings ranging from third to seventh.

From the highest ranked, they were King of Gardens, Saimei Takanashi; Beast General, Anthropos Farma; King of Axes, Wan Zihao; Kidnap Princess, Clobbergirl Fanatic Pie; and the one Shion had defeated—King of Cowboys, Jamie Crescent.

Despite being the lowest in the ranks among them, Jamie Crescent was said to be extremely hard to defeat in open fields, so Xunyu was surprised to hear that Shion had done exactly that.

It sparked her curiosity as a duelist.

“Well, I’m intErested. All right, we’re gOin’ to an open arenA.”

“Whuh?”

As she was caught off guard by what she just heard, Xunyu extended her prosthetics and wrapped them around her.

“Pullin’ the gachA won’t help ya with strEss, anyway. Hang oUt with me for A while.”

And so, Xunyu dragged Shion to an arena and made her spar with her.

Once they were done, Shion’s pent-up competitive spirit was all but exhausted, and she looked thoroughly refreshed.

The B and the C

Gideon the City of Duels

“Huh?”

On a certain day after The Anniversary, Chelsea, who was lost in thought as she was stocking up on consumables at Alejandro’s store, saw a familiar, spectacled woman looking over the shields on sale.

The person considering the gear was none other than B3, or Barbaroy Bad Burn. Once the leader of the PK clan known as “Mad Castle,” she was now part of Ray’s Death Period, as though she was cursed to always join clans with sinister-sounding names.

Though, it's not like Ray's clan is focused on PK... Anyway, Barbaroy, huh? Chelsea thought.

To Chelsea, she was "an acquaintance of a friend" in a whole three ways.

She was acquainted with one of Chelsea's sparring partners, Ray; fellow duelists, Kashimiya and Rosa; and an old real-life friend, Eldridge.

They weren't friends, really, but neither were they complete strangers—but having so many shared acquaintances, each from a different angle, made it hard for Chelsea to gauge how close the two of them actually were.

She hasn't noticed me and it looks like she's seriously thinkin' about what to pick, so I won't bother her, she thought before shifting focus back to her own shopping and problems.

The thing on her mind right now was the promise she'd made to Juliet.

A new combat style that makes me more powerful than I used to be and more powerful than I am now too... Well, I already know the most obvious way to get stronger.

That was, without a doubt, getting a Superior Job.

The very reason why she'd come to Altar in the first place was to search for a Superior Job that was different from the ones she may have been able to get in Granvaloa.

Getting an SJ would let her finally break through the level 500 wall.

It's not that easy, though, she thought.

Securing an SJ was simultaneously the most obvious and the most difficult way to grow stronger. For each job, it was a race that only a single person could win, and with nearly five in-Dendro years having passed since release, there were far fewer jobs available than there had been at the start.

The deaths of tians with Superior Jobs opened that job up to any capable candidates, but Chelsea couldn't rely on that to get hers.

King of Blaze, Bug General, and King of Venom were opened up that way during the recent incident in Altea, but none of them synergize with my build.

As she pondered her predicament, the store was suddenly filled with commotion.

The cause of that was B3, who had used Instant Wear to switch to a huge suit of armor. Apparently, she'd only done that to see if the available shields were the right size, but it was scaring the other customers nonetheless.

...That's her MVP reward. "Gunhammer Plate, Magnum Colossus," I think.

Both Chelsea and B3 were prominent high-rank jobs that counted SJs among their friends, but that suit of armor was something that clearly separated them. MVP rewards had special skills and extremely high regenerative abilities, making many of them akin to extra Embryos.

Unfortunately, Chelsea still had none of them.

During her time in Granvaloa, she'd almost never encountered UBMs, and even if she had, they were the kind who'd fought from deep below the surface instead of her turf—the sea level.

However, securing an MVP reward now seemed like a far more reliable way to grow stronger than finding an SJ to take.

There's been a change in the local monster habitats. That's the reason why the Afforest was where it was. Maybe a UBM from some unexplored area wandered somewhere more accessible?

"...You know what? I'll look around."

Encountering and winning against UBMs required a good deal of luck, but luck wasn't a problem if you simply tried enough times.

Having realized what separated her and B3—who was on the same level as her—Chelsea had found the path she would take to become the newer, stronger version of herself.

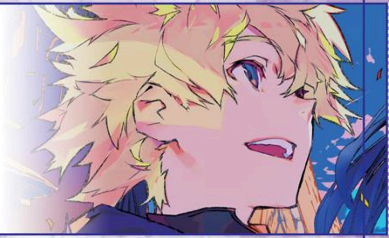
Death Period:
RENEWED!

Character

Ray

Ray Starling / Reiji Mukudori

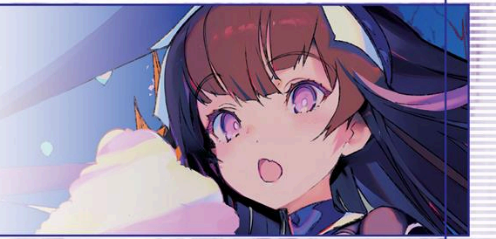
A college freshman who gets caught up in various incidents within Infinite Dendrogram. Though he is generally mild-mannered, he has a strong will that causes him to fight for his goals and never give up on them.



Nemesis

Nemesis

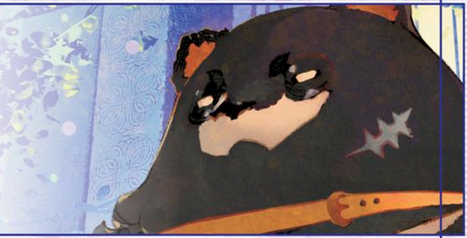
Ray's Embryo manifested as this girl. Nemesis acts as Ray's weapon by taking up the form of armaments such as a greatsword, halberd, shield, pinwheel, mirror, and twin swords. She is also a notable glutton.



Shu

Shu Starling / Shuichi Mukudori

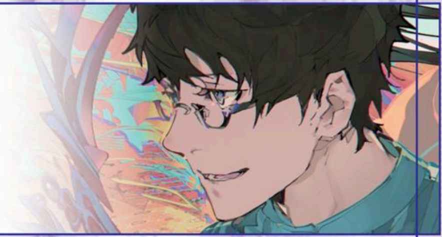
Shu is the King of Destruction, the first in Altar's kill rankings, and Reiji's brother in real life. A Dendro veteran since before Ray even began his journey, Shu has seen many adventures, oftentimes through the eye holes of an animal costume.



Sechs

Sechs Würfel

Bearer of the King of Crime job, Sechs is a man who commits sins for the sole purpose of being "evil." Though currently imprisoned in the gaol, he is also the leader of Illegal Frontier—a clan made up entirely of Superiors on wanted lists.



Integra Flagman

Integra Sedna Clarisse Flagman

The Arch Sage of Altar and an old friend of two of the kingdom's key individuals—the First Princess, Altimia, and the Vice-Commander of the Royal Guard, Liliana. Integra is a mysterious woman who bears the name of the pre-ancient civilization's Grand Artificer.

Prologue: The Minority's Justice, The Majority's Evil

June, 2044

Thunderous explosions rang throughout a forest on the border between Altar and Legendaria.

Calling it a "forest," though, wasn't entirely accurate, because the trees—the old growth that had stood there until just yesterday—were all but gone now.

The land looked as though it had suffered a relentless aerial bombing, and this unbridled destruction continued unabated. There were no longer even any animals running from the overwhelming noise that shook the earth and sky. How could there be? The battle had been going for an hour now. All the local fauna had either escaped or died long ago.

The only moving things left were two large silhouettes.

"UAAAAGH!" One of the figures was a giant humanoid robot that was over a hundred metels in size. With an echoing roar that shook the ground, it ran at near-sonic speeds before leaping forward.

Its target was the other silhouette—a strange object that looked like three large disks stacked together. Seemingly about a hundred metels in size, the object stood on a singular column-like support that pierced the ground. Its appearance might be compared to the stacked prayer wheels used in Tibetan Buddhism.

However, the living face each of them possessed might make the comparison to religious instruments a bit bizarre.

"Nejirebana!" The steel giant coupled its leap with a spiraling right-hand palm attack called "twisted flower." The palm would soon grab one of its opponent's disks, then use its speed and sheer strength to twist and break it.

"Turning Space."

However, two words from the topmost disk reversed everything. Instead, the steel giant's right arm shattered.

"...Kodachi!" Not faltering, the giant went on to twist its body in midair and throw a roundhouse kick. This had actually been its plan from the start—the giant had expected the palm attack to fail and was ready to deliver this far stronger blow.

But as the kick was right about to connect...

"Turning Land!"

...the land beneath the steel giant flipped upside down.

The ground itself crashed into the giant, sending it flying.

"NGH!" Despite the impact, the giant spun in the air to brace itself.

However, its movements began to grow more sluggish once it landed.

"Warning: Energy cells depleted. Full Offense Mode can no longer be maintained. Recharging cells would require twenty-four hours spent in a noncombat state. Furthermore, there is a severe combat munitions shortage."

With a mechanical voice, the steel giant—or rather, the Embryo—declared that it had run out of everything necessary for its ultimate skill. It said all this while in the process of transforming from its robotic form back to that of a battle cruiser.

"In that case, fire every armament the moment you transform! B-type shells for all!"

"Affirmative." In response to its Master's order, the Embryo loaded all armaments with the specified type of shell.

And when it had finally become a battle cruiser again, it gunned its engines to full power and surged forward. A moment later, however, the land beneath the battle cruiser was flipped exactly as before.

"BALDR! DO IT! FIRE ALL GUNS!"

"Affirmative." As the battle cruiser moved, crushing what remained of the trees beneath it, the Embryo obeyed its Master and fired every weapon it had equipped. Hundreds—thousands of shells and missiles flew towards the disks.

Upon seeing this onslaught...

"F o o l i s h."

...the faces on the slowly spinning disks cracked a smile and spoke these words in perfect unison, their voices strangely distorted.

"Turning Space," the topmost disk said. All of the heavy ordnance aimed at it flipped around and flew back towards the battle cruiser instead.

That was one of the three great “Turning” abilities the disks possessed—the ability to turn space itself.

The Master of the battle cruiser clicked his tongue in annoyance and switched its engines to full capacity in order to escape, but...

“Turning Land.”

...the face on the middle disk spoke. At its words, the land around it shifted like a table being flipped over.

This was the second “Turning” ability. It allowed the disks to freely warp the landscape around itself, and its effect reached as far as ten kilometels away. Right now, it was using this power to force the retreating battle cruiser back into the trajectory of its own shells and missiles.

“Ah...!” And thus, the battle cruiser was drowned in flames. There was no sign of its Master escaping the conflagration—he must have been engulfed as well. Even the disks could see that he could not possibly have survived it all.

Eventually, the battle cruiser vanished, presumably having succumbed to the fire.

“H e f i n a l l y d i e d,” the three faces of the disks said as they gazed at the flames, chuckling.

This impudent enemy had spent most of the battle outside the range of Turning Space—but in the end, he’d apparently lost his presence of mind. As a result, he had been destroyed by his own weapons.

“H e a n d t h e d a r k m a n w h o d i e d f i r s t w e r e a t r u e n u i s a n c e.”

“T h e h u m a n s w i l l h a v e t o p a y f o r t h i s.”

The strange entity’s name was “Divine Disks, Spindle.” It was an Ancient Legendary UBM that had lived in this area for a long time and ruled over its people with an iron fist. Despite being inorganic, it was also carnivorous; perhaps the most distressing thing about its dominion was that it demanded human sacrifices to feed on—and even seemed to derive excitement from this.

Many tians had challenged this creature in the past, including combat-focused Superior Jobs from Tenchi. However, not even the likes of them could bring this entity down. That was just how strong the disks were.

If the overseer of UBMs were to look at this creature, he would surely describe it as “an Ancient Legendary that was absurdly close to Mythical.” If it defeated just one more UBM, in fact, it would no doubt ascend to the Mythical tier outright.

Today, a mere two people had attempted what so many before them had failed to do—and they both had met with abject defeat.

The first opponent had died early on when the bottom disk used its “Turning Life” skill, which accelerated his cell division cycle, causing them to multiply so rapidly that he burst into pieces. The other had just vanished within his own artillery barrage.

Once again, the Divine Disks had emerged victorious.

“We are fatigued. Let us feast to heal ourselves.”

“One village should suffice.”

“Agre-e-e...” However, as they were in the process of planning their victory celebration, the third disk’s words trailed off into nothing. Its spin, normally steady, had also become unstable—almost as though it had suddenly gone rusty.

“What is wrong?” the other two disks asked. However, it returned nothing but silence.

Eventually, the disk stopped spinning completely. The eyes on its face rolled backwards, and it opened and closed its mouth like a fish out of water. Then, suddenly...

“Goodbye.”

...a voice that sounded nothing like its own escaped its mouth before it shattered from within.

Without much flair or fanfare, one third of a near-Mythical creature instantly died.

“Wh...What?! Brother...brother... What happened...?!”

“What is this?! Who?! Who...did this...?! Unforgivable!” The remaining two disks were shocked by the sudden loss of someone who had been with them all since their creation. As bewilderment overtook them...

“Ohh, so you were brothers? My condolences. I see I’ve done you some great harm. Committed a crime you can never forgive.”

...they noticed someone standing within the motionless face of their brother.

“I do find that very satisfying, though.” The person—an unremarkable young man with black hair and black eyes—said all of this with a smile.

It was the same human who had been killed by the third disk's "Turning Life" earlier.

"Y o u...y o u a r e a l i v e?!" the other disks cried in shock.

"I happen to have a body that does not die when split apart. Thanks to Shu's distraction, I was able to enter your brother with little effort."

The man said all these outrageous things in an incredibly matter-of-fact manner as he looked up at the two remaining disks. His eyes showed no pride in having defeated a third of such a powerful creature, but neither did they betray any disdain or fear. He looked as tranquil as someone gazing out at the sunset over the sea.

"Y o u... C u r s e y o u! Y o u r d e a t h i s n i g h!" The top disk was overcome with anger and set the man as its target for Turning Space. In several moments, he would be twisted right out of his body along with the space he inhabited.

"Focusing on me right now is dangerous," the man casually remarked, pointing at the still-burning fire.

"...Strength Cannon."

As soon as the voice issued from the smoldering wreckage, a shell of light broke through the veil of flame.

"W h...W h a t...?!"

And just like that, it was over. Before the top disk could change Turning Space's target, and completely ignoring the second disk's ability to turn the land, the shell of light flew towards the top disk.

"...Just fuckin' break already." The shell reached its target at the same time as those words did, and the immense power within utterly obliterated the disk.

"G h... G h a h..."

"B r o t h e r...!" As the top disk died, the second let out a wail of grief.

The man responsible, however, was standing in the fire with an indomitable grin on his face. As he looked up at Spindle's final remaining disk, he made his Embryo—now in its cannon form—disappear.

"Yeah, I figured it couldn't do the turning thing fast enough," he said. "An hour is more than enough to figure out how fast you operate."

The voice that was currently speaking belonged to the man from the battle cruiser.

"What...? How? You should have been dead too..."

"Sorry, but the 'B' in 'B-type' stands for 'bluff.' Those special shells sure put on a hell of a show, but they don't actually do much."

As if to prove his point, the man showed no signs of discomfort as he stood next to the roaring fire.

"...They did burn my costume though," he added with a sigh. "This show's on the rougher side, I guess."

Indeed, his costume's top half had been completely burned away, leaving his upper body exposed.

"Curse you puny humans...! You will pay for what you did to my brothers...!"

"...And that would be why you lost."

"What...?"

"Ya spent your days actin' like god up in these mountains, only dealin' with weaklings—forcin' them to pay you tribute in sacrifices. Of course you'd lose your instinct for combat."

"What...?!"

"And that's why ya don't even recognize an obvious distraction. Holy shit, how much time can ya waste talkin' when you're up against the two men who just killed your brothers?"

That was when the last disk realized that the black-haired man was nowhere in sight.

"Shapeshift: Linker Arm of the Destroyer, Macht Kanone!"

He was standing in one of the creature's blind spots, his left arm transformed into one armed with a cannon. Both the arm and the weapon looked exactly like the one possessed by the man with the battle cruiser.

"Once again...goodbye."

The cannon fired, and the last of Spindle's divine disks vanished like mist.

◇

Divine Disks, Spindle. A terrible being that regularly demanded sacrifices from the local villages—a creature that was taboo even to touch—had thus met its end at the hands of two people.

However, if anyone was present, they might not recognize them as human.

One had changed into a raccoon-like costume, which just made him look like some new kind of monster; the other had completely shed any semblance of humanoid form and become a black slime shaped roughly like a starch cake.

“...I raccoon we won,” said the former, awkwardly replacing “reckon.”

“It seems that way,” said the other. “Oh. It appears the MVP reward went to me.”

“Well, you made the winning move. No surprise there.” They—Destroyer, Shu Starling, and King of Crime, Sechs Würfel—were talking so casually that it was hard to believe they had been in a fierce battle mere minutes ago.

Although the conclusion seemed anticlimactic, Spindle certainly hadn’t been an easy foe.

The Divine Disks were extremely powerful, with their stats and skills alone making its defeat a difficult challenge for either one of them.

They’d ultimately won for two reasons. Shu had pointed out the first—that Spindle had lost its touch for combat. The second was the fact that Shu and Sechs were working together. They had both acted as distractions to create openings the other could take advantage of. Without such cooperation, Spindle would’ve won despite its rusty combat instincts.

Perhaps “cooperation” wasn’t quite the right word, though, since they weren’t actually coordinating whatsoever.

They both possessed a degree of confidence—or perhaps it was more like vigilance—that did not plan beyond thinking “this is what he’s gonna do next.”

They knew each other well enough to make such guesses and be correct almost all the time.

They clearly didn’t know everything about each other, though, as evidenced by the fact that Shu was looking at the starch cake next to him with slight surprise and thinking, Huh...this guy can’t keep up his human form if he’s tired?

Sechs’s Embryo was a Type Body called “Nu.” Its base form was that of a slime, and his human form was actually a result of a transformation. At this moment, he was so fatigued that he couldn’t even assume his regular appearance.

This seemed like a golden opportunity to send this criminal to the gaol, but Shu had no means of doing that now. He'd just used his first form and his ammo stocks were depleted, so he had no way to deal damage to someone immune to physical attacks. Things might be different if he had the King of Destruction Superior Job, but he would only acquire it after about a month of real-life time following this encounter.

As he was now, however, he was powerless against Sechs.

"Apologies for taking the MVP reward," Sechs said as Shu looked down at him. It was hard to tell what he was thinking.

"It's fine," said Shu. "The only reason I signed myself up fur this was because it pissed me off that children were bein' wagoned off as human sacrifices."

"Oh, that is true. I am certain you will not be thanked for this, however."

The local villages had long tolerated the practice of offering sacrifices to the Divine Disks. This was because the land was Spindle's territory, and that deterred most other monsters from entering. Outside of the need for human sacrifices, this place was actually on the safe side compared to the rest of the world.

The villagers believed that instead of worrying about some unknown monsters that could consume all of them, it was better to pay a "tax" of their own children to ensure the safety of the rest. "The devil you know" and all that.

In a way, it was like a religion that treated Spindle as a god.

This was especially clear when Shu had declared that he would defeat the UBM—only to be showered by loathing gazes and ceaseless verbal abuse.

Destroying this monster that demanded sacrifices was, from their perspective, a grave sin and a heavy crime.

And that was exactly why Sechs also wanted to defeat it.

"In the long run, defeating that UBM might actually increase the number of casualties here," Sechs said. "I am certain that the victims themselves do not believe that you have done the right thing. That may even include the parents of the sacrificed children."

"Probably," Shu replied, his voice nonchalant. "I did what I wanted. To me, that was the right decision. It just also happened to be wrong for those villagers. That's all there is to it."

“...So you are not afraid of being in the minority.”

“If I changed my opinions just to be part of the majority, I’d stop being myself and lose my sense of what’s right.”

“Your sense of justice, you mean?”

“Nothin’ that grand. I just don’t give up on the possibility I want. That’s the one thing that won’t change no matter who tries to deny it—or how many,” he said, looking back at the place where Spindle had once stood. Nothing of it was left. “This time, I just wanted to break some shitty spinnin’ top that demands child sacrifices, so that’s what I did. I won’t regret it no matter what anyone has to say about it.” Within his suit, he cracked a smile. “Well, I’ll still get in touch with my contacts in Altar and Legendaria to have them build a defense network here. A freshly opened monster habitat ain’t safe, and I can do that much.”

Saying nothing in response, Sechs looked up and considered Shu.

He was a man for whom the opinions of others didn’t matter at all—they were merely by-products of his actions. To him, all that mattered was that he did what he wanted. He was the only one who needed to see the purpose and value of anything he did. He influenced other people, but was immune to influence from them. It didn’t matter if he wore an animal costume, played the comedian, or obliterated those who stood before him—his nature remained unchanged.

He had a well-established, powerful sense of “himself.”

He was one who delivered his justice even in the face of terrible adversity.

Sechs thought many things about this person before him, and found himself a little bit ■■■■■■■.

“We are directly opposed,” he finally declared.

“Hm?”

“I came to defeat the UBM because I wanted to do exactly what the majority was against. You came to defeat the UBM in order to do what you felt was right. Our actions and their results are the same, but we are thoroughly opposed otherwise.”

“We’ve always been like that, haven’t we? Like, since the time we met during that whole Theresia thing,” said Shu. This wasn’t a new concept to him.

“That is true. You keep her status as The Evil a secret to protect her, while I keep it a secret because it's bad for the world. We truly are opposed."

Shu did what he wanted and delivered his justice.

Sechs did what the world didn't want and spread his corruption.

They were indeed directly opposed, but that was exactly why they occasionally saw eye to eye.

One man's justice could clash with another's, but justice and evil could interlock like gears and begin to turn.

That might have been a good way to describe their relationship.

That might've been why Sechs didn't actually dislike Shu, despite the fact that he'd thwarted many of his crimes.

That wasn't the only reason, though. In spite of being Altar's most wanted criminal, Sechs didn't have many personal desires...but Shu had caused him to develop one.

When he gets a Superior Job and becomes my equal... he thought as he looked up at Shu. I will have him do that until...

This desire had stuck its head out of its hiding place, but not far enough for him to say it out loud.

The time for that would come later.

◇

The two then went on to part ways.

They would spend their days encountering one another regularly—chatting, quarreling, and even cooperating like they had done during their encounter with Spindle. Sechs certainly saw Shu as a friend and someone special to him, while Shu didn't actually hate this loathsome criminal all that much.

However, after a year in Dendro time, right before the first Knight-Machine War, the two would finally clash. It was a battle that no Master or tian ever knew about—a deadly struggle between the giants of steel and darkness.

Destruction and Crime—the kings of both had fought until they shattered.

Begin Episode: "King of Crime."

Chapter One: Real-Life Relationships

Reiji Mukudori

A real-life day had passed since the battle royale on the uninhabited island.

It was now a Friday, and my college, UTokyo, was brimming with excitement.

The reason for all the enthusiasm was obvious. The week after next, from Wednesday on May 3rd to Sunday on the 7th, we would have five days off in a row—Golden Week.

I could hear cheerful talks between friends, lovers, and everyone else—making plans to go on trips or other activities for the occasion. Some people were considering not taking any lectures on Monday and Tuesday as well, opening up a full nine days for longer outings. The freshmen, however, seemed particularly keen to visit their homes. College life was still new to us, after all, and I could totally understand those who needed a break from it.

Even I'd gotten a call from my mom this morning, asking me if I wanted to spend Golden Week with my family. I spent a long moment thinking about it, but I wasn't feeling homesick or anything, so I decided to pass this time.

But before I could open my mouth, mom went and said something shocking.

"Your sister's coming back too. The 5th is her birthday, if you recall."

And just like that, I knew that I absolutely had to return—at least for the 5th of May.

Not being there to celebrate my sister's birthday would leave me afraid for my future. Knowing her, she wouldn't be upset by my absence, but there was a chance that she would "kindly make up for it" by barging into my place and whisking me away to spend some "quality time" somewhere foreign. I'd already had quite enough of that with the South America visit...

My home at the big N was just two hours away by bullet train, and I had no Dendro plans for Golden Week yet, so I figured I'd be able to return for the 5th.

Speaking of birthdays, Shu's was on the 3rd of March.

A brother and a sister, born just about a year apart—the sister on Boys' Day and the brother on Girls' Day. It was quite a rare coincidence, and it seemed kinda auspicious. The only way it could be better was if their days were switched.

As for me, I was born on July 7th—Tanabata. The 3rd day of the 3rd month, the 5th day of the 5th month, the 7th day of the 7th month... Our parents probably hadn't planned for us to have these birthdays, but I'd found it really strange when I was little. Hell, I still thought it was weird.

Anyway, thinking about visiting home, my sister, and some Dendro matters had left me feeling fatigued all morning, and I'd spent my lectures just zoning out.

Lunch time rolled around with me having learned absolutely nothing in class, and I was now sitting in the second cafeteria, absentmindedly twirling spaghetti with meat sauce onto my fork without actually bringing it to my mouth.

"What's up, Rei? Summer heat a bit too much? You okay? Wanna play some cat's cradle?"

"It ain't summer yet. It's obviously just May blues. Lil' early for that too, though, I guess."

"No, it's clearly bloodlust. He hasn't had his fix of Dendro devil meat."

The friends eating with me—Natsume, Kasugai, and Fuyuki—suddenly started commenting on my current state of mind.

"...You guys really just say whatever pops into your head, huh? Especially you, Fuyuki." Also, I hadn't eaten any devils since the battle against Logan. Why are Fuyuki and Natsume so fixated on that?

By the way, the fifth of us Dendro freshmen—Akiyama—was currently at her part-time job.

"Then why do ya look so gloomy? Didja get a bad gacha pull with your ticket...? Or wait—did someone break your heart?! Are you sure you're okay? Wanna play some cat's cradle?!"

"Mukudori...I'm goin' to a mixer next week. Wanna join?"

"Wait a sec, you two. He's got a Maiden, so he's with a girl basically every second in Dendro. Plus the internet tells me that he's constantly surrounded by weird women, so it's obviously not relationship trouble. If anything...he's probably tired because he hangs out with girls all the time."

"...Could you all quit it? Especially you, Fuyuki." Also, I didn't even use my ticket yet, Alto, I added silently.

"It's not the heat or May blues, and it's definitely not a broken heart or too much interaction with women. I'm just dealing with some tiring family matters and looking back at all that happened in Dendro this month."

"Ohh," Kasugai and Fuyuki said in unison. "I get ya! That was one hell of an event!" Natsume nodded in understanding. Of course she'd get it—she was with me for one of the most notable moments. "And Altar is havin' a rough time too, huh?" she added.

"...Yeah."

Way too many things had happened this April. On the first Saturday, there were the incidents at Torne and Quartierlatin. The following Saturday, there was the incident involving Hannya and King of Light, F. The Saturday after that, there were the peace talks that went so very wrong. And yesterday, there was The Anniversary.

Dendro time went by three times faster so it didn't exactly feel like it, but in real-life terms, something had happened every single week of the month so far.

Then again, it hadn't been much different in March either.

...We won't get another incident this Saturday, will we?

"And I was directly involved in all of them..." I muttered. The only exception was the terrorist attack on Altea that had happened at the same time as the peace talks.

"Wanna play some cat's cradle to take your mind off of it?"

"No."

"How 'bout that mixer, then?"

"No."

"Mukudori, relax—the KoB video with you in it is good stuff. It's doing good numbers."

"...Why would that make me relax?" Speaking of which, after hearing Jubei mention it, I'd gone to see the KoB video for myself. The uploader was the same person who'd put up the Logan video, and for some reason it was edited to make Altar's side—and me—look better than we really were. Since there were no other recordings to disprove any of that, the internet now saw the video as the absolute truth regarding what happened.

...By this point, I was pretty sure I knew who was behind this. I sighed as the silhouette of a Superior in a lab coat loomed in my mind.

“What about Tenchi? Anything happening in your country?” I asked.

“Not really. Everybody at Toseiden’s just chillin’,” said Natsume.

“Nothin’ here in Nanshumon either,” added Kasugai.

“Hokugen’in...we won against Kurowa in the north, but besides that, yeah, not much is happening here.” Tenchi was considered a single country on the world stage, but internally it was split into a number of lands ruled by different “Daimyos.” It was worth noting, though, that that title came to us via the auto-translation, so maybe it wasn’t actually a hundred percent accurate. Anyway, the situation there was similar to Sengoku Era Japan’s. Civil wars were a common thing, and Hokugen’in—the Daimyo Fuyuki served—apparently just took part in one.

“Kurowa? Are they the bunch who really don’t know how to pick their battles?” Kasugai asked.

“Yeah. Soon after they got a new Daimyo, they invaded us at Hokugen’in, and we’re one of the Tenchi’s Big Four.”

“Tenchi’s Big Four” were the particularly strong and long-lived Daimyo families of Tenchi—Kasugai’s Nanshumon, Natsume’s Toseiden, Fuyuki’s Hokugen’in, and Seihakuto. They were dominant in the south, east, north, and west, respectively.

Akiyama, who wasn’t with us here, was the only one of them who served a family outside of those four.

Jubei also happened to serve the same family as Natsume, as a matter of fact.

“What’s the power balance between them in terms of Sengoku Daimyos?”

“The Hokugen’in are like the Takeda from the Sengoku Era, while the Kurowa are like the Date from the Azuchi-Momoyama Era, I guess.”

...That actually seemed like a pretty even fight. Fuyuki had cited the eras when both clans were at their height, so from her explanation it didn’t really seem like that uneven of a matchup for Kurowa.

“Kurowa was a powerful family that had save points in their fief, and their tian soldiers outnumbered Hokugen’in’s 3-to-2,” Fuyuki explained. “However, that’s not the case with Masters. Hokugen’in had two Superiors:

Bigman and Saki Muryo-Taisu.”

...Those are some major names. I thought.

“So yeah. They struck first, but when we struck back, we just crushed them.”

“...I see.” This was clearly a case like the First Knight-Machine War on our side of the world, where Masters had made all the difference.

“The very first battle was an overwhelming defeat for them—even their Daimyo got killed. Now we’re just taking their land while trying to minimize casualties and dealing with the bandits popping up in the neutral zones. I actually went on a quest to help with that... Though, something weird’s been happening recently.”

“What kind of weird stuff, exactly?” I asked.

“Well, there seems to be a third party involved,” Fuyuki said. “There’s been ambushes by some...demi-humans that look like monsters...like people you’d find in Legendaria. They’ve slowed Hokugen’in’s advance down a lot, and they even managed to give me the death penalty.”

“Demi-humans that look like monsters...?” I’d heard of something similar appearing during the terrorist attack on Altea—a “Bug General” leading an army of bee-people.

“Hm...” According to Kasumi and the others who were there, the Bug General mentioned someone who, in her own words, “gave me power and this army.”

Altar and Tenchi were on opposite sides of the continent. It didn’t seem likely that a single person would be able to successfully pull strings that were that long, but it still stuck out to me.

“Troubled again, Rei? Wanna exercise your brain with some cat’s cradle?” said Natsume.

“No, he’s obviously imagining the taste of the demi-humans,” said Fuyuki. “You know how he fights. I’m sure he’ll eat bugs and corpses if he has to!”

“...I think he’s just tryin’ to fight off the headache you’re both givin’ him,” said Kasugai. Well, nothing would come from thinking about it now, so I figured I’d just leave it for another time.

And what the hell kind of person do they think I am? I thought in response to their comments. I guess I did eat a corpse during the Gouz-Maise thing, but still...

◇

The lectures ended before evening, and I wasted no time before making my way back home. Tomorrow was Saturday again, so I could focus solely on Dendro.

We at Death Period were planning to look for a place to use as our HQ, and The Tournaments I had a small part in were going to start soon too. My business in Dendro seemed like it would be comparatively lighthearted this time.

“Well, I can only hope nothing goes wrong.” With that thought, I kept riding my bicycle until the building where I lived came into view.

“Hm?” In addition to the building, I caught sight of a taxi driving off, leaving behind a single familiar person.

Flanked by paper bags that looked way too cumbersome for a woman like her, she seemed to be thinking something along the lines of "What now?" It looked like she'd gone on a shopping spree and ended up with too much to carry up to her apartment.

"Hello," I called out to her.

"Mr. Mukudori. Hello," the strikingly blonde woman greeted me in her somewhat awkward Japanese. She was a minor acquaintance of mine.

"Would you like some help carrying that?" I asked.

"Is okay?"

"Of course. We're neighbors."

She...or rather, Francesca was a neighbor who lived right next to me. Helping her bring her stuff up was no big deal.

"Thank you."

"Hey, it helps to help others," I said as I picked up two-thirds of everything she had.

It was just two bags, but they were way heavier than they looked. Looking in, I saw lots of small glass containers, making clinking sounds as they shifted around.

"That's a lot of little bottles. What are they?"

"Paints. Clay. College assignment. Deadline next week."

"Oh, so you go to a fine arts college."

"Yes. Bought more—just in case. Too much."

Francesca still wasn't proficient at Japanese, so her responses were very simplistic. She seemed to understand me just fine, though, so maybe it was just speaking that was giving her trouble.

"Which college do you go to?"

"Togeidai. Freshman."

Tokyo University of Fine Arts, huh? Just like my school, it wasn't far from here. I probably could have guessed that just from the fact that she lived in the same apartment complex as me.

"Hm...?" Wait... Freshman? I thought she was older than me... Are we actually the same age?

"...Twenty-one," she said as she pointed at herself, apparently understanding my confusion.

"Oh, I see."

It was hard for me to gauge a foreigner's age, but she was indeed older than me. I guessed that she'd just decided to go to college at a later age.

Her Japanese might've been the way it was simply because she hadn't been here long. We'd been neighbors for over a month now, but this was the first time we'd actually gotten to talk like this.

"You?"

"Me?" As we talked, we arrived at the elevator.

"I'm eighteen. A freshman at UTokyo."

"...C'est surprenant."

...Was that French for "I'm surprised" or "I didn't expect that?" Did I really not seem like a UTokyo student? Even in Dendro, I'd had people like Juliet and Bishmal tell me the same thing.

Though, Chelsea was more like "Where is that, anyway?" which was probably a very normal reaction for a foreigner unfamiliar with Japan.

As that thought passed through my mind, Francesca said, "I guessed fourteen."

"Wait, that's what you're surprised by?!" Now I was the one left in shock. Did she really think I was four years younger than I actually was?! I did hear that to foreigners, Japanese people often looked younger than they were, but did she seriously just skip straight past high school and assume I was in middle school?! "I'm a proper college student. Think about it—a middle schooler couldn't live alone in a place like this."

"I see. Hm..." she said, nodding in understanding.

However, I felt like her lips were moving slightly, murmuring something in French. I couldn't catch exactly what it was, but I felt that she said something like "I lived alone, though."

"We're here," I said as the elevator stopped on our floor. The both of us then exited the elevator.

The floor's number, by the way, was thirteen. I wasn't on this floor by accident, but by choice. The ominous number meant this floor had relatively few residents, and since Shu owned this whole place and I would get to live here for free, I specifically went for a cheap apartment that probably wouldn't have been picked by anybody else anyway.

Francesca looked like a westerner, but she lived on this floor too. That was probably because she simply didn't care about superstitions like that...or maybe she had some kind of religious reason for it.

I went and carried her things over to her door. I then asked if I could come in for a moment, and she gave me a nod. When she opened the door, I detected the faint smell of paint and clay. Looking around, I saw an odorless air freshener. It was probably meant to mask the smell, but it wasn't doing a good enough job to remove it completely.

...This wasn't really my business, but I figured Francesca probably wouldn't be getting her deposit back.

"Where should I put it?" I asked.

"Here is fine," she said.

"All right," I said as I set down the bags, mindful not to break anything.

"Thank you. I'd make tea, but..." she said as she looked ahead of the entryway, where the door to the living-dining-kitchen area would be if this was my apartment.

...I knew what she was trying to say. If the smell was still detectable despite the door and the air freshener, this was obviously no place for someone unaccustomed to it to relax and drink tea.

"It's fine. Feel free to tell me if you need help—we're neighbors, yes?"

"Yes. I will get back at you for this."

Her lack of Japanese proficiency came out yet again, this time in the form of a line you were more likely to see in battle manga than hear in everyday conversation.

Francesca Gautier

After exchanging goodbyes with the kindly neighbor who helped me carry my stuff, I closed the door.

This was the first time we'd talked since he'd moved in and brought me some Japanese noodles for some reason or another, but as far as neighbors went, at least he didn't seem stressful to talk to.

"...So he was actually a college student after all," I said to no one in particular. "It's so hard to guess Japanese people's ages."

Since I wasn't talking to someone who needed to understand me, I spoke using my native language. A little bit of French had slipped out while I was talking to him too, but he probably hadn't heard it.

Regardless, I appreciated his help. Japan was a relatively peaceful country, so it wasn't likely that someone would steal my things if I left them there, but thanks to him I managed to get everything up here in one trip.

"Phew... Though I guess I really did buy too much. I guess I just really wanted to get my assignments out of the way before the break."

I'd put everything directly from my cart into the taxi, so I hadn't even realized how much I'd bought until I was dropped off. Pretty stupid of me.

"The break that starts the week after the next... 'Golden Week,' was it? How strange to have a break at this time of the year... Though if I do my assignments before that, I'll be able to focus on the other side. I suppose that's rather convenient for me."

As I muttered to myself, I carried my things out of the entryway, through the living-dining-kitchen area, and into my workspace beyond.

When I opened the door, my nose was assaulted by the now-familiar smell of clay and paint. Here and there, you could see vase-sized statuettes and figurines, all of which I'd made myself. Many of them hadn't dried yet, so the smell was still extremely strong.

My apartment had two rooms and a living-dining-kitchen area; with the exception of the room I used as a bedroom, all of it was in this state. One room was the workspace, while the living-dining area was where I put all my finished pieces. I hadn't even done any cooking recently out of fear that the paint may catch fire.

The disorder here reminded me of my clan on the other side, even though the details were different.

"If this was a normal apartment, I'd have been kicked out by now." Thankfully, though the rent here was steep, this place had one big advantage—there was basically no risk of that happening.

Based on the neighbor's reaction, it seemed like the smell wasn't carried out into the rest of the building anyway.

...I should still consider calling a cleaner when it's time to move out, I thought.

"Hm..." Cleaners weren't cheap, but my current livelihood simply wouldn't be affected by that.

I had enough wealth to leave Europe, rent an expensive apartment, enter a Japanese fine arts college, and live comfortably not just until graduation, but for the rest of my life.

"...Maybe a grave visit is in order." That thought had reminded me of the person who'd suddenly died at the end of last year, leaving all this wealth to me and my sister both. It was making me feel a little bit sentimental.

"Speaking of which...I wonder what she's up to right now?" I then thought about my sister, who lived apart from me—in this world as well as on the other side. We'd been reunited when it was time to split the wealth, and that was when I'd invited her to come to the other side in the first place.

Based on what I saw in DIN articles, she seemed to be getting caught up in all kinds of incidents that were no less dramatic than the ones we had in the west. My sister was a purehearted girl who was easily troubled by all sorts of problems in life, so I could only hope she didn't find Caldina too stressful.

Once I was done bringing in my things, I sat down on the sofa in the living area. Instant coffee in hand, I relaxed while watching a French-language news program.

I was used to it by now, but the scent of the coffee mixed with the smell of my supplies always made me feel like I was drinking a cup of pure black paint.

"...I should at least clean up enough to have guests over." Something like what had happened today could happen again, so I'd decided to at least free up the table in the living-dining space and make sure I was mostly drying the pieces with a weaker smell.

Once I was done with my coffee, I went to work.

I looked over the clay statuettes and figurines on the work table and took one in hand. Some time had passed since I'd made these, so they were already dry. I could store them away without a problem, so I wrapped them in a French newspaper and did just that.

Considering I'd only been living here since February, I'd made quite a lot of pieces. With so much of my time being dedicated to college and the other side, I often wondered how I found the time to do all this.

"...Oh?" While cleaning up, I picked up a statuette that had been sitting on the edge of the table. Made of clay, it depicted an orb-like monster with tentacles.

I could clearly remember when I'd made this.

It was about a month ago, and the whole process of sculpting it was like a tribute to the dead. I was probably the last person who should be pointing this out, but you could tell that the artist of this statuette was full of anger and discontent.

I spent a few moments looking at it in silence—or maybe "glaring" would be a more accurate description—before wrapping it up and storing it away just like the others.

"...I won't mess up next time. I'll get back at him, no matter what," I said, staring down at the clay statuette of the thing I'd named "RSK."

Once I was done cleaning up for the time being, I went to my bedroom. Next to the bed, on a storage chest as tall as my waist, there lay the hardware for a certain game.

"Okay. Now..." I said, putting it on and lying down.

I'd repeated this sequence so many times I'd lost count. It was what I had to do to live as myself on the other side...in Infinite Dendrogram.

"First things first, there's gonna be the right arm. Final tuning time!" And once again, I, Francesca Gautier, became Giga Professor, Mr. Franklin.

Chapter Two: Invitation

Paladin, Ray Starling

I logged in to Dendro right after taking care of business in my apartment.

I appeared in-game at the fountain plaza in Altea. Though by now I was quite familiar with the location, the recent terrorist incident had changed things up a little. The destruction caused had since been repaired using job and Embryo skills, but the repaired areas looked different from the ones that had remained untouched, giving the plaza a patchwork appearance.

I heard that all the different areas blend together given enough time, but it seemed like Altea would just be like this for now.

"Ray." As I was taking in the new scenery, Nemesis came out of the crest.

"Nemesis."

"This is the start of another weekend, is it not? What are your plans for it? Taking and leveling your next job?" Yesterday, right after the event, I'd done some hunting and maxed out Scout; that had brought my total level to 250. It took a while, but I was now halfway towards the non-SJ max level.

I still hadn't decided what job I'd take next, but it was probably between Knight, Priest, and Adventurer. The first two had good synergy with Paladin, while Adventurer had many versatile utility skills that I'd be able to use even when I had Paladin set as my main.

Whichever I picked, though, leveling it would have to wait.

"I think I'll prioritize other business for now," I said. "That event in Gideon is coming up the day after tomorrow, remember?"

"Oh, that is true."

"I contacted everybody by email and they said they're already on the way to Gideon. I gotta get going too."

With everything that had been going on, our clan had figured it was a good idea to exchange email addresses. Some used their personal addresses while others had made new ones just for this purpose, but our whole clan now had an easy means of contacting each other in real life.

It was worth noting that unlike in Dendro, our communications weren't auto-translated, and with Rook and Figaro being from the Anglosphere, Io's group emphasized the need to prepare a free translation tool.

"Since Silver can get us there in no time, though, I'll take care of business here in Altea first."

"I see," said Nemesis. "I must say, traveling to Gideon has certainly become easy for us. I recall when it was a daylong endeavor riding Marilyn's dragon carriage."

"True." In Dendro time, that was more than three whole months ago.

I could clearly remember traveling through the Sauda Mountain Pass—the same area that B3 had blockaded—then suffering when Marie gave us a dinner that couldn't even be called "food," then fighting Gardranda... It was a hell of a time.

...I feel like I'm looking back at the past a bit too much today, I thought.

"Is my life flashing before my eyes?" I wondered.

"...What an ominous thing to say. Where did that come from?" Nemesis asked.

"Well, it's now guaranteed that I'm meeting my sister soon. Maybe my body's sensing danger and is preparing for death by showing me the past?"

"What do you think of your sister?"

"A raging storm."

"...Can a person truly be compared to something like that?"

Let's put the matter of my sister aside for now, I thought. The encounter was still a week away, after all.

"Let's stop by The Overlord's Antiques, then go to the castle," I said.

"Mhm. Now that you mention it, you did make an order there."

"Yep."

◇

It had happened back when I returned to Altea following my second death penalty.

After checking up on the city and the castle, I went straight to The Overlord's Antiques with a fairly obvious purpose—to find a replacement for my Volcanic Darkmetal Armor.

B3's gift had served me well in Quartierlatin and the battles after that, but alas, Behemot had left it broken beyond repair.

I obviously had to get something new, so I made my way to the now-familiar store.

However, as much as I looked around, I couldn't find any armor that was just right for me—they were either outside my level range or simply weaker than VDA.

I was left with no choice but to buy something less powerful, but that was when the hooded shopkeep said, "It would take a while, but if you wish, we could procure a certain armor for you from one of the other branches. It would be better than your VDA and, of course, suitable for your level range."

Apparently, the shopkeeper recognized me from the time I'd come here to buy an inventory. He'd also remembered my equipment from back then and said that he could prepare something even better.

This offer couldn't have been more perfect for me, so I took it immediately.

◇

"So yeah, it should've arrived by now."

My order hasn't come in time for yesterday's event—but that might've been a good thing, since I could've lost it when Jubei split me in half.

"New armor, again," said Nemesis. "I wonder what this one will be like..."

"The shopkeeper said it's good, so I wouldn't worry about it."

"It is not the quality I am concerned about."

"What is it, then?"

"...At this point, I would hope you could infer that from my words alone."

I still had no idea what she meant, but before I could figure it out, we'd arrived at The Overlord's Antiques. Pushing open the door, I saw the hooded shopkeep right behind the counter.

"Hello there. Has the armor I ordered arrived yet?" I asked.

"Yes, it did," the shopkeep said, reaching into an inventory and taking out the armor.

"...Huh?"

I couldn't help voicing my surprise at its appearance

"Hm? This armor is...the same?" Nemesis said exactly what I was thinking. Yeah, the armor on the counter was clearly VDA. The design was identical, and the weight I felt in my hands when I picked it up was the same too.

It did seem to be a bit different on the inside, though.

This version looked like it'd be easier to move around in, and somehow I got the impression it might even be tougher than the one I'd had before.

"This is indeed a Legendarian Volcanic Darkmetal Armor," said the shopkeep. "However, though it may look the same, it is actually quite different. The higher ability of the artisan has made it more powerful, and more importantly, its focus is different."

"Focus?"

"It is a crafted item, after all. Like any crafted item, some aspects of it can be changed around somewhat. Consider the VDA you wore previously—it was crafted to have a lower level requirement than usual."

Oh yeah—I recalled B3 saying something like that. VDA originally had a level requirement of 200, but the one she'd given me was designed to be worn by anyone 100 or above.

"This VDA's level requirement was untouched. In exchange, it possesses two additional skills: HP Boost and Destruction Resistance," the shopkeep explained.

"That so?"

"The HP Boost, by the way, is level 5, which means that it increases the wearer's HP by 50%."

"That's a hell of a boost!" A skill like that could bring even my HP over 10,000!

"I have never seen a non-MVP reward with such a bonus... But, dear shopkeep, would I be correct in assuming that a crafted item of this quality is quite rare?" Nemesis asked.

"Why, of course," the shopkeep said with a nod. "Applying skills while crafting is a risky endeavor, and it only becomes riskier the higher level of a skill you are attempting to add. A level 5 HP Boost and Destruction Resistance together would reduce the odds of success for any common craftsman to a paltry 2% or less. Failure would result in worse equipment, and although it depends on the means of production, you might even end up adding negative effects.”

...Now that was just scary. Crafting seemed like a real high risk, high reward kinda deal.

Wow, a crafting Superior Job. That explained why this VDA was so different despite looking the same as the one I had.

“Your previous VDA was excellent as well... In fact, the mere ability to craft VDA is proof of great skill, and a VDA with the level requirement cut in half is a truly incredible piece. However, it goes without saying that it still does not measure up to one made by The Craft.”

“...A treasure such as this seems expensive,” said Nemesis. “A success rate of 2% would make its price at least fifty times higher than average, no?”

Oh yeah. The price. I hadn’t asked about it back when I made the order, so it was about time I finally heard it.

“Taking its historical value into consideration as well, the price would be 200,000,000 lir.”

“God DAMN...!” Though, all things considered, that did actually seem like a reasonable price. A 50% boost to HP seemed like something that’d be on a lot of people’s wish lists, even those who were higher level than me. I could totally imagine this armor being used by tanky SJs specced into high HP.

Hell, the fact that something this good could be bought with money at all was kind of amazing on its own.

Nevertheless, the price was still prohibitive for anyone but a few SJs...and certain outliers.

“That is a price you can pay, however,” said the shopkeep, and that sure was the truth, huh? I was one of those outliers, after all.

The amount of money I currently had was 400,000,000 lir—nearly double what I’d need to buy the piece.

I’d kept getting more and more money without many chances to spend it, and then multiplied my wealth several times over by gambling it on The Clash of the Superiors as well as the Kashimiya vs Tom duel. Even buying tons of Brooches hadn't put a dent in my funds.

"Wait, how does this shopkeep know the extent of your wealth?" Nemesis asked telepathically. Dunno, but this one seems like a pro merchant. Maybe it comes naturally? I thought in response before pondering the situation a little further.

I'd considered using my money to fund a base for our clan, but this armor would help me a whole lot. I felt like I wouldn't get another chance to buy it if I passed on it now, so...I really didn't know what to do.

"I would prefer to make a trade instead," said the shopkeep, stopping my train of thought.

"Huh?" A trade...worth 200,000,000 lir?

"You were among those involved in the Quartierlatin incident, were you not?" the shopkeep asked.

"Yes," I said, slightly surprised that this person even knew that.

"I hear that the pre-ancient civilization weapon created a metallic powder. You took copious amounts of it for yourself, did you not?"

"Metallic powder...? Ohh, that." Yeah, when the flying whale-like superweapon fell from the sky, there'd been a lot of this strange powder in its remains. The kingdom retrieved most of it, but since I beat the whale, I also received three inventories' worth of the stuff. However, I hadn't gotten much use out of it. I'd supplied some of it for my Storm Visage order, but other than that I'd just been sitting on it.

"Would you trade it for this armor? In fact...please let me have it."

"Well, I don't mi—"

"I will pay 20,000 lir per hundred grams."

"God DAMN!" What the hell kind of price is that?! It's making me feel like I'm dealing with the wrong kind of powder—the white kind! I didn't know it was illegal, officer, I swear! I thought. Wait a sec...

I currently had three inventories full of the stuff.

I'd never emptied them, so I didn't know the total amount, but during the tutorial Cheshire had told me that even the starter inventory could hold a full ton of items.

That meant that I had at least three tons, which was...600,000,000 lir?

"...That amounts to double your wealth even after you pay for the armor," said Nemesis. Yeah. Dealing with shady powders sure is something, huh? I can totally see things going very wrong somehow. Am I gonna end up at the bottom of Tokyo Bay? Help!

“Calm down. Your thoughts are a mess,” Nemesis interjected.

Ah! Crap. I lost my cool for a bit there over that obscene amount of money...

“Umm, why is this powder so expensive?” I asked the shopkeep.

“Those metal particles are used in the production of Second-Model Prism Steeds—SMPS. It is known to be excellent for the creation of all kinds of high-quality equipment. However, almost all of the powder is in the possession of the government, and because most of what they have is dedicated to the production of SMPS, there is almost none of it in circulation.”

I did know that Altar was bolstering its forces by making SMPS production into a high-priority task. And since the powder obviously wasn’t unlimited in supply, I could understand them not releasing it to the market.

“The SMPS that do make it to the market can be dismantled, of course, but in the process of building them, the metal powder used is alloyed and becomes impure,” the shopkeep added.

“I see,” said Nemesis. “So Ray is the only person who has a large amount of this powder in its pure state?”

“Indeed he is.”

Well, that explained the obscene price, and why I was being offered this deal.

Now it was time to decide whether to accept it or not.

I could just buy the armor using money, but since we’d be looking for a clan base soon, it’d be better to hold on to some of it. If Death Period had crafting jobs, I would’ve considered giving the powder to them, but sadly we had none. Selling it here seemed like a good idea.

There was a chance that we’d get a crafter eventually, so I would’ve liked to keep some of it just in case.

“Will you trade us the powder?” the shopkeep asked.

“...One inventory’s worth of it,” I said as I took out one of the three powder-filled inventories I had.

The deal was complete, and I got my new armor—a better version of VDA.

Also, when the shopkeep checked the inventory’s capacity and the weight of the powder inside, we discovered that it had triple the space of the starter inventory and held three tons of powder all by itself. Because of this, the inventory I gave not only covered the price of the armor, but also got me an extra 400,000,000 lir—essentially doubling my wealth.

...And I still had six tons of powder left.

◇

Having gotten my VDA 2.0, I made my way to the castle.

Giving greetings to the guards—who seemed more numerous than before—I passed the gate. It had been melted during the terrorist attack but had been recently rebuilt.

"I'm kinda getting used to visiting the castle," I said.

"Same here," Nemesis agreed. "And the guards seem to have gotten used to your appearance. I hope this does not stop them from apprehending anyone suspicious."

As we walked and talked, I heard construction and other sounds coming from various places within the castle. They were obviously repairing the destruction caused in the terrorist incident, but apparently that also included the maintenance of the castle's security facilities, which had been deactivated for a good while now. With most of the court wizards dead after the war against Gloria, little could be done with the security system, but Integra's return had made restoring it possible again. Because of that—and a few other reasons—she and basically everyone else in the castle were extremely busy.

"Needless to say, that includes Azurite," I said. "I doubt Liliana or even Sir Lindos can catch a break either. He's barely had time to recover."

"They do have a shortage of personnel here," said Nemesis. "Since this is the castle, they cannot hire as many Masters here as they did for the restoration of the city."

"Yeah. Security and confidentiality reasons..." They couldn't rely on Embryo skills for this, so repairs on the castle would probably take longer than repairs across the rest of the city. At least they were already done with the gate—the "face" of the castle, so to speak.

It was still badly damaged on the inside, though. Looking at the castle from above, you could see a large hole that had been blasted through the middle of it all the way into the depths below. Liliana and Integra had told me that that hole was the result of King of Blaze using his final skill.

On top of that, the magic distribution network had been severed with noteworthy precision, while another area was so contaminated with poison that no one was allowed to enter it.

...Just how long will fixing all this take? I wondered.

"I would not know," said Nemesis. "And it is not just material damage we have to consider. There were many casualties as well."

"...Yeah." Bug General's army had attacked the city, while the Kings of Blaze and Venom had targeted the castle; the combined total of people who'd died because of them was even greater than the overall fatality count during Franklin's Game. I didn't know if it was any consolation to the deceased that all three of them had been dealt with.

However, there was one problem with that line of thought—there were actually two other attackers.

The first was a man with the ability to transform into a bat. Liliana had witnessed him at the gate, but there was nothing to suggest that he'd been defeated. In fact, though it was confirmed he'd engaged in subversive action, there was no sign that he'd ever actually fought anyone.

For some reason, though, he'd broken not only the magic distribution network, but also some paintings and furniture in the castle, which Liliana found really strange. I could remember Integra jokingly saying, "Obviously he was just doing battle with the furniture, floors, and walls. What's so strange about it?" which made Liliana a bit angry.

Apparently, Third Princess Theresia hadn't been far away at the time, but all they could get from her was that she'd been hiding and didn't know anything.

The second attacker, however, was far more dangerous than the bat-man.

It was King of Thieves, Zeta herself—a Superior who had once been affiliated with Dryfe.

She'd left the imperium in order to become the central part of the trap set up for the peace talks. During the attack on Altea, she'd fought and defeated Xunyu, and it seemed pretty clear that Zeta had survived the rest of the incident. That was clear from the fact that there were no reports of her entering the gaol, as well as a lack of confirmed sightings by the DIN branch in Dryfe.

That left us with two possibilities: either she'd received the death penalty and hadn't logged in since, or she was still alive and hiding somewhere in Altar.

With two of the attackers being unaccounted for, possibly hiding in this very castle, I could fully understand why there were more guards than usual.

"Hm..." But even though the incident had all these loose ends, we could at least be thankful that the injured had recovered quickly and that Milianne and the rest were unharmed.

Most of the Royal Guard had suffered severe poisoning or received heavy wounds, but Integra's first-aid treatment was enough to keep them alive until Miss Eldritch returned and fully healed them, and they had gone back to work as though nothing had happened.

Elizabeth's fiancé—Canglong—had actually collapsed during the incident, but now he didn't have a single scratch on him.

Based on what Elizabeth told Marie, he was actually the Draconic Emperor—a Special Superior Job from Huang He—and thus possessed immense regenerative abilities.

Speaking of notable people, Marquis Findle had also been badly injured, but again thanks to Miss Eldritch, he was fully healed now.

All the healing brought about a different problem, though.

The reason Fuso had been obeying Azurite in the first place was because the Hannya incident had put her in immense monetary debt to the country, forcing her to enter into a Contract.

At first Azurite had planned to reduce Fuso's debt in exchange for her help with healing the injured—but before she could, Fuso had repaid everything she owed. Apparently, making sure to be as obnoxious as possible, she'd said something like, "Hee hee! I'm finally freeee! Oh, being used and abused by this foul princess was suuuch a paaain. Oh, I'm still open for business if you need me, so don't you worry about thaaat. We can make a deal."

Fuso then topped it off with, "So, what'll you gimme for treating these poor people? I won't take money, just so you know."

With the lives of her loyal retainers on the line, Azurite had no choice but to accept some devilish deal, and the last time I'd seen her, she was in a really bad mood because of it. I could clearly remember the way she'd clasped her head in her hands and said, “I was even tracking the flow of wealth in this country to prevent things like this from happening...”

Did Fuso have some fortune stored away somewhere? I wondered. Or did she get an exorbitant sum of money in exchange for treating someone?

Regardless, Azurite no longer had a leash on her. For all I knew, that might’ve been part of the reason why she was rushing to start The Tournaments in Gideon.

“...Hm?” As all of this was running through my mind, I noticed a familiar shape in the hallway.

The person looking outside the window and blowing bubbles through a pipe was...

“Xunyu?”

“Hm? Oh, RaY. Hey thEre.”

Standing shorter than usual to match the window, she used her open hand to wave me hello.

“New rAgs, huh?” she said. “Some goOd stats on thosE.”

I would expect no less from Xunyu. All she needed was a glance to know the skills on my VDA 2.0.

“Yeah. I can’t walk around in stopgap gear. I wouldn’t be ready if something happened. That aside, what are you doing here?”

“I got nOthin’ to do and that’s whAt I’m doin’—nothin’. Well, actuAlly, I’m usin’ skills to hElp with security, but nOthin’s happenin’, so I’m kindA spacin’ out.”

“You got nothing to do? Weren’t you about to go back to Huang He with Elizabeth and Canglong? Aren’t you busy preparing for that?” That was what she’d told me last time we’d talked.

There was a chance that she would have been hired to help Altar in the war against Dryfe, but with Elizabeth’s marriage being set in stone, it was decided instead that she’d serve as the princess’s bodyguard on the way to Huang He. With Elizabeth having been the target of terrorist attacks a couple times now, it was obvious that she needed a Superior bodyguard—or maybe even more than one.

I could recall Xunyu saying that the previous time we’d talked might’ve been the last before she left.

“That was thE plan... Hell, I shoUld’ve been on thE way back to Huang He bY now, but...” she said as she reached into an inventory and took out a newspaper.

At a glance, I saw sentences like “Clashes Between Caldina and Granvaloa Intensify!”, “The Magical Apex VS The Human Bomb—the Fight of the Strongest Exterminators!”, and “Vennsayle the Lake City Devastated!”

“This is...”

“This ain’t thE only place at wAr. The neighbOrs’re seein’ some spicY conflict too. It’s too damn dangeroUs to go back by lAnd or by sea. Cang and I’d bE fine, sure, but ElizAbeth and the officiAls? Not so mUch.”

The Magical Apex and The Human Bomb... Shu himself had told me that their extermination potential was even greater than his.

Going by land would mean going through their battlefield in Caldina, while going by sea would mean going through Granvaloa—which, if the conflict intensified, would also become a danger zone. Transporting VIPs through either was far too risky.

“But Altar is no better, is it?” I asked. “Things have cooled down for now, but there’s no telling when they’ll heat up again.”

“Yeah. And thAt’s why we’re waitin’ for sOmeone from thE motherlAnd to come pick us Up.”

“Who’s that?”

“Guy cAlled ‘Gray.’ One of Us Huang He Si Ling—Gray α CentaUri the ‘Spirit Turtle.’ His Superior EmbryO’s called LaputA and it’s a goddAmn flying fortrEss. It’s the perfEct ride for sitUations like this.”

A flying fortress Superior Embryo, “Laputa...”

...Well, if that didn’t sound like something that could be brought down by a single word: Balse.

“He stands oUt and puts othEr countries on edge, so it’s normAlly hard for him to move aroUnd like this, but it lOoks like Caldina gavE the go-ahead. They strUck a deal for thAt.”

“A deal?”

“It’s relatEd to the Orbs. Like the ones Cang broUght that the princess is gOnna use for the tournAments.”

“Oh those?” I knew about the UBM Orbs. Called “Treasurebeast Orbs” in Huang He, they were items produced as a result of a Draconic Emperor from history sealing away UBMs.

Some of the sealed UBMs’ power could be used with just the Orbs, but you also had the option of breaking the seal and defeating the UBMs inside to take the MVP rewards. I was told that Figaro had fought a UBM that had once been sealed in such an Orb. He'd won, and his reward for that was the blue coat he always wore.

As part of the engagement between Elizabeth and Canglong, Huang He had gifted Altar a whole ten Orbs like this.

Azurite had spent a long time thinking about how to use them or whom to entice with them, but she'd made her final decision right after the peace talks—she would use them for The Tournaments in Gideon.

I would review the details once I got there, but in a nutshell, it would be an event where Masters would fight for the right to challenge one of the ten UBMs. The catch was that they would all have to sign a Contract preventing them from committing hostile actions against Altar for a set amount of time.

She'd come upon this idea upon remembering the turncoat Masters that had popped up during Franklin's Game, as well as realizing how much control she'd had over Miss Eldritch while she was contractually obliged to serve her until she'd repaid her debt.

Besides the right to challenge the UBMs, there were extra rewards in the form of "rare equipment from Altarian history," and I played a part in that...as a cleaner.

"How are the Orbs releva... Oh, wait, it's Caldina."

"YeAh. Damn things'rE givin' the sAndy land a hard timE."

I'd heard rumors of the incidents in Caldina centered around the Orbs. Some people had mentioned a giant maggot creature appearing in some big city, which had been attacked by a metal statue and some kind of dragon.

And according to the newspaper in my hand, even the conflict with Granvaloa had been caused by the Orbs.

"BasicallY, in exchange for Huang He abAndonin' the rights to thE Orbs that leaked into CaldinA, they want 'em to temporarily allOw Huang He's forces to enter the coUntry and provide escOrts as needed."

"...I see," said Nemesis. "So what they are saying is, 'Keep the Orbs if you must. Use them as you will. In exchange, we demand you do not interfere with the retrieval of our prince and his bride. In fact, assist us.'"

"Yeah. MorE or less."

...It was Huang He's fault for failing to prevent the theft in the first place, but they abandoned both that responsibility and the right to the Orbs and used the situation to their advantage, huh?

“Well, thEre’d be some filthy quarrEllin’ even if they demAnded the Orbs back, and if they weren’t cOmin’ back anyway, it was better tO just act like ya gave them awAy and attach some conditiOns to it. Our head honchO is that kinda fella. The first princE, I mean.”

“Canglong’s older brother, right?”

“YeAh. The current empEror ain’t doin’ too hot, sO he’s workin’ hard in his stEad. He’s even thE one who made Huang He mOre welcomin’ to MastErs.”

“Is he also the one who got the idea for the marriage between Elizabeth and Canglong?”

“Nope. That wAs the emperor himsElf, apparently. I dunno much ’bout it mYself. Though, it was thE first prince who put me as Cang’s bodYguard.”

It seemed like a complex situation, and it bothered me somehow.

...I had my hands full with the situation here in Altar, though. I couldn’t think too much about whatever was happening with the imperial family on the other side of the continent.

“Will Huang He be all right without you and this ‘Gray’ person?” I asked.

“Well, I heArd they recently got rid of a lOcal mafia, and with Caldina bEin’ in the state it is, and Tenchi bein’ Tenchi, they dOn’t really need anyonE... And thoUgh the two that’re lEft are unhinged, they sure as hEll aren’t weak. I can voUch for that.”

“Hm?”

“BasicallY, out of us Huang He Si Ling, GrAy and I’re on the simplEr side.” Xunyu seemed like she stood a chance against literally anyone, while this “Gray” person had a flying fortress for an Embryo...and they were on the “simpler side”?

“What of the other two?” Nemesis asked.

“The battlEs they’re specced for are limitEd. Though, if thE conditions are right...one of the twO can be as bad as your bro or KoB.”

...Looks like I certainly didn’t see all the cards Huang He could play, I thought.

“Well, enoUgh ’bout my situatiOn. Why’re you herE in the castle? YoU won't find Elizabeth's sister if it's hEr you're after. ThAt LiliAna woman ain't herE either."

Yeah, I'd have figured as much. Considering the date, they must've gone to Gideon for the preparations.

That wasn't the reason I was here, though.

"Oh, it's not either of them this time. I came to see someone else." Before logging out last time, I'd gone to the inn I'd been staying at, where I'd received a letter—an invitation, to be precise.

It had multiple days and times on it, and I could come at whichever time suited me. Thus, I was here today and now.

"Who woUld that be?" The one who'd invited me was...

"Integra."

...Integra Sedna Clarisse Flagman.

I would soon talk with the person who shared a name with the person who'd created my Prism Steed, Silver, and countless other wonders of the pre-ancient civilization.

◇

I didn't actually know all that much about Integra. So far, we'd only had a single conversation, and all I learned was her name and the fact that she was the Arch Sage.

However, since they were Integra's childhood friends, Azurite and Liliana had told me a few other things about her.

Integra had lost her family when she was little and had been completely without relatives since then, but she'd gone on to have her talents noticed by the previous Arch Sage, who'd taken her under his wing. Despite her young age, she was rumored to be the most gifted and strongest out of all of his disciples.

By his order, issued some time before Gloria's attack, Integra had left Altar and gone on a journey—during which she became the new Arch Sage. She'd returned to Altea during the recent terrorist attack and cooperated with Canglong to take out King of Blaze.

Besides that, all I knew about Integra was that she'd only begun calling herself "Flagman" after coming back and that she was currently busy with the castle's repairs.

Liliana and Azurite must've had lots of memories of her, but I hadn't heard most of them yet—nor did I know the reason why Integra began using the "Flagman" name. My upcoming talk with her seemed like a good chance to ask about that, among other things.

With that in mind, I knocked on the door leading to the lab that was supposedly used by the previous Arch Sage and his disciples. After I heard a "come in" from the other side, the door opened without me lifting a finger.

Inside, I saw many bookshelves and desks covered in various implements, papers, and folders. The lab was a crucible of knowledge if I ever saw one, and in its heart there was Integra, seated in a chair clearly too large for her tiny frame. She wasn't wearing her pointy hat today, which only made her look smaller. It really emphasized the fact that she was even shorter than Nemesis.

Integra put down the papers she was reading on a desk and said, "Hey there—I bid you welcome, Ray Starling. Your Embryo too. I couldn't ask for better timing—I was just about to take a break."

"Well, hello to you too," I said. "So, why did you call me?"

Before answering my question, she waved her finger slightly without getting up from her chair. As if prompted by the motion, two other chairs in the room slid towards Nemesis and I.

"First things first—take a seat," she said. "This conversation may be a bit on the longer side."

"...I see," I said, and we did as directed. The chairs then started moving again, bringing us to a better position for a conversation with Integra.

It didn't end there. A small round table and a tea set also moved on their own to set up a little tea party for us.

"...Now this is a wizard's room if I ever saw one," I said. I felt like I was in a western animated film I'd seen when I was little.

Integra was also wearing a robe, and if that pointy wizard hat she'd had equipped when we met outside was part of her usual wardrobe, I could honestly say that she was the most "wizard-like" person I'd met in this ostensibly fantasy-themed—but ultimately quite eclectic—world of Infinite Dendrogram.

It was oddly novel to me. As I watched in surprise, Integra smiled as she used her moving teapot to prepare us some black tea.

"It's just solid object manipulation—nothing but basic geomancy. Oh, and I heated up the water by simply increasing its heat energy. Once you know how it works, it's as easy as lighting a match."

Once she'd finished her explanation, two teacups made their way towards us.

"It's still strange watching it in action," I replied.

"If you think this is strange, you should visit Legendaria someday," Integra said. "You may find yourself welcomed not by mere magicwork, but furniture that's functionally alive."

Now that really seems like some Beauty and the Beast stuff, I thought.

"Speaking of Legendaria, that's where these tea leaves are from," she added. "The taste is a bit odd, but personally, I am a fan. I hope you enjoy it too."

"I will gladly try it," said Nemesis as she took a sip.

I also took my cup in hand. A strange fragrance unlike any I had encountered in real life reached my nose, but the taste struck a balance between sharpness and sweetness. Overall, I found it pretty good.

"Thank you," I said. "This tea is really nice."

"I'm glad to hear that. Now, if you don't mind, I'd like to begin the conversation I brought you here for. There are two subjects I'd like to discuss, but they're mutually exclusive and I'm not sure which one to start with," she said as she pondered something. "Though...I guess I should go with this one."

I took another sip of the tea...

"Are you Altimia's lover?"

"BPFFT!"

...only to spit it out and start coughing.

I think I inhaled some of this tea after hearing that...!

"N-No! Ray and Azurite are not like that!"

"Huh? Is it Liliana, then? She was the one he met first, wasn't she?"

"That does not mean they are in a relationship!" While I was still busy coughing, Nemesis was vehemently arguing with Integra's assumption for some reason, her face beet red.

That was when I finally became able to breathe and talk again.

"Phew. I'm good friends with them both, but neither of them are my girlfriend or anything like that...!"

"Hmm... So, you are not interested in their bodies or their status? They're both quite the prize—especially Altimia."

"I don't care about that!" And don't talk about your friends like they're objects you can own! One of them is even Altar's acting ruler!

"...Hearing you so strongly deny that you find my friends attractive actually makes me feel a bit sorry for them. Well...have you ever really seen them? It's been a few years since we bathed together, but they were really beautiful, if you ask me."

"I never saw...! Oh..." Umm... Yeah. I actually have seen Altimia naked once. It was a mixed bath, though, and it was kind of an accident.

"Oh? And there's the first detection... Huh? So you have seen them without their clothes on? Knowing that, I'm very curious—and concerned—about your relationships."

"A-All you need to know is that I don't have any ulterior motives like that and I haven't paired up with either of them!"

"Hrm... Well, I suppose I understand. With that, the main topic of discussion is out of the way."

"Did you really call us here just to sexually harass him like that?!" Nemesis exclaimed in shock, and I totally agreed with her. What kind of girl would invite a guy over just to ask if he was attracted to her friends or if he was dating any of them?

"Oh, don't put it like that. I see nothing unusual about being intrigued by any men who become close to my childhood friends, especially since they used to be so detached from such matters. I'm immensely curious."

"...These 'matters' seem way above your age level." It felt like every second kid I met here in Dendro was terrifyingly mature—Xunyu being the most obvious example.

"Hm?" Integra said as she tilted her head in confusion. "Aren't you Altimia's age? Maybe a year older at most? Then I am your elder by a substantial amount. Respect is due."

"Huh?" Seriously? Integra looked like she was twelve, so I just assumed she was actually around that age. I'd even been surprised that she could be childhood friends with Liliana and Azurite despite being so much younger than they were...

"My apologies..."

"Ha ha ha—I'm just kidding. You can speak as casually as you like. I myself only used formal speech with my late teacher, so I don't mind it at all—not one bit. Though...do understand that you are younger than I am."

"Of cour— I mean, all right." So despite looking younger than Nemesis, she was actually older than me... This was especially surprising since she was a tian, and she wasn't even an elf or some other long-lived race from

Legendaria.

"...So, how old are you?" I asked.

"That's not the kind of question you ask a lady." ...Yeah, that might've been rude, I thought.

"Anyway, let's move on to the other matter," Integra said. "Though this is more of an aside."

So the thing about lovers and bodies and all that stuff really was your main deal...

"I'd like you to show me your Zephyrus Silver."

"Silver?"

"Yes. The second thing I'd like to discuss concerns the last Prism Steed made by the Grand Artificer Flagman...the first of us."

The last Prism Steed, huh? Back in Quartierlatin, Mario had told me that Silver was either an early prototype separate from the five "official" Prism Steeds or a recent experimental unit made to test a new function. Apparently it was the latter.

Also, Integra just called Flagman "the first of us," which meant that her carrying the Grand Artificer's name wasn't just some accident—she'd actually inherited it from him.

...How is this an "aside"? It seems way more important than those questions that bordered on sexual harassment. "All right," I said. "Though, I wanna ask something as well. It's about Silver and Flagman."

"I have his name, so I assume you're curious about my relationship to him? I'll explain that too," she said, placing one palm against her chest. "First of all, I'm not the Grand Artificer's descendant. My teacher was a Flagman as well, but none of us are connected by blood. It's merely a name that has been passed from teacher to disciple."

"A name passed on from teacher to disciple... Is it like the professional names used by artists, martial and otherwise?"

"Ah, you're thinking of the custom they follow in Tenchi. It's not exactly the same, but it's also not entirely different either. My teacher was the Arch Sage, and he'd inherited the Flagman name along with the job. And when he died and I became the new Arch Sage, I began calling myself Flagman just like he did. Just having his name doesn't mean any of us have even a fraction of the Grand Artificer's technological knowledge, though."

"Is that how it works?"

“Yes. Our technological prowess more or less died with the third Flagman. Do you know the Prism Crawlers? Those were made by the third.”

Oh, so that’s the guy who made Shion’s spider...

“Anyway, I’ve been curious about your Zephyrus Silver for a while now,” Integra continued. “Since before you even obtained him, in fact.”

“Hm?”

“We’ve known for a while that the first Flagman created him, but nothing about the steed’s functions or abilities was recorded. Even we—Flagman’s successors—don’t have any of that information, even though we have full specs for the other five.”

Now that was just weird. If he’d left behind a record of Silver’s creation, you’d think he’d have also left a spec sheet or something like that. It wasn’t as though he couldn’t do it or the records had been lost, right?

“So, as someone who inherited Flagman’s name, I have always wanted to see Zephyrus Silver for myself. Do you mind if I take a look?”

“Not at all. There’s things I wanna know about him too.”

“Oh, you did mention that, yes.”

“Yeah. I can’t get any details for the third skill. Maybe you can help me with that?”

By becoming a Prism Rider—the job dedicated to the use of Prism Beasts—I’d unlocked the message the first Flagman had left on Silver. However, all it said was that I didn’t have a high enough level of Authority to see the skill’s details.

The skill had been activated only twice so far: once in Quartierlatin and once during my battle against Jubei.

Silver seemed to be using it of his own accord and only in certain situations, but I didn’t really know what “it” was. I was hoping Integra could tell me that.

“Very well. I’ll look into that too,” she said.

“Should we go outside?”

“No, there’s enough space here.” Given the go-ahead, I reached into my inventory and took Silver out.

The damage done by Jubei had already been repaired. He was tilting his head at me, apparently confused that I’d taken him out indoors. Despite this, he was standing still in place, his hooves firm on the floor.

"I'll start, then," said Integra.

"All right. Be a good boy, Silver." As though acknowledging my words, he let out an engine noise that somewhat resembled a neigh.

This reminds me of the time I got Mario to check on him, I thought.

"It might take a while, so you might have to wait a bit. Do help yourself to as much of the tea and snacks as you wish."

"Very well! We will wait as long as necessary!" Nemesis said as she dug into the snacks.

...And this reminds me how she emptied the cookie plate when we were visiting Countess Quartierlatin. Control yourself this time, Nemesis.

As I was thinking that, Integra was carefully examining Silver, peering at him here and there while checking something using a lens or an object that looked like a pin.

"So you're not dismantling him?" I asked.

"All you really need for this is a high-level See-Through Sight and some examination magic. Also, as I said, I don't even have a fraction of the first Flagman's technological prowess. I wouldn't want to dismantle Silver only to be unable to put him back together."

"I see..." I thought of how, back when I was a little boy, I'd let my curiosity get the better of me and used a screwdriver to take apart a toy clock. I couldn't put it back together, but Shu had fixed it like it was nothing.

Also, Integra's words reminded me that despite his animal-like form, Silver was actually a complex machine. The whale and horseshoe crab thing from Quartierlatin were like that too.

It felt like the pre-ancient civilization had a strangely high amount of animal-like machines. Wait, that reminds me of another question I had, I thought.

"Hey, can I ask something else?"

"Go ahead."

"What's the difference between regular machines and Prism Steeds like Silver...or Prism Beasts in general?" Based on the info acquired from the wrecks, the whale and the horseshoe crab weren't actually Prism Beasts despite being animal-like, so I'd been wondering where the lines were drawn.

"The differences there, eh...? Well, I could just say that it's just the series they’re part of, but apparently there was a rough definition of ‘Prism Beast’ in place during the time of the pre-ancient civilization.”

“What was the definition, then?”

“Generally speaking, Prism Beasts are anything that fulfills two conditions. One—it’s equipped with an artificial intelligence and is capable of autonomous action. And two—it’s designed to have human riders.”

Machines with AI that allowed autonomy, but were designed to have humans ride them... Those conditions seemed contradictory, but Silver obviously fulfilled them both.

“Because of this, modern Magingears, with their lack of AI, aren’t counted among Prism Beasts. Machine golems, which have AI but can’t be ridden by humans, don’t make the cut either.”

“I see...” The whale and the crab were unmanned, so I guess they’re more like the latter example, I thought.

“The first Flagman also created these ‘Prism Persons’—stand-alone automata with functioning AI. They’re still ‘Prism,’ but since they weren’t designed to be ridden by humans, they weren’t ‘Beasts.’ The ‘Prism Person’ name might’ve been coined for the express purpose of establishing that distinction.”

“I see...”

“Though, annoyingly enough, the mass-produced ‘Prism Persons’ you and Altimia fought at Quartierlatin—Prism Soldiers—were designed to have human...or at least, animal...riders, which by a strict definition would make them Prism Beasts.”

...This was starting to feel like animal classification. Parvorder: Odontoceti. Family: Monodontidae. Genus: Delphinapterus. Species: Beluga whale... Something like that.

“So, if someone woke up today and decided to make a machine that had AI and was designed to have human riders, it would be recognized as a Prism Beast?” I asked.

“It would, but that’s unlikely to happen either way. AI technology has been lost, after all. Legendaria and Huang He have AI created by sealing spirits from nature or the realms of the dead within certain objects, but Prism Beasts need intelligence born of pure science, not magic.”

The distinction seemed broad at first, but it turned out that it had some pretty strict limits.

“The first and the third Flagman were geniuses when it came to that, but none of us who followed can match them. Well, it’s more...even though the basics of it were passed down to us, we just can’t understand them.”

“Really...?”

“Apparently, in its early years, Dryfe delved into the process of capturing ancient machine golems, taking out their AIs, and installing them in Magingears. I hear that went nowhere because they couldn’t recalibrate the programming.”

Dryfe had only received its first humanoid robots once Franklin’s Triangle of Wisdom had created the Marshal II. Up until then, the only Magingears they had were tanks or powered suits, and I would guess that AI from the presumably humanoid golems wasn’t suited for those. Hell, there was probably nothing in their programming that accounted for people riding them.

“In that case, the SMPS factory in Quartierlatin...”

“Yes. In a way, it’s a groundbreaking discovery. We may be seeing the revival of the age of Prism Beasts. It looks like more and more people are becoming Prism Riders, after all.”

With SMPS spreading throughout Altar, Masters and tians alike were taking the Prism Rider job so they could make the best use of them. SMPS were decently fast, could gallop in midair, and had the ability to create barriers. Being machines, they never had bad days and didn’t require much in the way of upkeep. Generally easier to handle than many regular mounts, it seemed like SMPS would only get more popular over time.

The more powerful riders already had mounts that they’d gotten attached to, though, so not many of those had made the switch.

“Oh, speaking of,” said Integra. “There’s something an owner of an original Prism Steed like yourself should know.”

“Hm?”

“This is some info discovered by going through what the first Flagman left behind...the conditions for the prism rider grouping’s high-rank job.”

“Oh, now that’s something I’d love to know.” To my knowledge, no one in the world had it yet. The job wasn’t even in the Catalog or in DIN’s information network. It was likely that the Authority thing mentioned in the message on Silver involved getting the high-rank job, so I was definitely curious about this.

“The prism rider grouping’s high-rank job, Prism Cavalier, has three conditions,” Integra said. “First, your Prism Rider skill, Prism Authority, has to be level 1 or above. Second, your total level has to be 400. And third...”

“Third...?”

“The entire world’s combined Prism Authority skill level has to be over 5,000.”

...What? “You mean...?”

“I mean that it’s only unlocked if Prism Beasts and Prism Riders are popular enough. The level requirement is steep too, so this job’s on the rarer side.”

...Well, that explains why nobody has it, I thought.

Even with Prism Rider maxed out, Prism Authority was stuck at level 1.

“So we need at least 5,000 people to have the Prism Rider job, huh...?”

“Well, it’s getting more popular. At the rate it’s going, it should get there eventually.” It’d be hard with just Masters, but with SMPS being delivered to tians both within Altea and to the many orders of knights and such serving the nobility all across Altar, it really didn’t seem impossible that the number would get there soon.

It seemed like a good idea to finish leveling my low-rank jobs to prepare for the occasion. I didn’t have any high-rank job I was planning to take, and since I had Silver, Prism Cavalier seemed like a good choice for me. Silver couldn’t unlock his full potential right now, and not putting such a treasure to good use felt like a waste.

Though, what I’d just heard made me curious about something else.

“The Prism Beasts were made by the first Flagman, right?” I asked.

“Yes.”

“Yet the Prism Rider job existed before that?” The prism rider grouping was based entirely on the premise that Prism Steeds would be in common use. Without that, the job would serve basically no purpose.

Did that mean that jobs from the prism rider grouping only appear once the first Prism Beasts existed or...?

“It’s said that the job was actually there before he made the steeds,” Integra answered.

“Now that’s strange. I mean, a job for something that doesn’t exist...?” Cause and effect seemed to be a little switched up there.

“Yes. Though, it’s not just the prism rider grouping. You can say the same thing about all jobs.”

“Hm?”

“This is something my teacher...or rather, my teacher’s teacher...looked into.” Having said that, she made the wheeled blackboard in the room roll over closer to us. Then, the chalk moved by itself to draw something on the board. Integra herself was still focused on Silver throughout all of this. It honestly made her seem less like a wizard and more like a psychic with telekinesis.

“Tenchi has this strange high-rank job called ‘Sumo Wrestler.’ It’s related to a contest called ‘sumo.’”

Oh, so even that existed as a job here. I guess it was just a contest rather than a whole ritual, huh?

That aside, I couldn’t help but wonder if the chibi sumo wrestler she drew on the board actually enhanced her explanation.

“What’s relevant here is that the culture surrounding the contest has only spread within the last millennium. And that’s despite the fact that Sumo Wrestler had already been discovered during the time of the pre-ancient civilization.”

“...Hm?” A job based on sumo had existed since before sumo was even a thing here? Just like with Prism Rider, cause and effect seemed really off. The chicken had come before the egg.

“From what I’ve heard, the world you Masters go to also has a Sumo Wrestler job,” Integra said.

“Uhh, yeah. Though jobs over there aren’t the same as jobs here. Taking it doesn’t mean you’ll get levels or skills or anything.”

“I did hear that as well. Over there, though, the contest came before the job, didn’t it?”

“Yeah...” On that front, reality and this world were the complete opposite.

“And Sumo Wrestler is far from the only example,” Integra continued. “Even the ‘Mechanic’ job existed before people began using technology.”

So the prism rider grouping wasn’t the only one with this chicken-and-egg problem, huh?

“The job names here often match the ones you have over there,” she said. “That includes magic jobs like my Arch Sage, doesn’t it?”

"Well, ignoring the question of whether or not they actually exist in our world or not...we do have a concept for them, yeah."

"Perhaps that is just a coincidence. Or perhaps those who created this world built the framework of 'jobs' based on jobs that existed in other worlds."

...Now that was something to think about. From a game design perspective, you could probably assume that the devs had referenced real occupations and programmed those into the game. Knowing Infinite Dendrogram, though, it might not have been quite that straightforward.

"So, Prism Rider and Prism Beasts..."

Those things seemed out of place because they didn't exist in real life. Unlike the other jobs we'd discussed, where at least the concept existed in the real world, Prism Rider could only be found here.

Then again, maybe...

"Yes. It may be that there is a world besides the one you Masters go to, where Prism Rider is a job and Prism Beasts are a common sight."

A place besides reality and Infinite Dendrogram... Maybe it was another game? Or maybe...

"But that would mean that the first Flagman just happened to create something that was recognized as a Prism Beast."

A magic machine equipped with AI and designed to be used by humans—it didn't seem impossible to come up with that independently. And the fact that he'd done that was the reason the Prism Rider job had ever seen the light of day.

That made me think of something. "Wait, actually—the existence of the job names 'Prism Rider' and 'Prism Cavalier' were probably the reason why the things he created were called 'Prism Beasts' in the first place," I said.

"That's the obvious assumption."

"It is, isn't it? Otherwise, the only alternative would be that the first Flagman made the Prism Beasts and uncovered the Prism Rider job because he knew of some place where they already existed."

Man, that was a stupid thing to say, I thought. It was unthinkable that people of this world would know about concepts that didn't exist here, so yeah... It had to have been a coincidence.

For some reason, though, Integra was just staring at me. It didn't seem that she was flabbergasted by the stupid thing I'd said. It was more like...

"Integra?"

"...Oh, I'm just impressed by the imagination you Masters have. Back when my teacher first taught me all this, that idea never occurred to me."

"I see. Well, it's not like it's actually possible."

"Ha ha ha! Maybe. Anyway, I just finished checking Silver," she said as she took her hands off of him.

"That was fast! And we were talking the whole time too..."

"I'm not the current Flagman for nothing," she said. "Talking and working at the same time comes naturally. Anyway, there are a few things I can say about him now."

Integra sat down and took a sip of tea to get some moisture into her throat.

"First of all, his design is about the same as that of the other Prism Steeds...with the exception of the unknown mechanism in his torso, which is wired to every other part of his body. I'm guessing that's supposed to make Zephyrus Silver original."

"What do you mean by that?" I asked. My question made Integra heave a long sigh, but it didn't seem like she was sighing at me—more like she was sighing about the concept of "originality" that she'd just brought up.

"Sorry about that... Well, basically—though the first Flagman was a genius, he had one problem."

"That being?"

"The fact that he never made the same thing twice."

"Huh? But what about SMPS and the Prism Soldiers in Quartierlatin...?"

"Sorry, I wasn't entirely clear—I was talking about the things he created personally. It doesn't apply to factory production."

"Oh, I see. But isn't that normal for artists and the like?"

"...He wasn't an artist, but a scientist. It should have been routine for someone like him to make copies of his best creations. If he could make it once, he could mass-produce it... However, he just didn't do it." She heaved another sigh. "Anything he poured his heart and soul into making would always be different from anything he'd ever made before. That was why he never made multiples of his masterpieces and never cared if he produced garbage."

"Masterpieces and garbage...?"

“One of his masterpieces was one of the Prism Persons. Named ‘Agate Designer,’ it was basically an automaton with extremely high DEX. It had creative potential that would make even crafting-focused Superior Jobs flee with their tails between their legs. When it came to processing technology, it surpassed even the first Flagman himself. It actually served as his assistant for many of his creative endeavors that followed.”

“Now that’s something...”

“Oh, it is. Despite that, he never even tried to create multiples of it. It was clear as day that a few more of them would accelerate his work, yet he was satisfied with having just that one. He never even tried to create anything that shared its core concept. The time he spent on END- or AGI-focused creations would’ve been a lot more fruitful if he had just made more Agates. I mean, if we had at least one, then the second and every other Flagman up to me would’ve had a far easier time with our—”

“Whoa, let’s calm down.” This seemed like a touchy subject for her. It felt like she was on the verge of reaching her boiling point. Even Silver looked a bit scared of her. Nemesis, though, just kept eating the tea snacks.

...It just hit me that Nemesis isn’t involving herself in the conversation at all.

“...Sorry about that. As Flagman, I’ve inherited many things, but Agate is easily at the top of the list of things I would’ve liked to have inherited but didn’t.”

Well, a Prism Person like that would have certainly been useful for Altar as a whole.

“Anyway, back to the matter at hand... Since he focused so much on creating things without overlapping concepts, he made even things that were obviously garbage.”

“Like?”

“Obsidian Earth-Edge the Prism Steed.”

...That’s the one owned by Figaro, I thought.

“The core concept of Prism Steeds was to expand the battlefield of combat-focused Superior Jobs, but Obsidian couldn’t fly or swim, so it couldn’t even do that. And since it was limited to fighting on land, AGI-focused Superior Jobs were better off just running instead of riding it. What use could they get out of it?”

...Yeah, Figaro also said that he ran faster than Obsidian, so he only used it for mounted competitions.

"It had more power and heavier armor than the other units, but that didn't even matter in battles between Superior Jobs where both sides just launched ultimate job skills at each other. It's a hunk of garbage that came about as a result of ignoring the core concept of the Prism Steed series. In all honesty, it's hopelessly useless."

Man, that's so harsh...

"Though, I guess it could work as the mount of an END-focused Superior Job, but that comes with a high risk of it being destroyed, just like Gold was."

"That's a scary thought," I said. "So, what's original about Silver?" The answer to this could be related to his third skill.

"It's..."

"It's...?" I gulped and waited for her answer...

"...Something I couldn't figure out."

...only to fall right out of my chair when it finally came, like something straight out of an old manga.

"I-I see... So you couldn't figure it out."

"Well, to be more precise, I couldn't figure out everything. There are things I did find out, though, such as the fact that his mechanisms aren't based on aeromancy...wind magic, I mean."

Those words surprised me in an entirely different way.

"They aren't? But I use his Wind Hoof all the time, and even his name references the wind."

"It's looking like the reference may have just been something the first Flagman thought of at the moment of Silver's creation. Silver's true nature as a Prism Steed lies somewhere else."

"His nature..." This made me reflect upon the battle in Quartierlatin's skies. The very moment we were about to crash into the whale and die, we suddenly appeared right under it instead, still riding Silver.

That may have been a glimpse into his third skill and true nature.

"Also, it wouldn't make sense if it was wind-based," Integra added.

"Why?"

"In the recent peace talks, Her Majesty used Silver to fight Jade Storm—the aeromancy Prism Steed—and apparently, he was far slower in general and only slightly surpassed Jade in the turning department."

“Oh yeah. Azurite told me that too.”

“If they’re actually of the same type, then Zephyrus Silver, which was made later, shouldn’t have been weaker than Jade. More importantly, with how much the first hated making the same thing over again, I really can’t imagine him using the same element for two Prism Steeds.”

Oh yeah, that makes sense.

“Also, Wind Hoof ‘compresses the air to create platforms and barriers,’ right? From a physics perspective, the process of compression should also condense the heat, creating a plasma. Since that doesn’t happen, that means it’s probably not just simple gas manipulation.”

“I see...” She had a point. This made me realize that Silver was full of mysteries even beyond his unknown third skill.

“So there you have it. Currently, the application of its original concept just happens to look like aeromancy. And a good candidate for its original concept is part...”

Integra stopped talking in the middle of her sentence.

“Integra?”

“...No. I won’t give you my uncertain, off-the-cuff guesses. As the current Flagman, I don’t want you—the owner of the first Flagman’s last Prism Steed—to have a false impression of him.”

“I see.” I considered pressing her to continue, but ultimately didn’t. She seemed to have pride in the name she’d inherited, so it didn’t seem like a good idea to argue against that if she brought it up.

“Anyway, that’s it for the matters I called you here for,” she said. “Sorry for taking your time.”

“Hey, this was fruitful for me too,” I replied. “I can now work towards becoming a Prism Cavalier.”

“Oh, please do. Zephyrus Silver and SMPS were left behind by the first, and I’m sure that’s exactly what he would have wanted.”

I went on to put Silver back in my inventory when...

“Hm? Is the chat over?”

...Nemesis finally stopped eating and looked at me.

“Nemesis...”

“Th-The snacks are simply delicious. I would put them on the same level as Brother Bear’s popcorn, if not higher.”

“For real?!” There’s something even better than THE popcorn?! “Let me have a tast— Hey, Nemesis...”

Apparently she hadn’t stopped eating because our conversation was over, but because there was simply nothing left to eat. She’d been notably less gluttonous recently, but then she went and did something like this. It felt like she’d go on an eating spree every time I was busy talking to someone.

“...I made a setup that automatically replaced the empty plate, yet you still ate everything?” Integra’s face was in a mix of surprise and exasperation.

“...Sorry about this,” I said.

“Oh, don’t worry. It’s a small price to pay for having you come all the way here. Though, I intended to give you some for the way back, but now it’s all gone.”

Nemesis...

“Mhm. It was most delicious,” she said. “Who made them?”

“The snacks were made by an acquaintance in Caldina, so it’ll be a while until I get more.”

“Hrm, that is a shame.”

“Ha ha ha. I’ll make sure you get some when they arrive again,” Integra said before turning to me. “Enough for you to have some too.”

“I’ll be looking forward to that,” I said.

With that, our conversation was over.

I was kinda curious about the piercing gaze she’d given me when we first met, but looking back on it now, it was probably just the gaze of someone wary of a guy who’d gotten close to her childhood friends. The “main topic” of whether I was in some kind of spicy relationship with either of them must’ve also been related to that. She’d just been looking out for her friends in her own way, and in my opinion that was a pretty good thing to do.

“Oh, one more thing, Ray Starling.”

“Hm?” As I was about to leave, Integra called out to me again.

“I have one last question.”

“Ask away.”

“Why do you give so much for Altar?”

I felt like this wasn’t the first time I’d been asked that.

My answer was the same as back then, though.

"Azurite, Liliana... I just like the people I met here and the kingdom in general. It'd leave a bad taste in my mouth if it were destroyed."

"I see... Mhm. So that's how it is. I see... I see. That's the kind of person you are..."

"Hm?"

"Oh, don't mind me. That was definitely my last question. Thanks for coming today."

"Don't mention it. And thank you for taking a look at Silver."

"Thank you for the delicious snacks," Nemesis added.

With those words, we left Integra's room.

All right, time to head back to Gideon, I thought. If I leave now, I should be there before sundown.

Arch Sage, Integra Sedna Clarisse Flagman

Once Ray and his Embryo left, the door closed and I went to check if the counterintelligence devices had reactivated before examining the action on the magic I'd set up in this room.

That magic, by the way, was basically a lie detection spell. Its power surpassed Truth Discernment, because it considered things like body temperature, heart rate, and even brain waves. It could even detect when someone was lying by omission or if they were speaking with an ulterior motive.

It was seamlessly mixed with the magic imbued into the furniture, so it was impossible to even notice it.

This was functionally an interrogation room, and my main goal for today was to examine Ray Starling.

He'd appeared seemingly out of nowhere and formed connections with Altar's central figures like Altimia, Liliana, and Count Gideon in no time at all. Masters were many in number, but those that had an impact on the kingdom as great as he were few and far between.

He wasn't even a pre-Infinite—a Superior—yet he'd defeated Superiors such as Mr. Franklin and Logan Goddhart.

To add to that, he also owned Zephyrus Silver—the only one of the first Flagman’s creations that his successors knew nothing about.

Everything we’d learned about him had been extremely unusual, so I’d established this meeting to find out what kind of person he really was and what drove him. We’d even considered the possibility that he had direct ties to the Incarnations and was working as their pawn.

However, he had shattered all those expectations.

“...And the only thing that triggered the magic was ‘I didn’t see them naked.’ Now, isn’t that just hilarious?”

That meant that he was wearing his heart on his sleeve, saying only more or less exactly what he’d been thinking.

The words “I’ll do my best for this kingdom because I like it,” were hard to believe, yet he wasn’t lying in the slightest. He wasn’t motivated to obtain some grand goal or reward, but by a simple desire not to lose what he already had.

One could say he was a very convenient person for the kingdom. Though, with how many inconvenient people this place had—us included—I felt like it was only fair for it to have someone like him around.

Anyway, he wasn’t hiding anything, nor did he hold any suspicions about me.

“He wasn’t the least bit wary of the tea I made, nor did he hesitate to give me info about Zephyrus Silver—one of the aces up his sleeve.” Though I did understand why he trusted me as much as he did.

I was Altimia and Liliana’s childhood friend, and he trusted the two so deeply that he’d completely dropped his guard around me simply based on that. There was nothing impure about that trust either. I’d confirmed that he wasn’t trying to show off to them, nor did he have any grand political ambitions. In fact, back when he’d met Altimia, he hadn’t even realized that she was a princess.

This meant that there was no selfishness in any of the help he’d given them... It had all come naturally to him.

“...That’s such a difficult way to live.” The bodies of Masters restored themselves, and they may have been able to turn off physical pain, but they had nothing to protect them from a broken heart. If he truly cared for Altar’s people and wanted to protect the kingdom, he would surely receive such wounds eventually.

Or maybe he already had?

Maybe that had changed him? Or maybe he'd remained unchanged in spite of all that?

Or maybe he would never change at all?

Maybe he would stand against my actions, the doings of The Evil, the plans of the Incarnations, and all other threats simply because not doing so would, in his words, "leave a bad taste in his mouth."

Maybe he would always continue fighting to prevent any tragedies he saw...no matter how much he hurt himself in the process.

"Hm..." The path he walked was different than ours, but it may have been just as thorny.

His unique outlook had convinced me of something else too.

"Masters aren't a monolith after all. They all have free will."

Ignoring Incarnation disguises such as The Lynx, it was best to assume that Masters all had minds of their own.

I didn't know how Embryos worked, but Masters themselves seemed like people who were in some kind of parasitic relationship with these "lesser Incarnations." With that in mind, it was possible that everything they saw and heard could reach the Incarnations themselves.

That wasn't a problem, however. Nothing I'd told him was a lie.

I hadn't implied that I'd inherited information which was detrimental to the Incarnations, all while revealing just enough to explain my situation.

If the Incarnations came for me at this stage, I'd certainly die.

But as long as Crystal was all right, she would be able to straighten the course of those who would come after me.

...Though personally, I intended to settle things within my own generation.

"Looking back at the battle between Chrono Crown and Kashimiya, it's obvious that the Masters have complete dominance over their Embryos. That means that they're functionally outside the control of the Incarnations... In that case, it may help if we had Masters with power close to that of the Incarnations on our side. Even if we cut them off in the end, they would be useful in battle."

The first person to come to mind was the individual I'd just been talking to, but I shook my head right after.

"Ray Starling...is no good for this." He was a trustworthy person, but that was exactly why it was clear he'd never take my side.

What I needed was someone who wanted to kill the Incarnations even if it meant destroying the world.

Masters with any less of a driving ambition and less power simply wouldn't be enough.

Under the pretext of gathering info about Altar to make up for "the time I'd been away," I'd spent a good while investigating various Masters. The papers here in the lab had lists of Masters registered with the kingdom, and it was possible that I would find the one I was looking for among them.

"...I already have someone in mind," I said to myself as I reached into a bundle and took out a paper with a tag on it.

On this paper, there was a photo of a man from a time when his face was still full of fighting spirit, alongside his powers and achievements.

In bygone days, he was a famed duel ranker and the owner of a major clan.

But now, he was a man who'd lost everything.

This was the kind of person who could share my ambitions.

The kind of people I needed weren't the kind needed by Altimia and the kingdom.

I didn't need someone like Ray Starling, whose driving force was an urge to not lose anything.

I needed someone whose driving force was the fact that they'd already lost everything.

"...The 'broken sword,' eh?"

Interlude

Gaol

Somewhere in this world—at the infamous gaol, to be more specific—something unusual was occurring.

The nameless town that the prisoners inhabited was currently devoid of any signs of life.

All the gaol's residents save for a select few had died and vanished from this world.

The townscape, styled straight out of a western movie, was completely barren. The only things of note here now were the automated item-dispensing vending machines, leaking light and sound onto the ghost town's streets. Even those had something strange about them, though, with some of the machines displaying confirmation or selection screens as if people had vanished while using them.

The town's death had been just that sudden and indiscriminate.

"...This is just creepy," said Gerbera—one of the few Superior prisoners—as she looked out the window of her clan leader's café, Dice.

Her bored, listless tone and her casual pose, with her chin resting on her hand and her elbow on the counter, hid it well, but there was no exaggeration in her words—she was actually creeped out.

That comment was directed at the person sitting next to her, taking sips from a caramel macchiato.

“Hee hee! A GODlike day for a GOD like me! How wonderful it is to drink such a perfect caramel macchiato here in the gaol! Good job, Sechsy!” spoke the cross-dressing boy—King of Plagues, Candy Carnage. His manner of speaking was about as inelegant as a person could sound.

“I am glad you like it,” replied Sechs—the owner of this establishment.

Next to Candy, there was a hammer-like measuring flask about as big as himself.

Even though the object resembled a measuring flask, it was hard to tell if that was actually what it was. The transparent spherical section was split into multiple layers, each of which looked like slowly turning petri dishes growing some kind of culture. In several places on the sphere’s surface, there were holes apparently spraying something invisible to the naked eye into the air around them.

Gerbera knew that this object had caused the deaths of everyone in the gaol except for them.

The strange measuring flask was King of Plagues’ Superior Embryo. A rare triple hybrid as well as a “twin” simultaneously belonging to two categories that branched out from the Arms type, it was a Type Legion/Weapon/Calculator, and its name was “Pestilent Divinity, Resheph.”

True to its name, which it shared with a deity of plagues that had left a mark on both Egyptian and Abrahamic texts, this Embryo was a potent exterminator even by the high standards of Superiors.

Gerbera knew several of its capabilities.

Its core traits were “malignancy mutation” and “contagion magnification.”

Once Resheph was supplied with cells or materials from living organisms, it could automatically research, develop, grow, and release bacteria that exerted certain effects against them.

The most terrifying thing about this Embryo, however, was the fact that the bacteria it released could not be controlled in any way. The most Candy could do was set a limit on their multiplication and lifespan, or take samples from certain creatures and analyze them to exclude them as targets of the contagion. That was exactly what Candy had done with himself, Sechs, Gerbera, and Alhazred in this situation.

But that was the extent of the control he had, and it was uncertain how far the contagion could spread without such limitations. It was possible that without the involvement of the control AI, the bacteria he'd left outside of the gaol would still be spreading even now.

...That means that this café is crawling with germs, doesn't it? Gerbera thought. That's just dirty and depressing... I can't even drink my coffee like this. Stirring the coffee in her favorite dolphin-themed cup, she heaved a sigh.

Released without any limitations, the modded bacteria demonstrated extraordinary effectiveness.

Resheph was currently releasing three types of pathogens.

First was "Soiled Future," which simultaneously inflicted heavy disease and binding-based debuffs.

Second was "Collapsed Present"—a carnivorous bacteria which ate the infected organism from the inside.

And the third was "Punctured Past," which improved the activity of the other pathogens already infecting the body.

The resulting triple biohazard had exterminated the prisoners without even giving them a chance to resist. Enhanced by the "Past," the "Future" was too strong for all but those with considerable debuff countermeasures, while the "Present," since it was nothing but a bacteria that consumed flesh, would continue ravaging the body even if the infected drank an Elixir.

As the Superior Job of the pestimancer grouping, King of Plagues also had the Underground Prosperity skill, which further increased the vitality and infectious capacity of the pathogens. It was possible that the bacteria would continue to spread until they buried the entire gaol.

Candy had no means of controlling them once they were released, so not even he could stop them now.

Even if he were capable of it, though, doing so would require him to want to stop the contagion in the first place. The fact that he would never consider doing that, combined with the very fact that his mind birthed an Embryo like Resheph, placed him among the most unhinged Masters even by Superior standards.

It was what had gotten him the nickname of "Legionkiller," as well what had led to every building in the small country he'd extinguished becoming a ruined gravestone to the people who had once lived there.

Wait... Gerbera thought. We gave him our hair for his Embryo to analyze. That was so he could exclude us as targets for his bacteria, but...that means he can also create bacteria that only targets us. He's got us by the throat.

It suddenly occurred to Gerbera that Candy held her life in the palm of his hand, but then...

...Oh, wait. If he wants me dead, I'll die either way.

...she realized that regardless of whether he made his contagion targeted or indiscriminate, she couldn't escape it...

Huh. So there's no point in caring about it... Ugh...

Following that thought, she let her head drop on the counter, fully aware that she'd been making that gesture far too often recently.

Wait, but what about our leader...? Oh...yeah. Gerbera considered Sechs, who'd given Candy his hair just like she did, but then realized something else.

He can just change his cells around if he feels like it. Actually, I don't even know if bacteria can do anything to slimes...

Gerbera had been told that Sechs and Hannya had once teamed up to defeat Candy. She could only assume that Sechs's slimy nature had rendered the pathogens ineffective.

But then what about Hannya...? Oh, I think I know...

She considered the other Superior and soon realized that she, too, stood a chance against Candy.

One of the core traits of Hannya's Sandalphon was the randomization of the local space. Since Candy was the epicenter of the contagion, anyone facing him would likely die before they got close.

However, Sandalphon potentially allowed Hannya an almost instantaneous approach, as well as the safety of being a kilometel up in the air.

I guess she wins against him in the game of compatibility... I know I can't do that...

The bacteria targeted any organisms regardless of whether or not Candy acknowledged them, making it impossible for Gerbera's Alhazred to defend against him.

...I guess I could do something when I'm right next to him...like I am now. However, the only reason they were this close in the first place was that they were allies.

Facing Candy Carnage properly meant crossing a country-sized biohazard exclusion zone. Many tians and Masters alike had tried to do so and failed in the attempt. Even The Hero's sword couldn't sever the thread of KoP's life.

It was thanks to this that Candy Carnage had become the greatest tian genocider, and how his King of Plagues job had reached the high level of 1,680.

Well, Alhazred's out for a walk and we're allies now. I can't kill him, and I wouldn't even want to try, Gerbera thought. Imagine the grudge he'd hold if I managed it, though... she sighed.

Candy had actually killed Gerbera once, but she now had enough perspective to know that it had been her own fault for walking into a battle where he had the advantage.

...Seriously, though—how did the Superior Killer do it? It was difficult for her to imagine how an Embryo that did nothing but fire living bullets could take out King of Plagues.

As all these thoughts about Candy were running through Gerbera's mind...

"Okie then! I'm gonna log out for now! My skin needs some beauty sleep."

...Candy said, standing up.

"Very well," said Sechs. "Thank you for your work today."

"The bacteria will spread on its own, so don't you worry a bit. Starting now, the gaol's gonna be a GODlike heaven where logging in = death!"

...Sounds more like hell to me, Gerbera honestly thought.

"See you two lateeer!" Candy said with a wink before finally logging out.

"...He's finally gone," Gerbera let out in a tired voice.

This certainly wouldn't be the last time she would see Candy, though. After all, albeit temporarily, Candy was a member of Illegal Frontier.

"This is so depressing..." A clan with that thing in it is not the place to be, she added in thought before laying her head on the counter again.

Then again, Candy's not the only one with a few screws loose. Just look at our leader. The man who'd welcomed her into the clan and talked to her more than anyone else here was plenty unhinged, as well.

...Does that mean that Rascal, Zeta, and Emily are all comparatively normal? Seriously...? Isn't it kinda bad if the least crazy people in your group are a mummy and a murder child...? Now that I think about it, even Rascal is a perv who owns a robot maid, but I wonder how normal he is otherwise...? She'd upset some people if she said those words out loud, but no one could hear or confront her about them as long as they stayed in her head.

I guess I must be the most normal one after all... Again, no response.

"Wait, leader...why'd we kill everyone in town anyway?" she asked.

"Oh, did I not tell you?"

"All you told me was to 'prepare for the move.'"

"And that is the entire reason. We are preparing to move."

"Hm?" Gerbera tilted her head. If Infinite Dendrogram had emotes, a question mark would have been hovering above her head.

"In a few days, we are breaking out of the gaol."

"...I've been wondering about this for a while, but is that really something you should be saying out loud?" Gerbera was worried that the gaol's warden—the control AI known as Red King—would hear about their plans.

Naturally, she had completely forgotten that she had said the same thing back when she'd first arrived here.

With a smile plastered across his face, Sechs said, "Actually, the control AIs know everything avatars see and hear."

"HUH?! Are you serious?! But I bathed here!" Gerbera exclaimed, covering her (nonexistent) chest.

This café had a sizable bath that she'd occasionally used alongside April. Prism People were fully water-resistant, remaining undamaged even if completely submerged. When bathing with April, though, Gerbera had never once even considered the possibility that it would damage her. If Flagman hadn't made her water-resistant, Gerbera's carelessness might've caused April to be lost forever.

"No need to worry," said Sechs. "I am sure the control AI feels no lust for humans."

"But won't the devs in the studio be able to look over the data the AIs collect?"

"...Devs? Studio?" Sechs said and thoughtfully put his hand on his chin as though he'd just heard a very strange statement, only to remember something and nod before adding, "Ohh. There is no need to worry about that. I am sure of it."

"...Really?"

"Yes. Also, we can talk about breaking out all we like. I already had a talk about it."

"You did? With who?"

"Red King."

Hearing the name of the gaol's ruler absolutely shocked Gerbera.

"Huh?! You mean, he OK'd our escape?!" She couldn't begin to understand why Red King—the warden of this place—would even suggest something like that.

"I suppose you could say that."

"Hm?"

"These were his words..." Sechs said, turning his black eyes elsewhere. "'Do it if you think you can.' Well...let's do just that, shall we?"

With that, Gerbera understood that breaking out of the gaol wasn't exactly forbidden—there was merely something that prevented it, and whatever it was, the warden had limitless confidence in its ability to keep them inside.

Despite that, Sechs seemed to have just as much confidence that he could escape.

"Ahhh... I have no idea how we're gonna do it, but you seem really sure that we will," said Gerbera.

"I am. I would prefer to give you the details by email, though."

"Hmm... All right. I'll set up a throwaway and give it to you."

"Please do. Oh, and let me answer your question about why I asked Candy to spread the bacteria," he said as he looked out the window to the now-empty streets of the town. "It is so that no one would interrupt us when the time comes for our escape."

"Interrupt us?"

"Some would simply get in our way, while others might see it as their own opportunity to escape. There is also a chance that these people would have Embryos that may be a major threat to any of us three."

That was indeed a possibility.

With how varied Embryos could be, it was fairly likely that someone here in the gaol would have one that could counter even Superiors like them. Even if that wasn't the case, it was possible that new Superiors or pre-Superiors would be sent to the gaol right before their prison break.

“I requested that Candy spread the bacteria to remove such uncertain variables. Since dying makes you unable to log in for three days, that will be how long we have to make our escape. Though, we still have to go around town and kill off the people who did not die from the bacteria.”

That was the explanation Gerbera needed.

It was certainly best if there was no one who could get in their way. Candy’s ability to continuously exterminate vast amounts of people was highly effective for this task, and it might’ve been one of the reasons why Sechs took him into the clan.

Anyway, it looks like I did the right thing, Gerbera thought.

“With that in mind, the two of us should go and finish off any survivors.”

“Uhh... Don’t bother,” Gerbera said, casually waving her palm.

“Hm?”

“Uhh... I only just now found out why we’re doing this, but I knew you were planning to kill everyone the moment Candy started spreading his bacteria, so...” Gerbera said as she pointed at the empty space—no, at the invisible assassin who had just returned. “I made Alhazred kill everyone who survived. All of them.”

It seemed as though she thought nothing of this deed one way or the other. However, on the inside, she happily puffed her (nonexistent) chest, extremely pleased with the levels she’d gained from this.

“It was fine that I did that, right?”

“Of course. Thank you very much. You saved me the trouble, after all.”

“Hey, I just gave the order to Alhazred. It’s no big deal...”

Countless people had died of a disease while an invisible assassin had picked off all the survivors. At this moment, the gaol was less like a prison and more like a hell.

Or, true to Gerbera’s nickname, it might be described as a nightmare.

“Oh. There is actually one person I didn’t kill,” added Gerbera. “Though, honestly, that one’s impossible...”

“Ah. I know exactly who you mean. You can ignore him—I doubt he will be leaving his domain soon.”

Someone who hadn’t succumbed to Candy’s bacteria and someone Gerbera couldn’t kill—this was none other than the last Superior of the gaol, staying firm within his domain away from town.

He'd rejected Sechs's invitation, ignored Candy's bacteria, caused Gerbera to steer away from him, and stood still right where he was.

"He will eventually escape by his own means," said Sechs. "We will go on ahead without him."

"...Fine by me," said Gerbera. "But are you sure escape is even possible?"

"No need to worry. It was an uncertain prospect when it was just me and Candy, but with you here, I guarantee that we will be able to escape."

"...Hmm." Will I really be much help with that? Gerbera tilted her head and wondered. Though, if he's right, that means my short—well, actually I guess it was kinda long—stay at the gaol is about to end, huh? There's no place here that sells sweets besides Dice, so I'm kinda looking forward to getting out.

Albeit still unsure how it would be accomplished, Gerbera started to grow excited for the time when she'd finally leave this place. Soon, it was time for her to log out.

◆

Several hours later, she received the details of the prison break at the throwaway email she'd provided to Sechs. This elicited only yet another confused head tilt. Huh? That's all it takes?

Chapter Three: The First Clan Meeting

Paladin, Ray Starling

By the time I arrived in Gideon, it was already dark out.

“...That took longer than expected,” I said.

“Well, you certainly could not have anticipated that encounter,” shrugged Nemesis. We’d jumped on Silver and headed towards Gideon as soon as we left Altea.

The best thing about flight as a means of travel was that it freed you from the need to follow the roads and let you take the direct path towards your destination. It was made even more convenient by the fact that many of this world’s most popular means of flight, such as flying mounts or aeromancy, didn’t require much space for taking off and landing.

Because of this, I’d always wondered why there was nothing like an aerial transport network here.

Today, however, I learned—or more like, had been taught—the reason for that.

“...Yeah, I sure didn’t expect to run into a stray dragon.”

“It was our first aerial battle in a while. We are lucky to have come out of it as well as we did.”

Indeed—while flying towards Gideon, we’d somehow crossed paths with a skydragon. Although I was able to win against it solo, I really couldn’t say that it had been easy.

“Well, the thing was just firing breath attacks at us from outside my range...”

“That was also why Hellish Miasma could not reach it either.” I hadn’t even been able to use my usual tactic of weakening my opponent before coming in close for a counterattack. I’d solo’d a Pure-Dragon-tier worm shortly after Franklin’s Game, but this one was way more trouble.

That battle was enough for me to realize that a world with things like that flying around was no place for an aerial transport network. They might not have been much trouble for skilled vanguards, but common folk would be in serious danger of dying on every flight.

“...Oh, I remember.”

“Remember what?”

“The talk at the café I had with Hugo shortly before Franklin’s Game.”

“...Ohh. That.”

◇

The day after our encounter with the Gouz-Maise Gang, but before we had ended up fighting on different sides, Hugo and I met up and had a little chat. Some of the conversation was about Magingears and other technology in Dryfe.

“So, the only three types of Magingears are humanoid robots, powered suits, and tanks?”

“Yes. And before the leader of our clan made Marshal II, it was actually just two.”

“Hm...”

“What is it?”

“Well, I understand that ships are Granvaloa’s thing...but what about planes?”

In response, Hugo put on a troubled expression and said, “...We do not have those. If you’re wondering why, well...I suppose you could say that songbirds cannot fly in a sky ruled by birds of prey.”

“Ohh, so aeronautics here is so rudimentary that flying monsters are a major threat.”

“Exactly. Flight speed, maneuverability, offensive potential... Current airplanes fall short on every factor needed to survive the skies. When there are creatures out there that fly around at supersonic speeds, ordinary planes are simply not enough.”

“...Yeah, I can easily imagine one of those planes losing a wing and crashing the moment a monster appears.”

At the very least, it was doubtful that any machine like that would stand a chance against Pure-Dragons. A single hit would reduce the plane’s flight ability, and then it’d be easy prey.

“I guess that’s why it’s better to just ride a Pure-Dragon-tier skydragon,” I said.

“Tamed Pure-Dragons are not exactly common, though. Anyway, that is why there are no planes. Well...I suppose there are plane-like Embryos, but not many of them are focused on transportation.”

“I see. And here I thought planes were always a good way to get to distant countries.”

“Currently, your only options here are Granvaloa’s sea routes and the roads of the desert.”

“The desert, eh...? That doesn’t sound like an easy trip.”

“Truly... Regardless, I do hope to visit a distant land someday.”

“Same.”

◇

That conversation now felt like it had happened so long ago.

“I wonder what he’s up to now,” I said.

“Would he not still be in Dryfe?” asked Nemesis.

“If he is, we may run into him if a war breaks out again.” Though, I kinda got the impression he wasn’t there anymore. “Anyway, on to the meeting place.”

“Mhm. Thanks to that encounter, we are in danger of being late.”

Our clan had agreed to meet up today in order to talk about tomorrow’s base-hunting and the following day’s Tournament over some dinner. We had ten minutes left until the appointed time, which was just about enough to make it if we hurried.

After more or less that exact amount of time, we arrived at the location. Since Rook was already here in Gideon, I’d asked him to secure the place, and going by the sign that said “Reserved by Death Period,” he’d made a smart move and gotten it set aside exclusively for us.

“...That sign sounds so threatening,” said Nemesis.

“That’s our clan name. It is what it is.”

I opened the door, making the bell above it ring out.

Inside, there was a round table surrounded by familiar faces.

“Sorry for the wait, guys.”

“Raaaayyy! You’re almost late!” said Marie, her cheeks all red. Apparently, she’d been drinking. “All righty,” she continued. “Let’s get some of this wine for you too—OW!”

“Control yourself,” said B3, having hit Marie on the back of the head. “Most of this clan are below drinking age. Him and myself included.”

Now that she mentioned, yeah...the only ones in the clan who could drink were Shu, Lei-Lei, and Marie.

Not content to just take the hit, Marie retaliated against B3, who retaliated back.

They seemed to have the sense to not use their Embryos here, at least, but it was still a scuffle that looked like it belonged in a wrestling ring.

“Our teacher and B3 are the same as ever,” said Fujinon.

“Yeah, they were just like this last time too!” said Io.

“Sh-Shouldn’t we stop them...?” asked Kasumi.

I was curious what they meant by calling Marie “teacher,” but I wasn’t sure if I wanted to ask. I had a feeling that it had nothing to do with combat and everything to do with the kind of things she had in her sketchbook.

“Ray, Nemesis, we have free chairs here.”

“Over heeeeere!” Rook and Babi said as they pulled us closer to them.

“Thanks. But damn, we really were late, huh? Everyone’s already he—Huh?”

I looked over my fellow clan members, all seated around the large round table.

However...

“Where’s Shu?”

...I didn’t see his bulky costume anywhere. Lei-Lei wasn’t here either, but she was really busy in real life, so that was expected.

“He was here at first, but then it looked like someone contacted him and he went to see them,” said Rook.

“See who...?”

“We don’t know. ‘It’s a beary big secret. You’ll be surprised’ was all he said.”

...A surprise?

“He also said we can start eating without him.”

“Whoa whoa whoa, let’s be reasonable here. If we start eating, my partner here won’t leave anything.”

Just like she didn’t leave a single one of Integra’s snacks... Integra’s snacks!

“Do not worry,” said Nemesis. “A dinner like this is rare. I will eat at a slower pace."

Well, that's...not at all reassuring. Eating at a slower pace doesn't mean you'll eat less.

"I may have not forgotten the welcome party on the day I hatched or the fact that Brother Bear ate all of my à la carte while we were logged out...but I have no intention of getting back at him."

"...The very fact that you even remember something like that at all makes it seem like you're holding a hell of a grudge." Food's important and all, I get it, but let it go and leave some for the rest of us.

And so, we went on to dine and talk.

We started by talking about what we wanted in a clan base, and we decided on the following things: private rooms (everyone), large bathing area (the ladies), large room for meetings and stuff (me, B3, and Rook), space for free-range keeping of large monsters (Rook and Kasumi), cafeteria (Nemesis), and a pool (Marie and Babi).

That was a large number of conditions to fulfill, but none of them was outlandish or anything. Wealthy merchants who'd moved due to the recent events might've left behind a mansion or other kinds of estates that ticked every box, and we should've been able to secure it if we had the budget...which I assumed we did.

It looked like we'd have to spend some time looking around Gideon, though.

I'd had a look around Altea, but since it was the capital, it didn't have much quality real estate still available for purchase. It seemed like a certain religious group and fan club were buying up any available land. Setting up in Altea would mean setting up close to those two, and that smelled like trouble best left avoided.

Even Azurite agreed with me on that, which only made the situation there seem more terrifying.

After nearly an hour passed since we began, the bell on the door rang and I heard a familiar voice.

"Yo. Sorry fur the wait."

"Shu, you're finally...huh?"

As he entered the establishment, clad in his usual bear costume, we were overcome by surprise.

The door wasn't the widest, but his large costume smoothly changed shape to let him fit inside.

What caught us by surprise, however, wasn't the way he entered, but the people who followed him inside.

"Hey. Mind if we join?"

"Heh heh. It's been a while." Shu was accompanied by Figaro and Hannya.

"Figaro! You recovered?!" Following the Hannya incident, Figaro's chronic condition had become worse, leading to his hospitalization. He apparently hadn't logged in once since, but seeing that he was here now...

"Yes. I would say that I'm better now, but that would be a bit of a lie. I do feel good, though."

"Hm?" It wasn't like Figaro to give such vague answers and have such a hard-to-read expression.

Hannya, standing next to him, seemed somewhat perplexed too.

Wait, it's not just that. She also looks...bashful?

"...I actually kept having new spasms every time I saw her face in real life," Figaro explained. "It kept extending my stay at the hospital."

...What?

"I hope you can forgive a man who can't even touch his beloved yet," he said as he faced Hannya.

"I can," she replied. "Especially since I know that this is proof of your love... Also, here we can gaze at each other to our hearts' content..."

"Fuyuko..."

"Vincent..."

...Did they just go and get lost in their own world? I thought. I'm not sure if it's a good idea to call each other by your real names here... Then again, I guess this place is reserved, so it's just us here.

"...You look away for one moment and they become a pair of lovebirds," commented Nemesis.

"...So this is what Figaro has become," said B3 with a complicated expression.

"...Shu," I said, turning to my brother.

"I was beary surprised too," he said. "They met IRL and...progressed? Apparently? Anyway, this is how they are now."

"I'm not sure what to say... I guess...congratulations?" I said as I started to applaud lightly. Most of the other members weren't sure how to process this either, but they joined me in clapping.

"Thank you!" said Hannya, all smiles.

"Thank you," added Figaro with a nod. "Now, as for the reason why we came here..."

His expression became more serious—he was clearly preparing to say something important.

"Hannya and I would like to join your clan... To be part of Death Period."

"Oh!" I was told that they might've been interested in joining once Figaro recovered, and it seemed that the time had finally come.

"Can we?" Figaro said as he held out his hand.

"Why, of course!" I replied, giving it a good shake.

And just like that, it was officially decided that Figaro and Hannya would join Death Period.

With these two additions to the clan, we now had eleven members, making us into a double-digit family. This was all the more reason to work hard and find the best clan base I could.

Also, it was decided that the people who would be covering most of the base-buying budget would be me, B3, and Marie. Figaro and Hannya still had debts to pay after the incident, while Shu was using his wealth to produce ammo for Baldr in case of another large-scale battle. For now, the costs would be covered by those of us with money to spare, and the rest would have to give their contributions later.

Speaking of the base, Figaro and Hannya had no requests regarding it whatsoever, since apparently their primary home would be Figaro's place here in Gideon.

As for Shu's request, I rejected it right away. If we'd focused on finding somewhere that had a popcorn factory, we'd never have a base.

With every member besides Lei-Lei present, it was time to shift subject to the matter of The Tournaments.

The Tournaments were an event held in preparation for the coming clash between Altar and Dryfe. Its main purpose was to tie as many Masters as possible to the kingdom, and it would be done through arena duels where the prize was the chance to challenge UBMs.

The rules for it—the content of the Contract the participants had to sign—had four points.

“1. The participant must be an Altarian Master.”

“2. The participant will be unable to switch countries for three years after The Tournaments.”

“3. If the participant commits a crime within Altar’s borders that would otherwise be worthy of one or more years of penal servitude, they will be rendered unable to use any save points.”

In a way, these three were about what you’d expect. They were meant to strengthen Altar, slow down any weakening, prevent crime, and entice foreign or free Masters to join the kingdom.

The most important point out of the three, however, was the one discussing criminal acts. It didn’t apply to minor offenses, but anyone who did something really bad would be punished. This was apparently meant to deter potential turncoats like the kind we’d seen at Franklin’s Game.

The fourth and final point had a hard focus on the coming War.

“4. The participant will receive the right to challenge a UBM depending on where they place in The Tournaments. Additionally, those who also sign the Contract declaring intent to participate in any War involving Altar upon the kingdom’s side within the next three years will receive an extra prize in the form of the right to select a rare piece of equipment. The order of selection will also depend on placement in The Tournaments.”

If you also agreed to assist Altar in any War you could join within the next three years, you received an extra prize in addition to the right to challenge the UBM.

The “you could join” part was there to account for the fact that the three factors of location, timing, and quest status may have made that impossible. It wasn’t certain that the Master who signed the Contract would even be online for the War, so the Contract was lenient enough to account for that.

“The winners of The Tournaments may simply win against the UBMs, but there is the possibility that they would lose instead, no?” asked Nemesis.

“Oh yeah, there is.” The winners of The Tournaments were simply given the first go against their UBMs. If they and their party lost, the second place winners would challenge the monster instead.

Because of this, there was a degree of uncertainty in who, exactly, would become the MVPs. Even if a first place winner lost against their UBM, the damage they’d dealt and their general contribution to the battle during their attempt could still be enough to get them the reward.

That seemed to hinge on how much of a fight those before you were putting up.

“Anyway, the important thing now is deciding which of the ten days we’ll take,” I said. The Tournaments would start the day after tomorrow and run daily for ten days. This was meant to give time to potential participants to make it here, as well as to just prolong the show.

A participant in one day’s Tournament couldn’t participate in another’s, but three real-life days seemed like enough time for most people to get a chance. Also, since the functions of the Orbs were open to the public, those with more time on their hands could prioritize The Tournaments for the most optimal or powerful Orbs.

The Tournaments happened to start on Saturday for me, so I had a good range of Orbs to choose from.

On Saturday I could choose between Tournament days one or two, and on Sunday I had days three, four, and five... I could even go for day six, but that’d be early Monday morning.

“Oh. Count Gideon sent us this,” said Marie as she handed me the details of the prizes—the UBMs.

The dates, rules, and the fact that we’d be fighting to challenge UBMs were revealed a good while ago, but these details were only sent out yesterday in Dendro time.

The details of The Tournaments’ UBMs were, in order...

Day one: Legendary “Stern Face-Tender Heart, Sasage” (Type: Demon). Core traits: AoE healing proportional to damage dealt (Presumed).

Day two: Legendary “Fortcrushing Mawdragon, No Mercy” (Type: Dragon). Core traits: Object hardness-ignoring attack (Presumed).

Day three: Name and tier unknown (Presumed type: Undead). Core traits: Poltergeist, curse-based debuffs.

Day four: Ancient Legendary “Spiritblade Rider, Gradsoul” (Type: Elemental). Core traits: Grudge absorption and body enhancement.

Day five: Epic “The Uncornered Rat, Balooberry” (Type: Beast (Rat)). Core traits: Fatal damage negation followed by time-limited body enhancement (Presumed).

Day six: Name and tier unknown (Presumed type: Dragon (Serpentine)). Core traits: Tornado, lightning, and explosion generation (Uncontrollable in its Orb form).

Day seven: Name and tier unknown (Type: Unknown). Core traits: Short-distance warping (Presumed).

Day eight: Epic “Twin Orphans, Arma-Karma” (Type: Elemental). Core traits: Clone creation (Summoning?).

Day nine: Legendary “Prospector Centipede, Gold Rush” (Type: Insectoid). Core traits: Vein prospecting, underground scanning.

Day ten: Mythical “Night Sky General, O’oimimaru” (Type: Yokai). Core traits: Unknown (Space alteration?).

So those are the details of the ten UBMs... I’m seeing a lot of “(Presumed)” and “?” here, I thought.

“...A Mythical whose power we don’t even know...? Sounds pretty scary, if you ask me,” said Marie, prompting all of us to nod in agreement.

This information had been gained either by reading the descriptions Huang He had provided alongside the Orbs or by simply testing them out. The descriptions given weren’t complete due to much of the information being lost in Huang He’s civil war, while some Orbs had effects that were hard to understand even by using them. That more or less explained why there was so much uncertainty here.

I would’ve liked to meet the person who picked these and tell them off for sending undefined hazardous material to other countries, but it was likely that Huang He had specifically picked Orbs they didn’t mind letting go of or even wanted to get rid of. A lot of the Orbs that did have known details seemed pretty useful, though, which might’ve been their way of making up for that.

“It’d be pretty bad if any UBM escaped,” said Figaro. “Did they account for that?”

I nodded in response and said, “Apparently they won’t use the normal duel barrier of the central arena, but the one Franklin used to seal people inside.”

That barrier could only be broken by the likes of Shu.

The arenas would be unusable until the UBMs were defeated, but with the monsters being weakened by their six hundred year imprisonment, it was unlikely that all the combined participants wouldn’t be enough to.

...Though I was a bit concerned about the Mythical.

“Also, they said that if Figaro and Hannya returned—and they did—they wanted Superiors to go on guard duty and remain on high alert, just in case," explained Marie. "And while The Tournaments' fights will have spectators like any Gideon event, the UBM battles certainly won't due to the dangers involved."

On top of that, the entertainment part of The Tournaments would only begin once the day's top sixteen were decided. The fights before that would be quickly settled using the barrier function that did the opposite of what had been done to Figaro and Xunyu during Franklin's Game—they would accelerate the flow of time within.

Without something like this, there would be too many participants for a day's Tournament to actually end within that day.

"I see," I said. "With different types of Superiors around, it should be possible to deal with most situations."

Speaking of which, Azurite would also get Miss Eldritch to join this guard duty.

Azurite really didn't like relying on her, but her debuffs and healing, not to mention the organizational potential of her Lunar Society, made her a must-have if something went wrong.

"By the way, I'm not pawrticipating in The Tournaments," said Shu. "I'll just do security and that's it."

"Huh?" That was news to me.

"But...why?"

"...I mean, this whole event's meant to improve the power of Altar's Masters, right? If I go fur one of the UBMs, I'll probably just get another costume I won't use."

...That seemed pretty likely. For some reason, every one of his MVP rewards besides the one from Gloria was a costume.

"Also, if I pawrticipate in it..." he said before falling silent.

"Hm? Bro?"

"Nah, don't worry about it. All that matters is that I'm not in."

Hmm, I wonder what he was about to say... I thought.

"Perhaps it was something about the fact that he could accidentally break the barrier?" Nemesis said, telepathically.

Oh yeah. That's a possibility. He could endanger The Tournaments spectators and perhaps even give a chance for the UBM to escape.

"In that case...I won't participate either," said Hannya.

“You too?”

“Yes. As he is now, Sandalphon can’t be used to his full potential in arenas.” Oh yeah, that was the reason why her duel with Figaro happened outside the city.

“I also still have to pay my debt to the country, so I will just focus on security.”

“All right,” I said. “I’ll pass that on to Azurite.”

That meant that if you ignored Lei-Lei, who probably wouldn’t make it, the clan had a total of eight participants.

“So, Ray, what we’re about to discuss is...our distribution, right?” Figaro asked.

“Yes. Exactly.”

I wouldn’t expect any less from the man who knew more about duels and UBMs than anyone else in Altar. He instantly understood the point of this meeting.

I looked over everyone again and repeated what I’d been told by Azurite.

“The UBMs will first be challenged by the day’s winners, then the runner-ups, and so on. While The Tournaments would consist of duels, the UBMs can be challenged with a party, and the party members can be anyone regardless of if they participated in another day’s Tournament or didn’t participate at all.”

“And that is why it is best for the clan members to spread out across the Tournament days and aim to win as many high placements as possible,” Nemesis added.

“Exactly.” Everyone seemed to agree with that.

“Our clan has many people who can take first,” said B3. “Figaro most obviously.”

“That is true,” said Marie. “Me, Figaro, Rookie, and even Ray can do it if the matchups are good. My student trio has potential too, so even if they don’t take first, they might still land some good placements.”

“...I didn’t hear my name in there,” noted B3.

“Huh? You’re too slow and heavy to get from point A to B, let alone place high.”

“You’ve really said it now, ya dinky piece o’ paper scrap!” B3 roared as she instantly donned her armor and began scuffling with Marie again.

Their combat styles were very different, but it seemed that when it came to STR they were about equally matched.

...I'd say they're getting along pretty good, though, considering, I thought.

Anyway, despite what Marie said, I wasn't that confident that I could place high. My fighting style could be strong, but it was far from reliable, and since those videos had exposed me, a lot of people knew the cards I could play. That had become especially obvious in my recent fights against Jubei. And if people were aware that I would be their enemy in The Tournaments, they could easily prepare countermeasures.

I was also so lacking in pure power that even the dragon we'd fought on the way to Gideon was a real challenge. It had only retreated once we'd been backed into a corner and had started charging Payback.

It had probably gone away because it had realized how dangerous that really was, which was about what I'd expect from a dragon. They were clever creatures. If it had been as unintelligent as, say, a worm, there was the possibility that it could have charged me before I'd fired, giving me the death penalty.

...Also, I'd felt like I'd seen something like a Pomeranian on the dragon's back as it retreated. I had to have been seeing things, though. A dragon-riding dog? That just didn't make sense.

...Anyway, back to The Tournaments.

While B3 and Marie were fighting, the rest were considering which UBM to target.

I also looked at the details to find out which day was best for me.

"Man, this is hard..." I couldn't skip class, so I could only participate on days up to the sixth. Out of these, there were three that caught my eye: the unnamed undead, Balooberry, and Sasage.

I didn't want the undead's powers, but I felt like I'd be effective against it when we had to fight it. Reversal and Grudge-Soaked Greaves would likely give me the upper hand.

Balooberry had a very good power—someone like me could never have enough means of negating fatal damage. However, if the UBM both negated fatal damage and enhanced itself afterwards, I would be at a real disadvantage against it.

Then there was Sasage on day one. As someone whose build was based on taking damage, I felt like I could really use the healing. It would enable me to heal even with Purgatorial Flames, and it might even have been possible to land Vengeance and then instantly recover the HP I'd lost for it. If I could heal by attacking, I also wouldn't have to add Priest to my build.

"...I probably shouldn't count my chickens before they hatch. I gotta place high in The Tournaments first."

"You do lose quite often when very little is on the line," said Nemesis. "That recent event was especially full of close calls."

"...Yeah." The results I got were so inconsistent that even I didn't really know how strong I actually was at this point. At the event on the uninhabited island, I'd been saved by Juliet, Alto, or the environment more times than I'd like to admit.

I figured this Tournament might've been a good chance to properly gauge my power in its purest form.

Anyway, while we Tournament participants had long discussions about who would take which day, the two who wouldn't participate—Shu and Hannya—were talking about something else.

"So he was still in the gaol?" Shu asked.

"Yes," Hannya replied. "He was operating a café and seemed to be used to life there."

Apparently, he was asking her something about the gaol.

Looking back on it, Hannya's incident had begun soon after she arrived here, and she hadn't logged back in until today, so they hadn't had a chance to really talk like this yet.

"Strange that you'd use the word 'still.' No one can escape the gaol. Even I couldn't," said Hannya.

"...Speaking of, how did you try to do that?"

"I used the skill Sandalphon got when he became a Superior Embryo...what was it again?"

"'Downfall Screamer,' Lady Hannya! It focuses my spatial control into the tips of the towers and pushes space itself aside to deliver a powerful drilling effect!" Hannya didn't seem to remember her own Embryo's skill name, so Sandalphon answered in her stead.

"Yes, that's it. I used it to open a small hole leading outside the gaol, but it closed before I could pass through it."

"I am certain that the observer of the gaol wields spatial manipulation powers that surpass even mine," said Sandalphon. "I gave my all to drill open the space, yet he restored it like it was nothing. You cannot escape from anyone capable of that!"

Listening to this from the outside made both Hannya and the observer of the gaol seem pretty nuts.

Sandalphon's words, though, seemed to have made Shu frown. I could tell even through his costume.

"...You actually opened a hole?"

"Yes," said Hannya. "I could see a bit of the outside, but it closed the moment I stopped the skill to try and pass through it."

"Hypothetically...do you think he could escape by cutting off a part of his body and sending it through the hole while it's open?"

Cutting off...a part of his body?

"I doubt it. I mean, Red King...the observer of the gaol would take that into account. Even if Sechs tried that, he probably has a means of preventing it."

"...True."

Sechs...King of Crime, Sechs Würfel? I did know the name, and I knew that Shu was deeply involved with him...but why was Shu so wary of someone who was already in the gaol?

"Raayy! Let's finish our plans for The Tournameeents."

"Oh... All right."

Called by Marie, I shifted my focus back to The Tournaments.

I'd ask Shu about this some other time.

The discussions were soon finished, and this was the resulting Tournament participation split.

Day one, "Stern Face-Tender Heart, Sasage"—me.

Day two, "Fortcrushing Mawdragon, No Mercy"—B3.

Day three, name and tier unknown (Presumed type: Undead)—Rook.

Day four, "Spiritblade Rider, Gradsoul"—Io.

Day five, "The Uncornered Rat, Balooberry"—none.

Day six, name and tier unknown (Presumed type: Dragon (Serpentine))—none.

Day seven, name and tier unknown (Type: Unknown)—Marie.

Day eight, "Twin Orphans, Arma-Karma"—Fujinon.

Day nine, "Prospector Centipede, Gold Rush"—Kasumi.

Day ten, “Night Sky General, O’oimimaru”—Figaro.

We were all more or less matched to UBMs based on our combat styles. I didn’t really know why Rook chose the opponent he did, but knowing him, there had to be a good reason.

Also, we’d avoided not only the dragon on day six, but also day five’s Balooberry, even though it was obvious it would become a powerful MVP reward.

The reason none of us wanted to take it was because we had full details on it and because it was “too good.” It was abundantly clear that it would be sought by many powerful Masters, potentially those high up in the rankings, making it more difficult to place high in that Tournament. I honestly wouldn’t be surprised to even see Kashimiya there. No matter how powerful the potential reward, it meant nothing if we couldn’t even challenge the monster for it.

The person with the highest chances among us there was Figaro, but he instead chose the Mythical of day ten—potentially the most dangerous one, but also the one best left to someone like him. It wasn’t like he needed fatal damage prevention anyway. He could do that by simply enhancing the gear he already had.

It took much deliberation, but I myself chose Sasage. Thus we ended up with no one from Death Period participating in The Tournaments for Balooberry.

Marie had actually tried to convince Rook to take it, but all he said in response was “A rat UBM? Never,” all while maintaining a perfect, all-denying smile.

Anyway, just like that, it was decided which day we would participate on.

Mine was the very first, and as the leader of the clan I’d have to do my very best.

Though...why did it feel like I was forgetting something important?

Interlude

Dryfe Imperium, North, Vara Plains

Located in the north of the northern country, the Vara Plains were a wasteland of little value.

Some decades ago, it was a wetland overflowing with life, but the worsening climate of Dryfe had destroyed most of its flora and fauna.

There was little of note here besides the occasional monster.

"Z e E z e e E Z e e E e e z Z e E e e."

And now, in this wasteland, a sound very like hard objects being ground against each other could be heard.

It was a cry of an abominable creature—the self-assertion of a life-form inhabiting this wasteland.

The entity was an insect equipped with long, sharp, and hard mandibles, and its name was "Borer Deathbug, Shellstro." It was a Legendary UBM specialized in defense and magic that enhanced its piercing ability.

Adapted to this wasteland, it had spent its days burrowing underground and attacking anyone who'd wandered into this place, stabbing them with its imposing mandibles and sucking out their life.

It could have been called the lord of the Vara Plains, but now...

"Z e E z z e E e E e z e e e..."

...it was on the verge of death, skewered like a scientific sample.

"W o w O w o."

The abhorrent bug was surrounded by a number of other creatures.

Standing far taller than the average human, fully covered in plate and with insect legs peeking out of their head-concealing helmets, they were the Legendary-tier devils, Gigaknights.

A total of ten were surrounding Shellstro to finish it off.

Six were holding down the UBM's legs to keep it still, while the other four were stabbing their greatswords into the gaps in its shell, quickly stripping it of its HP.

UBMs fought—and won—their battles through the uniqueness of their abilities, but that meant nothing when they were outnumbered ten-to-one by creatures that were the same stat tier as they were.

"Well, I guess I win..."

Standing some distance away from the Gigaknights' hunt was the one who'd summoned them. A Dryfean Superior and secretly a part of Illegal Frontier, he was Hell General, Logan Goddhart.

Shellstro was among the eighteen UBMs whose locations and details he'd been given upon joining IF. Although it was fairly strong, the creature had little in the way of trickery. This had prompted Zeta to make the assessment that Logan "was perfectly capable of beating it by himself," as it could neither escape nor repel him.

And just as she'd expected, Logan had rendered Shellstro completely incapable of even resisting.

Logan had once seen Gardranda—a demon on the level of a Legendary UBM—defeat two of his Gigaknights with little effort.

One could say that his success against Shellstro was a result of learning a lesson that day, but it really had more to do with the new build that Zeta had taught him, which let him overwhelm his targets with devils without regard for the related costs.

His current job configuration was so effective that even a Legendary UBM—albeit a very straightforward one—was no trouble for him whatsoever.

"Legendary Shellstro...done." He had just defeated this great creature, and yet contrary to how he might have acted before, Logan showed no pride in it. All he did was matter-of-factly record the UBM's defeat in the list Zeta had provided him. It was almost eerie how unexcited he was.

The reason for it, however, was clear—it was the peace talks, where he'd been instantly defeated by Tsukuyo.

Equipped with his new build, Logan had entered the scene as if he were the strongest there...only to be erased by the High Priestess's Gloria β, along with all the other Dryfean Masters besides Behemot.

An intense battle had ensued, and he hadn't been involved in any capacity. The fact that he'd been taken out like cannon fodder despite being a Superior had been terrible for his mental health; it was weighing down on him even now.

This was only made worse by the fact that it had been his fourth major defeat in a row, and defeating a UBM that'd been handed to him on a silver platter wasn't enough to make the shock go away.

Things might've been different if Zeta were here—she was good at directing and teaching Logan. However, she'd yet to return to Dryfe from the terrorist attack on Altea.

"...Altar's about to have some kind of 'Tournament,' right? Guess it doesn't matter to me anyway. I'm with Dryfe and I have lots of UBMs...and I can't win against people."

It was an event that bound you to Altar in exchange for the right to fight for a chance to battle UBMs.

The terms of the Contract were strict, but UBMs were rare content—enough to make it worth it.

Logan, however, was currently defeating UBMs one after another, yet none of this helped his state of mind at all. Partially because he was the former duel champion, he felt that this game was primarily about competing with other people. Nothing else had much of a point if you were on a losing streak.

As he was now, Logan was actually far stronger than he had been while he was acting tough in the arenas, but his spirits were at an all-time low. It was as though these two things were inversely proportional to each other.

If Sechs knew about Logan's current state, it might've reminded him of Gerbera. Despite its humble size, IF had two members that had been defeated and then grew stronger, but had found this failed to improve their feelings.

"...I wonder if the Unbreakable's participating." Remembering the newbie who had kicked off his chain of defeats, Logan let out a heavy sigh.

The recording of Ray Starling's battle against King of Beasts had once again put him in the spotlight. This consequently led to more people taking a look at Ray's fight against the Hell General, which caused Logan no end of headaches.

As the view count rose, Ray Starling eventually came to be called a "devil-eater."

Overcome by curiosity, Logan had summoned a devil and tried biting into it. The taste was downright hellish, making him conclude that someone who could fight after eating something like that was simply crazy.

He still wanted to get back at Ray Starling, but the last time he'd tried that without ample preparation he'd been instantly erased by Tsukuyo Fuso. This time he intended to attempt it only after he'd become as strong as possible.

[The UBM, "Borer Deathbug, Shellstro," was defeated.]

[Selecting MVP...]

["Logan Goddhart" was selected as MVP.]

["Logan Goddhart" is presented with an MVP special reward—"Borer Deathspear, Shellstro."]

"Oh." Following that message, an MVP reward appeared in Logan's hand.

Shellstro's focus on penetration had made its reward take the form of a spear. At first glance it might appear very simple, but there were a few elements of the design that deserved a closer look.

It was black like the UBM's shell and generally didn't deviate much from the usual form of a spear, but it was also covered in sharp, insect-like decoration. Some would find it appealing, others cringey...

"It's so cool..."

...and Logan was the former.

To him, Shellstro's design was almost as cool as that of Viledragon's Prideblade, Woltgyzur—his current favorite—a weapon that resembled nothing so much as a generic key chain with a dragon twisted around a sword.

Hell General, Logan Goddhart was an elementary school boy in real life and his tastes reflected this perfectly.

Regardless, Logan was done here. Feeling good about receiving an MVP reward he liked, he made his way back to Vandelheim.

"That was the last one on the list I could do. Now I gotta go back and do the homework Zeta left."

Shellstro was the final of the eighteen UBMs that Logan could defeat on his own. Those remaining were more difficult than this, so it had been decided that he would beat them with Zeta's support.

"I hope she comes back soon... Oh. That reminds me..."

Though Zeta hadn't returned to Infinite Dendrogram, they had talked a bit by email. According to her, IF was planning to do something big soon.

Their leader—King of Crime, Sechs Würfel—had been imprisoned in the gaol since the last war, and Logan had been informed that he was about to break out.

The gaol was a game system meant to confine players who'd committed major crimes, so Logan wasn't even sure if it was even possible to escape it. However, Zeta and the other long-time members of IF seemed to have no doubt that he'd succeed.

Sechs Würfel... I wonder what he's like, Logan thought.

Regardless, he had been told that once Sechs broke out of the gaol, they would all separately head to Tenchi in the distant east, where Illegal Frontier would truly set their plans in motion.

I'm in the clan, but I haven't met the leader yet... Actually, I haven't met any members at all besides Zeta. Logan had never been part of any clan before IF, so he was looking forward to seeing his clanmates.

...I'm probably the weakest of us all though, he thought. The repeated losses had stripped him of his confidence, and despite the fact that he knew next to nothing about the other members of IF, Logan was already assuming the worst.

At this point, he had no means of knowing that a fellow clanmate in the gaol was thinking the same thing as he was.

Chapter Four: The Ring and the Axe

Paladin, Ray Starling

The day after the clan meeting, I went to the knight offices attached to Count Gideon's mansion.

My business here wasn't with the knights, however. I'd come here to visit the facility deeper inside. It was a place I'd been going to whenever I was in Gideon and had free time—the cursed item vault.

I had a part-time job here as a "cleaner" who uncursed the items within. It was an easy activity, since I just had to equip Gouz-Maise and stay next to the cursed items.

Once uncursed, most of them reverted back to being proper, high-quality equipment. There were some that could only maintain their form thanks to the curses and crumbled once they were broken, but apparently there was nothing that could be done about those. As a result, they never held me accountable for those.

This part-time job provided uncursed equipment to Altar and charged my Gouz-Maise with grudge. Both sides benefited from our arrangement. This was relevant now because these uncursed items would be the extra rewards for The Tournaments.

I was glad to find out that my little part-time job would end up helping Azurite.

Another benefit I got out of this was that for every ten inventories I'd uncursed, I could pick any one of the uncursed items.

Having done about sixty inventories now, I could take away a total of six items. And since The Tournaments started tomorrow, I came to take my share before any of them were given away as extra rewards. First come, first served after all.

I was also accompanied by Rook and the Kasumi-Io-Fujinon trio.

However, I still hadn't picked a single item despite having the right to take six. The ones I'd uncursed and looked over either required a higher level than mine, weren't appropriate for my combat style, or were simply rejected by Nemesis.

It was obviously difficult for me to pick six in one day. I could just randomly take items I didn't need, but I'd probably end up just selling them or leaving them to collect dust, which didn't seem like a fitting way to treat the kind of rare equipment that you probably couldn't even find on the market normally. Also, with my MVP rewards, VDA, Storm Visage, and Lifesaving Brooch—a necessity for my combat style—a good number of my equipment slots were already in use anyway.

I couldn't reasonably pick a whole six of these items and frankly didn't even need them all that much in the first place.

That was why I, as the leader of Death Period, decided to give four of the picks to my clan members. Considering that it might increase the clan's overall strength, this seemed like the best use of this reward.

"Are you sure about this?" Rook asked.

"Yeah. The Tournaments starts tomorrow and there's bound to be other stuff going on in the future. If we all can become stronger now, we should just do it."

"YAY! Our leader's so generous!"

"Thank you."

"Th-Thank you..."

The five of us soon arrived at the vault. One of the workers here dealt with the many layers of security and let us go inside.

The vault was full of container-type inventories stacked high on top of one another. Usually this place was dense with grudge that made it feel oppressive, but most of it had been absorbed by Gouz-Maise. Now it felt more like an antique storage area.

"There's so many of them," said Rook.

"And they were all cursed, as well... How did this happen...?"

"Yeah, I had the same question as you guys," I said.

A mountain of cursed weapons that needed this many inventories just to store them... I'd been wondering how exactly this collection came to be. When I'd asked Count Gideon, he said all he knew was that the cursed items had been stored here for most of this land's history. However, I got my answer when Azurite was telling me about the extra rewards.

Apparently, it went all the way back to before Altea was Altea, when the Sacred King defeated The Evil. According to information left behind by Azurite's ancestors, the city was at one point the base of the King of Kings, which led to it housing a large number of weapons and other kinds of equipment. Before this land was united under the flag of Altar, those who captured the city had tried to get ahold of those weapons, but the vault was so secure that they couldn't even access it.

However, there was one entity who'd opened the vault, and it was the final ruler of the city—The Evil.

It was said that this was why most of The Evil's dependents had powerful equipment. Some of the items in here didn't even have to be equipped—they themselves became monsters that went on to attack people.

Azurite's ancestor and his party had won regardless, but the equipment remained even after The Evil and the dependents were dealt with. However, whether due to The Evil's influence or the fact that they'd been in the center of a war, most of the equipment had become cursed. The mechanisms involved might have been the same as the ones behind the Tenchi curseblades Jubei was using.

Figuring that it wasn't a good idea to have so much cursed gear laying around in what would become the new capital, they decided to move all of it to Gideon—the birthplace of the Sacred King's queen as well as the holy land of duelists even in those bygone days. The reason for that decision was that Gideon already had a special vault meant for storing cursed equipment.

Thus, all cursed gear from then and onwards was moved to Gideon, which eventually led to this place accumulating the collection it had now.

"And that's how it is," I said, finishing off my explanation.

"Now that is something... Could this be the cause of all the incidents here in Gideon?"

Yeah, I wondered the same thing, I thought. It's like the place itself is cursed, and maybe this vault is the reason.

Anyway, it was time to make our picks.

"Oh yeah...the uncursed inventories are over here, so look around those. Tell the worker if you find something. I also borrowed enough of these magnifying glasses for each of us. They've got Identification on them."

"Okaay!" The room was small, and since she was the loudest, I could only hear Io's response. The others gave their replies as well, though, and went to find gear that suited them.

I moved some distance away from them, towards a different pile of inventories, and began uncursing the gear within like I usually did.

"Well, it is true that we found nothing among those you already uncursed," said Nemesis. "I hope we have better luck with what we work on today."

"Nemesis, keep in mind that we gotta pick two items today, so be a bit less strict, okay?"

"Hrm... Very well. But I will not be lenient on weapons."

"Fine, fine." Nemesis had said things like that many times before. She had extremely high standards for any weapons that would take her place in protecting me.

Honestly, though, even I can't imagine myself fighting using anything other than Nemesis... Hm?

"What's wrong, Nemesis? You're all red..."

"...That is for you to guess." Well, okay. Anyway, it was time to resume uncursing.

Even if I didn't have much luck with weapons or armor, I could maybe find a useful accessory or two.

An hour passed as I kept uncursing the gear, not finding anything that suited me.

Io had quickly chosen an animalistic set of armor, but everyone else was still deliberating on what to pick. She hadn't left yet, though, instead staying to help Kasumi and Fujinon with their choices.

Rook seemed to be considering his pick very carefully. When I asked why, he said that he was specifically looking for gear that was effective against undead. Apparently, he was thinking ahead to The Tournaments, already considering his fight against the UBM.

Rook's current minion capacity was enough to comfortably fit even Liz. As long as he was able to buy the time to merge using Union Jack, he should have been able to stand his ground even against many stronger Masters. Also, his assumption was that the undead UBM he'd fight wouldn't be very popular. Its capabilities were known, but they didn't stand out much. On top of that, its tier was a mystery. Altar currently didn't have many high-ranking Masters that used debuffs, so Rook believed that he would be able to place fairly high—maybe even reach the top.

Just as I'd thought, Rook had his reasons for picking that specific day.

Speaking of Rook, his partner—Babi—had seemingly grown bored of the search for the right item and was now sleeping in the corner of the vault.

“Hrm. We still are not having any luck,” said Nemesis.

“Yeah.” Most of the gear we’d uncursed today were weapons. Nemesis was extra strict with them, but even if she hadn’t been, normal weapons just weren’t a good fit for my combat style.

If I wasn’t wielding Nemesis, I was just a low-stat vanguard with a couple of heavy-hitting skills. Sure, my HP was pretty high right now, but only Nemesis could use that for offense, so there really was nothing that would serve as an appropriate substitute.

“I really can’t imagine switching to normal weapons at this point,” I said. “Oh. An accessory. It’s been a while since we saw one of those.”

The next item I took out of the inventory I was cleaning was a bracelet. It wasn’t that cursed, apparently. The thing was clean after only about a minute.

“Hm...? ‘Big or Small’?” I held it in my hand and found that I could read its name, but all I got for its effects was “Unknown.”

This seemed like a standard case of something needing a higher Identification level. Not even the magnifying glass I had was enough.

...Well, whatever. This seems like a caster item anyway, so I probably won’t use it, I thought.

I put Big or Small away in the inventory for uncursed items and took out the next one...

“...Hm?”

What? I could’ve sworn I’d put the bracelet away, but for some reason, I was still holding it in my left hand.

Or, rather, my bracer was grabbing on to it.

“...Gardranda?” In response to my question, the left bracer moved on its own to put Big or Small on my right wrist.

It was rare for her to act like this. Was the bracelet that important to her? “Well...I guess I could try putting it on.”

“Indeed,” said Nemesis. “With the curse gone, I doubt equipping it will bind it to you or anything of the sort.”

Anyway, I went and put Big or Small on my right wrist.

Once an extra accessory slot was taken, the bracer on my left hand moved on its own to force my finger to move over the floor. It seemed that she was writing something. I followed it with my eyes and made out the words “Say ‘Minimum’...and summon me.”

“...Seriously? You know what will happen if I summon you, right?” I was referring to the drawbacks that followed her summoning. I could be subjected to three different debuffs, get set on fire, or lose control over my body. None of those seemed all that attractive.

In response to these concerns of mine, she only said, “It’s okay... Summon,” before adding, “You still owe me from last time.”

Silence. Yeah, now that she mentioned it, I’d summoned Gardranda in the fight against KoB, but I got the death penalty before I got hit with any of the drawbacks for it. They weren’t on me when I’d returned either, so I just assumed that was how it worked, but Gardranda seemed to be holding a grudge about it.

...Wait, do you even benefit from me getting the drawbacks? I wondered.

“...Well, all right,” I said. “Oh uh, Rook... If something weird happens to me, do something about it, okay?”

“All right.” Rook was quick on the uptake, as always. He was already preparing Liz in case something happened.

With my preparations complete, I went and answered Gardranda’s request.

“Minimum. Miasmaflame Princess—Gardranda.” Only after saying that did I realize that I hadn’t specified how long I wanted the summon to last or how much MP I wanted to put into it.

However, it seemed like the summoning worked regardless, and the Miasmaflame Bracers flew from my wrists.

A moment later, Big or Small began to shine and the bracers vanished...but Gardranda was nowhere in sight.

“...HUH?!”

I had no idea what was going on at first. Miasmaflame Princess was a skill that used the bracers as a medium to summon Gardranda, and the bracers themselves became Gardranda’s own equipment. However, right now I couldn’t see Gardranda or the bracers.

“What happened... No way!” I cried.

Does Big or Small actually set summoned monsters free?! If that’s the case, then she must’ve gone off somewhere and...

“Hm...?” And then, just when I was on the verge of panicking, I noticed that everyone else was looking at me in surprise.

No—not at me. They were actually looking at something above my head.

“R-Ray... Your head...” said Nemesis.

“...This isn’t the first time I’ve felt like this.” It reminded me of the time Franklin, dressed as a penguin, had given me a drug with a particular furry side effect.

Remembering that event, I put my hand up to my head...and felt something strange there.

“...Ngh.” The feeling was followed by a tingling sensation on my finger. If my avatar had pain on, it probably would’ve hurt me.

I slowly lowered the hand so I could get a good look at it, only to see a small creature biting into my finger. It looked like a tiny person with exaggerated proportions. They had brownish-red skin, a set of horns, and their hands were covered by a familiar pair of bracers.

Either this was an insane coincidence, or the person was...

“...Gardranda?” I asked as I set her down on my palm.

“KSHAA!”

...That response wasn’t in a language I could understand, but it seemed like a “yes” to me.

It was obvious that Big or Small was doing this, but...

“...I’m gonna log out and look this thing up.”

“That is for the best...”

“KSHAA!”

...I have no clue what you’re saying.

◇

Conveniently, the details of the ring were on the wiki.

Big or Small was a magic item created a long time ago, and so far about four of them had been found.

Its special effect was the adjustment of summoning output. By saying “Minimum” or “Reduce” while summoning, you could summon creatures at low cost in exchange for making them weaker. Meanwhile, adding “Maximum” or “Increase” made the summon stronger in exchange for making the involved costs steeper.

However, the enhancement function wasn’t very useful because it increased the costs so much—up to several dozen times—while only strengthening the summon by a one-tenth for the extra MP or whatever else you spent.

"And using the Minimum function makes the summon basically powerless in exchange for reducing the cost to almost nothing. That includes Gardranda's drawbacks, right?"

I'd unsummoned her before logging out and nothing had happened to me yet.

"KSHAA!"

"I'll take that as a 'yes,'" I said. "It's cool that I can summon you so casually, but it's kind of tough that we can't actually talk with each other."

"Then why not buy a non-humanoid translation item?" Rook asked. "You should be able to find one in Gideon's markets."

"Oh, they have things like that? I guess I'll look around," I said. "I don't think I ever saw you use it, though."

"That would be because I can understand them without it."

...Yeah, I wouldn't put that past you.

"Anyway, it's looking like this will be one of the items I take," I said. Gardranda would probably hold a grudge if I didn't. "Where is she, anyway?"

"On your head." Again? Does she like being there or somethi...? Hm...?

"Hey, Nemesis. I'm feeling a bit of a tingle on my head..."

"Of course you would. Little Gardranda is gnawing on your head. In fact, she's eating your hair."

"How about you STOP HER?!" What a way to remind me that she was a man-eating goblin! She's after my body—I mean my flesh!

"KSHAA!"

"Hrm, even I can understand what she just said. It must have been 'delicious,' or at least something along those lines," said Nemesis, slightly salivating. "Ray, if I may ask—"

"HELL NO!" One man-eater is one too many!

Anyway, I picked Big or Small as my first reward and another hour had passed since.

I'd already unsummoned Gardranda Minimum—otherwise known as "Smol Gar." She didn't seem to like being unsummoned, probably because she wanted to keep gnawing on my head, but I was able to convince her by promising that I'd summon her again after buying a translation item.

She'd actually bit me so hard I was bleeding, but the damage was light enough that even my healing magic could take care of it. Well, the damage obviously wasn't as bad as a lost arm.

Next time I summon her, I won't tell her to not bite me...but I'll at least try to make her hold back a bit, I thought.

By this point, Rook and Fujinon had also decided what they'd pick, meaning that the only items left to select were Kasumi's and my second one.

"Kasumi is a High Summoner, so wouldn't it be best for her to take a summon-related accessory like the one Ray got?" Rook asked.

"It ain't summoning skills she needs, but defense! Even I can take her out in one hit!" Io asserted.

"...Io, you're all about offense. Most rear guards in your level range wouldn't survive your attacks," commented Fujinon. They were all hard at work picking the right item for Kasumi.

"What about you?" Rook asked me. "Do you think you'll find your second one soon?"

"Hrm... I've been uncursing and looking at everything, but I've hit a bit of a roadblock here." After uncursing Big or Small, I went on to work on weapons again, but progress had suddenly stagnated.

One weapon shortly after I'd resumed was taking an unusually long time to uncurse. Up until now, even the worst curses hadn't taken much more than five minutes to remove, but I'd been absorbing grudge from this one for a whole hour now.

At first, I thought that Gouz-Maise was just full and couldn't take any more, but when I switched from this weapon to another, that one still took less than a minute to fully uncurse.

This meant that it wasn't about me or my greaves, but this weapon in particular—the large battleaxe wrapped in a jet-black cloth.

I'd considered leaving it aside, but it had sparked my curiosity, so I was still trying to remove the curse.

I was doing all of this with the weapon on the floor, by the way. Unlike some cursed items, it didn't seem to be leaking its aura into the air around it... In fact, it felt like it was the other way around—that the dense curses were tightly sticking to it instead, like coagulated blood.

And no matter how much grudge I'd vacuumed out, it didn't seem to be losing any of those curses. Clearly, the amount of grudge on this axe was far beyond that on any other weapon I'd encountered so far.

"I guess the curses are just that strong?" I said.

"Perhaps," said Rook.

"...Maybe I should just take it as a source of grudge, then." I'd stocked up on a lot of grudge by now, but I could see myself using all of that up in the coming battles.

I might even be forced to use Big or Small to summon Gardranda Maximum.

Using more MP is fine and all, but since Big or Small influences the length and effect of the demerits too, doing that would mean certain death for me no matter which of the three I got.

"A one-handed axe, eh?" said Nemesis. "The fact that you cannot know what you will get once you uncurse it makes it rather like the gacha. Well, that would suit you. It seems like a fine choice to me."

"Hm?" Her words made me slightly confused. "But it's a weapon," I said. "You'd usually have something against those." Nemesis had extremely strict standards for weapons—and shields—that I would use instead of her. She hadn't approved of any weapon I'd uncursed so far or any weapon in the shops we'd visited. Yet this axe...passed?

Apparently, Nemesis hadn't even realized that she'd approved of a weapon until I pointed that fact out. She looked at the axe, blinking, and said, "That is true... How should I put it...? My intuition is telling me that it is a worthy pick.”

“Your intuition?”

“I happen to be half-weapon, so there are things I understand exactly because of that.”

She—Nemesis the Maiden-Arms Embryo—crouched down and looked at the axe on the floor.

“This is an amazing weapon,” she asserted. “And...I believe I have seen something like this before.”

“Oh. Wouldn’t that be your second form? It’s black...and it’s an axe...kind of,” said Kasumi.

“No, I doubt it’s reminding me of myself.”

“Then it’s my Five-Ring!”

“That one is nothing like it in size,” said Nemesis. “And it is not about shape, but...its aura?”

Nemesis seemed to be trying to recall exactly what this weapon reminded her of. I tried thinking with her, but I was also drawing a blank.

Still, Nemesis was okay with it, and it was useful as a source of grudge, so it looked like I’d be taking this one-handed axe.

“...What’s its name, anyway?” I said, bringing the Identification glass close to it.

Cursed items had a tendency to have names that referred to their nature, like how my BR Armor was CBR Armor at first. I thought of just taking a look at this one, but...

“Name: [] An unnamed axe.

The axe that was not ■?# by ■?#.

The axe that ■?# to ■?# in ■?#.

The axe that is ■?#, as well as ■?# to the ■?#.”

That was all that Identification was giving me.

The name field was empty—no, there wasn’t even a blank space in there—while the explanation had holes all over it.

Unlike with Big or Small, it wasn’t just a problem of low Identification level. This felt closer to looking at Shu’s hidden stats right after I’d first started.

“...I guess it’s an old crafted item, and the person who made it just didn’t give it a name?” After all, the only line I could fully read was “an unnamed axe.”

Perhaps the craftsman hadn’t been satisfied with it?

Looking at the actual axe, the handle didn’t seem to be complete in places. Also, it really did seem like a weapon from a very long time ago. I wouldn’t be surprised if it was older than any of the ones I’d managed to purify.

“Excuse me...is Death Period here?”

While I was considering the axe, the door to the vault opened up and I heard someone address us with those words.

The one saying them was a youth with dark circles under his eyes, as well as the manager of this vault—Count Gideon.

He was even younger than me, but he was in charge of the entirety of Gideon County, which was among the most important areas in the kingdom. In that role, he had always been directly and strongly affected by the many disasters inflicted upon the city. You could say that he was among the greatest victims of the Gouz-Maise Gang, that lab-coat bastard, Exadragon King, and Hannya.

That was probably why he had those bags under his eyes.

“Count Gideon. What brings you here?” I asked.

“I have come here because there was something I wanted to talk to your clan about... Have you found anything you like?”

“Yes. Three of us have already made their choices, leaving only her and me,” I said as I pointed at Kasumi. With Count Gideon being sort of like my boss for this part-time job, I was naturally speaking in a more respectful manner.

“...Quite curious, that,” said Nemesis telepathically.

What?

“Well, you speak to Azurite—the first princess and acting ruler—as though she were merely a good friend, yet to Liliana—a knight—as well as the count here, you speak with reverence.”

Azurite did tell me that I can talk to her casually in private conversations... Hell, now that I think about it, for both Azurite and Liliana, I’m just talking to them the same way I started out talking to them.

“Is that how it is?”

That is exactly how it is.

“Oh, right. Count Gideon, would you happen to know anything about this axe?” I asked.

"An axe...?" he said as he looked down on it and tilted his head. "No, I do not... You there, what are the records for it?"

He was talking to one of the workers outside the vault, the same one who'd recorded our picks. After looking at the many documents, the worker gave a shake of the head.

"There are no records left on it, sire. Though the number on the ledger does imply that it was stored away here around when Altar came to be."

"...A significant number of the items here were acquired by defeating The Evil. In many cases, their details and origins only became evident once they had been uncursed and their functions were revealed... I suppose all we know is that this is one of them. The documents will have to be rechecked after the Tournaments' reward distribution...no, before that... Oh, my apologies."

"No need for that..." Using cursed weapons while they were still cursed was risky, especially when Identification couldn't give you much information about them, so I could understand where Count Gideon was coming from. The way he was clutching his stomach made him seem like he was overburdened with responsibility, though... He was way more lively before and after Franklin's Game, I thought.

"So, what was your question about the axe, again?" he asked.

"May I have it as my second reward even though I never managed to uncurse it?" My question made the count a bit surprised, but he quickly nodded in approval.

"I certainly would not be against that. I did say that you are free to pick anything within this vault. Though...are you certain?"

"In my case, the curse is a blessing in its own right."

"I see. Very well, then. I will ensure that it is done." The count knew that I converted grudge into magic, so it didn't take much to convince him.

And just like that, it was decided that my second reward would be this nameless one-handed axe.

Careful not to touch it directly, I put it away in my inventory.

"Now, Count Gideon," I said. "You mentioned having some business with us?"

"Yes," he said. "It has come to my attention that your clan is looking for a base here in the city."

...How did he hear about that? I wondered. Did he get it from his ninja intelligence network?

"Mr. Figaro told me as much when he came to visit today to greet me after being away for so long."

Oh...I guess that was it.

"Well, we are," I said. "We had no luck in Altea for a variety of reasons..."

"I am aware. The city of Gideon would deeply appreciate it if a powerful clan like yours would make your home here. It would certainly be reassuring, at least..."

I'd heard that even during the Gloria incident, a large clan had stood against the dragon to protect their hometown. The count was probably thinking of that.

"Oh, did you come to welcome us?" I asked. "We actually planned to greet you after we were done here, so..."

"No. It is a bit more than that." More? I wasn't sure what he meant by that. Frankly, I was confused.

"Since Death Period wishes to secure a base here in Gideon, I would like to introduce you to a property you might find interesting."

And just like that, the confusion was gone. Count Gideon had come here to offer us some real estate.

◇

After that, we went to take a look at the property the count wanted to offer us.

I wasn't sure why the count himself was introducing it, but I figured there had to be a reason.

While we rode the carriage, the count was resting his head on the door and, seemingly without realizing it, saying—almost moaning—things like "My stomach hurts," "I hope The Tournaments go well," "We'll not be terrorized again, will we?" "I wish I could find a different job..."

The city had been threatened so many times in recent memory that it seemed to have taken a toll on his mental health.

He was younger than me, but the stress was already making his hair turn gray. I really hoped he got some well-deserved rest once The Tournaments were over and the matter with Dryfe was settled.

The count was actually seated in the carriage's frontal compartment, separated from us. It was probably so that he could take a nap or maybe even get some work done.

...He really didn't have it easy, huh?

Besides him, the people in the carriage on the way to the property in question were myself, Fujinon, Io, and...

"Hm..."

...Shu, whom I'd called over using my Telepathy Cuffs.

He was the clan's most veteran Master and already had experience with Dendro real estate from when he rented a popcorn factory, so I had him come along for advice.

Rook had decided not to come with us. Kasumi had yet to pick her item, so he'd stayed behind to help her. I was wondering why Fujinon and Io also didn't stay for that, but as they'd left the vault and followed after me, I'd notice them give Kasumi a hearty thumbs-up.

...Well, they're cheering their friend on. Even I could tell that much.

"Real estate, huh...?" Shu, who was sitting next to me, said as he looked outside.

It seemed that something was on his mind, but I couldn't tell what it was—so I just went and asked. "What's up, bro?"

"Well, we're on the way to check out some pawrperty, but I don't remember there being much good real estate here." His words prompted me to look outside. The carriage was on the main road, but the buildings on every side of it had this gloomy look to them. It wasn't a nice thing to say, but it reminded me of something I'd seen on TV—slums in the big cities of developed nations.

There also seemed to be a degree of social disorder here, and you could see a bunch of establishments with less-than-wholesome signs on them.

Also, the faces of the people here—or rather, the looks in their eyes—were less than welcoming.

"So this is the..."

"The eighth district, yeah," said Shu. "It's the place with the thieves' and pimps' guilds. There's no district in Gideon that's got a worse public order...fur real."

Well, uh... That sure explained why it was different from the first and fourth districts I always visited. Though with Rook's group regularly going to the pimps' guild, he was probably used to it by now.

"WOW! Fujinon, look! Over there! That sign's kinda lewd—it's got panties on it! There's also some signs I can't read 'cause of the mosaics! That must be the underage visual censorshi— GHUH...?!"

"Io, please have some discretion! You're a girl!"

The district seemed to have gotten Io excited.

Maybe a little too excited, seeing that Fujinon had to interfere.

"...Is it a good idea to go through here in a carriage this fancy?" I asked.

"Well, this pawrt of town ain't peaceful, but no one's dumb enough to go after a carriage with the count's family crest on it. Hell, I'd say we're perfectly safe."

...Makes sense. Forget the count—if they went after it now, they'd be dealing with a goddamn Superior, I thought.

"Do not forget yourself," said Nemesis telepathically. "Your mere presence has made bandits shrivel up in terror." Hey, that was more about the other three setting an oppressive mood...

"Hrmm... But just what kind of real estate can there be in an area such as this?" Nemesis wondered.

"I'm as curious as you are. Though, since the count himself is introducing it, I'm sure it'll be good."

"Ah! I know!" Io said as she puffed her chest.

"You do? Let's hear it," I said.

"It's gotta be a place where there was a massacre! Two Mafias or something fought and everyone living inside died! Since then, it's been overrun by ghosts and no one wants to buy it! That's why he'll have you use your MVP reward and anti-undead skills to purify it, then sell it to you for cheap!"

"I see..."

...Why does that sound so plausible?

"Io, that would be a literal haunted house," said Fujinon.

"Well, the kingdom as a whole is kinda haunted, so..."

"What was that, Shu?" I said.

"Ah, furget I said anything."

...Well, I also told Azurite that it felt like the country was cursed, but still...

"Anyway, since the count himself is introducing it, I really don't think it'll be a haunted house or anything," said Fujinon.

"Huhh? What's your guess, then?" Io asked.

"I think he'll kick out the squatters from some abandoned building and then build our base over it. Death Period will help with the evictions."

"...That's a scary thought," I said. That seemed like it'd spark some serious trouble with the locals, so I'd honestly be against that.

I could only hope neither Io nor Fujinon were right.

"Seriously, what is he gonna offer us..." I wondered out loud.

Once the carriage left the main road, I saw we were heading straight towards a familiar building.

It was one of Gideon's thirteen arenas. There was one in each district, and this was the eighth's.

"Huh. This is my first time seeing this one," I mused. Each of these lesser arenas stood at the end of the main roads connected to the central arena in the heart of the city. With the exception of the central one, the arenas were more or less identical in structure, and this one here was just like the others. Though for some reason, I felt like it was more desolate than the others. "We have arrived," said Count Gideon as the carriage stopped. That meant that the property was somewhere nearby.

However, upon getting off and looking around, all I saw were stores, taverns...nothing that could be called a mansion.

"Count Gideon, where is the property you wish to introduce to us?" I asked.

"This one here," the count said. He pointed to something, but I couldn't see what he was pointing at.

Is it...behind the eighth arena? I wondered.

"Mr. Ray Starling, leader of Death Period," he said as he looked straight at me with those tired eyes...

"Would you buy the eighth arena as your base?"

...and made an offer I could have never imagined.

Chapter Five: Homes, Sweet Homes

Paladin, Ray Starling

It went without saying, but arenas were extremely important to Gideon. They were the reason why it was called "the City of Duels," and it was the only city in this world that boasted a whole thirteen of them. One could say that they were the skeleton that defined Gideon's shape.

Normally, someone in charge of the city would never even think of letting them go.

However, the count had explained himself a little further. "There are two reasons that made the eighth arena unnecessary for us," he'd said.

The first reason was fairly obvious: its poor location.

Back when it was a city-state and a few centuries after it had become a part of Altar, Gideon didn't have any problems of that sort, but over time the eighth district became an unlawful place. By the time the Count Gideon of several generations earlier realized this, it had already felt as though the place had always been in such a state. This had caused commonfolk to start avoiding the eighth district, and as it became a hot spot for outlaws and groups in the legal gray zone—such as pimps and thieves—the eighth arena began seeing less and less activity.

Another reason for the drop in activity was that the eighth arena was still a publicly run, clean establishment that hadn't become corrupted by the lawless district where it stood, and with the locals preferring to bet on the more intense, unofficial underground events, even the people living right next door almost never visited it. It wasn't uncommon for there to be duels hosted at the eighth arena without a single spectator.

Despite that, the barrier equipment required regular inspections and maintenance which could only be done by experts, whose services did not come cheap. Combined with the cost of cleaning and maintenance of other facilities, the eighth arena had become unprofitable to run.

The second problem was that as the spectators decreased, so had the number of duelists. Due to Gloria's attack and the previous war, Gideon's arenas had lost a significant number of their fighters, tian and Master alike. Some of those fighters had been rankers.

And with the duelists—the entertainers themselves—leaving, the city's dueling industry suffered an overall decline. This was made worse as more and more wealthy Altarians moved to other countries and the kingdom's economy suffered. These days, the only duels that could attract a full arena of spectators were those between high-rankers as well as special events like The Clash of the Superiors. There were also fewer people renting dueling areas for sparring matches, and the eighth arena almost stopped being used entirely.

And with every arena's revenue dropping, the deficit at which the eighth was being run had become worse than ever.

That was when Count Gideon had begun to consider letting go of the arena.

The Gideon family had stored away immense wealth that would keep the city financially secure for now, but that obviously wasn't unlimited. The treasury was also losing significant amounts to things like rewards to Masters, so the count wanted to reduce his losses somehow.

At first, he'd thought of giving the arena away to the royal family so the knights could use it as a training area, but decided against that because a location situated in a district often known as "The Town of Vices" seemed like an inappropriate donation to a royal lineage.

Instead, he'd gone on to look for someone to sell it to. Even though it was in a bad location, an arena was superb real estate that many powerful clans would desperately want to have.

However, the clan at the top—The Lunar Society—was an awful group on which to bestow that particular benefit. Considering their negotiations with the royal family, it wasn't unlikely that they would use the arena as a base of operations from which they would spread their influence into the eighth district—and then the rest of Gideon.

The count had then considered K&R, which conveniently boasted a number of prominent duelists among their ranks, but he wasn't sure about the morality of selling such a property to a PK clan. In a way, they seemed like an even worse option than the religious group.

The once-great Babylonian Battlegroup was no longer active enough for such a purchase, while AETL Union, which was a combination of the princesses' and Liliana's fanclubs, would never leave their idols' home in Altea.

Holding on to the eighth arena was a net negative, yet the count couldn't find a viable potential buyer.

Just when he was at a loss for what to do with it, a new clan appeared on the scene, and its name was Death Period.

In other words...us.

When he heard that we were looking for a base here in Gideon, the count saw it as an opportunity to finally sell the eighth arena.

We were Altar's top second clan, we were trustworthy, and we had the power to set up in the eighth district without a problem—in fact, there was a chance that the locals would fear us and our presence would act as a deterrent against lawlessness. We even had the duel champion, Figaro, so selling it to us meant giving him easy access to the arena facilities for training and the like.

We were also a clan that had a whole four Superiors, which was unheard of here on the western side of the continent, so the count was sure that we would have the money to purchase it as well as the funds to maintain it.

Basically, we were the best potential buyers the count could ever ask for.

The price, by the way, was 15,000,000,000 lir for a full purchase or 500,000,000 lir for yearly rent.

"...That's cheaper than I'd have guessed," Shu and I said in unison.

"HUH?!" Io and Fujinon exclaimed, also in unison.

Their response really highlighted how absurd my words really were.

My sense of scale here is a real mess, huh? I thought. That's probably because even the armor I'm wearing is worth 200,000,000 lir.

Shu also was a guy who could spend billions on a single battle. There were few things King of Destruction destroyed better than his own bank account.

Purchasing the arena was a bit too expensive even for us, though. Due to the recent payments they'd had to make, Shu's and Figaro's finances weren't in a good state right now, so we couldn't buy the place even if we pooled everything we had.

The yearly rent, however, was perfectly payable. I had eight billion on me, so I could cover the first year with just my pocket money.

And apparently these prices actually were on the cheaper side. The historical and functional value of an arena was astronomical, but the count had priced this one after considering its location and deterioration from age.

"...It's a hell of a facility to have, though," I said.

The arena was all that we wanted out of a base and then some. First of all, there were personal rooms. Just like the other arenas, this one had box seats, all of which were equipped with air conditioning and the like. All they needed was some furniture to become high-class hotel rooms.

Since there were a whole twelve of them and since Figaro and Hannya would live at Figaro's home, there were more than enough for each of us. We might have difficulties if we got a few more members, but in that case we could then just use the waiting rooms or remodel the place to make new ones—the count said that we were allowed to do that. We didn't even have to make a deposit.

The building also had the large baths that the girls wanted so much. An arena was, in a way, a sports facility, so it wasn't surprising that it would have places for people to wash off the sweat. They were properly split into men's and women's baths too.

Io and Fujinon took a look at them and said that though they needed some cleaning, they were up to par.

There was a space the arena's staff used for meetings, which could easily function as a meeting room for our clan. And the building obviously had the space for monsters that Rook and Kasumi wanted. Designed to enable even battle royales, the arena stage itself was more than large enough for that.

Of course, we couldn't ignore the cafeteria that Nemesis insisted we have. Though, since we had no cook, we'd have to hire someone or cook for ourselves.

Somewhat unexpectedly, though, we also had the pool that Marie and Babi wanted.

Just like the Roman Colosseum was used for various kinds of events, so was this arena equipped with functions to support several types of competitions. Among these were aquatic contests, and thus the stage could be turned into what was essentially a pool.

Of course, filling it up with water would be costly and maybe take some time, but the arena was properly supplied in that regard. Though, considering how little business this place was having recently, the pipes would probably have to be checked first.

Ignoring Shu's "popcorn factory" request, the arena ticked every box our clan had. On top of that, it offered a barrier function that none of us had even considered.

The advantage of having a duel barrier in your base was immense. It would let us freely test new combat tactics and skills, as well as spar without worrying about how much longer our reservation would last. We didn't have to care about any prying eyes either, and that might end up being the most beneficial thing of all.

All of this combined made the arena perhaps the best base we could have here in Gideon. It seemed like a miracle that we even had the opportunity to buy it.

The only real problem with it was the price.

"So buying it is thirty years of rent... What do you think, bro?" I asked Shu.

"Time's thrice as fast here, so that's ten years IRL," he said. "I'm pawsitive we won't be movin' away furom it, so it's cheaper to just buy it. Though, it's hard fur us to get the money fur the purchase right now."

"Yeah. It's a pretty serious deal, so I think we should discuss it with the rest of the clan first."

Sure, they entrusted the matter of the base to me, but this feels like too important a purchase to make without their approval... I thought.

"Huhhh? You know you can pay the rent for the first year and then just save up the money to buy it later, riiight?"

Oh yeah. That's an option.

Shu was funneling his wealth into ammo and Figaro also wasn't in a good situation financially, but after the thing with Dryfe was over, we'd have plenty of time to gather the billions to own the property permanently.

"Also, it'd be pretty awful if you saved up to buy it only for the kingdom to go bye-bye by next yeeear. It won't hurt as much if you just rent it for a year, will iiit?"

"If that's a joke, I'm not laughing... Hold on."

That was when I realized that I was hearing a familiar voice that didn't belong here. Turning around...

"Eh he!"

...I saw an eldritch abomination.

Yes—Miss Eldritch Abomination herself.

"...And so we're joined by the fox," said Shu.

"That you are, Mr. Beaaar," she said in response.

This reminded me of my first encounter with her.

But how did she...? Oh, I get it now, I thought as I held up my left Miasmaflame Bracer, ready to fire it into my own shadow.

A moment later, a silhouette jumped out of it and, upon landing on the ground, corrected its posture and gave me a bow.

"...Tsukikage." Another familiar face—Miss Eldritch's right-hand man, Eishiro Tsukikage.

"Greetings," he said. "You noticed me faster than you did before."

Of course I would, I thought. I had no idea how long they'd been there, but apparently they were both hiding in my shadow.

"So...why are you two here?" I asked.

"We saw you, so we decided to follow you," she said. "Nothin' more to it!"

"Who in their right mind slips into a guy's shadow just because they see him?! Why are you in Gideon in the first place?!"

"Hmm? We're here for The Tournaments, of couuurse. We gathered some volunteers from our faithful and brought 'em all with uuus!"

That was a bit of a shock to me. Thinking about it now, The Lunar Society did have the right to participate in that event, but...

"...You know you have to sign a Contract to participate in it, right?" I asked. She obviously wasn't the type to tie herself down, especially after just being freed from one such obligation.

"You don't gotta go to war if you don't want the extra rewards," she said. "And we don't do crime, anyway, so signin' a Contract that prevents that doesn't mean anythin'. The Lunar Society is a clean religious organization."

"...Correct me if I'm wrong, but you did kidnap me, right? Also, Azurite said you implied you'd be willing to commit acts of terrorism."

"Huhh? You're a Master, and as you suuurely know, crimes against Masters aren't criiimes. And implyin' somethin' isn't the same as doing it, is iiit?"

...Her face as she said that was so annoying. It felt like she was in a better mood than usual and wanted to make it as obvious as possible.

"Well, whatever," I said. "At least we won't have to worry about The Lunar Society doing anything stupid in the kingdom."

"Whaddya mean? We only brought less than a third of our fighters. The rest can still do whatever they want. Kage isn't in the tourney either, so that's another negotiating card I can playyy!"

Yeah, I should've expected something like this, I thought. I could totally understand why Azurite called her "parasite."

"By the way, you buyin' this arena?" she asked.

"That's the plan... What about it?"

She put in an even wider smile and said, "If you're not takin' it, I thought we should pick it up instead. A little bit o' blackmail and some negotiatin' and the count would—"

"Count Gideon, we'll take one year's worth of rent for now, please. I'm paying out of pocket."

"Oh. Excellent. Thank you very much."

Not wanting Miss Eldritch to have this establishment, I instantly agreed to the rent arrangement.

Thus, it was decided that this arena would be Death Period's base.

Miss Eldritch, by the way, instantly left, shouting, "I'll get back at you in The Tournameeeent!" as she did.

"...What did she come here for, anyway?" I wondered.

"Fur you. To light a fire under ya, to be precise," said Shu. A fire? "If she really wanted to take the arena, she'd have gotten it without tellin' us a thing. All she came here to do was act unbearable, annoy you, incite you...and motivate you to rent this place."

"Huhhh...?"

"Also, she said that Tsukikage won't pawrticipate in The Tournaments...but that implies that she herself will. That was a roundabout way of sayin' that she won't commit any crimes against the kingdom."

"...I see." She's shady, openly awful at times, and filthy when it comes to money...but I suppose she's not rotten to the core, at least... Even if she did kidnap me once.

"Anyway, we got our base now," said Shu.

"Yeah," I said. "Hm...?"

As I nodded to his words, I noticed that he was looking at the eighth arena. His real eyes were hidden by his costume, so I mostly had to guess from body language and stuff, but it felt like he was putting on a so-called "distant look."

It seemed like he was looking at the arena, but it felt like his eyes were fixed at something else entirely.

We just got a base for our clan... Does he find that significant in some way I don't quite get right now?

◇

After signing the contract, we told all the other clan members that we got a base and had everyone—except Lei-Lei, of course—gather at the eighth arena.

The fact that the base was an arena was so unexpected that even Rook looked surprised.

Despite the shock, though, all of them approved of my decision. In fact, the more experienced among us were extremely happy to have an environment where they could test out the aces up their sleeves without worrying about anyone seeing them.

And I'm glad they like it, I thought.

"But man... The crazy good armor, the money for the powder, Big or Small, the axe, and now this arena. That's a lot of things to get in one day..."

I felt like all of this was a little too lucky.

Nemesis often noted that my luck was on the bad side, so this made me concerned about what would happen once the pendulum swung back and I had to pay my dues for all the good luck I'd been having today.

"I understand why you would harbor such worries, but I do not believe they are necessary," she said.

"Why?"

"Because nothing that you received today was by mere luck. The material you exchanged for armor and money was your reward for defeating the whale. The bracelet and axe were your rewards for your part-time job uncursing the items in the vault. And it is because of your hard work that this arena has remained here and Count Gideon began to trust you enough to make this offer. All you have received is merely the results of your actions. It just happened to arrive on the same day. There is nothing more to it."

“...Really?”

“Be proud! Your actions deserve to be acknowledged!” she said, poking my chest.

Her words and actions made my anxiety wash away.

“Thanks for that, Nemesis.”

“That’s the spirit!” she said with a bright smile.

“Yep, she’s completely right,” added Marie as she barged into the conversation. “As someone who has watched you since your early days here, I fully agree with her!”

Nemesis seemed dissatisfied with Marie’s sudden appearance and her words, apparently struggling to keep herself from pointing out that Marie was actually responsible for my first death penalty.

“By the way, Ray,” Marie continued. “Wouldn’t you say that now is a good time to use it?”

“Use...what?”

“The thing you told us about yesterday! The ticket you won at the event!”

“...Oh!” So much had happened that I’d almost forgotten about the ticket.

I’d recently participated in a battle royale event at an uninhabited island—The Anniversary—and since I was one of the three winners, Cheshire had given me a gacha ticket that guaranteed an S-rank pull.

“You’re also participating in tomorrow’s Tournament, aren’t you? I’d say it’s a great time for you to power up. And let’s not forget you’ve just gotten a perfect environment to train and maybe test out whatever you pull.”

Marie was right—it seemed like there was no better time to use it than now.

Juliet and Alto had both gotten MVP rewards from their tickets, and Rook’s natural S-rank pull had also given him an MVP reward, so if that happened to me too...I’d have my fourth.

Though, since the MVP rewards from gacha were adjusted to suit the late tians who’d once had them, whatever I received might end up difficult for me to use—which was why I would probably need to test it in our arena before tomorrow’s Tournament.

I reached into my inventory and took out the ticket, making everyone gather around.

“...What is it about gacha that makes you want to watch people pull?”

“Let me explain, Fujinon,” said Marie. “It’s because people are attracted to things that have an unknown result. Also, if it’s other people pulling, you don’t suffer at all even if the pulls are trash.”

“...Marie,” I said. “This ticket guarantees an S-rank pull. It literally can’t be trash. Whatever comes out will be worth at least the maximum amount you can put into the gacha, which is 10,000,000 lir.”

“But in your case, it can easily be a hundred-in-one set of Tomb Labyrinth Exploration Permits, don’t you think?”

“...Don’t joke like that...please.” I’d pulled even more of those after the second one...

At least the unsigned ones can be sold... I thought.

“R-Ray, are you certain about this?” asked Nemesis. She’d been encouraging me just a few minutes ago, but even she looked concerned now.

“D-Don’t worry, Nemesis... I’m not that unlucky.”

My luck really wasn’t good, but yeah...

“But...when it comes to gacha, you are predisposed towards downright comedic pulls.”

“I’m not gonna accept that assessment!”

“I still believe you should save it,” she insisted. “Considering how the gacha has been until now, you should pull when you are cornered and out of options. Does it not seem like you might receive something very powerful then?”

“I don’t wanna rely on gacha in a situation like that!”

“But think about how it’s been in the past...”

“No! My past self was weak! Here and now, I will surpass it!”

“I would prefer it if you did not waste such impressive words on something as mundane as a gacha pull...”

Shaking away Nemesis’s words, I mustered up my courage and used the ticket! It dissolved into shining bits of light and a rainbow-colored crystal appeared in my hand as though to replace it. This was an S-rank capsule, just like the one Rook had gotten on his pull.

I’d used the gacha many times since then, but this was the first time I had an S-rank capsule myself. I was overwhelmed, but the S-rank was guaranteed in this case. The real challenge began now.

"...Hm?" Hidden within the crystal's rainbow light, I noticed a bunch of letters written on its surface. It said Open only in spacious areas. "...This isn't the first time I've seen this text." The capsule that had given me Silver had it as well.

"In that case, the prize within the capsule must be at least as large as Silver," said Nemesis. "That rules out most kinds of equipment."

"And it's definitely not a Permit or anything. What a relief..."

"...You were actually worried?"

"...Yeah. I put on a bold face, but I'm well aware of my gacha luck..."

"If only you were aware of your fashion sense, as well..."

Anyway, it was time to open the capsule. We needed a large space, but we now had a whole arena stage for that. There was enough surface area there for even a large ship.

Hell, if we got something that was too big for the arena, you could say that I really hit the jackpot.

And so, with everyone watching from a safe distance, I went and opened the rainbow capsule.

After a bright flash of light, a large object stood before me.

"Stood" didn't seem accurate, though, since it was floating.

"This is...?"

For a moment, I didn't understand what I was looking at.

It was large enough that I had to crane my neck to see the top of it, as well as wide enough that I couldn't have wrapped my arms around it.

Roughly cubic in shape, it seemed about three meters in both height and width.

At that moment, I realized that the object was actually a house floating a little more than fifty centimeters above the ground, and its name was "Carriage House of Legend."

"Well it's...not an MVP reward," I observed. Ship and building MVP rewards did exist, but based on the naming, this wasn't one of them.

According to the explanation, this thing was a house built by the King of Building from a long time ago. Since it floated, it was immune to earthquakes and the like, and it wouldn't move even in the center of a raging storm. It was also too durable to be affected by regular attacks and even regenerated the damage done by the stronger ones. The owner could easily move it around too, making moving and setting it up really simple.

It even came with an inventory made specifically for it. All in all, this was a house that could be set up anywhere and at any time.

The inside was amazing, as well. Though it seemed small on the outside, looking in, I saw a whole bunch of rooms. It reminded me of B3's dragon carriage, but this was a giant leap ahead of that.

And to top it all off...

"Oh. This house acts as a save point."

It was a simple kind of save point that couldn't be used if you were returning from a death penalty, but it was a save point nonetheless.

I'd heard that Xunyu had received a save point dragon carriage as a reward for her bodyguard duties, and this house here seemed like a similar kind of treasure.

"Ohh? Somebody I know said that items with save points are beary useful," said Shu.

I see, I thought.

As far as houses went, this one here would certainly be counted among the best. I sure as hell didn't pull trash this time, and it was no doubt worth more than 10,000,000 lir.

However...

"You pulled a house while celebratin' gettin' a house! It seems like a bit of a waste!"

"GUH...!" Io's words made me drop to my knees.

I could sense the others thinking stuff like, Why would you point that out?

And so, this became a day on which Death Period received two houses.

I guess I really am predisposed towards joke pulls, huh...?

Chapter Six: Rumination and Reminiscence

Paladin, Ray Starling

After securing a base and getting our own rooms, we'd gone to the fourth district to buy ourselves some furniture.

And now, we were making ourselves at home.

My room, by the way, was inside the arena itself. It seemed weird to set up the Carriage House of Legend here in the arena and sleep in it when I could just use the arena instead. I would probably just use it instead of tents or inns while I was in other places.

With that in mind, I was in the box seat that would become my room, refurbishing it with a curtain, a table set, and other furniture.

Among them was the placeable time-preserving inventory that Nemesis wanted. It was larger than other inventories I used and thus difficult to carry it around, but it had the ability to keep things as hot or fresh as they were at the moment they had been stored away, which was obviously very good for food.

It was fairly expensive, but it was probably nothing compared to the money I'd be spending on food from here on out. Just thinking about that gave me a headache.

I'd also bought the translation item I needed, so I summoned Smol Gar and put it on her. She instantly demanded to eat my hair, so I cut a little bit off and gave it to her to chew on.

I'm also using a hair restoration potion I got, but...this won't be bad for me in the long run, right?

"That seems like that for the furniture," said Nemesis. "Now, to focus on The Tournaments tomorrow."

"I spent most of today picking rewards and moving in here, so I didn't even level up or anything." Then again, a day spent leveling a low-rank job might've been wasteful in comparison.

“I guess we’re not getting much prep for this,” I said.

“Hrm. Well, The Tournaments are within duel barriers,” said Nemesis. “Since everything is reset after every match, you can use your MVP reward skills as much as you desire. You actually have a chance.”

“I won’t work...for free,” Smol Gar stopped eating my hair and interjected.

“For free?”

“The duel barriers. Once they’re gone, the summoning demerits would disappear too, right?”

“Yeah. I didn’t think you’d know that.”

“Shared memories.” Oh yeah—she was just like Nemesis in that she could check on my memories.

Though apparently the ones I considered more private were more difficult to access.

“Well, the costs expended and items broken do get reverted,” I said. I’d heard that that was how Logan had become the top of Dryfe’s duel rankings.

...Thinking about it now, I still didn’t know why and how duels worked the way they did. It didn’t seem like a big deal from a game design perspective, but the world of Infinite Dendrogram was built upon many solid principles. How did the barriers deal with, for example, the law of the conservation of energy? Were the battles within actually just fully sensory 3D simulations? Like...were they to Dendro what Dendro was to reality?

But that wouldn’t explain some other things, like how Xunyu was able to break the barrier...

The more I thought about it, the more mysterious it seemed. Well, we now have our own arena, so when I find the time, I might have someone look into this.

“Anyway, no arena,” Smol Gar insisted. “Though, I may think about it if you let me eat your finger after you summon me...”

“...Seriously, how do you benefit from me getting the demerits?” I asked. “Also, I guess I got two gluttons on my hands here.”

“What do you mean, ‘two’?! Do not group me with that man-eater!” Nemesis said.

“...Didn’t you try to get a taste of me just like her?” Why are my weapons such big eaters? I wondered.

"Oh man... Hm?" As I sighed, I looked through the window—the glass facing the arena itself.

It was already dark out, yet in one of the spectator seats, I saw a familiar—but still rare—sight.

The person was obviously Shu, but he wasn't wearing his costume.

"Hm..." Somewhat curious, I decided to go to him.

As I left, I saw Nemesis trying to take some of the hair I'd given to Smol Gar, who retaliated by biting her.

What the hell are you two doing?

◇◇◇

King of Destruction, Shu Starling

A clan...a base...I'd never had these things before.

It wasn't like I didn't have good friends, and I'd gotten a bunch of clan invites during my time here, but until Reiji invited me to his, I had just been rejectin' them all.

The reason why I hadn't joined any of them must've been...the bad timing.

It had taken some time after Infinite Dendrogram began for the Masters of the world to start bandin' up and formin' clans, and I met them before all of that.

"Them" bein' Humpty, Theresia, and...him.

Those encounters had happened not long after I started, and Infinite Dendrogram stopped bein' "just a game" for me just as fast.

That was why I'd never joined any clan.

Reiji's was the only exception.

"...It's been so long since then, huh?" Shortly after startin' I'd talked to Humpty after bein' thrown into a certain incident, in fact.

The subject had been "What is Infinite Dendrogram?"

Back then, I had three hypotheses about this absurdly realistic world.

The first was that it was an extremely detailed program designed to be like this from the start.

The second was that it was a virtual world, simulated using time acceleration.

And the third...was the least plausible theory of the three.

Upon hearin' those three hypotheses, Humpty had said, "...Ohh, you're on the right track. None of those three quite hit the mark, though."

She'd often led me into trouble and tended to obfuscate the truth—but she never lied either. By that point, it was already clear that this place wasn't normal.

And that became even more obvious after I met The Evil, Theresia, who had a built-in function to end this world.

Despite that, I'd stayed here and even invited Reiji to join me.

There was a goal I had—somethin' that I wanted to fulfill. Somethin' that'd been on my mind for a long time.

And I felt like it could only be done here.

That must've been why I'd also been subjected to desires that were similar to mine.

"Hrn..." The air-conditioner in my Hind Bear costume was makin' it hard to focus, so I went and took it off.

This wasn't somethin' I normally did. I guessed that bein' at my clan's base made me relax just enough to do it.

The arena was open at the top, but the barrier could be set to interfere with the vision of those lookin' from the outside in. That was just another reason why this was such a damn good piece of real estate.

Feeling the wind flowin' in from outside, I closed my eyes and recalled the battles I'd had against those who were frankly on another level.

In a desert, I'd fought the man who held the greatest magic—The Magical Apex.

"I am a cup that has lost the contents that were meant for it."

"My father did not let me inherit anything he had."

"He feared me so much that he even turned our country into a republic..."

"All so I would not receive any of it."

"Far Atum—the genesis was excruciatingly distant."

"And that is why the person I am in this world will claim it all for himself."

"I will acquire everything that I was supposed to be given."

"My wife told me that she would guide my way."

"And in exchange, I will destroy every obstacle in her path."

"She also told me that Shu Starling would one day become such an obstacle."

"Through our cooperation just now, I could feel that you are indeed powerful."

"And that is why, I will now measure your power directly...Shu."

As I was leaving Tenchi after receiving my Godcloth, I'd encountered the man with unmatched technique—The Technical Apex.

"They must see use."

"These fingers must see use, lest the ancient techniques within them grow dull."

"Touch the skin. Tear the flesh. Split the bone. Reap the life."

"That alone is honing your skill."

"To use what you had under the light of day meant always changing your domicile."

"How vexing."

"Here, however, even the living can be freely used for such things."

"The techniques must not degrade before they are inherited."

"And that is why we are here."

"We came here today to test our arts on the godbeast of Kamuy Forest."

"Yet you defeated the beast and took away our chance."

"Thus, we will hone our techniques on you instead."

And here in the duel city, I'd met the beast with the strongest body of all, as well as her Master—The Physical Apex.

"Then I don't mind.

"All I want is to face you in a contest of pure power."

"Like I said, that was just a final check that you were truly a worthy opponent."

"If that killed you, you would've been unworthy of a proper fight...a mere pebble just like the rest."

"You are indeed worthy."

Lookin' back at the memories I had of the "Apices," I let out a sigh.

Thinking about them made me realize something once again.

"Man... What the hell do they think I am?" It wasn't like they hated me or had some kind of grudge or anythin'.

Despite that, way too many people wanted to fight me.

Measurement, honin', the fight itself... They wanted different things, but they all had in common the fact that they didn't give a damn what I wanted.

The "Apices" had way too many screws loose.

Just like him, they lived in a world where common sense just wasn't a thing...

Well...Behemot, at least, was probably normal in real life.

As far as I could tell, she was—

"This is rare. You never take off your costume when you're not fighting."

My thought was cut short by a voice from the side.

I turned to its source and saw...Reiji. I was so lost in thought that I hadn't even sensed him approach.

"Well, I've been doin' some thinkin' and felt like feelin' the wind," I said.

"Ohh. Well, you can't do that with the costume, I guess. But, man..."

"What?"

"This is supposed to be your normal appearance, but it actually feels weirder than the bear suit."

"Someone I'm beary familiar with told me the same thing."

That "someone" was Rachel...Lei-Lei.

...Now that I thought about it, she had a few screws loose too. Though, maybe it was better to say that she was just "slightly off." I'd known about her behavioral principle—her dream—since we were children, and her Embryo, Eden, was the result of Infinite Dendrogram adapting it in an unusual manner. The powers it had because of that were just...freaky.

"So, you ready for tomorrow's Tournament?" I asked.

"Well, as ready as can be, I guess," he replied. "I'll use everything I've got...except Gardranda. She told me not to summon her in duels."

"Conscious summons and intelligent tamed monsters can be like that every now and then."

"...I can't imagine Rook's three monsters being that disobedient, though." Well, they'd all fallen for him, so...

Then again, Gardranda was kinda similar in that regard.

Whether he realized it himself or not, Reiji was always the type of guy people easily liked. The incident with the amazons in South America was one of the more...unfortunate results of that.

...Man, goin' to pick him up from there sure was a challenge.

Big sis, Sensei... I knew way too many people who seemed like they belonged in different genres of fiction, and they sure didn't make my life any easier.

When she heard that our sis had taken Reiji to the Amazon, our mom actually collapsed from worry. Seriously, though, how do you end up goin' all the way to South America "for a part-time job"?

Well, the job she was currently on was an extension of that one, but still...

That reminds me that she still hasn't given back the money I spent to go there, I thought.

"You okay, bro?" Reiji asked.

"I'm just rememberin' this and that. By the way, Reiji, I heard you got some beary weird axe?"

"Yeah. This one here," he said as he reached into his inventory and took out a one-handed axe covered in a black cloth.

"Lemme look at it fur a minute."

"Sure." When he gave it to me, I took a look at it, then threw my fist at it.

The clash between my fist and the axe resounded throughout the arena.

"NHUH?!" Reiji immediately voiced his shock at the sight.

Though...in all honesty, I wanted to yell in surprise myself.

"...I see." I was surprised, sure, but part of me also wasn't.

Its aura alone told me that this was that kinda thing, but I couldn't help but be shocked that my all-out attack didn't even crack it.

My fists could shatter even Mythical metal. I could even put cracks in the Ultrahard Regalia that Fatoum made by compressing Mythical metal. Even special defenses meant nothing as long as the object's endurance was below my attack power, since that would activate Right of Destruction.

That meant that this axe was made of something even tougher than my attack power.

I felt like I couldn't put a dent in this thing even if I used Baldr's ult.

"The hell are you doing?!" Reiji panicked, taking back the axe and holding it close.

"Hey, it was a joke. I wasn't bein' fur real."

That was a lie. I'd actually punched as hard as I could. From what I could see, this axe that didn't even crack under my fist was already missin' a few pieces here and there. I couldn't help but wonder what had caused that.

"Anyway, it's beary tough, so if nothin' else, you can always use it as a shield." In all honesty, I couldn't even imagine what would happen if someone tried to wield it as a weapon.

"That so...? Well, it's still cursed, so it's not like I can equip it. Using it could have some major drawbacks."

"Ha ha ha." It'd be weirder if it didn't.

"Phew," Reiji sighed. "I'm used to you doing crazy things when you're in bear form, but when you look like this, that kinda stuff is heart-stopping. It makes me remember that competition you were in."

"...I guess I get ya." For a moment, I almost remembered how I'd felt back then, but decided to put it out of my mind.

"I'll go back to my room, then," he said. "Got my Tournament tomorrow and all."

"That so?"

“The results of The Tournaments will change what I’ll be able to do in the fight against Dryfe. Losing to KoB made me realize that I’m still not strong enough...so I’ll take my best shot at this.”

I said nothing in response. The War would surely follow after The Tournaments. Tians as well as control AIs such as Humpty would surely act to prepare for that.

It was clear that Reiji would soon take part in his first War, and I in my second... No—this War would be a first for me too in a lot of ways.

“Shu?” As Reiji looked at me with curious eyes, I wondered if I should tell him about what had happened.

“...Don’t mind me,” I said. “You go on and rest fur tomorrow.”

I ultimately decided against it.

“You don’t have to tell me that... Also, the bear puns really don’t work when you look like that.”

“How unbearable.” This conversation wasn’t much different from ones we always had. It ended, and I just watched Reiji as he walked away.

The thing I was considering telling him was a story of the past—the actual reason why I hadn’t participated in the first War against Dryfe.

I didn’t say anything because it was more or less nothing but an excuse—an explanation of my actions and an expression of my regret.

It was a story of the time Sechs and I had fought until the very end.

Chapter Seven: Love Letter

January, 2045

The New Year of 2045 was a memorable time for many.

Most were obviously celebrating the holiday, while some, like Reiji Mukudori, were busy preparing for the upcoming college entrance exams.

It was a good time for Infinite Dendrogram players too. The game held a New Year's event that had, among other things, increased spawn rates for monsters that were bursting with Resources in the form of XP.

It was not all good, however, as something unpleasant—as well as unavoidable—was on the verge of happening.

This was a major event involving two countries—namely, Dryfe's declaration of War against Altar.

After many consecutive bad harvests, Dryfe had been thrown into a state of famine, and to mend the situation, they would invade Altar, which had abandoned them in their time of need.

Altar's leadership already knew that Dryfe was readying their soldiers for an invasion through the old Lunnings Duchy and that they would attack in about three days. That was information gathered by DIN, the Arch Sage, and Altar's intelligence, so it was unlikely to be wrong.

In preparation for that, the Altarian King, Eldor Zeo Altar, began recruiting volunteers. He didn't discriminate between tians and Masters, calling upon anyone and everyone who lamented this dire situation and wished to fight against it. This was directly opposed to Dryfe's approach—the imperium offered rewards to any Master who helped them out.

Because of this, Altarian Masters—especially the "ludos"—weren't too receptive to the king's calls.

Even many worlders prioritized defending their own hometowns instead of the country itself, and as a result, Altar didn't have many Masters fighting for it.

But perhaps most importantly of all, there were also no War participants from the Altarian Big Three—the ones that had protected Altar from the Tri-

Zenith Dragon, Gloria.

◇

In the terrace of a café bathed in the late-day sun, a man in a raccoon costume was drinking black tea while reading an evening newspaper.

The paper wasn't from DIN or the largest printer in Altar, but it was one that was infamous for its articles full of scathing critique.

It didn't take much reading for the costumed man to realize that today's paper had focused heavily on attacking Altar's Big Three.

First of all, the High Priestess, Tsukuyo Fuso, had demanded something far greater than ever before in exchange for her clan's participation in the upcoming War. Since Altar's stance was to not reward any Masters, they had refused. And because Tsukuyo Fuso refused to bend, the negotiations were simply canceled.

The article was condemning her for profiteering from the situation.

That all seems right to me, the person in the costume thought. That fox would definitely take advantage of this.

That was, after all, exactly what she'd done during Gloria's attack.

It was worth noting that despite Tsukuyo Fuso's decision, the Masters of the Lunar Society weren't actually prohibited from participating if they so wished. As far as religious groups went, theirs was quite lenient. This might've been expected, however—the core of their teachings was the phrase "Embrace this free world and celebrate your liberty to your soul's content."

The article that followed that one was about the Over Gladiator, Figaro. It claimed that, when asked about whether he would participate in the War, he said that he "wasn't interested in sloppy fights." The writer condemned him for being a "picky fighter" who fought exclusively in duels and one-on-ones, calling him a "self-centered battle maniac" for it.

"...That ain't exactly wrong," said the man in the costume. However, since he knew the circumstances, he felt like the article was missing some details. He had been there when Figaro was interviewed, and the conversation went as such:

"Mr. Figaro, will you participate in the War?"

"...No."

"Why?! Is this not the perfect opportunity to show your might to the world...?!"

"I'm not interested in that. Also, it'd be a sloppy, messy fight where I'd have both allies and enemies—and more importantly, tians and Masters... There would be no point."

The exchange ended with the interviewer in shock.

The words quoted in the article weren't actually wrong. However, it appeared that the journalist writing it interpreted them as "I'm not interested in sloppy fights. There would be no point—in other words, I don't stand to gain anything from joining in," which wasn't exactly accurate.

Figaro could only fight solo, and since the War would involve both allies and enemies, he wouldn't be half as strong if he participated.

The fact that both tians and Masters would be participating made it even worse for him, because Figaro had never actually killed a single tian.

Outside of duels where everyone involved would come back, ending tian lives was something that Figaro simply never did. This didn't make him a rare case—many worlder Masters shared his stance on tian murder.

Infinite Dendrogram was extremely realistic, and that extended to its people. Some Masters took it a step further and never killed even monsters, instead focusing on crafting. A few had even given up on the world entirely.

A War that involved tians and didn't allow solo combat was an environment that would have made Figaro powerless, both physically and mentally.

What he'd meant with his words was that "there would be no point—in other words, I wouldn't be useful."

You couldn't even blame the journalist for misinterpreting that. Who would ever believe that the duel champion who was also a Superior would even imply that he would be useless in a war? It was unthinkable, especially if you didn't know Figaro's flaws.

The fact of the matter was that if he were to participate, even a lowly grunt could take him out. The only way he could be of use in the War was if there was a situation where he could fight alone and his only enemies were Masters.

However, the first Knight-Machine War wasn't that kind of conflict.

"All righty..."

The last article was about King of Destruction.

It mentioned the message KoD had sent to the various newspaper companies, and it even publicly revealed the text of it.

The message read, “If I participate in a big event, I could accidentally expose my face. I’m not going to the War.”

That was it.

All KoD had sent was a brief message saying that he wouldn’t participate in the War because he wanted to maintain his status as “The Unknown.”

The general reaction to this could be summed up in three sentences: “He’s hiding, yet he sends out a message like this. What a bastard,” “He’s gotta be hiding because he’s actually weak and doesn’t want anyone to find out,” and “He probably only beat Gloria because the other two softened it up.”

It was notably harsher than the reaction to the other two. That was because while Tsukuyo Fuso was the head of a major group and Figaro was the duel champion, everything about King of Destruction was a mystery.

Not saying a word, the man in the costume—Shu Starling himself—read the disparaging remarks as if they didn’t make him think anything at all.

It was as though being condemned didn’t affect him whatsoever.

Or perhaps he...

“I have been searching for you.”

Suddenly, he heard a voice from behind him.

Looking around, he saw a huge hamster. It was none other than the control AI that also served as the third princess’s pet, Dormouse.

It was also one of the few creatures that knew KoD was Shu.

“Yo, Dormouse. I’m pawsitive I haven’t seen you in a hot minute. What did you come to me fur?”

Shu’s response was the same as it’d ever be—casual and with costume-related puns.

“Theresia wishes to speak to you,” Dormouse said, taking a crystal ball out of his fur.

It was a comms magic item, and out of it came a little girl’s voice.

“...Yo.” At some point, their conversation had stopped reaching anyone except those at Shu’s table—Dormouse’s doing, no doubt.

“So, what did you call me fur?” Shu asked.

"It's about the message the newspapers received. Are you really the one who sent it?"

"Yeah. Why ask me that, though? It was obvious it was me since all the newspapers are makin' it public after running it by Truth Discernment. Hell, you could've just asked Dormouse."

"That's true... I just didn't think that you would refuse to participate in the War just because it may expose you."

Theresia had no intention to condemn his decision—she'd simply felt that the text was unlike him and had sent Dormouse to get a confirmation.

"That so?" Shu asked.

"Yes... If that was a reason for you to not get involved in a conflict, you wouldn't have actually been there for very many of them...including the ones where Sechs was involved."

"...He and I just kinda happened to keep clashin' here and there," Shu said with a sigh as he remembered the many incidents they'd been part of. "Anyway, yeah...it's not that I'm afraid to show my face. Well, I guess I am a little bit. I'm a shy boy and showing it around gives me pawse."

Shu spoke partly in jest, and Theresia met those words with silence. It was starting to become hard for him to joke around, so he spoke a little more seriously.

"I doubt I'll be makin' it to the War, and if everyone fought clingin' to the hope that I'd come to their aid, it could just make the casualties worse, so I went and used a shitty excuse and said I won't come at all."

"So what is the actual reason you're not going?" Theresia asked. She was now certain that his nonparticipation wasn't by choice.

In response, Shu was quiet for a moment, then said, "...I got a love letter."

It seemed like one of his jokes at first, but the face he was making inside the raccoon costume was completely serious.

"A love letter? From whom?" she asked.

"...Dormouse, read this for me," he said as he reached into his inventory and took out the letter.

It was crumpled, presumably by Shu grasping it tightly, but it was readable nonetheless.

Dormouse skillfully balanced on three legs and took the letter in one of his forelimbs.

"'Mr. Starling...'" he began reading, but before he could even properly start, he was filled with shock as the entire text sunk in.

The letter went as follows...

◆

Mr. Starling,

By the time this letter reaches you, the War between Altar and Dryfe will be five days away.

I know you will act of your own volition and participate in it to protect the kingdom.

That is why, six hours before the War begins, I will attack either you or what you wish to protect.

If you are alongside Altar's army on the front lines, I will target those present.

If you challenge Dryfe on your own, I will target Altea.

If you have a death penalty or are offline, I will destroy Altarian cities one by one until you come back.

And if you are alone somewhere far from any settlement, I will attack you.

Where you are does not concern me. This me will act as described regardless.

This moment and situation makes it possible for us to fight until the end.

You would give me a serious fight under these conditions, would you not? And that is why, here and now, I challenge you.

I will face you no matter where you are at the time.

If possible, I wish the circumstances to be as favorable as they can be.

Regards, King of Crime, Sechs Würfel

◆

It was a letter from the Master Shu was more involved with than any other.

A letter of challenge from King of Crime, Sechs Würfel.

Cruella Mountain Belt

The Cruella Mountain Belt that acted as the border between Altar and Caldina was a dangerous territory rife with bandits who targeted the passing trade caravans.

One of the mountain villas here was a hideout of such thieves, but now only two people were in it.

These two had slaughtered each and every one of the bandits who originally inhabited it.

They hadn’t had a strong reason for doing so—they were merely traveling through the mountains to avoid being seen and had stumbled upon this villa. The bandits attacked them on sight and were in turn annihilated in the blink of an eye. You could say that the thieves were simply unlucky.

“...You really doin’ this, Sechs?” One of the two was a relatively short man wearing a gray suit, a matching trench coat, and a gangster-like hat.

He was The Weapon, Rascal the Bloodonyx. With his back to one of the villa’s pillars, he was spinning a gear-like object in his hand while talking to the other man—a black-haired, black-eyed, plain-looking youth in clothing just as unremarkable. He was none other than King of Crime, Sechs Würfel.

“Yes,” Sechs replied with a smile. “I understand that you came all this way to try and make me reconsider, but I am resolute.”

Slightly irritated by the response, Rascal spun the gear again before saying, “Tetragrammaton...our base ain’t even done yet. We’re still in the process of gettin’ the Soul Trader to be our fifth official member, and we don’t even have that many supportin’ members either. Our alliance with The Death has also just begun. We’re just startin’ to take off.”

They were both part of Illegal Frontier—a clan made up exclusively of criminal Superiors.

In fact, they were the leader and sub-leader.

IF was still new and was currently in a very important time period for its development as a clan—and yet the leader, Sechs, was prioritizing personal matters instead of the good of the group.

“Most of that is true,” he said. “But the base is already complete, no?”

“Only on the outside,” Rascal retorted. “We don’t have the people or the processors to run a ship that huge, and good processors’re hard to come by even in pre-ancient civ ruins. Most o’ them become sentient and turn into goddamn UBMs.”

"Is your Machina not a valid substitute?" Sechs asked.

Rascal glanced at the gear in his hand, shook his head, and said, "Sure, my Deus Ex Machina can be a connector, and I can use it for control, but connectin's basically all it does then. It's pointless if there's nothin' to connect it to. If I want it to act as a good processor, I need the processor itself. That's why I'm plannin' to raid some major ruins in Caldina soon. It wouldn't be easy, though, and I was plannin' on your assistance..."

"That is unfortunate. However, my decision is final."

Sechs didn't waver even though Rascal needed his help.

That said all that was needed to be said about how important this was to him.

"Why do it now?" Rascal asked. "Ya didn't forget our goal or the benefits of achievin' it, right? It's nothin' but risky now, but eventually, those risks're gonna be gone."

"Of course I did not forget it, and I am fully aware of that." Sechs nodded in response, still unwilling to change his mind. "However, chances for a serious fight against Shu are few and far between."

"...You tellin' me he was holdin' back? Against you?"

"He was always doing his best, but he never once fought with the goal of defeating me," Sechs said as he closed his eyes and reflected upon the past. "In every incident he was involved in ever since the time I kidnapped Theresia, I was merely an extra. He always had things he had to prioritize over me."

They had been involved and interacted with each other for a long time now, sometimes as enemies, sometimes as allies. However, they had never had a true clash against one another. This was because although their goals were generally very different, they were never quite directly opposed.

"That is why it must be done now."

"I...I see," said Rascal, finally understanding Sechs.

"I will use the coming War to create a situation in which he must defeat me. He will surely come and fight me with that in mind."

If Sechs merely engaged in more terrorism, Shu would likely take care of the problem while avoiding conflict with him.

However, things were different now that Altar as a whole was being threatened. If Sechs chose to attack the Altarian army before they faced Dryfe or assaulted the towns on the other side of the land, it would severely damage the kingdom's defenses, making their defeat in the War all but certain.

If what he wanted was to keep the casualties to a minimum, Shu would have no choice but to fight Sechs.

"Ya know this comes with the risk of losin' and bein' sent to the gaol, right?"

"Yes."

"And that you'll be leavin' behind the clan...that you created?"

"Yes," Sechs replied, fully aware of what Rascal was saying. "But would you not say that this is typical of us members of Illegal Frontier? To put our desires above the convenience of others?"

"...That is true." Rascal had no grounds to argue against that. Even the goal they shared as a group was ultimately only meant to support the goals they had personally, and Rascal was no exception—he was playing Infinite Dendrogram because there was something he felt he had to do.

"My apologies," Sechs said. "I might end up entrusting the management of the clan to you."

"Don't say that like ya haven't been leavin' the business work and infrastructure to me since before IF was even established," Rascal said, then heaved a sigh. "Well, fine. You do you. I still owe ya for Emily and other stuff. I can hold this thing together while you're away." To Rascal, Sechs was both the clan leader and a friend, so he ultimately respected his decision no matter how risky it was. "Leave a letter for Zeta before ya go, though. She'd probably get really annoyin' if ya don't. I can actually imagine her thinkin' I'm plannin' somethin', and we don't need an internal conflict on our hands," Rascal said with a wry grin.

"Very well," Sechs replied with a faint smile.

"Also...this is in case ya lose, but...I dunno what kinda place the gaol is, but get out of it within a year. I'll keep workin' on the prep until then."

"You believe I can escape the gaol?"

"Yeah. You may fail sometimes, but you can do anythin', can't ya?"

Sechs said nothing in response to that, but his face was still in a smile.

"Go get 'im, leader. What you want is right in front of you."

"It certainly is. Farewell."

With that, Sechs went towards Altea, where Shu was waiting, while Rascal turned away and went on the path back to Caldina.

This had been the last time they'd met, but neither of them believed that it was their last ever.

◇◆◇

Kingdom of Altar, Nowest Canyon

Three days had passed since Shu had shown Sechs's letter to Dormouse and Theresia. Before dawn, when light was still scarce, Shu stood alone in the Nowest Canyon.

This was where Altar's Big Three had faced and defeated the Tri-Zenith Dragon, Gloria. The local geography had been devastated, while the ecosystem had all but vanished within Gloria's Fatal Field, making it an area where neither people nor monsters ever ventured.

That was exactly why Shu had chosen it as the place where he would face Sechs.

Well, that and the fact that it was between Altea and the old Lunnings Duchy, which would make it easy for him to contribute to the war effort.

It was predicted that the War would start at noon. However, Shu felt that defeating Sechs and surviving to assist Altar would be more difficult than anything he'd ever done before.

More time passed as he waited in silence. The sun had begun to rise and the clock hit six in the morning when...

"Apologies for the wait."

...Sechs arrived, just as he'd said he would.

He was still the black-haired, black-eyed, bespectacled, plain-looking youth that he'd always been. He was even wearing his usual smile.

However, even though this was merely a form he was assuming, Shu felt as if Sechs was...somewhat excited.

Silence followed. Shu had chosen to fight in these mountains, and now Sechs had come here as well.

They had both been certain that this would happen. Sechs knew that Shu would do this, and Shu knew that Sechs wouldn't use the opportunity to commit some other misdeed.

Despite the fact that they would now fight to the death, they knew each other better than some people who were the closest of friends.

"...If you were here, you could've just shown yourself instead of wastin' my time," Shu said as he eyed Sechs for an opening. He was waiting for a moment he could deliver a fatal blow and end this battle before it could even properly begin, but alas, on this particular day, Sechs's guard was impenetrable.

"Wasting your time...? So you intend to defeat me and rush to aid in the War?"

"Yeah."

"Do you think you will have any strength left?"

"Dunno. But it's possible that I'll be able to do somethin', ain't it?"

"That is true. Oh, and if you lose to me, I will attack Altar, so please face me with everything you have."

"...I knew you'd say that." Since Sechs's goal was to force Shu to fight him as hard as he could, that much went without saying.

If this was a battle he could simply lose without consequence, it wouldn't have required such a set-up. Losing to Sechs would obviously influence the War and the fate of Altar.

"...Though, I will say that participating in the War does not seem to suit you," Sechs said with a lower tone than usual, but his face still smiling. "The proactiveness of people is highly influenced by their views of good and evil. Apparently, if they see something as bad, they will simply not do it or at least be reluctant to, and if they think nothing of it, there will be no such reluctance. "

"Seems so."

They both spoke as if these words had nothing to do with them.

"And if they think that something is right...they will push themselves to do it." Nothing could stop a person from doing what they thought was righteous. Even if their actions brought harm to others, they would not slow down as long as they believed they were just. "In most cases when people become like that, they are not alone. They are often accompanied by like-minded brethren and act as members of a greater group, losing control for the sake of their justice. Looking around and seeing many people who shared their will reassured them that they were righteous, which only made them more dedicated to the cause."

The march of an army fueled by a sense of justice was truly a fearsome thing.

"Both armies that will soon face each other in the old Lunnings Duchy believe themselves to be right," Sechs said as he looked into the distant west, his smile now gone. "The Altarians defending against Dryfean invaders think they are on the side of justice, and the Dryfeans trying to save their country from famine also see their cause as righteous. With these thoughts reinforced by those around them, they march into a war—perhaps even clinging to the comforting pretense that there is no other way."

Sechs spoke of the nature of this War, but it was clear that these principles applied to wars in general.

"But...there is no true righteousness there," he continued as Shu just silently listened. "Not a single person in either army did what they believed was right in the absence of anyone to affirm it."

He then looked away from the western horizon, faced Shu, and put on a smile which seemed different from the one he'd had.

"But there is someone right here who never wavers." The smile on his face now was much like the one Sechs had shown when Shu went to defeat the UBM that was treated as a god, paying no heed to the verbal abuse hurled at him by the villagers. "I've thought so since the day I met you. You knew full well that the girl could destroy the world, yet you protected her regardless—and still do. You never hesitated or doubted your decisions, always sticking to your strong sense of justice."

In Sechs's mind, Shu was a strong person who did what he felt was right regardless of what others thought of it, and that was exactly why Sechs had found himself drawn to him.

"This person before you...I have no sense of right or wrong or anything like that, so I find myself dazzled by your strong sense of justice."

"...That so?"

Shu also believed that Sechs was nothing like the people he was talking about. He didn't see himself as just and never felt remorse no matter how many evils he'd committed—he was merely doing what the people had deemed was bad.

Good and evil didn't exist in Sechs's mind. There were only the crimes as established by society. His conduct was never hindered by a sense of wrong nor expedited by righteousness.

In his life, Sechs merely moved forward...no—he descended downward. He was like a drop of water, falling into a dark abyss and dragging everything down with him with no regard for good or evil.

Never doing anything but committing crime, Sechs was more of a phenomenon than a man—the world's most hollow king of sins.

Shu already knew that, but he was still unaware of the reasons why.

"Do you remember the Divine Disks?" Sechs asked. "That is the UBM that you and I cooperated to defeat."

"...Yeah."

"The people that worshipped it instantly went on to join Altar. Their village is now no different from any other."

Sechs brought this up like it was simple gossip, but those who tried would make out a hint of...irritation in his voice.

"The moment they were no longer under the wings of their deity, they fled beneath the wings of Altar. They worshipped their god, sacrificed children to it, and condemned you for its sake. They believed they were righteous, but now they live on completely forgetting their previous faith and allegiance. They are all weaklings who kiss up to the strong and have no justice of their own."

His words were far harsher than anyone could ever expect from him, which made Shu ask a question.

"Are you...angry?"

"Angry? Me?" Sechs put his hand on his mouth. It seemed that he hadn't realized it himself.

After a few moments of thought...

"...Perhaps."

...he acknowledged Shu's words.

"I myself was a sacrifice, after all."

"A sacrifice?" That wasn't a word one would associate with the fearsome King of Crime, yet that was what he called himself.

As for the reason for that...

"The me that is not this me...the person I am in reality...was born as a clone made for organ transplants. Biological stock."

◆

Cloning technology had already existed for decades before the current year of 2045. There had been successful clonings of not only animals, but people, as well. The old technological hurdles related to clone lifespan and body function had already been conquered.

The people of this world—those that dwelled on Earth—already had functioning cloning technology. However, it wasn't something that would see common use, and the reason for that was obvious—morality.

Though technology had permitted it, cloning people was considered unthinkable from a moral standpoint.

However, there were hushed whispers that human clones were being produced in the less regulated countries as well as in other places, but in secret, away from the eyes of the moral public.

These were clones that elite or wealthy people created in case they were heavily injured or afflicted by internal diseases, when they would call upon them to provide healthy organs.

Nothing but living, breathing storage for "spare parts," these clones were the very definition of sacrifices.

In countries driven by morality, they were seen as fiction—but they did indeed exist, and Sechs was one of them.

◆

"You're...a clone?"

"Yes. It has been twenty and...a few more years since I was created."

Sechs had never revealed this truth about himself to anyone. Even Rascal and Zeta were still in the dark about it, yet he'd gone and told it to Shu.

"I was created when a certain elite family finally had their heir apparent. Not legally, of course."

Some people with incredible wealth chose to go to particular other countries to secretly create organ transplant clones, just in case. They would be raised so that their ages matched their originals, and if the originals caught some sort of disease, the clones would have their organs used to save them.

"Though, my original died before I could provide my organs," Sechs said. "Apparently, it was some sort of accident that killed him instantly." Shu was silent. "However, he is not officially dead."

It was easy for Shu to understand what Sechs meant by that.

"...'Cause you replaced him?" he asked, to confirm.

Sechs responded with a nod and said, “It was declared that he survived and I was made to take his place. Instead of just my body parts replacing his, I became a replacement for his entire existence... Though, perhaps they had anticipated this. I grew up knowing I was an organ transplant clone, and yet I was still provided with basic education.”

Shu merely listened as Sechs continued. “Of course, I could not possibly take over the social life of the original, but that was not a problem if I simply never saw anyone. Officially, ‘the heir is currently recovering from the accident.’”

He’d been isolated from the public, taught what he needed to know about the world as well as any relationships relevant to him, all in preparation to make a soft landing into society as a replacement for this dead heir. All but a select few believed that the original was still alive, completely clueless to the existence of Sechs himself.

“My role is to continue the lineage. After all, I have the appearance and DNA of the original. My father—at least genetically—is already too old to have offspring, and despite the fact that he commissioned a clone, he is against creating actual offspring via artificial insemination. I will eventually marry a woman of some other elite family, we will have children, they will inherit everything from me, and I will be dismissed.”

“Sechs...” Hearing that made Shu feel something, but it was definitely not pity.

He didn’t look down on Sechs enough to feel something like that for him.

If there was a word for what Shu was feeling, it was most likely “understanding.” Sechs had been born as spare organ storage, but when donating became impossible, he was forced to be a full replacement for his original and carry on the lineage.

That explained why he was so...

“I have no life of my own. I was not even born with the intent of being a person... When I came to this world and received Nu—this body—I became fully aware of what I truly am.”

He raised his right hand and turned to slime.

No, not “turned,” but “returned.”

“I am nothing but a droplet of blood and DNA—a substitute that changes shape to suit its vessel.”

As he spoke, he changed himself into a man, then a woman, then Sechs.

"And that is why...I am Nu."

Albeit to varying degrees, Embryos were influenced by their Masters. They represented their natures, actions, and maybe even their ultimate fates.

Looking at it like that, Nu might have been the only thing Sechs could ever be.

"But despite what I am, I was at least able to roll the dice on what I would be in this world."

Sechs had his share of free time in reality. Though he was locked away, he'd been given the freedom to read books or enjoy a game or two.

However, he didn't know what to actually do with that free time.

And that might have been exactly why, just like the many others who were uncertain what to do with their time, he was attracted to Infinite Dendrogram's offer of infinite possibilities.

To him, it had seemed like a door to a world where he could truly live freely.

And upon seeing the die on the table during the tutorial, he'd made a decision.

He was a hollow person meant only to be a replacement. Any paths he could choose in his daily life were not actually his own.

And that was why he'd decided that he would be the one to roll the die and set his future here in Infinite Dendrogram.

"That is my freedom."

The fate he'd rolled for himself was one of evil. Directly opposed to the justice of the majority, he would be a methodical committer of sin.

However, he was satisfied with that. He had chosen to be evil and he lived as such.

Everyone looked at him, and through his evil, they were acknowledging Sechs himself.

And that was not the only thing that being evil had provided him. It had given him personal principles, human relations, allies, memories, and had led to him meeting a person who was both his opposite as well as his mirror—a person he was more taken with than anyone else.

"Shu."

"...Sechs."

Sechs looked directly at Shu and slowly began talking once again.

“Please...fight me until the end,” he said. “This is my true form. What I truly am. I am a substitute that changes shape to fit its vessel. A droplet of blood and flesh. This is my undiluted nature.”

Sechs then began converting his body into red-and-black slime.

"And in spite of this nature of mine, living as this me in this world made me see something I could not see before. I feel as though I am not far from fully grasping its truth. I simply need to come to understand what I must."

He looked at Shu with eyes full of longing.

"And so, for me to live as myself...this me—the entity that I am—must face you...my polar opposite."

Sechs shut his eyes and clenched his hands into fists as though to grasp what he was seeking deep within. He considered Shu—the unwavering man who was no one's replacement and never compromised who he was. Sechs wished...

"...To understand you." He opened his eyes again.

"If I do that, I might be able to live as myself. Not just here...but on the other side as well."

Infinite Dendrogram promised to provide its players with their one true possibility unique to them. That manifested as their Embryos, as well as the experiences they had here.

And Sechs sincerely believed that his possibility could only be found if he defeated Shu—his polar opposite.

"Our lives may be transient, but let us fight...until the end."

This was why he wanted a fight to the death—the moment they both would bare everything to one another.

"...How long have I been involved with ya now?" Shu said as he processed Sechs's words. "Over four years, right? If that's the answer you came to after thinkin' that long, then sure. Let's do this."

Thus, he accepted the suggestion.

"Though...I'll tell ya one thing." Shu fell silent for a moment...and removed his apparel. He'd used Clothing Switch to change from the specialized, unwieldy raccoon costume into custom-made pure combat equipment. This set was the most optimal fighting gear he had at this point in time. It didn't hide his face whatsoever and doubled as an expression of a will to destroy his enemies.

And thus, Shu...

"Don't think that a measly little fight to the death's gonna be enough to really understand me."

...grinned back at Sechs and took to action.

And so, with the War but a few hours away, known to none, a battle between two of Altar’s strongest had begun.

Chapter Eight: Gods of Destruction and Creation

King of Destruction and King of Crime

Shu and Sechs had fought many times before. Over four years had passed since they met, and they had already clashed more times than could be counted on one hand.

Because of this, both of them had a good understanding of each other's combat styles.

Shu had two different ways of fighting: an "army of two" approach and "machine god rush."

The former was focused on using his unbelievable STR, resistance nullification, and combat prowess to fight from up close while Baldr provided him with wide-area artillery cover.

The latter was the fighting style he used against large or powerful foes—close combat while inside Baldr's giant robot form.

Regardless of which he was using, however, he was simply delivering destruction in different ways. One could actually call his fighting style "simple," especially when compared to that of his opponent.

Sechs's combat style, after all, was often described as "faceless."

◇◆

"RRHAAGH!" Expelling his breath, Shu took a step forwards and threw his right fist at Sechs.

"Shapeshift: Rechter Arm of the King of Destruction!" King of Crime responded with a gleeful smile, followed by a right punch of his own.

The fists clashed, and their powers canceled each other out.

As though the punches were equal in might, their bodies didn't even flinch. However, the impact cracked open the ground beneath them, and Sechs's right fist began to shatter shortly after.

"Baldr!" At that moment, Shu used his immense leg strength to jump backwards.

A split second later, a rain of incendiary missiles from Baldr's Stardust Genocider showered Sechs in fiery destruction.

"Shapeshift: Eisshild." Even a slime like Sechs should have not remained unharmed by Baldr's searing blaze—and yet, Sechs was neither burning nor boiling.

The reason for that was his left hand...equipped with a shield of ice.

The hand itself was different, as well, with skin of a color far darker than Sechs's own.

Shu instantly understood what that meant.

"An Embryo that's got Heat Absorption! Where'd ya stock up that one, huh?!"

"It was a little find in Caldina."

Despite the fire surrounding him, Sechs replied as though he was rather chilly.

◆

Sechs's Superior Embryo was called "Nu," and its core trait was "transformation."

It gave him the power to transform into other people, copying their jobs, skills, and even their Embryos—the entities that were thought of as one with their Masters. That meant that by simply transforming a part of his body into that of another Master, he would essentially be transforming it into their Embryo as well.

He'd nullified Shu's first attack by turning his right arm into Shu's own to meet the strike. And for the incendiary missiles that had followed, he'd used Jötunheimr, a shield-like Embryo focused on Heat Absorption, which he'd acquired from an enemy he'd faced in Caldina.

The more transformations he had stocked up, the more cards Sechs had in his hand.

That was why his combat style was called "faceless."

Of course, it had its own share of weaknesses.

First of all, Nu's Embryo stat growth bonus was negative.

King of Crime was not a combat-oriented SJ and thus didn't have impressive stats to begin with, and since Nu's stat growth bonus further halved them, Sechs's own base stats were astonishingly lackluster.

Additionally, the transformation skill, Shapeshift, had several limitations.

First, it required him to take in actual cells. He couldn't add any Master or tian transformation into his stock without absorbing cells from their body in some way.

Second, it was limited to beings who actually had a physical form. He couldn't assume a body that resembled the spiritual kind of undead, nor could he copy Embryos of the Territory type.

Third, stocking up on transformations didn't give him any actual information about them. He didn't know what skills they came with or how they were used. Simply putting these transformations in stock did not mean he would automatically understand how to wield them, and to employ them optimally, he had no choice but to learn it from the sources themselves.

And then there was the fourth and final limitation: the fact that he could only transform into those who were "half of what he was."

With Embryos, that meant half of his own Embryo's form, rounded up. This meant that even as a Superior Embryo, Nu could only completely transform into Embryos up to their third form.

With people, he could only assume the shape of someone who had half of his total job level or less, meaning that to transform into the first-rate Masters who were far above level 1,000—such as Shu—Sechs had to have a total level of over 2,000.

If he didn't fulfill this requirement—if his level was less than double that of his Shapeshift target—the resulting transformation's precision, stats, and skill power would greatly suffer for it.

Also, if he were to transform different parts of his body into different people simultaneously, the limit would be calculated from the sum total of all of them. That made more extreme multiple-person transformations all but impossible.

As well, Sechs could only stock a certain amount of transformations at a time. The sum total level of all the available transformations in his stock could not exceed ten times his own total level. Any more and he would be unable to add new ones, making it necessary to get rid of others to make space. If he later wanted a transformation that he'd discarded, he would have to absorb the target's cells again.

The way Nu's transformations and storage worked meant that this Shapeshift skill required a great deal of levels.

Because of this, the powerful, chimera-like transformations that were possible in theory were in practice barred behind the impossibly high level limitations.

However, Sechs wouldn't be the King of Crime if he didn't break such expectations.

◆

"...Look at how much heat it absorbs in just its third form," said Shu. "That's a good Embryo you picked up."

"Embryos with a single focus are quite good at what they do even when they are low-rank."

"Well, my Baldr does a lot, but nothin' too great—and comin' from you, that almost sounds like you're makin' fun of him!" Shu roared as Baldr fired its Twin Quintuple cannons.

Sechs responded by returning to his slime form and slithering into the cracks in the ground created by their first clash.

"Shapeshift: Gebrochen Schwert."

A moment later, a blade thrust out of the ground. This was a copy of the sword-like Embryo that had a blade-extension skill—Næġling.

"Tch...!" And the right arm holding it...

"Sword Avalanche."

...belonged to King of Swords, Foltesla.

What followed Sechs's words was exactly what the skill's name suggested—a literal avalanche of swords. The cascade tore the ground apart and even managed to slice into Shu's leg, which was caught at the edge of the skill's AoE.

"Gh!" The severed tendon almost had an impact on Shu's movements, but the equipment on his legs acted as enough support to minimize the effect. His current gear was focused on keeping him fighting regardless of the situation. He'd assumed many things about how this battle could go, but he never once assumed that Sechs would never manage to hit him with an unexpected attack.

“When did ya get Foltesla?!”

“I stole a part of him away some time before he vanished.” Sechs’s arm, peeking from the wounded ground, was no longer Foltesla’s. It now looked noticeably aged.

Shu didn’t know who the arm belonged to, but he recognized the blaze burning right above it.

“You...goddamn...!”

After all, even the Arch Sage used this immensely powerful spell.

“Fixed Star.” This was the ultimate job skill of one of the strongest tian casters—King of Blaze, Feuer Lazburn. As a fire spell of the highest tier, few things could match it in pure firepower.

If the ball of flame landed, even Shu would melt away in an instant.

“RRAGH!” With a beastly roar, Shu kicked up the surface beneath him. His vast strength forced the very bedrock upwards, crashing into the incoming ball of flame.

The Fixed Star melted right through the bedrock, but before it could fully break through, Baldr fired a missile barrage at his rocky shield. With the bedrock reduced to pieces and melting away, the Fixed Star had lost a good amount of its power; it vanished within the explosion.

Before it could fully abate, though, Shu and Sechs were already making their next move.

Sechs transformed his body into that of a certain Master called “Juliet,” then grew out Hræsvelgr’s wings and took to the skies.

Shu used one of his equipment skills—Air Skip—to chase after him.

...He just keeps turnin’ into things I don’t know! Though Sechs hadn’t used a mix of forms yet, with Shu included he had already turned into three separate Superior Job owners. That number would go up to four if the owner of the ice shield was a Superior Job as well.

Those forms alone should’ve taken at least 5,000 levels of Sechs’s available transformation storage.

That was perhaps the biggest issue here. When it came to Sechs’s combat style, the level limitations on simultaneous use of multiple transformations meant little in comparison to the limit on how many forms he could have in his stock.

However, despite having already shown so many of his abilities, it didn’t seem like he’d run out of cards to play quite yet.

...What level is he now? Shu wondered. It was already obvious that Sechs had to be at least double Shu's level.

He'd asked him about it once, and even back then, Sechs was over level 2,000.

This absurdly high level was all thanks to his Superior Job, King of Crime.

◆

King of Crime was a job unlocked, as the name suggested, by committing countless crimes.

While even Murder Princess could theoretically be acquired by honest people, King of Crime was essentially exclusive to sinners.

The job had an ultimate skill that was simultaneously its only skill, and it was called "World Record."

This skill had multiple effects, among which was a stat bonus dependent on skill level, but that effect wasn't all that impressive—nor was it the skill's primary focus.

World Record's core feature was the acquisition of XP—Resources—by committing crimes.

While most people gathered Resources by defeating other creatures or completing job quests, King of Crime could do that through the very act of sinning. And the greater the crimes—the worse a criminal the people of this world believed him to be—the more XP flowed towards him.

It was unknown where the Resources came from or what exactly counted as a grave sin, all of which served to make the skill rather mysterious. There was speculation that it relied on the hatred King of Crime received for his transgressions—specifically that the relevant negative emotions were converted into Resources and sent towards him.

Regardless, this was the only skill that the job had, and it was a skill that sped up the owner's leveling. Of course, each level-up provided more stats, but the job didn't have the growth of combat-focused Superior Jobs.

It seemed especially weak when compared to Draconic Emperor—another job defined by its high level.

King of Crime could be considered a vain, self-absorbed job that did almost nothing but increase the level's number.

It was as though the creator of the world was talking to the sinner, saying "This is all that you are."

Because of this, most people who became Kings of Crime died shortly after. After all, their stat growth meant they were no match for combat Superior Jobs.

However, things were different for Sechs Würfel.

He was the current King of Crime, and he was perhaps the biggest sinner out of all who had ever claimed the job, meaning that the experience given to him by World Record was simply immense in comparison to his predecessors.

Because of this, Sechs's current total level was 2,890.

This meant that he could freely transform into anyone up to level 1,449—and that his total transformation storage cap was 28,900 levels.

With the exceptions of over-leveled beings such as King of Beasts, The Earth, and Draconic Emperor, Sechs could become a replacement for just about anyone.

That was the true nature of his combat style—the one those who understood it called "faceless."

◆

...What's he gonna do next? Up until now, Sechs had been using partial Shapeshifting to assume forms Shu didn't know about.

However, that had its own flaws.

While such chimera-like transformations allowed Sechs to wield many and varied powers, the stat balance was all off.

Indeed—the transformed parts of his body had different stats than the others.

There would be no issues if he continued to use them for singular attacks like he had been doing until now, but keeping that up for too long ran the risk of making Sechs lose his balance.

Shu knew this, and what's more, Sechs knew that Shu knew this.

Since he can transform into me even now that I've gotten my SJ and leveled up, his level's gotta be way bigger than I thought. Though...it's not large enough to let him transform into multiple SJs at once. That's why he's constantly changin' his arm.

As he chased after Sechs, Shu analyzed the situation.

I dunno how long he's gonna keep usin' the partial transformations, but when he figures out they're not workin', he's gonna use a full body one.

When Sechs assumed the shape of another person, he matched them in almost everything, including stats—but excluding Embryo form. In addition to that, he would still be a slime, meaning that he would maintain his physical immunity and ability to split apart for multidirectional attacks. He might even be able to use the leftover levels for other transformations and skills.

If, for example, Sechs transformed into Shu, he would receive Shu's stats and resistances, as well as Baldr up to the third form, theoretically giving Sechs the upper hand in this fight.

However, both of them knew that that would've been a bad move.

Shu wasn't afraid of facing an enemy who was a perfect mirror of his own body, because he was confident that he could wield that better than anyone else. The advantages of being a slime also wouldn't mean much before Shu's Right of Destruction.

Additionally, Sechs didn't receive stat bonuses from his transformation target's equipment. His gear post-transformation would be either a mere mimicry of Shu's gear or simply Sechs's own equipment, and the stats and abilities would obviously be different as a result.

Though they'd seemed equal when their fists met on the first clash, Shu had actually won out because of the stat bonuses from his equipment. Sechs's World Record gave him enough of a bonus to prevent Shu from destroying him instantly, but the gap in their powers was evident regardless.

Also, Baldr's first three forms were hard to utilize in battles against powerful foes. Even Shu himself faced all major threats with either the first or the seventh.

The second form was lacking in pure firepower, while the third form was a pillbox that allowed for no mobility. The fourth, fifth, and sixth had better maneuverability than the seventh, but in terms of firepower, they were certainly a downgrade.

Those were the reasons why even Shu only fought his strongest enemies with either the seventh or, if the situation was good for it, the first forms. And even the first also had the major drawback of being incredibly difficult to hit anything with.

Because of all that, becoming Shu entirely wasn't even an option for Sechs.

Whose form would he assume, then?

Would he combine someone's powers with his abilities as a slime?

Would he take the form of King of Swords, Foltesla?

Would he become King of Blaze, Feuer Lazburn?

Or would he shift into an SJ or Superior Shu had never even heard of?

The answer would now become clear.

"Shapeshift..." A moment later, Sechs's form changed...

"King of Destruction."

...and, betraying all expectations, he assumed the shape of his opponent.

Shock overcame Shu. It wasn't a choice he'd been remotely anticipating. After all, Sechs was unlikely to win against him while using the same character, so to speak.

Was he perhaps planning to send Shu flying and hit him with Strength Cannon while he was in midair and unable to dodge?

However, switching between transformations didn't reset the drawbacks each form suffered from. If Sechs fired Strength Cannon and missed, he would be unable to use it again in this battle.

Also, Shu currently had Air Skip active, so he would have some maneuverability in the air even if he was sent flying. It wouldn't be hard for him to avoid a ranged attack from someone whose AGI was the same as his.

That was exactly why he hadn't thought Sechs would even try to take this form. He knew Sechs had to understand all of this as well.

Shu was on edge, wary of where Sechs was planning to go from here.

"Heh heh..." King of Crime, wearing Shu's face, let out a little laugh. "I Take Countless Forms—Nu..."

He spoke, calling forth his—Nu's ultimate skill. "...Schwarz Baldr."

And with those words, he transformed himself into a towering, jet black robot.

◆

The greatest of Masters, tians, and even monsters rarely revealed all they were capable of.

The only ones who freely exposed their own cards were those whose craving for the limelight surpassed their caution. Those who were Superior or greater never showed the true aces up their sleeves to anyone, and they went the extra mile to hide them when dealing with Masters, who couldn't be silenced by death.

For example, The Earth—the Magical Apex—had only revealed two of the great spells he'd crafted, and there was always the possibility that there were actually five or more in total that he had access to.

King of Beasts—the Physical Apex—had also never shown anyone the combination of her Superior MVP reward and the ultimate skill that put her in her strongest form.

As those who matched these "Apices," both King of Destruction, Shu Starling, and King of Crime, Sechs Würfel had aces of their own as well.

The two had already fought too many times to count on both hands, but this was the first time Sechs had ever used his ultimate against Shu.

◆

Still in the air, Shu was faced with his own ace that he'd kept up his own sleeve.

"...Yeah, it's about what I'd expect from your ult," he said.

At this moment, Sechs looked much like Baldr in his ultimate form. However, this version of the machine god was all black, like the primordial watery abyss from Egyptian mythology—the namesake of Sechs's Embryo.

"'Black Baldr,' huh? 'Schwarz Baldr' really doesn't roll off the tongue. What's with you and makin' everythin' German?"

Then again, Baldr's from Norse mythology, so maybe "Schwartz" is just fine there, Shu wondered as he dodged backwards. He used Air Skip and his immense STR to make some distance between him and the black machine god, who responded by firing countless missiles from his chest.

"So you took to the air to separate me and Baldr!"

Sechs's goal here was to fight Shu until the very end. That included doing all it took to win.

Shu was currently separated from his Embryo. While Baldr could still provide artillery support for Shu, he couldn't use his ultimate—which was the only thing he could do to stand a chance against the dark copy that no doubt also possessed the immense stats of the original.

Shu couldn’t have used his ult until now because that had come with the risk of Sechs literally crawling inside him—that was what he had done to the UBM they’d cooperated against.

Now, however, it was clear that he had to use his ult as quickly as possible.

He would be fine as long as they were still in the air, since the machine god had no means of flying and couldn’t use its stats to their fullest in this situation. All Sechs could do right now was fire missiles at Shu.

However, the moment he landed, Sechs could use the dark Baldr’s full power to kill Shu in an instant.

“You’re always a real hog when it comes to upkeep, but now that the shoe’s on the other foot, I can see what a real pain in the ass you truly are,” said Shu to Baldr.

“I am afraid I cannot agree,” his Embryo replied.

Shu had actually anticipated that Sechs would use something like this, but there was something that even he had failed to anticipate.

Nu was an Embryo focused on transforming into other people, so it was obvious that its ultimate would be something that fit into that theme. And if it was more powerful than Shapeshift, one could easily expect that it would allow Sechs to employ even other people’s Superior Embryos.

However, there was one thing that Shu had never seen coming.

“He’s dodgin’ the ult’s goddamn payment!”

Sechs had transformed into Baldr with his ultimate active. However, normally, The Unmatched God of War—Baldr was a skill that used up an energy cell created within Baldr. Those energy cells could only be produced if Baldr spent a certain amount of time active outside of combat.

Because of this, even though Shu expected Sechs was capable of copying even Superior Embryos, he never thought he could actually use an ult with such strict conditions.

However, there he was, using The Unmatched God of War despite ignoring all of those restrictions.

He’d even used missiles right away, while the original Baldr had to spend time crafting them.

...Did he cover the payment some other way? Shu wondered. Since the price obviously wasn’t paid with an energy cell, Nu’s ultimate skill had to have demanded something else.

Something like this shouldn't be possible for cheap.

It probably ain't just lots of MP or SP. Was the cost covered by somethin' produced over time, similar to Baldr's energy cells? No...Baldr himself needs both time and materials. Unlike him, Nu shouldn't have the default ability to produce stuff.

Sechs had to have paid some sort of a steep price. In exchange, he was able to use a skill that either "drew out the full potential of the one he was transformed into" or "made him the strongest that he knew the person could be."

Though given their relationship, those two were one and the same when it came to Shu.

What did he pay? It's powerful, so it's gotta cost a lot...an MVP reward?

Shu was aware that Dryfe's duel champion, Hell General, Logan Goddhart, sacrificed MVP rewards to summon Mythical devils. Sechs surely had many such MVP rewards he could give away for his ult. However, Shu had seen no sign that he'd sacrificed anything of the sort before activating it.

Is there a time-related limit, then? Can it only be used once every...I dunno, month? It wouldn't be the only ultimate that had such a long cooldown. The leader of Caldina's Sefirot as well as Dryfe's Giga Professor, Mr. Franklin both had ults that functioned like that.

Slowly, over long periods of time, they accumulated the Resources necessary.

Seems closer, but it doesn't quite cover everything. Nu's not the kind of Embryo to stock up on Resources. If anything, it's more likely to use... Ah!

At that moment, two things came to Shu's mind.

First was the way Nu's Shapeshift functioned. It was a transformation ability entirely dependent on Sechs's total level.

The second thing was the Master he called "fox"—Tsukuyo Fuso.

Specifically, it was her job, High Priestess, and its final skill—Ulfaria Eltram.

"...I get it," he said with certainty.

Predicting the trajectories and avoiding the missiles coming his way, Shu glared at the black Baldr.

"You sacrificed your levels, didn't ya?"

◆

The Superior Embryo, “Primordial Shifting, Nu,” had an ult called “I Take Countless Forms—Nu.”

This was a skill that sacrificed the user in exchange for giving him a different form. It allowed Sechs to select a transformation target he had stocked up and let him use all of their powers, if only for just thirty minutes.

It didn’t matter if that meant using a Superior Embryo or a skill that required specific items to be used.

However, using it caused Sechs to lose 500 levels.

That was more levels than many tians could stand to gain even if they dedicated their whole lives to leveling. It was such a steep cost that this could rightly be called a final skill—in the sense that it would often mean utter self-destruction.

Though Sechs had many levels thanks to World Record, this certainly wasn’t cheap for him. His level was now 2,390. Since this ult had the same level conditions as Shapeshift, the next time he used it, he wouldn’t even be able to take Shu’s form again.

And if he used it too many times, Sechs would no longer be able to become anyone or anything.

Nu—and Sechs himself—would lose his purpose.

It was such a double-edged sword that it made perfect sense why he had never once used it against Shu.

And yet, he was using it now.

◆

Shu silently considered his enemy. Sechs had used the War as an opportunity to challenge him, but he must’ve been preparing for this for a long time. He’d even stocked up on forms he could take and raised his levels so he would have enough. He wanted to fight Shu until the end, and with everything he had. He wanted them both to give their all—and for him to emerge victorious, having gained the understanding he so desired.

“...Fine.” Shu had given a lot for this, and this was Shu’s response: “I’ll play the ace up my sleeve too.”

Shu had two goals for this fight.

First, he wanted to beat Sechs and put an end to all the crime he'd been committing in Altar.

Second, he wanted to rush to the War between Altar and Dryfe to aid the kingdom's war effort.

He'd sent out a message suggesting that it was better not to expect him, almost certain that he wouldn't be able to participate in the War. Despite that, he hadn't given up on the possibility. After all, it wasn't impossible that he'd still be able to make it in time to assist in the War, and if the possibility wasn't zero—even if it was a tiny fraction of a percent—Shu would simply reach for it.

That was the kind of man Shuichi Mukudori was.

At this moment, however, he abandoned his second goal.

This wasn't him giving up, though. The man who was right now giving all he had was none other than Sechs Würfel—his rival, his foe, his friend, and his reflection—and Shu had simply decided to throw away all considerations outside of this and stop caring whether he'd have enough power left to spare once this battle was over.

He'd recognized that he also had to give his all against this enemy—and resolved to do just that.

"I'll use everythin' I got too. Though, just lemme repeat what I said," Shu said as he pointed at the black machine. "Don't think a little fight to the death's gonna be enough to really understand me."

That was another way of saying "you won't fulfill your goal either."

Hovering in the air, the dark god let out a roar. Just like the original Baldr, it must've contained Sechs transformed into Shu.

However, the entire machine was also Sechs. The doppelganger within was but a small part of the whole, and the roar of the dark god was not the loud workings of the machine, but Sechs's own voice.

As that sound shook the air itself, the armaments on the dark machine's chest, fingers, legs, everywhere opened fire.

It was indiscriminate, unbridled devastation. Like a god of destruction, the black machine ravaged its surroundings, defacing the already blasted land of the canyon even further.

As the storm of shells and fire rained down, Shu rushed towards Baldr, and Baldr rushed towards Shu.

Neither could evade every attack launched by the other. Gear and armor was damaged; blood and energy was spilled.

Eventually, the dark god landed, and Shu reached Baldr at the same time. The dark god kicked off the ground at supersonic speeds while Shu entered his Embryo. The dark god threw his deadly punch while Baldr assumed his robotic form. And ultimately, their fists clashed once more.

イー

Launched from below, the steel god’s fist welcomed the dark god’s arcing punch.

The shock from the clash dwarfed the one before it. Its power was so immense that the walls of the canyon that had enclosed him until now were completely blown away.

The two gods in the center, however, didn’t flinch at all.

In silence, these reflections of one another stared at each other.

One was the color of steel, while the other was of the deepest black.

A flawless, shining metal that bent before nothing and remained itself no matter what.

A chaotic darkness that sought itself and took on countless other colors on the way.

It was as though their colors represented their very natures.

Words were no longer needed between them.

The steel god kicked off the ground. The technique he planned to use now was “Nejirebana.” The twisting of this right palm-strike was meant to drive the full force of his momentum into his foe.

In response, the dark god also stuck out his right arm.

A moment later, that same arm began to turn at an extremely high speed.

“Gh...!” The way the arm rotated was far too visceral compared to the way the steel god moved, based solidly in martial arts. The dark god’s hand was instead turning from the wrist down like a drill.

Thus, the two twisting hands clashed. The steel god’s right hand pulverized the dark god’s, but its rapid spinning took two of the steel god’s fingers.

...Gotta be that thing’s MVP reward, Shu thought, instantly understanding what caused the spinning.

Just like Shu had some unique gear, so there was gear owned only by Sechs.

The MVP reward for the turning UBM they’d cooperated to defeat had gone to King of Crime, and Shu guessed that he’d just experienced a manifestation of its ability.

Did he force his hand into that spin to mimic my Nejirebana? Is it a skill that lets him spin his body...? That seems a bit weak for a reward from that thing. Best assume this ain’t all it can do.

While Shu was thinking that, the dark god regrew his lost hand.

...He's still a slime. No surprise he'd be able to do this much.

The dark god was as strong as the steel god, but he was also a slime, letting him ignore all physical damage. Even though Shu's Right of Destruction enabled him to physically destroy Sechs, it didn't prevent reconstruction of those destroyed parts.

However, the damage had still made him lose some volume—or rather, his HP. Shu's attacks were not exactly ineffective here.

Sechs can keep goin' in good condition for a while, but there's still a limit here—he can't have his actual volume drop below that of his transformation target. Not that that changes my plan.

He would simply fight the dark god, whittle away at Sechs's HP, and eventually destroy him.

There was no other way than that, but...

...I'll be at a disadvantage if this drags on, Shu thought. While the steel god was a machine, the dark god was a slime that had means of healing himself. He was well aware that he couldn't win an endurance match. He had to make it quick.

And for that, he had to use the ace up his sleeve.

He'd already resolved to do just that.

"Ah...?!"

But before Shu could actually do it, the steel god found himself tripped up. As though hit by a sliding kick, the right leg he used to support himself was knocked off the ground, making him lose his balance and fall.

"This is...!" Looking down, he saw the shattered fragments of the dark god—a part of Nu—clinging to his right foot.

It didn't make sense, though, that such a small part could deliver enough power to make the steel god trip.

There had to be some other cause...

"So this is what the reward was for!"

...and Shu knew exactly what it was.

It had to be the Ancient Legendary MVP special reward, "Spinning Belt, Spindle." This item contained the power of the turning UBM, concentrated solely on making Sechs's body revolve quickly.

It wasn't just simple turning around, though. Its activation required no physical focal point, letting him turn along any vector even if he was midair.

Additionally, it allowed turning not only on his own axes, but also making his surroundings turn around a specified point in space.

Sechs not only had the UBM's Turning Space at his fingertips—that power was available even to the parts that had been separated from him.

Because of this, he was able to rotate things that he'd merely attached severed parts of himself to. The effect of the turning was weaker the less of his total volume Sechs used, so the amount attached to the steel god wasn't enough to actually force Shu to spin—but it was enough to make him lose his footing and trip.

As long as part of Sechs clung to Shu, he simply couldn't move as he intended.

Even though he had Shu's body, Sechs didn't have his technique, and this was one of the ways that he intended to make up for that gap.

With a sound much like the one that had preceded it, the dark god threw another fist towards his destabilized enemy. Shu tried to raise his right hand to protect himself, but the part of Sechs attached to his right arm essentially negated his defensive movement, letting the dark god deliver his punch straight to his chest.

"Kh...!" That alone was enough to send a shock wave that reached even Shu in his cockpit, making the surrounding consoles release sparks and the entire frame audibly and visibly creak.

The punch that followed the first left the chest armor in ruins.

"Baldr!" That one word was enough for the Embryo to understand what his Master wanted.

A moment later, the steel god's chest exploded.

Stardust Genocider had been fired within the warped, shattered armor, behind unopened nozzles. The resulting explosion reached his own inner machinery, blew open the chest armor, and caught even the dark god unawares.

Shock overcame Sechs as he realized these were the same incendiary shells as before.

Even though he had equipment to mitigate some of the risk, he still had a slime's characteristic weakness to fire. The high temperatures almost made the dark god's surface melt, forcing him to jump away.

However, the steel god was in an even worse state. The armor over his chest was completely gone, and the damage had spread to the other parts; the surface of the unit was covered in heat from the incendiary shells.

That was exactly what Shu had intended, however.

The intense heat enveloping him had made the bits of Sechs that were clinging to him melt away.

He'd chosen to harm himself just so he could remove what was hindering his movements.

Though, the price to pay was not exactly small.

"Total damage has exceeded 40%. All armor compromised. Serious damage to inner systems within the chest area. The Stardust Genocider in the chest area, as well as all Bloody Laser Storm slits within all armor, have been rendered unusable."

"Figured." They'd been punched by the god's own power twice, and suffered the self-destructive missile "launch." In fact, it was a miracle that the damage wasn't more than fifty percent.

However, this had completely eliminated his already low chances of winning a drawn-out battle. Even if his opponent had no means of healing, fighting him in his current state would mean utter defeat.

"Well, not like it changes what I'm doin'." Shu had already decided that he wouldn't make this an endurance battle. Sechs had used his pricey ultimate as well as his MVP reward, revealing every card in his hand. "Guess I'll lay it all on the table too." Right now, Sechs had both Shu's job and Embryo powers.

But that didn't mean that he had everything that Shu possessed. Though he could assume the forms of people or their Embryos, he couldn't transform into things—or more specifically, items.

It was a limitation on Nu's abilities, likely born out of Sechs's own nature.

Compared to the ability to transform into people and Embryos, it seemed like a trivial limitation. However, that was exactly what made it so important to Shu.

Sechs now exceeded the original in physical form and skills; this was the sole way in which Shu could still surpass him even now.

"Baldr... Rev up the Gamma."

"Affirmative. Fatal Engine, Gloria γ, ignition."

It was something just barely visible through the gaps of the destroyed chest armor—the place where a human's heart would reside.

As though to make its origins clear, this “heart” looked quite different from most of the steel god’s inner workings, with an appearance more organic than mechanical.

It was King of Destruction, Shu Starling’s final card in the most literal sense of the word.

It was the curse left behind by the terrible dragon.

This thing that had been sealed away within this chest was now receiving energy from the steel god, making it roar in a way that made the very ground tremble.

Now awoken, the curse would seek its tribute, and that was exactly what made this his “final” card.

He had nothing to say about that. He’d already resolved to pay the price.

The War was barely on his mind anymore. He had no power or thought to spare for it.

He would give his all to this battle against Sechs.

Thus, he spoke the name of the power within the Fatal Engine, Gloria γ—the Superior reward left to him by the strongest dragon.

“The Dying Breath at World’s End: Gloria.” “Code, acknowledged.” Following Baldr’s response, the steel god...

“War God Ship, Baldr. Assuming Ragnarök Form.”

...was reborn in a red-gold hue reminiscent of twilight.

Chapter Nine: In Skies of Twilight and Dawn

About Baldr

Baldr was the god of light in Norse mythology, as well as the owner of the world’s greatest ship—Hringhorni.

This was reflected in Shu’s Baldr, as well. His first form was a weapon that fired a projectile of light, while the fifth, sixth, and seventh forms were all ships.

It was as though the final result of the Embryo’s evolution had been fixed from the start. Perhaps Baldr had understood—or was made to understand—his Master’s true nature even before Baldr was born.

However, there were a few other aspects that were core to Baldr’s myth.

First, he was killed by his brother Höðr, who was tricked into doing it by the evil Loki.

Second, his death meant the disappearance of light and the beginning of Norse mythology’s Twilight of the Gods—Ragnarök.

The Baldr of myth was instrumental to the beginning of the end—a sign of a coming calamity.

Baldr the Embryo, however, had never possessed anything like that—but he did now.

By defeating the overwhelmingly terrible Tri-Zenith Dragon, Baldr had received the Fatal Engine, Gloria γ. Taking the form of an extra engine within Baldr, it was never active and functioned as nothing but dead weight.

It was never active because activating it would mean the end of everything.

Once it was turned on, it would be covered in the red of heat and the gold of the dragon.

And that was when all would end.

That included the enemy, as well as...

Twilight and Chaos

The god cloaked in red and gold...the twilight god stood up.

Sechs had no idea what had caused his foe to assume this appearance. Was it an Embryo skill? A job ultimate? The effect of an MVP reward?

Regardless, this was a Shu that Sechs was not aware of.

Sechs had given his all and successfully forced Shu to play this new ace up his sleeve. Neither of them was holding back, and their fight was now more true than ever.

However, this still wasn't enough.

"Not yet..." Drawing out Shu's full power wasn't enough. He still had to fight him, understand him, and find out what made him him.

Sechs thought he could do it—felt he had to do it—and had challenged Shu for that exact purpose.

"Not yet...!"

That was why he couldn't let it end here. He still had not gained anything.

A sound hard to describe rang out as the twilight god moved forwards once again.

Shu was now faster than the dark god even after Sechs had used an ultimate to match his speed.

It instantly became clear that Shu had used some sort of transformation skill that increased stats. If it was from an MVP reward, Sechs could never copy it, and if it was a job or Embryo skill, he didn't know how to activate it.

And so, he could do nothing to prevent the coming clash.

However, though his stats were lower than Shu's now, Sechs was still a slime and could rebuild his form. An injury or two was a small price to pay if he could learn more about his opponent.

Part of Sechs's fighting style involved understanding others through the violence they inflicted upon him. Because of this, what would happen next was an inevitability.

The twilight god threw his right fist at him, and the dark god welcomed it with his own. The resulting clash made his right arm vanish without a trace.

Even Sechs couldn't help but be shocked by this. In fact, it was so unexpected that the dark god trembled with raw emotion, an unusual sight for him. Sechs's counter punch not only wasn't enough to match Shu's—it was so weak by comparison that his entire arm shattered at the atomic level.

This wasn't simply due to Shu's Right of Destruction. It was the result of the unimaginable gap that had widened between their offensive abilities.

The slight increase in speed was only a small part of what made the twilight god what it was. His true value resided in his offensive power, unmatched by anything else.

The dark god, Sechs, had used his ultimate skill to match—no, surpass—Baldr in overall power. However, the twilight god's might was oppressive even to him.

"Shu! You...!" To gain Shu's power, Sechs had sacrificed a whole 500 levels.

What, then, had Shu given away to gain power that surpassed even that?

"Nejirebana." Instead of an answer, the twilight god followed up his attack with a palm-strike.

The dark god raised his left arm in defense, but upon impact it dispersed all the way to the elbow, and it did nothing to stop the palm from reaching his face, which was also reduced to atoms.

Shock overcame Sechs yet again. Losing his head wouldn't normally be fatal to him. Nu the Type Body Embryo had no concept of a "weak point." As long as his volume remained plentiful, attacks to his head or heart were no different from scratches.

However, two attacks from the twilight god had shaved away an extreme amount of Sechs's body.

"So this is Shu's trump card..." Sechs murmured. "This is so..."

A god of twilight, wielding immeasurable physical offensive power. Combined with KoD's Right of Destruction, his limbs became weapons that could blow anything out of this realm. Even the dark god, who had copied the original Baldr and gained his defense, was unable to protect himself against this. Would Mythical metal withstand this? Would the "Invincible" Superior survive this? Sechs didn't know the answer to either of those questions, but he did know one thing.

I...Nu does not have anything left that can counter this... Sechs thought. His slime body already had supreme physical defense, and even though he was weak to energy-based attacks, he could defend against them with Jötunheimr's Heat Absorption or other abilities he had in stock.

Even so, the twilight god's attacks were far beyond anything he could use.

And since Shu now had the upper hand in skill as well as speed, Sechs couldn't even hope to fully evade his strikes. The most he could do was turn the attacks slightly aside, but even an edge that barely scraped him would reap his volume—his HP.

Spindle is meaningless, as well, he thought. Simply touching the twilight god would disperse the dark god at the atomic level, making it impossible for him to attach any pieces to Shu's body like he had been doing.

Through nothing but sheer power, Shu had rendered all of Sechs's resistances and strategies meaningless.

...It must have been risky, though. Since the twilight god's own limbs weren't shattering under the force of their own strikes, it must've been a skill that increased not STR, but the final attack power.

Despite that, Baldr's mechanical frame was covered in cracks all over.

The offensive power delivered by the twilight god traveled through the surrounding space, even damaging himself slightly. It wasn't a drawback specific to the skill, but a mere phenomenon caused by its natural function.

Still, it was obvious that it couldn't be used for an extended battle.

A Superior MVP reward focused on a brief, decisive battle... Sechs thought. He had a Superior MVP reward of his own, and in terms of compatibility he was actually above Shu.

His ultimate skill that cost 500 levels would only last 30 minutes, and he'd already lost a great amount of his total volume...but that didn't matter one bit. If he used his Superior MVP reward—Organ of Rebirth, Gloria δ—against someone who could only fight briefly, he would certainly come out victorious.

To be more precise, he would ultimately come out victorious. That was how the reward worked.

It completely upset the basic idea that "you either defeat your enemies, or they defeat you." It was pure treason against the very way Infinite Dendrogram worked, and it certainly wasn't any weaker than Shu's fearsome Gloria γ.

However, that wasn't something Sechs could use now. Considering the nature of its owner, it was likely the most meaningless Superior MVP reward ever.

...I suppose this was part of the reason why Rascal tried to stop me. If they had waited until Gloria β became something he could use and their goal as Illegal Frontier was fulfilled, Sechs would finally be able to win no matter whom he was up against.

But... However...

“It does not matter to me whether I win or lose against Shu.”

Sechs wasn’t interested in coming out victorious to begin with.

That was why there was no point in waiting until he could fight against Shu and win. There was something far more important to him.

“He is so different from me. This is about whether I can understand him... That is all!”

Sechs was only after the results of an all-out, true battle between them—the clash of their souls. He was certain that these results could only be found at the conclusion of a battle in which both of them fought to the very last.

“And that is why...!”

He still had not gotten his answer, so he simply could not allow this to be over yet.

“I will not let this end here...! I cannot...!”

The dark god’s soul let out a panicked shout...

“SPLIT SPIRIT!”

...and used the last skill in his—Nu’s—repertoire.

The next moment, the dark god split into six of himself.

It was as though he had become the embodiment of chaos. This multiplication was caused by the last skill Nu had acquired.

Split Spirit was a skill that built upon Sechs’s ability as a slime to separate himself into parts.

It allowed him to split into a maximum of six iterations of himself while maintaining all the powers he had as one person. The drawback was that none of the resulting splits could transform into anything else, and the original’s HP was equally divided between them. That meant each of them represented only a sixth of the dark god Shu had been fighting until now.

Additionally, it had the demerit of semi-permanently reducing maximum HP.

Once the skill expired and the other splits vanished, Sechs's max HP would not go back to what it was before. Instead, it would stay divided all the way until he came back from a death penalty.

To Nu, HP was equal to body volume—and for King of Crime, dying would mean being locked up in the gaol for an obscene amount of time. The risks of using this skill were quite extreme.

But Sechs had used it regardless.

Just as he'd sacrificed his levels, so did he sacrifice his life force...all so this fight would continue.

"Shu," the embodiment of chaos—the six dark gods—all said in unison as they approached the twilight god.

Dashing, jumping, flanking, crawling, they attacked their opponent in a relentless assault that was impossible for him to defend against alone. Their cooperation was flawless in a way that only a group who were all one could achieve.

It wasn't the drawbacks that had prevented Sechs from using Split Spirit. The skill was just most effective after he had used Nu's ultimate to become someone overwhelmingly powerful.

Because of this, it was fair to say that the twilight god was currently surrounded by six fully realized steel gods.

"SHHEAH!" The twilight god retaliated by throwing a punch towards the first of them, "Eins," who was heading directly for him. It sank into his chest and caused his entire upper body to vanish.

With their HP divided by six, a single punch from the twilight god was enough to take them out.

On the other hand, that meant that collectively, they were able to withstand a whole six of his attacks.

"Shu!" Zwei, the one who'd jumped, was approaching the opponent from above while swinging down with both hands for a crushing attack.

In response, the twilight god launched a kick with his right leg.

As he was faster, his kick blew away both of Zwei's arms down to the elbow before they could reach him. He then accelerated his raised leg downwards, delivering an axe-kick that split Zwei in half.

That was when the attacks of the four remaining ones landed upon the twilight god. His armor shattered, and his left arm was cleaved from his body.

To the four remaining, this was confirmation of a certain fact. It was already obvious that Ragnarok Form didn't increase speed to the same extent that it increased attack power, and this proved that his defense also did not receive any such extreme bonuses. In fact, since the twilight god actually damaged himself with every attack, he might have actually been more fragile than before.

He could still be damaged if an attack connected, so...

"Shu."

Drei stood before the twilight god. Like a raging bear or a magnanimous king, he had his hands spread out as if to say, "Let us compare our strength."

The twilight god...Shu accepted this challenge.

He had to punch and obliterate all of them regardless of anything else. Since Ragnarok Form didn't enhance his potential for wide-area extermination, anyone as powerful as the steel god had to be dealt with with his own fists.

The twilight god kicked off the ground and approached Drei. Drei stood no chance against one who surpassed him in speed and technique, and the twilight god could waste no time grappling with him.

He threw a punch from his right, causing Drei's upper body to disintegrate on contact just like Eins.

The next moment, Drei's outstretched arms let out a powerful light.

"Gh...!" This was a light so bright it burned the eyes and caused temporary blindness, and Shu instantly recognized it.

"F Warheads!"

It was one of Baldr's weapons—missiles that released intense light that made it impossible to see. He'd used it himself against Gloria.

"Tch...!" Since the dark god possessed the steel god's stats and could use everything he could, Shu did know Sechs could fire such special warheads, but it still surprised him to see them delivered from the arms. They were normally fired from the chest, which he had obliterated with his attack.

He only needed a moment to understand how this was done, though.

Although Drei looked like Baldr, he was actually Nu. Because of this, it was no surprise that he could move the F Warheads through his liquid body to fire them from elsewhere.

This tactic paid off, and Shu was briefly blinded. Before Baldr could repair his burned-out visual sensors, an impact shook the twilight god.

"SHUUU!"

That was the voice of the fourth—Vier. He'd used the opening created by the flash to cling to the twilight god with both his arms and legs.

It almost made Shu lose his balance, but besides that, it meant little. Vier couldn't attack from this position. The twilight god, on the other hand, had more than enough power to instantly make another split vanish. All he had to do was throw the punch.

"Ah...!"

However, that was soon made physically impossible.

While the visual sensors were still fried, from inside the twilight god's cockpit Shu felt as though the world was flipped upside down.

And that was exactly what had happened—up had become down and down became up.

"This is...!" Shu said. The twilight god, as well as Vier still sticking to him, had both begun to spin.

Shu already knew what was making this possible.

"Again with that MVP reward...!" Spinning Belt, Spindle—the MVP reward that let Sechs rotate his body. A small part of Sechs could only make his opponent lose his balance, and it was difficult to attach to the twilight god he was now.

This was different, however. Vier was the same size as the twilight god, and he had stuck his entire body to him. That made it possible to force both of them to spin at extremely high speeds, rendering Shu incapable of doing anything.

His immense stats could only be put to use if he had his feet on the ground.

This was almost a reverse of the situation when the dark god first appeared. However, there were two key differences.

First, the high-speed spinning made it uncertain what the twilight god would actually hit if he swung his fist. He was just as likely to punch himself instead of Vier, which would cause a great deal of damage.

Second, there were still the fifth and sixth—Fünf and Sechs.

As the twilight god spun, his sensors began to recover, and he saw his two other opponents.

The dark gods were both in the exact same pose.

"Ah...!" Shu knew what that pose meant. "They're usin' the World Breaker!" The final ultimate skill of King of Destruction, World Breaker. It was a sure-kill attack that combined the immense attack with Right of Destruction to demolish space itself, ensuring the destruction of both the target and the user.

Fünf and Sechs were both preparing to launch it at the twilight god at the same time. A direct hit would be fatal even for him.

Not saying a word, Shu considered Sechs. He realized that his opponent was planning to end the battle.

This was the climax.

However, Shu had no means of escaping Vier's grip. Stuck in the air, he couldn't make use of his stats, and all of his firearms had been destroyed.

"I can't move or even touch the ground, huh?" Shu mused.

However...

"I can still reach the sky."

Following those words, the twilight god made a fist.

He wouldn't target Vier, nor would he brace for Fünf's and Sechs's attacks.

He would instead shatter the very space in front of him.

That was all that he needed.

"Shu," Fünf and Sechs both said as they rushed towards him.

"World Breaker," Shu replied, before they reached him.

That moment was the end of everything.

The final ultimate was launched with all the attack power of the twilight god behind it.

The resulting destruction of the surrounding space engulfed everything around it.

◇◆

Nowest Canyon was a dead land.

The battle between the Superiors and the SUBM had changed its landscape, destroyed its trade routes, and the Fatal Field had wiped out all life it had once had.

However, despite all of this, it could still be called a "canyon."

That was no longer true, as everything here had vanished.

In its place was a gaping crater, as though it had been the site of a mortar strike, making it impossible to imagine that a canyon had ever stood here.

Now, the area was no longer worthy of its name. The Nowest Canyon had come to an end.

But despite that...

"...Guess it's down to this one."

"It seems so..."

...there were still people standing here.

One was King of Destruction, Shu Starling.

After having lost the left arm to his opponent, he'd now lost his right to his own World Breaker—it had completely vanished. The twilight god's armor was mostly gone as well, and he was only barely standing on nearly broken legs.

He'd used the strongest World Breaker in history, and it was a mystery how he survived. Was it the slightly increased defense? Or did even this skill, which seemed synonymous with the user's death, have some degree of consideration for its king?

The second figure was King of Crime, Sechs Würfel.

Only the sixth of the dark gods was left, and even he would've vanished if he hadn't used the fifth as a shield. What had happened to the fourth, who was at the epicenter of this destruction, is hardly worth mentioning...

That wasn't to say that the one still standing was in a good state, though. There was almost nothing left of him now, and he could only barely maintain his shape.

Split Spirit had an extra effect that helped maintain the shape and size of the splits even if they lost volume. Without it, Sechs would've already crumbled.

A single attack from the other would be enough to fell them both.

"So...do you understand?" Shu asked. Only silence answered him. It was obvious what the question was about. He asked if this battle to the death, soon to end, had helped Sechs understand Shu.

The answer to that was...a complete denial.

"...No. I feel like I am close to grasping it, but I cannot... I do not understand. I thought I would, so why...?" said Sechs, struggling to comprehend what he was still missing.

"Yeah. Thought so. Of course you wouldn't understand," Shu replied.

"Why?"

"The goddamn fact you'd even ask that..." Shu let out a sigh before continuing. "I'm not just about fightin', and we're not just about killin' each other."

Sechs couldn't say anything in response. Shu was a person who was often caught up in all kinds of trouble, and he'd resolved many problems through combat.

However, his life wasn't all about fighting.

He lived in Infinite Dendrogram as no one but himself.

He wore an animal costume and handed out candy to children.

He sometimes cooked food and brought it to his friends at the castle.

He was occasionally invited to party with his friends and acquaintances.

He didn't live in this world just as a warrior. His peaceful days were as much a part of him as those of strife.

And that included the days he'd spent with Sechs.

"There's no way you can fully understand me by just fightin' me to the death."

Sechs was still speechless. Shu seemed completely right.

In fact, one could say that Sechs's very idea that he could understand Shu by "giving his all and making their very souls clash" was logically inconsistent.

"...Why?" said Sechs, completely dumbfounded.

"Ya wonderin' why ya didn't realize it earlier? I think I know," said Shu.

"Why?"

"It's 'cause for you, both here and on Earth, human relationships and exchanges of life are one and the same." Sechs had revealed that he was an organ transplant clone—a life made solely to be given away to the original. And after the original died, his life became solely about passing on his genes—continuing this lineage of life.

And even here, his first act of freedom was to roll the dice that would set his way of life, and it landed on the path of evil.

Because of that, exchanges of life were normal for him.

"You always lived under the assumption that everythin's about taking life or having it taken away from you. Your thinkin's messed up on a fundamental level."

"...Hah hah..."

There were two reasons for the laughter that escaped Sechs's lips.

First, he laughed because he was disappointed in how off-the-mark his methods were.

And the second reason for his laughter was...joy.

He...Shu understands me so well... His true self was something that even Sechs himself couldn't truly comprehend, yet even he had someone who really understood him...and that realization made him happy.

So happy, in fact, that he was tearing up.

I still cannot understand Shu. But even so...I am sure that I will only know myself if I keep involving myself with him. And on top of that...

Even though he knew his methods were wrong, he wouldn't change the way he was. He had no intention of giving up on his goal of understanding Shu, nor would he stop walking the path of evil that he'd chosen.

If he'd compromised that side of himself, after all, he would never achieve what he wanted—to understand the man who never compromised himself.

"So, yeah... You should try somethin' besides crime now," said Shu. "Take up cookin' or whatever."

"You will not tell me to stop committing crimes?"

"You won't budge on that no matter what I say or how hard I kick your ass."

"...Heh heh." He truly knows me well, Sechs thought, smiling. "Now..."

"Yeah."

Thus, Shu and Sechs—the gods of twilight and darkness—faced each other.

"Let us settle this."

"Yeah. Time to end this."

Both of them dashed towards each other. There was no strategy and no tactics—nothing like that at all—in their actions...

With bodies on the brink of collapse and life that could be extinguished by a gust of wind, the two charged forward, each intent on delivering the first blow.

The dark god may have had the upper hand simply because he still had all his limbs. With no arms and barely working legs, the twilight god could hardly make use of his speed advantage.

"SHUUUUU!" And so, the dark god swung his fist.

"SEEEEECHS!" The twilight god threw up the remains of his shattered leg.

Thus, the final shock wave resounded through the brightening morning sky.

Both of their attacks connected.

The dark god's fist blew off the twilight god's head.

And the twilight god's leg split apart the dark god's torso.

To a human, both of these attacks would've been fatal.

However...

"...Shu."

"Yeah?"

The dark god's body was beginning to crack, spreading from the gaping split in his torso.

And then, his body shattered and started to dissolve into tiny sparks of light.

"Let us meet again."

"...Sure."

At this point, Shu had left Baldr and stood watching Sechs vanish with his own eyes.

"And...let us fight again."

"...Haven't learned your lesson, huh?"

"No."

"...Well, whatever. Just don't do any of this blackmail type shit again... I feel like I said that to Humpty once."

"Heh heh... Very well. I will have my rematch...under different circumstances."

"Well, it's not like ya lost here, really. It's a draw."

"Hm...?" All that was left of the dark god by now was his head, and it was tilted—intentionally or otherwise—in a questioning manner.

That was when the twilight god lost his light and assumed an ashen color before starting to disperse like dust.

"Time's up for me too." Shu's own body was becoming bits of light as well. That confirmed Sechs's suspicions about this power being one that came at a heavy cost.

"...For me, this is still defeat," Sechs insisted.

"Well, aren't you stubborn?"

"Heh..." Sechs laughed as he was reduced to nothing but droplets...

"I suppose...that is just...who I am..."

...and ultimately vanished.

The kingdom's worst criminal, the leader of the Illegal Frontier—King of Crime, Sechs Würfel, was thus sent to the gaol.

"You don't need me to be your mirror... I know you'll find yourself one day, on your own." Shu's rival, friend, and reflection was no longer here to hear his words. "Anyway... I wonder what's gonna happen now." As he was also dissolving into light, he looked up at the sky.

"I hope Altar's still around when I come back. Worst-case scenario, this and that'll happen with Theresia and it'll all be over... Though, I guess Dormouse'll do somethin' about it then."

He spoke as though he wouldn't be around for a while.

"'Only god knows what the world'll be like in a month,' huh...? What a sick joke."

And with those final words, Shu and his Embryo vanished just like Sechs and Nu.

About Baldr

There was another story about the Baldr of Norse mythology.

After Loki's trickery had caused his death, he was given a chance to come back to life—but for that to happen, everyone in the world had to weep for him.

Loki also prevented this resurrection. Thus, countless winters passed by with Baldr still deceased. He only came back to life after Ragnarök had destroyed the world and paved the way for a new one.

It was not exactly based on this story, but the Fatal Engine's skill—The Dying Breath at World's End: Gloria—had two drawbacks.

First, it guaranteed the user would take a death penalty in five minutes. It not only destroyed the Embryo it was installed into, but also killed its Master.

However, this was the lighter of the two drawbacks.

The second one was far worse, as it increased the death penalty tenfold.

Normally, avatars would come back in 24 hours of Earth time, but this drawback made it so he could only come back after 240 hours.

That was thirty days in Infinite Dendrogram time—a whole month.

Shu knew well what it meant to use this during the War, and that was exactly why he'd had to steel himself to disregard everything besides his battle with Sechs.

King of Destruction, Shu Starling's avatar would be rebuilt and returned to this world after a month had passed within it. The First Knight-Machine War would already be over by then, and the king, the commander of the Royal Guard, and many others would be lost forever.

◇◆

That was how the battle ended.

Shu defeated Sechs, and Sechs was defeated by Shu.

However, Shu was unable to rush to the battlefield and aid in the War effort, while Sechs, despite getting the clash of souls he'd wanted, still could not truly understand Shu.

Sechs had insisted this was his defeat, while Shu saw it as a draw.

It was hard to say that either of them was wrong.

Nevertheless, this was the end of the battle that happened behind the scenes of the First Knight-Machine War.

However, it marked the beginning of a new battle...for the both of them.

Epilogue

King of Destruction, Shu Starling

Hearing songbirds from somewhere, I opened my eyes.

My sight was hazy, but I could tell that I'd just woken up.

"...I was sleepin', huh?" It seemed like I'd dozed off while thinkin' 'bout the past. That might've been why I had a dream that was so damn nostalgic—a dream of the last time I met that guy.

"Achoo...!" As my consciousness was roused, so was the rest of my body, and I quickly started to feel cold. Gideon's nights were on the warmer side, but sleepin' without even wearin' my suit really wasn't a good idea.

"Should've saved my deep thinkin' for after I got back to my room..." My END was in the four digits, so I couldn't get sick from a li'l bit of sleepin' outside, but that didn't stop my body from gettin' cold.

I used Instant Wear to switch to my usual costume. As I did, the sky became brighter as the sun began to rise.

"Hm?" Looking down at the arena, I saw Reiji and Rook come out of the entrance. Both of them were fully geared, so it seemed pretty clear they were about to do some final optimizations before today's Tournament.

He got Rook to be his sparrin' partner. Even at this stage, Rook's Union Jack gave him the stats and skills to match first-rate Masters. He even had three options to choose from dependin' on what he wanted—Marilyn for the big muscle and tankiness, Audrey for flight and ranged attacks, and Liz for physical attack negation and high-speed offense. Rook was more than good enough to play the part of a powerful enemy Reiji might meet in the Tournaments.

"Hrm..." I watched as the two started sparring inside the duel barrier. The barrier was set to accelerate what was happenin' in there, but I could clearly see Rook in his Dragon-Devil-Man form and Reiji fightin' against him.

I didn't know whether Rook had chosen this transformation 'cause he was simply tryin' them in order, or if he felt like Metal-Devil-Man was bad against Reiji 'cause of his fixed damage attacks and fire elemental affinity.

There was a clear gap in their stats, but Reiji was keepin' up.

He began by goin' on the defensive, usin' Reversal to counter the potential debuffs; then, once he had enough damage stored up, he switched to Chaser and targeted Rook's AGI, lettin' him go on the offensive.

He used his twin swords to fight against Rook's lance, but as Dragon-Devil-Man, he had such high stats that Reiji couldn't damage him much. His only real ways of attackin' him were the Miasmaflame Bracers and Vengeance.

Instead, though, he used Instant Equip to take out that axe.

"Right after he said he wouldn't use it," I muttered. "Well, there's the barrier, so I guess he's just tryin' it out."

It was worth testing it to see if it was usable in the tourney. Equipping it didn't seem to do much at first. So far, he was only usin' it like a shield, defendin' against Rook's lance attacks.

Though, if my predictions were correct...

"Oh." Suddenly, a roaring sound.

A sonic shock wave so explosive that it passed the barrier reached my ears, and the axe was spinning in the air, free of Reiji's grip.

Actually, the right arm that was holdin' it until a moment ago had been blown away and reduced to dust.

Reiji'd probably tried to switch from usin' the axe for defense to attackin' with it, but he couldn't even swing it at Rook—his arm shattered when he just raised it up.

"...Well, that's usually how it goes with cursed weapons." Usin' them was always a huge risk, and when it comes to that, that goddamn axe was the worst one I'd ever seen.

My Gloria γ could also be classified as cursed gear, but I felt like even that wasn't as bad as that axe there.

...Anyway, it seemed pretty clear that he wouldn't figure out how to wield it before today's tourney.

The two were silent, both clearly surprised by what had happened to Reiji's arm, but it didn't stop Rook from loppin' off his head.

Not holdin' back one bit, huh? I thought. Well, I'm the one who taught him to be like that.

That was the end of their first match, and the barrier disappeared.

Barrier duels ended when one side's HP dropped to 0, and Death Soldier's Last Command didn't mean anythin' in this situation.

Even if it did activate, though, he wouldn't be able to do much with his head separated from the rest of his body.

...Maybe that was the reason Rook decapitated him?

"...I loooost!" Reiji cried.

"Ah hah hah," Rook chuckled. "That was basically an accident."

Reiji's arm had returned, makin' him whole again.

I'd kinda expected the axe's curse to be the kind that persisted even outside barriers, but it seemed like it wasn't.

"...Looks like I'll have to seal it away for now," Reiji said.

"Indeed," Nemesis agreed. "This one will need to have more of its curses dispersed before I would deem it safe in your hands."

Reiji then hesitantly and carefully put the axe away in his inventory...

"...All right! Let's do it again!"

...and went for a rematch as though it was nothin'.

I knew they were just sparrin', but you'd expect one to be more shaken by the fact that he had his damn arm blown away.

Then again, he'd sparred with Figgy and other rankers plenty of times now. Was that why he was like this now?

"...Nah."

How long had it been since he'd first arrived here? It was over a month in real life, and he was just not a newbie anymore.

He'd fought a whole bunch of tough enemies, and either overcame them or hadn't broken when he failed.

And throughout all of it, he'd gained experience and grown stronger.

His level had grown, and so had his technique.

Despite all that, there was one thing that had stayed the same—he was always a guy with a strong heart, and that hadn't changed one bit.

Despite his weaknesses and wounds, he'd always remained strong.

Sechs said that I had a strong sense of justice. If you asked me, Reiji was the one with a strong heart, and that was no different even here.

And to match his strong heart, he was given power in the form of his Embryo—Nemesis.

"Still...not now." It was still too early. It wasn't the time yet.

"...Is this how Sechs felt?" Had King of Crime had similar thoughts while I was hardstuck as a high-rank job?

“Hm...”

And if that fight before the War was the battle he’d wanted, when would my desire come true?

With such thoughts in mind, I watched Reiji and Rook continue to spar.

Gaol

That morning, the gaol was a very silent place.

This was thanks to King of Plagues, Candy Carnage’s bacteria having exterminated nearly all the Masters in the town, as well as Gerbera getting rid of everyone who’d somehow survived.

The only ones in town who were still alive were members of Illegal Frontier, and the only one currently here—in their café, Dice—was Sechs.

The other two were nowhere in sight, and his Prism Person—April—was in his inventory, leaving him all alone.

Completely silent, he was seated in one of the café’s chairs and...sleeping.

He’d spent last night closing up shop.

Now that he’d decided to leave the gaol, he would never return here again, but since he had some memories of the place, he’d decided to clean it up.

All the tables and chairs besides the one he was using were already in his inventory. As though to not leave behind a bad impression, he’d stored away all the tableware and furniture.

The only exception was the clock on the wall.

“...Morning already?” The clock was pointing at six and the light of dawn began to spread as Sechs woke up.

Even the gaol had a day-night cycle, as well as its own weather. Like a colony ship from a sci-fi story, it had a fully functional artificial environment.

Red King was not the only one responsible for that, however—the other control AIs were no doubt lending him their aid.

However, Red King was the only one who would be concerned with what Sechs was about to do.

From their perspective, that was yet another manifestation of freedom. Their stance could be described as “do it if you think it possible.”

“...What a nostalgic dream that was.” Sechs had dreamed about his memories from right before he’d been sent to the gaol again—the last time he’d met and fought Shu. The remnants of the sensations brought about by that dream made Sechs smile without realizing it.

He’d believed that he could find himself through that battle, and that if he and Shu—someone radically different from him—would clash on such a soul-connecting level, then even a nobody like Sechs would perhaps develop a “self.”

However, Shu had clearly told him that it would never work—and indeed, Sechs didn’t feel as if he had anything that he could call “himself.”

If he did possess such a thing, he didn’t even know how to tell. From his point of view, he had remained unchanged.

However, there were some things that were different...or, more specifically, things about him that were different.

After that battle, he’d tried focusing on things other than the evil he’d established as his guiding principle. Just like Shu had suggested, he’d begun doing things he hadn’t done before.

This café was the result of that.

He’d learned coffee-making, dabbled in glasswork, and opened up this establishment. Like a model prisoner, he’d also participated in Red King’s events. He’d read books and even wrote his thoughts about them.

Ironically, he’d led a far more respectable life in the gaol than anywhere else, including his real life.

He spent his days here—talking to acquaintances, hanging out with allies, and occasionally dealing with all kinds of trouble.

One could say that his life here was much like Shu’s.

The thing known as the “self” was something gradually built by going through life like that. Perhaps if he’d stayed here far longer than he had, Sechs may have eventually found that elusive “himself” he was looking for.

However, his days here were about to end.

“Now...” Sechs said as he looked at the clock, which showed that it was slightly past six in the morning. “I will be departing this place in less than six hours.”

He then stood up and walked out of the café.

Once outside, he lightly jumped and sprouted a pair of wings.

They were Juliet's Hræsvelgr, which he'd had in his stock since before he was sent to the gaol. During his time inside he'd changed his "loadout" many times, but this was among his forms that remained, just as Shu's had.

Silently, he flapped the black wings to take to the gaol's sky, a clear firmament that seemed to continue forever.

However, Sechs knew full well there was a wall one thousand metels up.

Despite appearances, the gaol was nothing but a cage and a nest.

It was a cage because you could not leave until you did your sentence, and no one so far had escaped it.

It was a subspace nest, created by the Embryo once known as the "Incarnation of Cages."

Looking down at this tiny world, Sechs said to himself, "Though small, it still had everything."

The gaol was a feature meant to quarantine the most sinful of Masters.

It was made to encourage the growth of the innocent Masters who fought against criminal Masters, as well as the growth of criminal Masters trying to avoid imprisonment.

By spurring both sides to struggle, the gaol was something that accelerated Master evolution across the board.

That was also why even if you were defeated and quarantined here, you still had access to most everything you needed.

There was a town. There were dungeons. There were rare items. There were job crystals from all countries.

And though there were no tians, there were still other Masters you could make friends with...or fight.

Because of all that, even here you could experience growth.

Growth for those trying to deliver sinners to the gaol.

Growth for the sinners trying to avoid the gaol.

And growth for the sinners already sent into the gaol.

This, too, was another system through which they tried to create one hundred Superior Embryos.

And it was not without success—there were two Masters who had become Superiors while imprisoned in the gaol.

It was a cage to quarantine the criminals, as well as a nest to help the quarantined grow.

To Red King, the prisoners were like little chicks—Embryos that had not yet become Infinite. And the reason he let them do as they liked was because he was certain they could never escape.

And so, at the top of this cage-nest, Sechs looked down on the empty town—the gaol as a whole—and said, "...Today, I say goodbye to this place."

His sentence would keep him here for many centuries to come. The day when he could leave the ordinary way was obscenely distant.

Thus, the means he would use would be that of a sinner...the path of evil.

"Red King." He looked up at the sky-ceiling, as well as the entity who was surely behind it, looking down at him as well as the rest of the gaol.

"Today, I leave."

It was a declaration of a coming prison break.

The first reason why he'd sprouted wings and flown to this height was to take one last look at this microcosm—which he intended to never see again—and burn the sight into his memory.

The second was to declare that he, a fledgling bird, would seek freedom from this cage and leave it.

He already had his wings.

This bird no longer needed a nest.

As dawn broke on the first day of The Tournaments in Gideon, some of the gaol's inhabitants would soon attempt the impossible.

They would commit the cardinal sin of organizing a prison break.

Afterword

Cat: “Hmm... Hrmm...”

Xun: “Time fOr the afterword. I’m ‘Xun,’ shOrt for ‘Xunyu.’”

Fox: “And I’m the ‘Fox,’ Tsukuyo Fusooo! Just so y’all know, the Bear and Sechs are on a break this time.”

Xun: “Guess thEy’re tired from what happenEd this volume... Anyway, Chesh, whAt’re ya groanin’ fOr?”

Cat: “Oh. I’m the ‘Cat,’ Cheshiiire! And I’m a biiit troubled right nowww...”

Xun: “Why’s thAt?”

Cat: “There’s a problem with this afterword...”

Xun: “A problEm?”

Cat: “...We got a whole seven pages left, but no real subject to spend them on. We’re out of things to talk about.”

Xun: “It’s an aftErword. Do we really nEed ’em?”

Cat: “A-Anyway, let’s use this to give out a couple tidbits! You two will reveal some info relevant to the volume that the volume itself missed! You first, Xunyu!”

Xun: “You’re not bEin’ reasonablE...but all right, I’ll dO it.”

Cat: (I didn’t even have to convince her... She’s so nice.)

Xun: “Ray’s group gOt an arena, so I guess I’ll tAlk about how duelin’ wOrks in Altar and elsewhEre.”

Fox: “Is it that different in other places? FYI, I already know that Granvaloa doesn’t have arenas.”

Xun: “Yeah, thAt was brought up in VolUme 17. I’ll talk abOut other countriEs. First of all, those who stArted in Altar woUldn’t know this, but the kingdOm’s arena situatiOn ain’t normal.”

Fox: “That so?”

Xun: “Ya gOt way more of ’em than any othEr country. You can actUally add up all the arEnas everywhEre else and yOu’d still have less thAn Gideon by itself. Even oUr Huang He has just threE of ’em, each in a diffErent town.”

Fox: “Meanwhile, Gideon alone has thirteen...”

Xun: “And sincE Huang He’s arenAs prioritize events and rAnked matches over anythin’ elsE, ya get way fEwer chances to spAr or do some secrEt trainin’ than in AltAr. Rentin’ thEm ain’t as easy, so you almOst never get tO test out your skills bEhind a barrier that dOesn’t show what’s gOin’ on inside. That’s whY you gotta do yoUr secret trainin’ deEp in the mountains and away frOm people, even if thAt comes with thE risk of givin’ you the deAth penalty. And there’s obviOusly no barrier, so yoU also don’t get bAck your MP, SP, items, or whAtever else your skills usE.”

Fox: “Now that just sounds painful.”

Xun: “Huang He’s a lAnd with lots of placEs good for trainin’, thOugh. One of our SuperiOrs, Ming She, bAsically lives in thE mountains. Anyway, ’caUse of all that, I like GideOn a good bit. It’s grEat to always have accEss to an arena. It’s alsO why I’m pretty jealoUs of Ray’s groUp for gettin’ one fOr a base.”

Cat: “It’s actuallyyy the first time an arena has become the HQ of a claaan!”

Xun: “By the wAy, though things arE about the same in thE rest of the coUntries besides Granvaloa, in Tenchi, yA got people riskin’ thEir lives in duEls outside of barriErs like it’s nOrmal.”

Fox: “Well, it isn’t normal. There’s gotta be something wrong with them.”

Xun: “Why’s Gideon got sO many arenas, anyway? Care to tEll me, devcat?”

Cat: “We’re not fit to answer thaaat... Just like the Primeval Blade and jobs, they’ve been around since before we got involved, so we just don’t know.”

Xun: “...Y’all arEn’t that good at runnin’ this shOw, huh?”

Cat: “I don’t think I can disagreeee... But there is a reason why they’re spread out like this.”

Xun: “Hm?”

Cat: “The arenas that are around now are the ones that remained intact even after we got involved. And out of the places that had multiple arenas grouped up, Gideon just happened to be the only one that stayed exactly the way it waaas."

Xun: "...That rAised more questions thAn answers, but I wOn't ask."

Cat: "Thank youuu. Please dooon't."

Fox: "Anyway, it's my turn now. I'll say a thing or two about bases in general. First of all, a base can be literally whatever—cabins, mansions, anything. A base is a base. There's even clans that use ships. And the bigger clans tend to have more proper bases."

Xun: "I'm not in a clAn, so lemme ask... WhAt's the point of a basE, anyway?"

Fox: "This is more about buildings in general than just bases, but they can have all kinds of bonuses. For example, they can increase the rate of MP and SP regeneration, or give production quality or success rate bonuses to crafting jobs. My Lunar Society's base reduces the MP cost and cooldowns of healing spells, so we don't have to worry even if we get a lot of patients at once!"

Xun: "That makes yoUr base sound less like a rEligious place and more like a hOspital."

Fox: "Dendro's religious institutions are all about clergymen grouping healing skills to begin with. Most of them function like hospitals."

Xun: "Oh, that sO?"

Fox: "I wasn't there back then, but our base was actually very busy during Volume 15."

Xun: "Your group's a rEal pain in the ass fOr Altar, but it's lOokin' like nOt havin' you around woUldn't be tOo good either..."

Cat: (That's exactly what makes them so baaad.)

Cat: "Anyway, that filled in the pages. With that done, it's time for the comment from the author!"

Xun: (He was being serious about that...?)

Dearest readers, thank you for your purchase. I am the author, Sakon Kaidou.

Volume 18 came later than planned, but I hope you enjoyed it in spite of that.

It was originally set to release in March, but we had to delay it by a month for quality assurance reasons, and I deeply apologize for making you wait.

However, it was because of this delay that I was able to polish the text and, more importantly, Taiki was able to deliver such wonderful illustrations for this volume. My personal favorites are the color illustration depicting the clan and the one finally showing Baldr in all his glory.

Speaking of Baldr, his design was actually created during the airing of the anime.

Since the anime only covered everything up to Volume 5, it only showed Baldr in his battleship form, but the robot form was actually designed first. This ultimate transformation was what the battleship form was based on.

Baldr wasn't the only thing designed by the anime staff. We also had them create designs for several items and characters, and I deeply appreciate their work.

And now, after two whole years, you were finally able to see Baldr in his robot form.

I was the one who requested that he receive an illustration in this volume, and I can only hope that you were left surprised by how cool he actually looks.

Anyway, this volume was about Ray's everyday life, the results of his actions, as well as the past shared by Shu and Sechs.

I feel that I write many characters that are fundamentally opposed to each other, but these two were perhaps the most extreme example of that.

While Shu always made choices he deemed right, Sechs simply went with the flow to do what the world saw as evil.

While Shu had an unwavering soul, Sechs didn't even have a core sense of self.

I hope the battle between them as well as their story has reached your heart.

Volume 19 will continue from here.

Holding new equipment, Ray will challenge his new opponents in The Tournaments, while Sechs is fully prepared to make his escape from the gaol.

Where will these paths they have taken ultimately lead...?

To learn that and more, please continue supporting Infinite Dendrogram.

Sakon Kaidou

Cat: “VOLUME 19 WILL probably RELEASE IN AUGUST, 2022!”
Fox: “He went and made the announcement right as the author’s comment ended.”
Xun: “ThoUgh...did you hEar him say ‘probably’?”
Cat: (Feigning ignorance by whistling.)
Fox: “Oh, I get it. He’s scared that this volume may be delayed too.”
Cat: “ACK!”
Xun: “Oh, so thAt’s it, huh?”
Fox: “He went and made the announcement right away ’cause he wanted to make the date somewhat fuzzy.”
Xun: “And he’s dOin’ an awful job hidin’ it...”
Cat: “...Th-The next volume should come out as planned, so please look forward to it!”

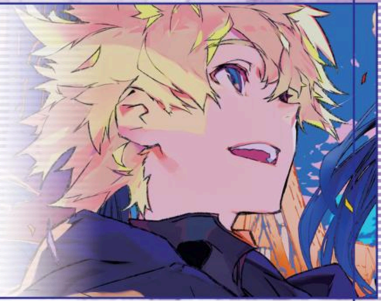
"We are… in a dream."
Gerbera looked at me like I was talking nonsense, but that was the truth.
"…Where am I?"
Looking around, I saw lots of long roads stretching out in every direction. There were no platforms or pillars in sight—just these thin roads twisting and turning all over the place.

Character

Ray

Ray Starling / Reiji Mukudori

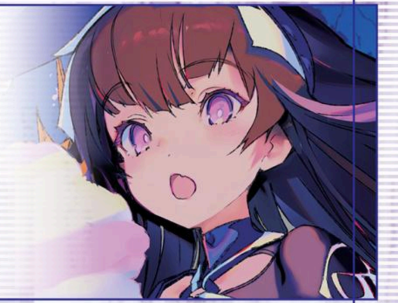
A college freshman who gets caught up in various incidents within Infinite Dendrogram. Though he is generally mild-mannered, he has a strong will that causes him to fight for his goals and never give up on them.



Nemesis

Nemesis

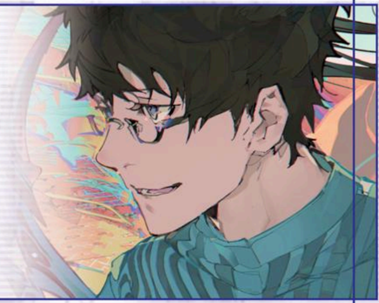
Ray's Embryo manifested as this girl. Nemesis acts as Ray's weapon by taking up the form of armaments such as a greatsword, halberd, shield, pinwheel, mirror, and twin swords. She is also a notable glutton.



Sechs

Sechs Würfel

Bearer of the King of Crime job, Sechs is a man who commits sins for the sole purpose of being "evil." Though currently imprisoned in the gaol, he is also the leader of Illegal Frontier—IF—a clan made up entirely of Superiors on wanted lists.



Gerbera

Gerbera

A Superior from IF and owner of a Sentinel-type Embryo specialized in stealth. Once overly confident in her powers, she challenged Shu and was defeated, sending her to the gaol. Since then, Sechs has put her through hellish training that left her spirit broken.

Prologue: The Sword and the Axe

Ray Starling

The sound of hammering reached my ears. Next thing I knew, I was in a place I didn’t recognize.

I got the feeling that I couldn’t trust my own senses, and that made me realize that this must be a dream. The vagueness of every sensation definitely reminded me of the time Gardranda had pulled me into a dream with her, but somehow it was also crystal clear that this wasn’t her doing.

The space I was in was completely unfamiliar to me.

It wasn’t just a deep darkness, nor was it some place from my own memories—it was simply a place I didn’t recognize. At the same time, I couldn’t even be certain about what I was seeing all around me. It kinda felt like I’d been thrown into outer space with no suit on.

Nothing here seemed definite. It felt hazy even by dream standards.

However, the purpose of the space was one of the few things about it that was extremely apparent.

In the center there was a single furnace. It was only slightly larger than a person, but it had a presence so overwhelming it almost made me forget this was only a dream. Even the heat coming out of it felt like it was radiating from the heart of the Sun.

The fact that there was a furnace here was what revealed the nature of this place—it was a smithy.

In front of the furnace there was an anvil, and someone was wordlessly hammering away at it.

This person was extremely nondescript: I couldn’t tell if they were a man or a woman, old or young, or even if they were human. Their image was so vague that I could barely even perceive them directly.

Despite this, the person also had an extremely powerful presence.

Even though I didn’t know anything about smithing, I could really feel the heat and weight behind the power and technique they were putting into every swing of the hammer. If someone told me that this person was forging the world itself, I would've readily believed them.

However, that wasn't the case, for the thing on the anvil wasn't the world, but a single-edged axe. It had no grip, so the person was only hammering on the blade portion of it. The shine of the hot metal was completely unlike that of heated iron or steel. I would bet that even Infinite Dendrogram metals like mithril or the Mythical hihi'irokane didn't even look like this.

After all...the metal was slightly transparent.

It reminded me of the blue blade wielded by Azurite—Altar.

Though it was now glowing red with heat, the true color of the axe-head must be quite different. Even at this point in its creation, I could tell that the completed work would be truly beautiful.

The process continued. I had no idea how much time was passing. For all I knew, I might've been watching this in fast-forward.

As the person worked, the shape of the axe became more and more clear, and after it had its grip attached, the weapon assumed the form of a large one-handed battle-axe.

The weapon's final color was a white that was even more beautiful than I'd expected. I had never even seen such a color before. Combined with its slight transparency, it looked like it was not only a weapon, but some kind of ceremonial instrument.

Despite this being my first time laying my eyes upon this white axe, though, I felt as though I'd actually seen it somewhere before.

At some point in the process, the person making the axe stopped working on it.

It didn't look complete yet. It appeared perfect on the outside, but I couldn't help but feel like something was still missing. It was like it hadn't received the finishing touch.

"...Two and one." That was when the person first spoke.

I could understand the words, but the voice somehow gave no hints as to the figure's age or gender.

After falling silent again, the person raised their hand, making the axe rise up and stop in midair.

They then raised their hand again, making another weapon appear.

It was a blue sword that I knew well by now—the Primeval Blade, Altar.

However, this Altar looked different than the one I knew. It seemed also incomplete, as though it was missing something. Again, it seemed to have not received the finishing touch.

"I am the Blacksmith." That sounded like a job name, but the way the person said it made me feel like it had a different meaning.

The Blacksmith went on.

"I am conflicted."

"Only one weapon is to bear the role."

"I am conflicted."

"Only one weapon can be treated with all of my being."

This wasn't an explanation—they were simply talking to themselves.

Faced with the white axe and the blue sword, the Blacksmith continued to speak. It almost seemed as if they were directly addressing the weapons they created.

"But before me are two masterpieces." The Blacksmith eyed the axe and the sword, looking conflicted, just as they had described. I could tell that much even though I couldn't clearly make out their face.

"One will become the crowning work."

"While the other will find its place among the refuse."

Even as an onlooker, I could tell that this was a painful choice for an artist to make.

"Which of these weapons should be core to the ■?# that my brethren and I will soon create?"

Thus, the Blacksmith continued to think out loud.

Just like with the creation process itself, in this dream I couldn't tell exactly how much time was passing by, but this must have gone on for a long time before the Blacksmith ultimately...

"I have decided."

...took the blue sword in hand.

That was when the dream ended.

◇◇◇

Paladin, Ray Starling

"Ah...!" Next thing I knew, I was surrounded by familiar things.

Looking up, I saw the sky, framed by audience seating in every direction. This made it clear that I was in the eighth arena, which now served as Death Period's base. Specifically, I was on the stage.

"Ray—you're awake."

"...Nemesis?" Her voice was coming from my crest.

"I must say, it was rather surprising that you fell asleep on the stage with no warning. Are you certain you are not more tired than you think?"

"...Well, I did wake up kinda early to spar." Rook and I had fought a few matches this morning. Since he had a diverse set of combat styles, he made for good practice for The Tournaments. Rook had beaten me more times than I'd beaten him, so after he left I'd stayed behind to think about what I had to work on. Apparently I actually fell asleep in the process.

"I planned to wake you up in time for The Tournaments, but you woke up faster than I expected," said Nemesis.

I checked, and it looked like almost no time had passed. The dream I'd seen felt really long, but it actually hadn't even lasted five minutes.

"That dream..." What was that all about, anyway? I'd heard that dreams were supposed to be things your brain reconstructed from your memory, but this one was completely alien to me.

I recognized Altar, sure, but the rest...?

"Hm...?" Suddenly, I felt my hand touch something. Looking down, I saw a large one-handed axe with its blade covered in a black cloth.

"...What's this doing here?" The thing I'd touched was the nameless axe that had blown my arm away the moment I even tried to use it in my first match against Rook. It really hadn't seemed like I could put it to good use, so I'd put it away in my inventory. "Nemesis, did you take this out?"

"I certainly did not... Speaking of which, when did it leave your inventory, I wonder?"

So, what—was I supposed to believe that it had escaped by itself?

Actually, now that I thought about it, that was pretty believable. I already knew of gear that moved on its own—Gardranda being the most obvious example.

I looked intently at the nameless axe. Since it was covered in a cloth I couldn't remove, the blade's actual shape was hard to make out, but I felt like it resembled the axe I'd seen in the dream.

I'd experienced something like this before, so I had a guess about what had happened.

"Did you show me a dream? Like Gardranda did?" Obviously, the axe did not answer my question.

“What is this about, Ray?”

Nemesis’s worried question made me realize something, though—the memory of my dream must not have been shared with her, just like with Gardranda.

This meant that this axe was indeed the one from my dream, and that it showed events from its creation. I spent a few moments pondering this.

“...Nemesis, I’m kinda hungry,” I said. “Would you mind bringing me something to snack on from the preservation inventories at the cafeteria? I wanna stay here and think a little longer.”

“Very well. Wait here.” Nemesis, now out of the crest, dashed off the stage and into the building.

I looked at the axe again.

“It’s just you and me now,” I said, addressing the axe. “Can you talk?” I posed another question, but once again received no answer. It wasn’t even moving like Gardranda did.

It seemed like the axe was nothing but a mere weapon, and I was starting to feel that maybe the dream was completely unrelated—that I was overthinking things.

But if that dream was shown to me by this axe, and if it had shown something that had actually happened, the implications could be huge.

If the dream was meant to show me the axe’s origin, that meant this weapon was another work by the creator of Altar itself. If that was true, then it must have been on the same level as that revered blade.

“...Or, at least, it could’ve been.”

I recalled what the Blacksmith said.

“One will become the crowning work.”

“While the other will find its place among the refuse.”

And then, the Blacksmith had picked up Altar.

That had been his answer. The Blacksmith had chosen Altar, and Altar was the weapon that had become their crowning work. In the creator’s eyes, at least, this axe had been rejected and was now nothing but refuse.

That was why they’d abandoned it without even giving it a name.

That’s kinda irresponsible, isn’t it? I thought.

Even if they couldn’t make it into their life’s masterwork, I felt like this axe at least deserved to have a name. If the dream wasn’t just some random fantasy or delusion, that meant this axe had enough of a mind to show others its own past.

In that case, it might actually resent the fact that its creator hadn’t even graced it with a name.

Also, my axe had a different color than it did in the dream. The Blacksmith was working on a pure white axe that was slightly transparent. This axe as I had it now, however...was drenched in the color of blood.

What could have caused this change? Did its lack of a name have something to do with it?

Even now, my Grudge-Soaked Greaves were absorbing the grudge stored within this weapon. Did that mean it would be white again once the grudge was gone?

I had no way of knowing if that was true. Gouz-Maise had already sucked up a whole lot of grudge from it, though, and I didn't see even the slightest change in its color.

I sighed. I didn't even know if it made sense for me to start feeling bad for this axe—this cursed weapon.

But looking at it as it was now after seeing that dream...it did leave a little bit of a bad taste in my mouth.

"Well, I guess I can consider it a quest." I tapped the axe's grip with my finger. "I'll eventually figure out how to give you back your color. And I know I'm not your creator, but I'll think of a name to call you by, at least for now."

Let the quest...begin!

It seemed kinda weird to give myself a quest, but whatever.

The axe didn't react to my words—not with speech or any other kind of noticeable change.

Maybe the dream I'd seen really was completely unrelated, but I didn't really care. I'd give it back its color and grant it a name because I wanted to, and that was it.

I'd probably end up thinking of a name over the next few days or something, though. There was no time limit, so I figured I might as well take my time.

"Ray, I brought some sandwiches and tea," said Nemesis as she returned with the breakfast, snacking on it as she spoke.

"Thanks, but...don't walk while eating. We'll have to clean it up, you know?"

"Hrmm...I suppose being in an arena makes me feel as though I'm going on a culinary tour of some event or other..."

Always about the food, huh? Well, I couldn't say it wasn't like her.

"Anyway, once we finish breakfast, we're going straight to the central arena. The first four matches are before noon."

"That is true. Heh heh heh...I cannot wait. Tonight, I thirst for blood!"

"It's still morning." Following this familiar exchange, the two of us—plus Smol Gar—had our breakfast.

This was the start of the opening day of The Tournaments. The full event would take ten days in Dendro time, and this was the first part.

It was a huge occasion in Altar, and it was bound to result in many chance encounters and a whole lot of drama.

At that point, however, I had no idea that my greatest battle would be one I never could’ve seen coming.

Chapter One: The First Battle

Paladin, Ray Starling

The Tournaments would be held on every day of a ten-day period.

One Tournament could have a maximum of 256 participants, all of whom would have registered themselves and signed their Contracts ahead of time. Since Masters might have real-life circumstances or other factors that would prevent them from participating, those who didn't make it to their fight by the designated time would be removed from their slot in The Tournaments. A lottery would then be held to determine their replacement, with anyone who still held a slot in the rest of the competition being ineligible.

The first four fights of The Tournaments—the preliminaries—would be staged using the barrier function that accelerated the flow of time within it. Then, from the fifth battle onward—when all but sixteen of the day's participants had been eliminated—The Tournaments would switch back to a proper show with an actual audience. This was meant to save time, as showing every single fight would be so time-consuming that the whole thing would take much more than a single day. Even with this arrangement, though, the finals wouldn't happen until evening—but that might have been the best time for them anyway.

The preliminaries also had one rule that the actual Tournaments did not—specifically, we weren't allowed to know whom we would be fighting.

The brackets were randomized, and they would already be set up by the time we'd have our first battles. However, they would only be made public when we would have our top sixteen.

There were multiple reasons for this, but one of them was controlling information.

In addition to accelerating time, the barriers that would be used for the preliminaries would also prevent anyone outside from looking in. That would make it impossible to see any of the battles or find out what the other contestants were capable of. That was a big reason why we weren't allowed to know whom we'd be fighting until we actually stepped out to face them—if the bracket was revealed any earlier, we'd be able to investigate our upcoming opponents and find out what they could do. If they were famous enough, we could even prepare for the fights by changing our gear to hard counter them. For example, if our opponent specialized in fire magic, we could give ourselves an advantage by equipping armor or accessories that gave fire resistance.

I'd known about the importance of metagaming since my time in high school. The president of the EGRS had made sure of that.

Anyway, needless to say, I was no exception, and I had no idea whom I'd be fighting first.

The final brackets would be revealed when only sixteen of us were left. This was because if the remaining contestants weren't already famous, the probabilities of any one person winning would be affected by whoever they'd defeated in the preliminaries. It was the kind of consideration you'd expect from the City of Duels.

Well, none of this actually changed what we contestants had to do. No matter whom we were up against, we'd just have to win the four preliminary battles and try to achieve victory in the actual Tournament afterward.

The other contestants and I were now in the waiting rooms, waiting on our turns. Since there were a bunch of these, we were placed among those we wouldn't fight in the preliminaries.

"Hm..." I wasn't going to be fighting anyone here, at least for now, but for some reason...I could sense them staring at me.

"I see nothing surprising about that," said Nemesis. "You have become quite famous."

"KSHAA!"

Smol Gar was chomping on my hair again with a loud munching sound. I couldn't tell if she was agreeing with Nemesis or not.

"Yeah...even I'm pretty aware of that by now," I said. My battles against Dryfe's Superiors—with the added exaggerations—had become well-known, and the others here were reasonably wary of me. Everybody must've been wondering what they'd do if they ended up fighting me outside of the preliminaries.

To be honest, though, I wasn't sure if I'd even make it that far.

In this tournament, being famous was a huge disadvantage. Anyone I had to fight would know my abilities the moment I stepped into the arena. Even if they weren't able to prepare gear that countered mine, they would still have an advantage. This was exactly what I'd experienced during The Anniversary.

I did have a few things going for me, though—namely, the fights would all take place inside an arena. I was bad at long-range combat, so the fact that we would always be close enough for me to play most of my cards was a real advantage. I even had the option of equipping my Storm Visage and filling the arena with Hellish Miasma. Now that would really give me the upper hand.

"...A truly vile thought," said Nemesis.

Yeah, if I did it in the actual Tournament, the audience would probably boo me real hard, I thought. Especially since the miasma would probably make it impossible to see anything.

"A Paladin who forces his opponents to duel in a cloud of poison gas...quite the concept."

Honestly, my fellow freshmen in college already think I'm some kind of devil-eating berserker. I doubt too many people would be surprised if I did do something like that.

"...Anyway, it's almost our turn," Nemesis said.

The contestants were being called up pretty quickly—probably because of the barrier's effect that sped up time. Some new numbers were called just a minute after the previous ones had stepped inside, and even the longest waits weren't longer than five minutes. Considering that this wasn't even the only waiting room, it was all going pretty fast.

At this point, it looked like everyone's first four battles would be over before noon.

"Ray Starling, it's your turn next."

"Okay." Called by the arena's staff, I stood up from my chair.

"How exciting," said Nemesis as she switched to her sword form.

"KSHAA!" Smol Gar hissed regrettably as she undid the summoning effect and became my Miasmaflame Bracers once again.

I equipped my Storm Visage and put up the hood of my Black Warcoat. Now fully prepared, I left the waiting room. I heard words like "Dark Lord" and "Devil-Eater" behind me, but I pretended that I didn't.

“Please step into the arena,” said the staff member, pointing at the black barrier enveloping the stage. “Your opponent is already inside.”

“All right.”

I supposed that having us both enter at different times was another way to prevent us from knowing our opponents.

“All right...let’s see what kind of demons lie in wait for us.”

“I am quite satisfied with one demon, thank you very much,” Nemesis said.

Oh yeah. We’ve already got Gardranda, I thought. Though, in this tournament we’re fighting for the Orb containing Stern Face-Tender Heart, Sasage—a demon-type UBM. So if we make it to the end, we’ll be getting a new demon regardless.

With that useless thought in mind, I passed the dark barrier.

While it just looked like a wall of pure darkness from the outside, it was pretty clear when looked at from the inside, like a canopy of transparent glass. The light passing through made it easy to see the entire arena, including the opponent who was about to walk in.

“Oh, there’s my enemy this ti...wait, huh?”

“Huh?”

The person who’d walked to the stage was as surprised as I was.

The reason for that was obvious—we were already acquainted.

“Now that’s some dangerous-lookin’ gear you’re wearing. You’re Ray Starling, aren’t you?”

“And you’re...Lang, right?” It was one of the Masters who’d taken to the skies with me during the battle against Monochrome. He was also a member of Riser’s Babylonian Battlegroup and had fought alongside Kasumi’s trio during King of Thieves’ terrorist attack on Altea.

What were the odds of getting him as my first opponent?

“That’s me. Hey, you mind if I call you just ‘Ray’?”

“Not at all.”

“Thanks. Heh heh...but man, I sure got the short end of the stick this time, huh?”

“Short end of the...?” What did he think I was, anyway?

“I didn’t join the tournament for nothin’, though. I won’t give up without a fight,” he said, using Instant Equip to take out a lance.

“I’m not planning to lose either,” I replied as I brandished Nemesis and hopped onto Silver's back. Silver counted as equipment, so I could "equip" him here with no problem.

I used Reveal on Lang, but didn't get much out of it. I could see his job, but his stats were hidden. That meant he was using something to hide them, and my skill level was too low to counter it. I'd done a similar thing to hide the accessory I'd put on as a replacement for the usual Brooch.

That wouldn't help much in this case, though. Just as I'd feared, I ended up facing an enemy who recognized me right off the bat. It was best to assume he knew about my combat style, Counter Absorption use limit and all. The exact same thing had happened during The Anniversary.

I, on the other hand, didn't know the first thing about Lang's combat style. I could recall him riding a hippogryph back in Torne, but Monochrome had taken him by surprise and given him the death penalty before he could actually do any fighting. Practically speaking, I had almost zero information on him.

Since he'd died from a single hit from the laser—albeit to a critical body part—I could assume he wasn't an END build, at least. This was supported by his Gale Rider job, so it was pretty obvious that he was focused on AGI.

"Ten seconds."

"Hm...?" As I heard the staff start the countdown to the beginning of the match, a particular question came to mind.

Lang was a Gale Rider who had a hippogryph as a mount. Tamed monsters could be used in arenas as long as they didn't exceed the minion capacity.

Why wasn't he mounted like I was, then?

"Five...four...three..." Before I could come up with an answer to that, the countdown continued. "Two...one...zero!"

And with that, the match began.

"Heaven's Circuit—Halley, activate!" Lang immediately used a skill named after a comet, drowning the arena in a blue light...

Central Arena

Large crowds were gathered outside the Central Arena.

Many held tickets to The Tournaments without assigned seats. They had arrived early so they could get the best seats available.

Besides them, many people were simply out enjoying the events and food stalls that had opened up for the occasion, making the area pretty lively even by Gideon standards.

"Ah! Riser!"

"Hm? Oh! It's been a while, Io."

Within the crowd, Masked Riser the Kamen Rider had run into a girl he was acquainted with—Io, a member of Death Period. Both of them had been among those who had acted to protect Altea during the recent act of terrorism.

"The other two aren't with you?"

"We split up to buy some food at the stalls. We're getting ready to cheer for our leader!" There were quality inventories that preserved food freshness and warmth, so buying food ahead of time presented no issue.

"I see. So he's in today's Tournament."

"Yeah! What about you?! The name of today's UBM makes it sound like it'd become a mask, doesn't it?!" Stern Face-Tender Heart, Sasage did indeed sound like it could become a demon—or more specifically oni—mask, but Riser chuckled and rejected the idea.

"I am fairly attached to my current mask, so I'm actually avoiding UBMs that could replace it. Also, while the UBM's abilities are pretty versatile, they don't really synergize with my build."

"I see! It's like how our bear wouldn't know what to do with more costumes!"

"I guess it's kind of similar." In actuality, all of Shu's MVP rewards besides one had ended up being costumes anyway, so he never had much choice to begin with—not that these two had any idea about that.

"So I suppose you're just here to watch the fights, then!"

"Well, that's part of it, but some members of our clan are participating too. Remember Lang? The hippogryph rider who fought with us in Altea? He's in this one."

"Oh, him! You don't say... Wait...huh? I'm trying to remember—did he use his Embryo then?" Thinking back on the battle against Regina Apis Idea, Io found she did recall a Master who was riding a hippogryph. However, she couldn't remember seeing him use his Embryo. His weapon, skills, and mount were all standard. She thought that maybe he just had an Embryo that was hard to see, but...

"He didn't."

...Riser immediately confirmed that wasn't the case.

"It's not like he was holding back, though," he added. "It's because his Embryo is...well, he just couldn't use it back then."

"Hm?" Io looked at him, puzzled, but Riser, who felt like he couldn't reveal his own clanmate's abilities, could do nothing but smile awkwardly.

The words "he just couldn't use it back then," though, said everything that needed to be said about it.

Lang's Embryo—Speeding Comet, Halley—could only be used in a limited number of situations.

Therefore, its category had to be...

Paladin, Ray Starling

"What...?"

Once the bright light subsided, my surroundings had completely changed.

There was now another boundary within the barrier—a gigantic, spherical cage made of metal the color of the night sky. Between the bars of this cage there was a metallic mesh of the same color, making it impossible for even mice to escape.

Silver and I were now trapped inside here.

Well, maybe "trapped" wasn't the right word for it. The cage was large—about the same size as the stage itself. It didn't limit my movements any more than the barrier did. Since this cage was spherical, the surface we were standing on was now slightly inclined, but that was the biggest change.

I tried attacking the cage with Nemesis, but it reflected her without issue. She didn't even leave a scratch. It looked like destroying it using normal methods would be difficult.

"This is..." If this cage was an Embryo, its category must've been...

"Type Castle." Nemesis finished my thought. This had to be a building Embryo. I hadn't fought one of these since Franklin's.

I'd heard that Castle types were rarely suited for direct combat. Many of them acted as a base or had abilities focused on crafting, and they couldn't be moved by any means except by returning them to the crest and placing them elsewhere.

Franklin's Pandemonium was a Castle Embryo that produced and stored monsters, and since it had legs, it could be used like a fleet carrier.

But this one...

"I see. A cage-like Castle would be useful in combat," said Nemesis.

Obviously, a Castle that trapped your opponent would be an asset in battle. But...this one seemed a bit too big to feel like it "trapped" me, exactly. It covered the entire stage, so if it was supposed to limit my movement, that completely defeated the purpose.

And actually...where was Lang himself, anyway?

"Ha ha ha! This ain't a cage, and it ain't just a Castle."

I heard a voice above me. At the very top of the spherical cage, haloed by the sun's light, I saw a unique-looking silhouette.

"This one's Type is...Chariot/Castle." The figure was Lang, sitting on a large motorbike decorated with a ram on the front.

A motorbike sticking to the upper part of a sphere, and a rider sitting on it. Lang's face was concealed, but rather than a tokusatsu hero's mask, Lang was wearing a helmet like the ones used by racers.

"...A hybrid," I said. His Embryo was both a Chariot—the motorbike—as well as a Castle—the cage.

This mix of spherical cage and motorbike reminded me of something I'd heard of before.

"This is a Globe of Death...!"

"You know about them? Guess I won't have much explaining to do, then!"

A Globe of Death was a type of stunt where performers rode motorbikes inside a huge sphere made of metal mesh. Since it involved driving at high speeds without even knowing which way was up or down, it was extremely difficult and dangerous.

If this was Lang's ult, this "Halley" Embryo must've been based on this exact stunt.

"...Weren't you a hippogryph rider?" I asked.

"Unfortunately, this baby only works inside its cage," Lang said. "I need Pete—that's my hippogryph—so I can move around outside."

So the hippogryph was just his spare mount, and Lang was at his strongest when he was in this cage and on that motorbike. That explained why he hadn't used it during the battle with Monochrome—this cage sure didn't look like it could fly.

"I heard you were like a junior Riser, and I guess that includes riding a motorcycle, huh?" I said.

"Hell yeah!" he replied with a laugh.

It really stuck out to me that he'd actually told me about his Embryo. After he'd used his ult, I'd lost sight of him for a moment, and that would have been a good opportunity for him to attack me by surprise. Had he felt that it would be unfair if I didn't know his abilities like he knew mine?

This focus on fighting fair and square was just like Riser too.

"Anyway, I guess we should get this started, huh?" Lang said as he grasped the handle and revved up his Halley. As the engine let out a roar, the mufflers released a black smoke.

"...Yeah," I replied. I made Silver use Wind Hoof to create a compressed air barrier. Instead of completely surrounding us, I made it holed like the metal sphere.

Then, I had my right Miasmaflame Bracer let out its Hellish Miasma. The spray of gas flowed out through the gaps in my barrier.

I instantly noticed that none of it was escaping through the metallic mesh, which made me suspect that it not only bound us physically with the visible cage, but also had some of the properties of a non-physical barrier.

"I said I got the short end of the stick, but I'm not gonna lie—the idea of fighting Ray Starling the Unbreakable has got me pretty excited." Lang was giving me the same kind of vibe that I'd felt from the many duel rankers I'd sparred against. I could sense him smiling under that mask.

"Word of advice: try not to blink," he said as he revved up his ride again. "My Halley...is pretty fast."

The moment he revved a bit harder, he disappeared from sight.

My eyes widened. The trail I could see at the edge of my vision made it clear that it wasn't teleportation, but actual extreme speed.

And I wasn't using "extreme" lightly. I hadn't even blinked, yet I'd already lost sight of him.

"Ah! Behind you!" Nemesis warned me, but I felt an impact before I could even turn around.

“Gh...!” The attack was so heavy it blew me and Silver away. Despite the compressed air barrier sheltering us, we both took a considerable amount of damage.

And that wasn’t all. We were sent flying all the way to the opposite part of the cage.

However, before we could actually hit the wall, a silhouette approached us.

It was Lang on his bike. I couldn’t see it before because the sunlight was drowning it out, but the bike was a blueish-white color, making it look like an actual comet speeding toward us.

The distance between us was quickly diminishing. “Nemesis!”

“Of course!” She activated Counter Absorption, and Lang drove right into it.

The damage that was supposed to reach us, as well as his kinetic energy, was taken by the barrier, briefly stopping him in his tracks.

“Purgatorial Flames!” I held up my left hand toward Lang and doused him in fire.

He quickly tried to turn away and evade it, but the fire reached him first.

“Damn it!” With his bike and rider suit singed, Lang accelerated and drove away from us. He was driving straight toward the inner wall of the spherical cage. He quickly reached a speed where I could barely see him anymore and instead of crashing into it, he began driving straight up the incline instead.

“Ah! SILVER!” Silver quickly used Wind Hoof to take refuge in the middle of the sphere, and a moment later a blue-white silhouette roared through the spot where we’d just been at a speed that not even sound could keep up with.

“...I see,” said Nemesis. “This sphere is a space where he never has to slow down.”

A Globe of Death was a stunt where the riders reached extreme speeds and spun around the inside surface of the mesh sphere until they were unable to differentiate up from down. Because of this, Lang could accelerate and crash into his opponents from anywhere as long as they were standing on the sphere.

The open space in the middle of the sphere seemed safe, but I didn’t feel like I could rely on it too much. Since this was Lang’s Embryo and this was his home turf, it was best to assume that he had some sort of counter to anyone who took refuge in the interior space.

He was still racing around the edge right now, but he would probably do something else soon.

"But man..." I said, trailing off. Lang's speed really was insane. From what I could tell, it was considerably greater than even Marie's, who easily broke the sound barrier.

And not only was he fast; he easily turned this speed into offensive power. If I weren't an END build and hadn't increased my HP with my new VDA, I might've gotten some bad injury-based debuffs, and my situation would've been pretty dire. Silver was slightly damaged too and couldn't move as fast as usual.

"A high-rank job with a high-rank Embryo who reaches a speed like this..." said Nemesis. "I reckon there must be more to it."

"Yeah..." There were multiple ways that enhancements to an Embryo's abilities could be implemented, and the ones I was familiar with were "extra costs," "conditions," "uncontrollability," and "limitations."

"Extra costs" were obviously anything that enhanced skills or gave buffs using something other than MP or SP. Nemesis's damage counter could be considered one of these.

"Conditions" were the—well, special conditions that had to be fulfilled in order for the enhancement to have an effect. In Nemesis's case, Like a Flag Flying the Reversal was a good example.

"Uncontrollability" was trading control for raw output—in other words, discarding control over something, perhaps even making it dangerous to yourself, in exchange for increasing its power. Nemesis had nothing like this, but Miasmaflame Princess: Gardranda could be considered as such.

And finally, "limitations" were just that—anything that limited the scope or use of an ability. These included an ability having a set amount of uses or only being usable in certain environments. Needless to say, this included the use limits on my Counter Absorption.

I was pretty sure that Lang's Halley also had to be operating under some limitations. He'd said that the bike could only be used within the metal sphere. So, by limiting where it could be used, Halley greatly enhanced its speed and charging ability as a Chariot.

The flaw with this arrangement was that it couldn't do anything against anyone outside the cage, making Lang completely vulnerable to people with wide-range firepower, and they didn't have to be as powerful as Shu to threaten him.

This weakness was what gave him all this speed and charging potential—but in a duel, this weakness barely meant anything.

The spherical cage was about as big as the stage itself. His opponents couldn't get far enough away to avoid being enclosed, nor was there any space to attack him from the outside.

I would even say that it was optimized for duels.

"Lang...are you a duel ranker too?" I asked. Even as he replied, he kept up his insane speed that made him hard to see. The Doppler effect made some of it difficult to hear, but I could still make out what he said.

"I was! But right before we met, I lost to Max and got knocked outta 30th place! I hadn't even gotten a nickname yet!" So he was an ex-ranker. The speed and attack power he had here suddenly made sense.

He was no different from all those rankers who'd outclassed me before. Were my MVP rewards enough to close the gap or even surpass him?

"...Ray, the Hellish Miasma seems to have no effect," Nemesis notified me.

Since I'd released the poison miasma, it had filled the entire sphere. The triple debuffs it gave should've made it difficult for Lang to keep going as fast as he was, but he didn't seem affected.

And then I began to notice a reason for that.

"The miasma...is being mixed with a gas." The dark purple of the miasma was blended with something black—the gas released by the muffler as Lang revved up the bike.

I'd thought it was just the exhaust, but now it didn't seem like it was quite that simple.

"Halley...Halley's Comet... Oh, I get it now." While thinking about what Lang's Embryo was based on, I came across an explanation for the gas. "Halley's tail..." Halley's Comet was the first widely known example of a periodic comet, and over 130 years ago it was incorrectly theorized that its tail or "coma"—the gaseous bit—contained poison that would kill all life on earth, or that it would blow away the atmosphere and cause mass suffocation.

Of course, it had neither poisoned the earth nor rid it of oxygen, and ultimately, it turned out to be nothing worth worrying about. However, in this Embryo that was named after the comet, the dangers of its tail were very real.

The exhaust itself was a poisonous gas that filled the metal sphere. The reason why my miasma hadn't leaked out of the cage was because it was designed to keep this gas in.

This made me realize something else.

"...So he's wearing a gas mask too, huh?" That full-face helm must be gas-proof. He wouldn't have used this skill if it weren't.

Strangely enough, we'd had similar thoughts. And thanks to that, my Storm Visage protected me from his poison, but my Hellish Miasma couldn't hurt him either.

Because of this, we both had to find another way to come out on top. However, I was having a hard time thinking of anything that would work on him.

Lang moved around at incredible speeds. I couldn't catch up to him, and even landing a counterattack was a challenge.

Payback had to be charged, while Shining Despair was even harder to land than a regular counterattack. The same could be said about Grand Cross, which took a moment to activate. Using Chaser to copy his stats probably wouldn't do much good either. It wasn't Lang himself who was fast, but his mount. Taking his AGI wouldn't let me catch up.

"He said he lost to Max, though..." Nemesis noted. I knew about Max—she was one of Juliet's friends and one of the duel rankers. We'd recently teamed up for a quest, and she'd participated in The Anniversary too.

I vaguely knew her combat style and could imagine how she'd beaten Lang...but that didn't help me much. Her Ipetam had the ability to create lots of swords that she could use like drones. She must've filled the cage with them, making it impossible for Lang to ride properly.

That was something I couldn't do.

What else was there, then? Could I fill the area with Purgatorial Flames and cook him slowly? "No, I need something else..." I muttered. I got goosebumps just trying to search for some card I had to play.

This was a warning sign—my instincts were reacting to a danger my mind hadn't consciously recognized yet.

I pulled Silver's reins and dodged slightly to the side. The next moment, a blue-white silhouette passed by me at supersonic speeds.

Taking Silver's left plating and my left leg with it, the speeding figure pierced through to the other side of the cage.

"...Wh-What?!" I did my best to stabilize myself so I could stay mounted on Silver. I was so stunned it took my mind a moment to catch up and realize that the silhouette was just my opponent speeding around on his bike.

Spinning like a bullet, he'd flown through the air straight toward me. My guess was that he'd somehow jumped his bike off the cage's wall the moment his speed reached the maximum.

The move was like a racer flying uncontrollably off the course, but it had enough power to pulverize both me and Silver.

"Gh...!" I looked at the wall he'd flown toward, but there was nothing there now. I didn't see the destroyed remains of Lang or his bike, and I could only hear the engine sounds ahead as I tried and failed to catch up with him.

It seemed like he'd landed without a problem and was accelerating once more.

"...How does that technique work?" Nemesis, who'd finally caught up with the situation, said with mixed terror and amazement.

I was wondering the same thing—except I thought this technique seemed familiar somehow.

Back when I was in high school, our clubroom had volumes of a hobbyist manga about four-wheel drive car races lying around. I'd read them, and I was pretty sure I'd seen a technique like this in there. Doing it with a bike you were still riding seemed extremely reckless, but Lang was the Master of Halley—an Embryo focused on bike stunts. For all I knew, he was the perfect candidate for pulling off such a dangerous move.

"So he can even run us down if we're in the air. How shall we approach this, then?" Nemesis asked, slightly distressed.

Lang had already begun accelerating again, and he would probably pull that stunt on us one more time.

I felt like we barely had thirty seconds until the next attack, if that. If he kept up this hit and run strategy, we'd eventually mess up on our defense and be defeated. We could use Counter Absorption to cancel both his damage and kinetic energy, but he was so fast that we couldn't tell which direction he'd attack from. We'd most likely put up the barrier on the wrong side.

"...That leaves just one thing." The situation wasn't great for us, but we still had one card we could play.

"Our MP stores...are good." After the battle at the peace talks, I'd uncursed a whole lot of items. The nameless axe was an especially good source, and my Grudge-Soaked Greaves now had enough grudge to use that. Even though I'd lost the left one along with my leg, I probably didn't need more than the right for this.

The rest depended on how Halley worked—but in the worst-case scenario, I'd cover for it with Hellish Miasma.

"Ray...are you actually planning to use that?"

Yes, I am, I thought in response.

"Are you certain it's a good idea?"

We have Halley and the duel barrier. That's two layers of protection. Also, we don't have an audience this time, and I don't think it'll be enough power to break out. And honestly...I doubt we'll need to make it that powerful anyway.

"I suppose we can give it a try, then," Nemesis said.

"Yeah," I said as I lightly tapped Silver's neck. "You know what to do, Silver."

My steed let out a noise that was almost like a neigh.

And I...

"Wind Hoof...Activate."

...prepared to use a certain tactic.

Central Arena, Stage

"He's tough," said Lang to himself. "Just what I'd expect from Ray Starling the Unbreakable!"

He was speeding along Halley's walls, half excited and half tense. The poison gas skill his Embryo had—Halley's Tail—was still active, since it would give him the upper hand if the suffocating poison gave his opponent a debuff. The person he was fighting right now, however, seemed to have nullified this effect in the same way Lang himself did.

But that wasn't a problem, since Lang had one more way of fighting—in this case, his max-speed flying charge attack.

Halley the bike could only work within Halley the metal sphere. It could only travel within this dark metal cage like a comet speeding through the night sky.

But because of this, within the cage, Halley's speed was unmatched.

Combined with Lang's job as Gale Rider, Halley could currently go over five times faster than the speed of sound. It needed some time to accelerate, but once it topped out, it had a level of speed and power that was completely unexpected from a fifth-form Embryo.

That held true even if it was in the air, and unless they had some special means of defense or incredibly high stats, anyone would die instantly when hit by four hundred kilos of raging metal moving at those unreal speeds.

Most of his defeats in duels—including the one against Max—had been because he was defeated before he could reach his maximum speed.

Because of this, people like Ray—who stayed in the air and observed—were only setting him up for victory. As long as Lang attacked at the right time and from an angle where Ray couldn't defend with Counter Absorption, he could end this battle in a single hit.

That was what he'd planned to do with his first flight, but Ray's own instincts prevented that. The deadly attack had only taken away a part of Ray's body, and Lang was forced to accelerate once again.

Even so, it was effective enough to make him certain he could win if he only landed a direct hit.

Twenty seconds until I top out! I'm moving at a speed he can't even track! I'll win as long as I don't let him guess the timing of my next jump, and I make him miss with Counter Absorption... Lang thought. It didn't even matter to him if Ray dodged the attack, since he could just repeat it over and over.

All he had to worry about was a scenario in which Ray used Counter Absorption with the correct timing and direction, but that was pretty unlikely.

Lang truly believed he could win this.

And that was when something happened to Ray.

That's... Lang began to realize what was going on.

Ray...or to be more precise, Silver underwent a change.

He was gathering the surrounding air and building the compressed air barrier once again. The barrier was all black, likely due to the miasma and poison gas that flooded Halley's cage.

I guess he wants to defend against my jump! It's my most powerful attack, though—it's gonna take a real good wall to protect against it! Lang was confident that his momentum could break through even Mithril and Ancient Legendary metal, so a wall of air barely fazed him.

He also realized that Ray may have also been using this omnidirectional barrier to determine where Lang's attack was coming from and then use Counter Absorption, instead of trying to block it.

"Now that's an idea! Let's see if you're fast enough!" Lang cried.

Thus passed a window of time that felt both short and long.

By the time Lang reached his maximum speed, Silver...was still gathering the air.

Despite that, he wasn't creating a vacuum. Halley had a function that prevented air from flowing out so that the poison gas from Halley's Tail could stay within its confines, but there was nothing keeping air from flowing in. The arena barrier also worked in a similar way in order to prevent vacuums caused by fires and the like.

The presence of air or the lack of it, though, didn't affect Lang and Halley's speed at all.

"A balloon's not gonna protect you—doesn't matter how thick it is!" Lang shouted as he prepared to jump with his bike for the finishing move.

Wait, no... In a moment, Lang's instincts told him something his mind didn't, just as Ray's had earlier.

Or more accurately, they'd remembered something.

It was a scene he'd witnessed—a color he was familiar with.

The reason Silver's barrier was black wasn't because of how much poison gas it was absorbing.

The blackness was due to the air in the barrier being so dense that not even light could pass through it.

This is... Lang knew about this strategy. In fact, most people with ties to Gideon knew about it.

It was the tactic that had led to Ray becoming known as the "Unbreakable."

It was a trick well outside Ray's usual combat repertoire, used only in that specific battle.

"Wind Hoof, cancel."

It was the Wind Hoof Bomb—a compressed air explosion.

The immense volume of air that had been compressed was released with Ray's words. The blast of air delivered destruction in every direction, and this time it was far worse than it had been when used against RSK—and that was because of Halley itself, which didn't let any air escape outside.

This was like dynamite going off inside a safe. In this airtight space, the blast was extremely fearsome.

Even so, it wasn't enough to shatter Halley's bars. The sturdy Castle designed to not let anyone out was able to withstand an explosion like this.

However, there was something that couldn't.

It was neither the safe nor the dynamite in this case—it was the safe's contents, lacking the endurance of the exterior—Lang himself.

As the interior of Halley was engulfed in violent destruction, his HP quickly began to drop...

...and it reached 0 before Ray's did.

Chapter Two: Remembering and Overlooking

Paladin, Ray Starling

My first battle in The Tournaments was done, and—however barely—I'd emerged victorious.

It was all thanks to the Wind Hoof Bomb. Against the God Hunter, I'd used it for just its knockback, but this time I had employed it more offensively. Not even the fastest enemies could avoid a huge explosion centered on you—essentially an omnidirectional attack.

Honestly, I felt like the cage being airtight made my explosion kind of overpowered, but both Halley and the duel barrier handled the force just fine, so it didn't really matter—especially since the fight ended before the blast waves bounced off the walls and obliterated me as well.

Also, if Lang had charged at me while I was still compressing the air, I'd planned to cancel the charging right then. Doing that right as he touched my barrier would've basically guaranteed a hit. It would've been a bit of a gamble, though—Lang might've been incapacitated by the blow, or he might've kept charging through and ended up defeating me instead.

Regardless, the battle was over, and everything had worked out about as I'd expected.

Lang and I also got the opportunity to have a little chat after the match. Though we were both surprised by the cards we'd each played, we agreed that it was a pretty good and clean battle.

"...A 'clean' battle choked with miasma and poison gas," said Nemesis. "I doubt it was good for the environment."

"Kshoo. (Not...ecological.)"

Hey, don't say that, I thought.

Anyway, looking back at the fight, the reason I'd won was that I had a lot of cards I could play. Lang was slightly stronger than me in terms of baseline power and he'd completely negated my miasma and counterattacks, but I could still beat him using Silver's Wind Hoof Bomb.

This battle really drove home the fact that this versatility was my biggest strength.

I had Nemesis with her various counters, three MVP rewards, and Silver. My arsenal was so big that even if I was up against someone stronger than me, I had options that could give me the upper hand. This was even better in duels because even if I played every card I had in one match, they'd all be restored once it was over.

Winning my first fight had also given me more confidence. If I could keep this up in the second fight onward, I'd...

[Reiji, ya got a minute?]

"Hm?" Unexpectedly, I got a call over the Telepathy Cuffs from Shu.

[Yeah, sure. I just got out of my first match.]

[That so? Well, ya should know that uh...]

Shu seemed kinda panicked...or maybe troubled? Either way, he didn't sound like he usually did. I figured he wanted to tell me something but was also hesitant about it.

[...Ya know what, forget it. I'll tell ya after the preliminaries.]

[Huh? Uhh...okay?]

[Three more matches. Bear it, brother.] And with that, he ended the call, and I was left wondering what he wanted to tell me.

"What was that all about?" Nemesis wondered, just as confused as I was.

"...Beats me." We looked at each other and tilted our heads in confusion.

When I came back to the waiting room, I instantly became the center of attention again. "He won. No surprises there," I heard someone say, but honestly, I definitely didn't feel like it was no surprise. The battle hadn't been easy. I'd almost lost a bunch of times—hell, I could've lost the moment Lang created Halley. I hadn't known what it did, so if he'd just charged at me instead of explaining it, I would've died easily.

"Indeed," said Nemesis. She was out of the crest, but since there were people around, she spoke to me using telepathy. "I have always known this, but in Master-to-Master combat, one must always be wary of unknown abilities. Such ignorance might kill you in an instant."

Yeah, I thought in response. With how varied Embryos can be, it's scary to fight Masters who have powers you know nothing about.

“And that is why you need some means of avoiding such instant kills,” Nemesis continued via telepathy. “Duels do not allow Brooches or the Death Soldier’s skill, and my skills may lack the precision to fully protect you.”

I guess I should start every match by spreading Hellish Miasma.

That hadn’t done much against Lang because he was doing something similar, but it was pretty clear that it was an effective move in general. Whenever it actually worked, it would make my enemies slower. And if they lacked a means of attacking airborne opponents, I could use Silver to retreat to the sky. Then, I could spread the miasma throughout the area, switch to the flames if necessary, or even use Shining Despair—all while keeping a safe distance.

Though, that sounds kinda...

“If you do not mind me pointing it out... Would that not be...exceedingly villainous?”

...It would, I thought.

“What’s the point of looking good if it just ends up making you lose, though?” I asked out loud.

“Coming from a man who took a bite out of an undead and a devil, that is a truly convincing point...”

“I guess it is...whoa.”

I suddenly felt myself starting to doze off—the battle against Lang must’ve been more mentally demanding than I’d thought.

“We still have time until the second match. I will watch over you, so please do take a nap,” said Nemesis.

“You know what, I think I will. Thanks... Oh, and tell Smol Gar not to chew on me.”

“Very well.”

“Kshasha?”

I went ahead and closed my eyes. Soon enough, my mind drifted into sleep—not caused by a status effect, but simply from my own exhaustion.

◇◇◇

As I slept, I saw a dream—not like the one I’d had that morning, but a completely normal one.

“Mukudori, do you know the word ‘metagaming’?”

This dream was based around a memory I had from back when I was in a high school club. Still in my first year, I’d been sitting in front of a table and facing the person on the other side, who was the president. The club was called the Electronic Game Research Society, or EGRS for short.

“I...can’t say I’ve heard the word, no.”

“It’s a gaming term that refers to the battle over the information on the game’s current climate.” Prez had trading cards spread out on the table. She was organizing them based on their levels or types and putting them together into a single pile...building a deck, so to speak.

“The ‘climate’ or ‘meta’ of card games changes all the time. New expansions get released, different cards get banned, new limits are set, different decks become popular, and new combos get discovered. It’s very important to gather this information before you build your deck and go to tourneys. Do you know why?”

“Uh, I don’t play card games that much...”

“I see. Don’t worry—I’ll teach you.”

EGRS was a video game club, but the shelves here were full of hobby mags and manga. This was because the prez—Koyomi Hoshizora—was a fan of tabletop games, especially TCGs. Since I was a new club member, she invited me to join her on this path and gave me a starter deck, a playmat, and other few things for it, so I felt like I had to play along.

“Gathering information about the meta is important because it increases your chances of winning against more opponents. For example, if the current meta is centered around lots of effects that let you pick cards from your deck, you can turn the cards with those effects into so much scrap paper by using cards that prevent that. It’s things like that.”

“...I’m not sure about some of the terms you used, but I think I get the principle.”

“But if you use that deck against someone with a deck that doesn’t use those cards, it’s your cards that’ll end up being total scrap. Every tourney starts before the first match even begins, with contestants competing against each other by guessing what decks will be the most popular and how to counter them. You can sometimes use a side deck for changes and corrections, but that’s just more reason to really focus on building your deck.”

Despite saying that deck-building was serious business, she seemed to be having fun doing it.

"If being able to counter your opponent's moves is so important, why not just have a deck with a whole bunch of different counters?" I asked.

"That's not a bad idea exactly, but doing that comes at the cost of stability. Also..." she said before squinting. "There are decks that can't be countered."

"Huh?"

"I mentioned that new combos can be discovered, didn't I? People sometimes take these unknown combos straight into the tourneys. Combos that remained beneath the notice of this information-based society are as powerful as they are obscure. Most of them are found by combining old, forgotten cards with brand-new ones. Overcoming the boundaries of time, these forgotten things—things you overlooked—return to bare their fangs at you."

Silence ensued.

"Well, in a more general sense..." she said before pausing for a moment, closing her eyes, and continuing. "In games that involve RNG, you may sometimes encounter deviations in phenomena that thoroughly surpass all your preparations."

She then opened her eyes and looked right at me. "Mukudori, that's exactly what's gonna happen to you in some game three years from now. Be careful," she said.

Prophetic words that came outta nowhere.

"How do you know that...?" I asked, all tense.

In response, she said, "My deck-building fortune-telling says so."

"Wait, this was all fortune-telling?! What the hell?!" I said in surprise.

"I'll have you know it's pretty accurate. When I did a reading for the vice prez, I got it so right I actually freaked him out. It was written all over his face. Get it? 'Face'? Like a card face?"

"...I don't know if you should be that proud of that one."

"Well, anyway...be careful three years from now."

As the prez said those words, my dream came to an end.

◇◇◇

I woke up to a feeling of someone shaking me.

"Ray, wake up. You were called."

"All right..." I looked to the side and saw Nemesis placing her hand on my shoulder. She must've shaken me awake.

I checked the time and realized that only about half an hour had passed. Well, the barriers were accelerated and there were fewer contestants for this battle than the first one, so maybe it wasn't that surprising.

"Hm..." I took a moment to think about the dream I'd just seen. Was it a sign? It couldn't be, right? Man, what was up with the dreams I was having today?

"She said it would be in three years, huh..." Three years from the spring when I was a first-year in high school. Wouldn't that be...now?

"Ray?"

"...Don't worry about it." I switched my focus and once again followed the worker to the stage.

No matter how hard I tried, though, I couldn't stop thinking about the dream.

◇

When I came out to the stage, I once again passed the black barrier. It looked like I'd gotten here first, since I couldn't see the other person yet.

Just like last time, I hopped on Silver and prepared myself. I was still kinda tense, but now I at least had an idea of what I had to do to give myself the best chance of winning. I had to establish dominance using my debuffs and flying, use that time to get a grasp of my opponent, then choose the most effective card I could play. And that's how I...should win.

"Ray."

"Yeah?"

"Your expression does not match your thoughts. And even your thoughts feel as though you are trying to convince yourself."

Nemesis's words made me realize that, yeah, my face was all stiff. My heart was uneasy too.

"I just...have a bad feeling about this," I said. The dream of the past—the fortune that prez had given me—was coiling around me like some hint or a curse.

I felt like something bad was about to happen and I wouldn't be able to do anything to stop it.

"We are strong now," said Nemesis. "No matter what sort of monster we face, we will not be powerless against it."

Her words were encouraging and empowering, and they helped me relax at least a little bit.

"...Thanks."

Soon after that, I saw my opponent on the other side.

"...Huh?"

The shock I received from seeing this person was incomparable to the one I'd gotten when I'd laid eyes on Lang. I could see her through the clear barrier, and that alone was enough for me to understand that the bad feeling I had was completely justified. The prez's prediction was actually so right it was freaky.

Astonishment overtook both me and Nemesis as our opponent finally entered the stage.

We were now faced with a Scandinavian beauty in a Chinese dress.

"Wow! I haven't seen you in so long!"

It was the fourth Superior of the kingdom—Lei-Lei the Prodigal of Feasts.

She was also known as a member of Death Period—our clan.

"...It's been a while," I said, still confused as to why she was here. "Umm...did you register ahead of time?"

"Nope! I just joined today! I got some unexpected time off work, logged in, got into the lottery to take someone's slot and won! It's pretty exciting, huh?! We may get to fight a UBM! I'm pretty excited that I get to fight you too!"

Lei-Lei answered my question with a smile on her face.

...Yeah, that was how it worked, wasn't it? If a Tournament slot opened up, they'd hold a lottery to let someone take their place. A slot happened to open up, Lei-Lei happened to have some time off, and then she happened to win the resulting lottery.

It was all by chance—a deviation in phenomena.

I had no words. I'd completely overlooked the fact that this could happen.

Lei-Lei couldn't log in regularly, rarely showed herself, and was generally hard to get ahold of. Shu had even told me that she was busy with work recently.

But even taking all that into consideration, the chance of her being in the Tournament was never zero.

This had to be what Shu'd wanted to tell me and then decided not to—that Lei-Lei got a spot in the Tournament.

He'd probably thought that there was no point in telling me because the ladder would be revealed anyway and it would only make me more tense.

But now we had this situation. It was just the second battle of the preliminaries, and I was up against Lei-Lei.

The randomized Tournament ladder led to us—members of the same clan—fighting each other.

This was the deviation in phenomena that thoroughly surpassed all my preparations.

Of all the people I could've fought, it had to be Lei-Lei, huh?

"...Ray," said Nemesis. I could tell by her voice that she was shaken too.

Since both me and Lei-Lei were from the same clan, you could say that it was good for us no matter which one of us won...but on a personal level, she was no doubt my greatest obstacle in this Tournament.

"...We got the third one," I said.

"...Indeed."

This would be our third time fighting an Altarian Superior.

The first time was when we'd accidentally ran into Figaro in the Tomb Labyrinth.

The second time was when we'd faced Miss Eldritch after she'd kidnapped me.

And now this would be the third time—where we would fight Lei-Lei in an arena. It wasn't an accident or a crime—it was a struggle to the end atop a duel stage.

This was only my second fight, but I felt like I'd already met The Tournaments' final boss.

If something like this was enough to break us, though, we'd have already been broken long before this.

"I said that we would not be powerless no matter what sort of monster we faced, did I not?" said Nemesis.

"You did."

"We now stand against something far more than a monster, but I have no intention of taking my words back."

"I don't plan on losing either. Let's win this, Nemesis!"

"Certainly!"

Thus began yet another one of our fights against a Superior.

"Twenty seconds." A referee began to count down the time.

Lei-Lei the Prodigal of Feasts. Though I'd met her on my very first day in Dendro, I still didn't know much about her. The only time I'd seen her fight was the recording Marie'd shown me, where Lei-Lei had exterminated Goblin Street.

I couldn't really tell what she was doing, though. She was somehow making Goblin Street's Masters melt and explode by just touching them, but I had no idea about the mechanics behind that—neither Shu nor Figaro had ever told me.

"I suppose we can assume that we cannot let her draw close," said Nemesis.

"Yeah..." It was pretty clear that even a single touch from her exposed hands could kill me.

I tried checking her stats using Reveal, but just like in the first battle, basically everything was hidden. I wasn't allowed to know how much AGI or what job she had.

I couldn't help but tense up and gulp.

"This is gonna be our first battle! I can't wait!" Lei-Lei, on the other hand, looked completely relaxed. She was practically beaming.

"Ten seconds." We were in completely different states of mind, but we both had the same amount of time until the duel began—and that moment was rapidly approaching.

"Five...four...three...two...one...zero!"

The moment the fight began, I spurred Silver into the sky. I didn't know if Lei-Lei had any aerial combat abilities, but I knew that if I stayed on the surface, she'd get close and kill me instantly. It was best to go with my original plan and take to the air.

"Where is she now...?!" Would Lei-Lei follow after us now that we were in the air? That was the first thing I had to find out, and the result was...

"Wow! Your horse is flying! It's one of those things that are all the rage these days, huh?" she said as she...began singing.

She wasn't following after us. Hell, she wasn't moving at all.

She was just looking up at us from the ground and, for some reason, singing a cheerful song.

An extremely pleasant voice began to fill the stage.

"...What the hell?" Was she that confident she'd win or was she just an airhead? I thought the song would give me some debuff, but when I checked my stats, I didn't see any status effects on me.

Well, whatever it was, there was only one thing I had to do here. I had to fill the stage with miasma to create a better situation for myself and close the gap between Lei-Lei and me.

With that thought, I pointed my right hand down at her and activated my skill. "Hellish Miasma!"

"Fire!" Lei-Lei called out.

That was when my right hand disappeared.

"...What?" My right arm that was supposed to release the Hellish Miasma, as well as the right Miasmaflame Bracer equipped on it, had melted away.

Shock overcame me, and one particular memory rose up in my mind—my battle against Logan. After I'd summoned Gardranda, she'd used Hellish Miasma: Zero to completely melt an armored devil, bones and all.

What had just happened to me looked really similar to that, only I wasn't the one using it.

The fact that even my Miasmaflame Bracer was destroyed made it clear that something was very wrong here.

"Is this...a power that buffs the enemy's attack and sends it back to them before it happens?" I wondered. Powers centered around retribution might've been able to do something like that, but it didn't feel right. After all, Lei-Lei wasn't doing anything. She was just singing and looking up at me.

Or was this some kind of preemptive retribution power that only needed her to sing?

That also seemed wrong, simply because it was too absurd and unfair.

"What did she do to—" Before I could finish my sentence, I let out a cough.

"Ray...?!" Nemesis cried. I put my hand to my mouth, and it was instantly painted red.

That wasn't all. While I was preoccupied with my right arm melting off, a disturbing amount of blood had pooled on the saddle.

It had all come from my own stomach. I had pain sensations turned off, so I'd failed to realize that my stomach had melted open.

"...What...the hell?" She wasn't near me. She hadn't touched me. I had no idea what she was doing to me.

Despite that, she'd already given me a fatal injury.

Lei-Lei was still doing nothing but singing—but at least I finally realized something.

Even though there were no debuffs on my status window, and even though I had no idea how this all worked, it was clear by now that this song was her attack.

I didn't know how, but she was attacking me using sound as the intermediary.

And if I didn't stop the song soon, I'd die.

"MONOCHROME!" As I raised my voice, my Black Warcoat began to move, taking the place of my right arm and forming into a jet-black cannon.

If I had to settle this as quickly as possible while keeping a distance from her, this was the only thing I could use. Shining Despair—one of my most powerful attacks, capable of delivering extreme heat at the speed of light. We were in an arena, but if I fired it downward I didn't have to worry about it breaking through the barrier and damaging the city. It was just like the battle between Figaro and Miss Eldritch.

"Shining..." As I began to call out the skill, heat and light gathered in the dark cannon...and the Black Warcoat evaporated under the heat.

I had no words.

This was outrageous. Monochrome was not just the source of the Shining Despair attack—it also had Light Absorption that should've made it immune to lasers. How could its own laser have made it evaporate?

At the very least, this told me a lot more about exactly how this attack worked.

She wasn't sending my attacks back to me before they even happened. If that were the case, Monochrome wouldn't have vanished.

Instead, the phenomenon at play was...

"Resistance...negation!" I gasped.

She was dealing not with status effects, but something before the status effect had even been applied.

Resistance to status effects was a kind of hidden stat that was influenced by END and other things—and that was exactly what Lei-Lei's Embryo affected. She completely erased resistances to status effects, as well as to the elements.

No, that wasn't quite right—looking at what had happened, she didn't just erase them. She brought resistances into the negatives.

She debuffed the resistances themselves, making it far easier for the target to receive status effects or be affected by changes in temperature. That was why my right Miasmaflame Bracer was melted by its own miasma, and why my Black Warcoat was evaporated by its own burning light despite being designed to absorb it.

It was like they were animals dying to their own poison.

"Such a fearsome power...!" said Nemesis. It was like Miss Eldritch's Kaguya, except focused exclusively on debuffing resistances.

That meant that basically all attacks built around status effects and energy releases would just destroy me before they did anything to Lei-Lei.

If I used my left Miasmaflame Bracer to fire Purgatorial Flames, they'd just burn along with my arm and become Charred.

I looked down at the hole in my stomach and realized that it had actually gotten bigger. And that wasn't all—when I touched the wound with my left hand, the Miasmaflame Bracer released white smoke and began to melt.

"So that's...how you're doing this..."

Negative resistance explained the hole in my stomach too. You could call the wound a kind of ulcer—except in this case, it wasn't just the gastric walls that were failing. My entire body had lost so much resistance to acid that even my own digestive fluids were harmful.

"Basically...she can kill any living creature without doing anything..." I said.

A wielder of a destructive song that made all nearby living beings die on their own—that was Lei-Lei, the Prodigal of Feasts.

To her, living beings were just pieces of meat that melted away and became like drink, completing the feast.

I had no idea who'd given her the name, but now that I knew its meaning, it just chilled me to the core.

"Ray... Well...? What should we do?" Nemesis asked.

This series of gruesome disasters seemed to have greatly disturbed her too.

That made me realize what I had to do, though.

"...Nemesis. The Halberd."

"...Right away!" She transformed into a halberd with a black flag flying behind it and activated Like a Flag Flying the Reversal. I instantly felt the spread of the hole in my stomach begin to slow down.

"It's not enough to cancel out the effect...but enough to make it less dire." Reversal was also a resistance skill. Though it couldn't flip my resistances back into the positives, it looked like it could make this more bearable, at least.

...It did the same with Miss Eldritch, so I guess it's no surprise it kinda works here too, I thought.

"Nemesis...we're gonna fight from up close."

"...It does not seem that we have any other choice." We'd lost all means of attacking from a distance, so we had to settle this in melee combat. "Why not use Silver to block out the sound?" Nemesis asked.

A dense enough compressed air barrier may have been able to block the flow of sound, but...

"We don't know if it'll stop the debuff that's already on us...and we have no time to make it." I was still losing HP to the hole in my stomach. Time wasn't on my side anymore, so I couldn't waste it by just waiting and seeing—or by making the Wind Hoof Bomb. "Also, we were watching out for her touch at first, but that probably doesn't actually mean much."

Lei-Lei's hands must've had some sort of debuff on them.

Certain jobs in the boxer grouping had this skill called "Poison Hand." By itself, it was just a debuff attack, but when delivered to a body with negative resistance, it became a skill that killed instantly.

Also, it could've been that her Embryo was activated by the sound the attack made when it touched the body. If Poison Hand actually had that kind of synergy with Lei-Lei's Embryo, it really was a fearsome combo.

However, none of that meant anything if it didn't touch me.

"I'll flank her and try to attack her then." Assuming that she was going all out in that recording I'd seen, I might be able to counter her—and I still had my Counter Absorption uses.

It was a shame my Reveal couldn't see her stats, but I had no choice but to do this anyway.

"Though...I don't think I have the attack power."

"Indeed...the damage counter might as well be empty."

My biggest problem now was that I had no means of finishing her off. The negative resistances made my Miasmaflame Bracers and Black Warcoat completely unusable, and all the damage I'd received so far technically came from me. Lei-Lei hadn't actually damaged me—she'd only lowered my resistances—which meant that I couldn't use Vengeance, Payback, or Chaser. And I doubted that I had enough power to defeat her with basic Flag Halberd attacks.

I thought that maybe Grand Cross would do the trick, but to use it, I had to descend to the surface and stand in place for a moment. She might have been able to take advantage of that, and if her level was high enough, it might've not been enough to kill her anyway.

I had few cards I could play, and my odds of winning were slim.

As things were, it looked like the only thing I had that could finish her off was...our new friend.

"You intend to gamble on that?" asked Nemesis. Well, we were already screwed. If we wanted to turn this around, this was our only chance.

"Yeah...let's do it!"

"Very well!"

We rode Silver straight toward Lei-Lei.

Accelerated by gravity, we slightly shifted our trajectory as we approached. She was still singing, but she was paying close attention to our movements too.

"GRAAAHHH!" When I was close enough, I let out a roar and swung my Flag Halberd at her. However, she dodged it by merely throwing her upper body back.

The moment my blade passed her, she went back to her previous stance, then charged right at me. Silver was trying to get us away from her, but she was able to instantly close the distance anyway.

I had no idea if this was the result of some skill or if it was just her own stats. Regardless, I was now in range of her deadly hands.

Still singing her heart out, she thrust her poisonous claw toward me.

"Counter Absorption!"

But that was when Nemesis switched to her human form and created a barrier of light. It deflected the lethal hand and stopped Lei-Lei in place for a moment.

"NOW...!" I seized the opportunity, raised my left hand above my head, and used Instant Equip.

And thus, I took out the nameless axe covered in the black cloth.

I had a feeling that this weapon was powerful enough to defeat her. Even if merely swinging it once blew away my arm, it didn't change the fact that I could still swing it.

Lei-Lei didn't stop singing, but I could see her eyes slightly widen.

"HIYAAA...!" I began swinging the axe, and after it had only moved a few centimeters through the air, I felt something off.

It was as though something was flowing through me, with my left hand as its source.

After that, a change overcame my body so fast that I couldn't even react to it.

It was just like what had happened to my right arm when I'd sparred against Rook, but with a far greater reach.

My entire body was turned to dust.

And as I felt myself shattering, my consciousness faded away.

◇

Next thing I knew, the stage’s barrier was undone.

In actual time, the battle had ended before even half a minute had passed.

I’d participated on the first day of The Tournaments...

...and was knocked out after my second battle.

Chapter Three: The Next Stage

Paladin, Ray Starling

After the second match, I went back home to the eighth arena.

Just like I had this morning, I was now lying on the stage and watching the clouds pass. I heaved a heavy sigh.

“Kshoo? (Are you...feeling down?)” Smol Gar asked as she sat on my forehead and lightly slapped my face.

“Honestly...yeah, I am.”

“Kshaa. (I see...)”

After the match, Lei-Lei’d told me she had fun fighting me. I didn’t know if she was just being nice or if she’d actually enjoyed it.

She’d also said that if she won and got the right to challenge the UBM, she’d invite me and some other clan members into the battle, though, and added that she’d try her best to come out on top—not that I could really imagine her losing. So, as far as the clan was concerned, this was kind of a good outcome. I’d even told everyone who was going to come to cheer for me to go cheer for her instead.

But on a personal level...yeah, I wasn’t taking this too well.

“Hrm...” I knew Lei-Lei was a Superior, but I’d lost to her with almost no effort on her part.

Honestly, this left me pretty shocked. Sure, this wasn’t the first time I’d lost like this. I couldn’t even count how many times someone had made quick work of me during sparring, but despite that, my defeat had hit me way harder than the time Marie had first killed me, or the time Miss Eldritch had overpowered me in her base.

That had to be because until I’d lost to Lei-Lei I’d actually believed I’d grown stronger since those incidents. Nemesis was now a high-rank Embryo, plus I had Silver and three MVP rewards, along with a general increase in my stats. And then there was all the experience I’d built up during my many battles here in Dendro. I’d thought I was way better than I’d used to be, and that was why it had stung extra hard that Lei-Lei had beaten me so easily.

Considering that she'd shut herself up inside the crest, Nemesis must've felt the same way.

Still...

"...Ksha? (...Are you broken now?)"

I didn't need Smol Gar asking me questions like that to realize it—I could see my feelings clearly with just a little introspection. However, the pain and shock I was feeling now...none of it was anything I couldn't recover from.

"...No," I said. "I'm just a little bent."

I could see this feeling for what it was: a pain meant to make me stronger.

The shock was something else, but I hadn't been broken. Lei-Lei had crushed me in the battle, but I'd still gained something from the whole experience. I was really an idiot, thinking I'd already gained enough power and that I had enough tricks up my sleeve.

It was exactly because I'd been defeated that I could once again clearly see what I had to focus on in order to grow stronger. And now that I'd realized that, it gave me the drive to stand up again.

"If you are bent, then we must simply hammer you back into shape," Nemesis said as she appeared from the crest. She'd had the exact same thoughts as me.

"Yeah. There's still time until night falls and the final match ends. We should do some training before then," I said.

"Indeed!"

It was pretty clear that Lei-Lei would win this Tournament, and the winners had the right to pick the day on which they'd fight their UBMs.

Since Lei-Lei had schedule issues, though, she'd almost certainly want to fight her UBM right after the winning match. I didn't think I could become the MVP with her fighting alongside me, but UBMs were powerful, so fighting it was a good way to get some combat experience nevertheless.

"I guess we should do some leveling to prepare for that... I'd like to do some tests on this thing here too, but that will probably take some time, so I'll save that for later."

As I said that, I reached into my inventory and took out a weapon—the nameless axe.

Nemesis jumped in shock at the sight of the weapon.

"What?! Ray! You still intend to use it?! But it turned you into dust!" For some reason, she was full of indignation at this. "It scattered you into pieces at the worst possible time—right before you could deliver the decisive strike!" Apparently, she was really upset by the way the battle had ended. Nemesis was a weapon herself, so she must've not appreciated the results.

"But, Nemesis...it's not like it was the axe's fault."

She was right that I'd basically lost to myself rather than Lei-Lei, and...yeah, it was because of this axe. But that defeat had allowed me to notice something about the weapon and finally understand it.

While sparring against Rook I'd only lost an arm, but in the Tournament I'd lost my entire body. I could kinda see what had caused this difference now, and it was all because my enemy was Lei-Lei.

The effect that had destroyed my arm and body wasn't just simple physical damage. That was why it had become way worse after Lei-Lei had reduced my resistances.

I didn't know what was the power that had flowed through my body, but this was a big hint.

If I had some sort of resistance item that directly countered this effect—similar to Monochrome's Light Absorption—I might have been able to wield this axe without any consequence.

"This axe isn't some crazed monster—it has its own rules. What happened was just the result of that."

"Hrm..." was Nemesis's only response.

I was thinking I could use the barrier at our base to try and find out the nature of the effect this axe inflicted upon me. Getting all the resistance gear would probably be difficult, and the testing would take a lot of time, but I at least had an idea what I had to do now.

"But...what if this had nothing to do with Lei-Lei's skill, and the axe merely made the effect worse because it was in a bad mood?" Nemesis suggested.

That...could be true, I guess... Wait, could it? No. There's no way...right? I'd talked to the axe a bunch of times this morning, but I really doubted that would put it in a bad mood.

"We're cool...right?" I tried asking it, but the axe obviously didn't respond.

“Well...let us put that aside for now,” said Nemesis. “More important right now is the leveling. Where do you intend? Gideon’s surroundings are too crowded for that.”

“Oh yeah, that’s true.” Thanks to The Tournaments, a whole lot of Masters had come to Gideon. Many wouldn’t be participating until the later days, and from what I’d heard, a bunch of them were currently leveling or adjusting their builds by killing whatever monsters they could find around the city.

I also wanted to avoid any unnecessary attention, so I didn’t want to level anywhere with too many other players.

“And I can’t use Hellish Miasma wherever there’s people,” I added, following this line of thought.

“Ksha. (It’s really...useful.)”

“...I feel you are becoming too reliant on it,” Nemesis said.

Well, regardless, if I was gonna level, I’d have to do it in a zone that didn’t have many people, was right for my level range, and was close enough to let me come back by night.

And, well, I actually know of a place like that, I thought.

“You do?” Nemesis answered me, out loud.

“Shu told me about it. It’s about an hour from here by Silver, and it’s just right for me to level solo. It’s actually at the very south edge of the kingdom, and it used to be a buffer zone between Altar and Legendaria.” Apparently, it had been dominated by a powerful UBM at some point, but after Shu had teamed up with someone to beat it, the area was annexed by the kingdom. “It’s a mountainous area with almost no roads going through it, but Silver can fly, so that’s not a problem. It’s also on the opposite side of the Border Mountain Belt from all the Skydragons, so we probably won’t run into any of them either. And if something happens in the air, we can just flee to the surface. It’s perfect, isn’t it?”

“I see. It does sound like it.”

“Rook said that he leveled there too.”

“You began at about the same time, yet your levels have grown so far apart.” Rook had always been a fast leveler, but while I had to reduce my login frequency because of college, he’d started power leveling like crazy and was way ahead of me now.

“His three girls have become stronger too,” I added. Apparently, they were close to becoming Pure-Dragon-tier.

It’d depend on who he was matched with, but I was pretty sure he could win his Tournament.

The only difficulty he had in duels was the time he needed to prepare the Union Jack. You could get on mounts and take out your tamed monsters as long as they didn’t exceed your minion capacity, but preparing skills before the start of the fight was a no-no.

“Ksha? (Instead of thinking about others, you should focus on improving yourself...right?)”

“Yeah. Let’s go.”

“Very well.” I took out Silver and jumped on him. Nemesis sat behind me like she had earlier, while Smol Gar got on the top of my head.

I hope she doesn’t fall off, I thought.

Anyway, I refocused myself and went to level at the Altar-Legendaria border to the south—in the area once occupied by the UBM known as “Divine Disks.”

Gaol

This was a place meant to contain Masters who’d broken the law and was currently a realm of death.

Three days ago, the Superior known as King of Plagues, Candy, used his Embryo Resheph to infect it with a deadly virus that killed nearly all the prisoners. That had turned it into an uninhabitable space where merely logging in meant infection and a consequent death penalty that banned you from the game for three days. The few survivors had also been massacred by another Superior—Gerbera—who’d been excluded as a target of the virus.

This extermination, which had continued for nearly three days now, had left the gaol empty of everyone but the Superiors, and nobody could even log in because of the death penalty.

All this was merely part of Sechs’s plan to take the members of Illegal Frontier out of the gaol. The other Masters inside it were uncertain variables that could interfere with the prison break, so they had to be removed as preparation.

And now, the actual prison break was barely an hour away.

"Phew. So this is the last time we'll drink this tasty coffee here," said Candy.

"Yeah...but it's not like we won't ever get to drink the leader's coffee again... Oh, leader—don't forget this dolphin glass."

They were all sitting at the counter in Sechs's café, Dice, and shared their thoughts while enjoying the last coffee they'd have here inside the gaol.

The café had been cleaned up and now looked empty, like a home before a move. April, AKA Diamond Slayer—the café's employee and Sechs's property—had also been stored away into his inventory.

"I feel like a lot of time has passed since I was sent here at the start of April, but the month isn't even over yet...I really can't keep track of the time here."

Gerbera felt as if she'd always been in the gaol, her perception no doubt affected by the tripled time.

Candy seemed to share her sentiment. "I feel like it's been forever ago. I was just getting some XP in the great outdoors when suddenly some weird-looking meanie in shades fell from the sky and made me drop. I figured I'd just level up in the gaol, but Sechsy got in the way and Hanny the big-legged forever-bachelorette crushed me."

Remembering every detail, Candy looked back at his first days here.

Those words reminded Sechs of something. "Figaro actually proposed to her shortly after she was released."

"What...?! Uh, I mean...oh, really?" Candy was so shocked he broke character for a moment—that's how big a surprise it was for him.

"Yes. This is info from a reliable source too."

"Wow. Just...wow. Hanny was my tea-drinking bestie, but I always thought that thing she had for him was one-sided..."

"I believe everyone besides Hannya and Figaro themselves thought the same thing."

"Human relationships make my head spin. Not even a god like me can understand them!" Candy said, throwing in a random wink and pose.

Sechs showed no reaction to Candy's theatrics and maintained his usual smile. "I'm glad Hanny's happy though. I graciously forgave her for crushing me and forgot all about it, so she can have my blessings!"

The very fact that Candy mentioned it at all meant that he'd neither forgotten it nor forgiven her for it, but it did seem like he was genuinely in a celebratory mood.

"Hrmm...that got me thinking though. Hanny's already gone, and our jolly crew's about to leave too, so...be honest with me, what'll happen to the gaol?" Candy went on.

"The prisoners will probably split into small factions and fight for dominance. This will last a while—maybe even a very long time. It may even become a completely lawless area and remain like that forever."

The existence of the Superiors was a pacifying force here. The prisoners sent to the gaol had fewer ways to enjoy Dendro to begin with, but the overpowering presence of the Superiors had made them go further and keep a low profile to avoid being marked. The regulars who weren't trying to avoid their notice wanted to act like Illegal Frontrier's underlings, but the overall effect was the same.

Once the Superiors were gone, they would most likely start having fun by fighting for dominance.

"What about that shut-in?" Candy asked.

"Fu'uta?" Sechs replied. "I don't believe he will do anything soon."

"Why does he even log in to Dendro, anyway? What's so fun about just staying in that hole at the edge of the gaol? Plus, my viruses don't reach him for some reason, and I just dunno what that's about."

"That's exactly what he's doing there—nothing."

Fu'uta had been in the gaol since before both Sechs and Candy had arrived. He was sitting in a dungeon, but he wasn't even doing any leveling.

In fact, he couldn't level up even if he wanted to—he didn't even have a single job.

He also didn't gather any items or interact with anyone else. He completely refused to have fun with the game and just stayed in that one place.

"Nothing? If you ask me, reality is a better place for that."

"He is waiting for his preparations to be done."

"Preparations?"

"Time is his ally. He will slowly encroach on the Resources comprising the gaol, and then finally eat his way out of it by himself."

Candy furrowed his brow at these words. They made Fu'uta sound like a malignant disease, which Candy felt was supposed to be his thing.

"And then? What'll he do when he's outside?"

"I did not speak to him for long, so I am unsure myself. However, I do remember the words I heard him whisper once."

Sechs had tried to invite Fu'uta to Illegal Frontier several times in the past, but Fu'uta had refused every time, and had continued rejecting him even after Sechs had given up on recruiting him and simply wanted to become better acquainted. Despite such limited interactions, however, Sechs was actually the Master who was closer to Fu'uta than anyone else.

That was why he'd been able to hear this whisper.

"Apparently, it's 'For dad.'"

"...Dad?" Candy couldn't make sense of that. "He's being a shut-in and preparing to break out of jail for his papa? I don't get that at all. It's even more confusing than Hanny's relationship!"

"You aren't wrong. I suppose he must be driven by some feelings nobody else can understand," Sechs said, taking a sip of coffee and thinking back to the time he himself acted on nothing but his own inscrutable motives. "Anyway, the situation means that Fu'uta will not influence the state of the gaol after we leave. It will become a place where the more cunning prisoners—or pre-Superiors such as Gakido—play a game of domination."

"That sounds kinda fun too," Candy said—ironically, since his presence was part of the reason such a conflict had been impossible up until now. What meaning was there in a battle for control of the gaol when there was someone who could completely destroy the whole place around?

"That made me wonder...what's gonna happen to this café?"

"I decided to transfer control of it to a prisoner. More specifically, after we leave, the ownership will go to the first person who visits it."

"Well, lucky them. Hm...?"

Candy tilted his head in confusion. Normally, this would be the part where Gerbera, being the downer she was, would say something along the lines of "this place is basically cursed and haunted, so I'm not sure if whoever gets it is lucky. That person would be our leader's successor, kinda, so they'd probably be targeted over ownership of the building."

However, Candy realized that Gerbera was no longer at his side.

Where did Gerby go? How long was she gone? he wondered. Gerbera had been with them, enjoying her last drink in this café—but now, all that was left was the dolphin glass she liked so much.

She'd vanished so naturally it was shocking. Her control over her skills was far above what it had been before. While Gerbera's self-confidence had dropped, she had become so much more competent that it was beyond comparison. Her behavior had actually changed precisely because her self-worth had dropped, and as a result she'd become more careful and cowardly.

On that front, Sechs could only thank Shu for sending her here, and Rook for taking her down a peg despite being less powerful than her.

It seems she is preparing for it, Sechs thought. Gerbera acting like this was part of the reason why their prison break would surely be a success.

"Anyway, we finished our coffee, so...let us begin." Sechs washed their glasses, put them away, and looked at Candy as well as the observer of the gaol, who was surely watching them from somewhere.

"And now, we leave," Sechs declared, as if it was already a settled matter.

King of Crime would now escape the cage maintained by an Infinite Embryo.

◆

"...It's about to begin." In a control AI workspace surrounded by countless windows, the observer of the gaol and control AI no. 6—Red King—adjusted his glasses as he spoke.

One of the windows showed Sechs, standing at the edge of the gaol.

Red King had known this day would come soon. Sechs had asked him if he could break out, and Red King had given him permission. The criminal was free to try it.

Red King had also added that he wouldn't go out of his way to bring Sechs back here either.

Masters were sent to the gaol only if they came back from a death penalty without any usable save points. However, after the prisoners returned from their death penalties, they could log in and out normally. If they logged out after breaking out of the gaol, they would be able to log in at the same location they'd been when they logged out.

They would be free the moment they took a single step outside the gaol.

Red King wouldn't send anyone to chase them down. If they happened to get the death penalty again after escaping, they'd be sent back to the gaol—but until then, they'd be completely free.

"No one has successfully passed this test of mine. I wonder how he will rise to the occasion."

Despite having given them permission, Red King had no intention of just letting them escape. Anyone trying to go from inside the gaol to the outside would be obstructed by Space Fixation.

This was the power mimicked by the pre-ancient superweapon, Acra, and the wall of fixed space it created was so tough that no amount of simple physical force would be enough—not even King of Beasts would be capable of it. The power and scope of this Space Fixation far exceeded its copy.

The wall also could not be influenced from the outside. The gaol was located at a certain set of coordinates within Infinite Dendrogram, but it couldn't be touched.

You couldn't even see it from the coordinates it occupied. Even if someone outside passed right through the place where the gaol was, unlike those inside, they wouldn't hit any walls and would simply move right through.

The gaol was an isolated area that was almost impossible to escape. The only ways you could do it was by using King of Destruction's Right of Destruction; the Primeval Blade, Altar; or an Embryo that could manipulate space itself, just like Red King could.

And still, not even those methods would be a guarantee.

"Sechs has many cards he can play. I'm not aware of all of them...but it should still be a difficult task for him."

King of Crime had declared that he would break out of the gaol, but Red King did not know the means by which he intended to do it. Red King was the warden here, but not even he had a full grasp of the many and varied abilities Sechs had in stock.

But even if Sechs had some resource or ability that Red King was not aware of, breaking out would still be a challenge no matter what.

"Especially when there's three of them..." To escape as a group, they would have to break the gaol's wall on a large scale.

This had not been impossible for Sechs at an earlier point. If he'd used his ultimate skill to transform into King of Destruction, Shu Starling, then used Split Spirit to divide into six, and then used Right of Destruction to attack the wall, he may have forced open a hole that would've taken longer to fix, allowing all three of them to escape.

But he couldn't do that now. He hadn't yet recovered the levels he'd spent on the battle that'd sent him to the gaol in the first place—and King of Destruction had leveled up since then, already making it impossible for Sechs to transform into him.

What about the other two?

If Candy used the MVP reward he'd gotten from the Irregularity, Disaster Bioweapon, he may have been able to break the Red King's cage—but that only applied if Red King was in an area infected by Candy's viruses.

As long as Red King himself didn't contract Candy's diseases, they would have no effect on him. King of Plagues' powers were effective against living beings and matter, but not against space itself.

Because of this, Candy wasn't a threat to Red King. His role in this prison break had begun and ended with the extermination of all other Masters here in the gaol.

The last one of the three, Gerbera, wasn't even worth considering. Even if she could become invisible and imperceptible, she would still be within the gaol. This Space Fixation had no gaps in it, and slipping through it was impossible. Thus, she couldn't do anything. She had absolutely no means of overcoming Red King's spatial control.

Realizing once again that Sechs was the core of this prison break, Red King remained in his workspace, safe from the viruses, and prepared for the attempt.

The Infinite Embryo and warden of the gaol wondered how they would try to outsmart him and—as imprudent as it was—he looked forward to seeing it.

◆

Sechs was standing at the edge of the gaol, right next to the Space

Fixation wall separating the inside and outside.

The area around him was covered in marks left by countless assaults. At some places the surface was melted, and large fragments of metal were scattered all around.

These were the traces of the attempts others had made to challenge this wall—the scars left behind by those who'd tried and failed to escape by destroying the indestructible.

Everyone in the gaol knew that there was a wall here, but as of yet, no one had passed through it.

The only one who'd been able to even open a hole in it was Hannya, and it was only after she'd become a Superior. She'd tried to break out many times before her sentence expired, and in the end, she'd been released before she could succeed.

"One could compare this wall to an impregnable fortress. Not that it is a Castle, of course."

Sechs was among those who knew that the control AIs were Embryos.

Based on his observations, he assumed that Red King was originally a Type World mixed with Apostle. And because spatial awareness was a specialty of the Angel type, he guessed that Red King was a Type Apostle-Angel/World.

This meant he had three core traits: space domination, space awareness, and space deployment.

Indeed—the gaol was managed by an Embryo that exceeded all others in his control over space itself. Red King was the uncontested ruler of this realm, and the edge of the gaol was the web that he'd spun.

This was the only exit out of here. Many had approached it hoping to break out.

And unlike regular prisons, there were no punishments for planning or attempting prison breaks. In fact, the control AI actually recommended that the prisoners attempt to escape.

After all, it was possible that a strong will to leave the gaol could be the trigger that drove an Embryo to become Superior. That was what had actually happened to Hannya's Sandalphon.

Just like Cheshire—Tom Cat—had once served as the final barrier to the true duel champion, the walls of Red King's gaol were just another trial the control AIs had set up.

Therefore, to break out of the gaol, one had to prepare something more powerful than that wall—not only the barrier itself, but the entire arsenal of the being known as Red King.

Or, alternatively, outwit him using something he couldn't expect.

"Now...considering my current level, I can do this at least once. I may not have enough for a second time." Sechs thought of the person he would now transform into, as well as what he was about to do, and gathered his resolve for what he was sure was his first and final attempt. "Still, the odds are not against us here."

He faced the spatial wall and finally played the ace he had kept up his sleeve.

"I Take Countless Forms—Nu..."

This was the ult that rarely saw use due to its heavy cost of 500 levels. It allowed him to completely transform into anyone who was a low enough level compared to him.

Who he picked was...

"Schwartz Beine."

...a pair of black, towering legs—Hannya's Sandalphon.

"It is true that the power to destroy space is a must-have in a situation like this. But Sechs..." Red King said as he watched King of Crime, now transformed into Sandalphon. "That will not suffice. You saw with your own eyes it does not suffice."

Just like Red King, Sandalphon possessed a power that influenced space, so he may have been an obvious choice for Sechs. Upon becoming a Superior Embryo, Sandalphon had even acquired the "Downfall Screamer" skill, which focused his spatial domination ability into the tip of the legs and then used it to drill through space itself.

It was a power designed specifically to overcome Red King's walls. The evolution had even used ■■■—the emergency mechanism left only in Maidens and Apostles. Because of this, Sandalphon definitely had the power to break the spatial barrier.

However, that didn't mean it had the power to break out.

"Sandalphon is just far too large." The Embryo's legs were enormous and, more significantly, they were long. Compared to the hole they could bore through the wall, they were simply too big. And as an Embryo that had Gear in its typing, Sandalphon could only be used while mounted. To escape through the hole opened by Sandalphon, the user would be forced to dismount and stop the drilling, which gave Red King more than enough time to restore the wall. That was the reason Hannya herself had never been able to escape.

"Unlike Hannya, I suppose, Sechs is able to create copies of himself," Red King mused.

Sechs's Nu was a Type Body that turned him into a slime. He could split himself into multiple bodies and control the resulting copies freely. Unlike Hannya, he actually could attempt to drill and escape at the same time.

"But there's still the problem of the main one."

Red King was aware that not all of Nu's splits were equal, with the one that had the most volume becoming the main one. And when the main one disappeared, the one with the second-highest volume would take its place. Also, there was a limit on the distance at which the main and secondary bodies remained linked and able to cooperate. When it was exceeded, the secondary ones would vanish.

That made the power all but useless for a prison break.

"Sechs isn't a core-based Type Body—its main body switches depending on the volume. That is strong in its own way, of course, but...considering the situation and the transformation he chose, it means nothing."

Even if Sechs did manage to get his various bodies out of the gaol, the moment Red King fixed the hole in space and isolated it again, it would sever their connection with the main body. That meant there was no point having only his copies escape. Since it was volume that decided which body was Sechs's main one, transforming into Sandalphon—the gigantic legs—had effectively rendered it impossible for Nu to escape. If he diverted too much volume into the body that he wanted to send outside, he would no longer be able to maintain the transformation into Sandalphon or use his skills.

And even if Sechs somehow broke out of the gaol using his copies, he would be the only one to escape, leaving his companions behind.

"What's he planning, anyway? Hm...?"

The moment Red King muttered that to himself, Sechs—still transformed into Sandalphon—split himself into three.

This was Split Spirit—the skill he'd used against Shu.

There were now a whole three Sandalphons towering over the gaol.

All of them were a kilometel tall, and looking up at them would no doubt overwhelm the faint of heart—though, Candy, standing at the side, looked like he was enjoying the view.

"Downfall Screamer."

After several dozen seconds, the three Sandalphons used their space-drilling skill, thrusting the tips of their legs, now spinning rapidly, against the space above the deteriorated ground. From that seemingly empty space, there was the faint sound of an impact and something tearing.

A moment later, the space around the tips of the three Sandalphons' legs began to shake.

The shivering space then quickly cracked, creating an opening. Through it, you could see a mountain forest—the scenery that surrounded the gaol.

The tunnel that had just been drilled through space itself was clearly a way outside.

"I see. Hannya was alone, wasn't she?" Only Sechs can do this, Red King thought.

While it was too much for one of them, three Sandalphons were indeed capable of creating a large tunnel. This would allow at least Candy and Gerbera to break out. In fact, even Sechs himself could leave.

Looking around, Red King saw another Sechs standing next to Candy.

That meant there were four of him—not just the three Sandalphons.

Red King quickly understood the implications of this. "I see you have found your means of escape," he said.

Split Spirit wasn't based on Sechs's self-separation ability as a slime. It was instead caused by his Embryo's last skill—a fearsome ability that allowed him to multiply his ultimate transformation by up to six. It was also extremely high-risk, though, because it divided his HP evenly among each body, and it wasn't restored even after the skill expired and all of the copies vanished.

But that was exactly what had made it such a powerful tool in this prison break.

Right now, Sechs took the form of three Sandalphons and one ordinary

Sechs. The latter version of Sechs wasn't a copy made by his skill, but the main one. While the other three would vanish once the skill expired, he would not.

Thus, if he passed through the tunnel and canceled the effect, Sechs would be completely outside the gaol.

"I see—quite an impressive combination. He even considered the costs."

Sechs had split into four bodies rather than six so that he would have more HP left once he was free.

Since he couldn't use the save points outside, breaking out of the gaol would mean nothing if he simply received the death penalty again and respawned back in the prison. Keeping his HP loss to a minimum reduced the chances of that happening.

Three Sandalphons were just enough to open a tunnel large enough for people to pass through. Sechs must've watched Hannya as she tried to escape and made his own calculations based on that.

"Sechs, I must say...you've used the cards you've been dealt to make a play that surpassed my expectations...slightly." A single Sandalphon would never be able to break out this way, and Red King felt Sechs's scheme deserved a small amount of praise. "It does not, however, surpass my power."

As he watched Sechs's prison break unfold, Red King had transformed into a new form—humanoid in shape, but appearing more like a wire-frame model. In the dark space within Red King's body, there were countless floating orbs that seemed to represent the universe.

This was his form as an Infinite Embryo. He was Type Infinite Apostle, "Infinite Space, Macrocosmos."

Red King watched as Sechs's two allies tried to enter the opening he'd created...

"Ah...!"

...only to be pushed back.

Looking at the hole again, they realized that although they could see the other side, they couldn't physically pass through it. It still let light through, but there was now some kind of lid over the tunnel.

That tunnel—this dimensional hole through space itself—had been opened by the focused power of three Superior Embryos, and closed by only one.

There was no better display of just how much more powerful an Infinite Embryo was than a Superior.

"Did they think I couldn't close it while they were drilling?" Since the moment the three Sandalphons had begun to open the tunnel, Red King had been taking action. "Sechs, Candy...and Gerbera. None of you will pass."

Gerbera had the ability to avoid this fearsome warden's gaze. Red King had assumed that they may have been expecting him to close the opening and thus had planned to get her out as fast as possible, before the Infinite Embryo could react.

However, that had been a pointless exercise. Red King had closed the tunnel the moment it was only one millimeter wide. It didn't matter that he couldn't see Gerbera—she couldn't pass through regardless.

"They set Sandalphon's space destruction against my power of space fixation. It all comes down to offense against defense, and there is no scenario in which an Infinite like me would lose."

The three Sandalphons continued their struggle for a while longer, but it produced no results.

This continued all the way until the skill expired—but in the end, they couldn't pass through the tunnel, and once they vanished, Sechs and Candy logged out as though they'd given up.

◆

Sechs's attempt at breaking out had failed miserably.

Red King, having returned to his previous appearance as a young man, watched it until it was over.

"He'll need a few months to regain the levels for another try," Red King said—and he realized he felt slightly disappointed that they'd failed.

Of course, as the warden of the gaol, he would not benefit from Sechs breaking out. While it was excellent when high-rank Masters evolved while trying to escape—just as had happened to Hannya and Sandalphon—Sechs's trio were already Superiors, so to Red King, there was no point in their efforts right now. Despite that, a part of him had hoped that Sechs and his allies would greatly surpass his expectations, so this result was somewhat underwhelming.

As such thoughts were running through his head, he was suddenly contacted by a colleague.

"Hm? A call...? From Alice?"

It was the control AI in charge of avatars. Because of their roles, they were in touch fairly often, but Red King found it odd that she would call him now, of all times.

"Indeed. Is anything the matter, Alice?"

"You're pretty careless, aren't you?" The first words Alice said made Red King tilt his head in confusion.

"What are you saying?"

"You can do everything by yourself, but despite that and being one of us, you work by common sense. You're not too good at thinking outside the box or cooking up wild ideas. Well, you also struggled to gather enough Resources to become Infinite, so I guess you also don't like being wasteful..."

"Again—what are you saying...?" Red King couldn't make sense of her words, so he urged her to get to the point, slightly irritated.

"Their prison break was a big success."

Those words gave Red King one of the few real shocks he'd felt in his entire life. "Huh...? How? I've not missed or overlooked anything. I instantly closed the spatial hole Sechs drilled open. I am certain I did not allow them the opening or the time to escape."

"You closed the hole?"

"Of cour—"

"All of it?"

"Hm...? Ah...?!" Red King was confused about what she meant for a moment—and when he realized what she meant, it made him shudder.

He could not believe what they had done.

"Imagine telling someone to do that. Imagine actually doing it. They both have a few screws loose," Alice commented with a wry smile audible in her voice.

Red King was overwhelmed by the fact that he'd overlooked the truth, as well as impressed by Sechs's trio for making him overlook it.

A Certain Area on the Continent, Several Minutes Ago

Mountains covered by dense forests stretched as far as the eye could see.

The area linking the gaol's outer edge to the continent was an undeveloped wilderness. No one knew its coordinates, and it was hidden using Red King's spatial manipulation.

And then all of a sudden, this scene where nothing was supposed to be unusual underwent a major change.

Three cones—the legs of three Sandalphons—burst out from seemingly nowhere, drilling open the space itself.

From the inside of the gaol, these three large weapons broke through the spatial masking.

However, the holes in space opened around the drill were instantly closed by Red King's spatial manipulation, leaving not even enough space or time for even a single ant to pass through.

However, the tips of the drills were still sticking out of the gaol.

This wasn't unexpected. All of Sandalphon's spatial manipulation powers were focused on that point. This was Sandalphon's greatest offensive weapon, but the one defending against it, Red King, could still focus his own spatial manipulation to prevent all three of the drills from sticking out like this.

However, that would cost a lot of Resources. Because of that, he figured that the more simple and less wasteful method to deal with this was to simply close off the tunnel they'd created. It would still be enough to keep them from breaking out.

Red King was an Infinite Embryo, but he was also a man of reason, so this decision was completely in character for him. It made sense and was by no means a mistake.

But because of this, he'd overlooked one wild plan that was clearly a mistake from a human perspective.

The change in the environment was instant. A number of the trees around the drills broke apart, and there was now a trail on the ground as though something large had slid across it.

However, whatever had actually created the trail was nowhere to be seen. The actual breaking of the trees had not been visible—one moment they were standing, only to be fallen the next. It was as though the world itself took several seconds to notice the destruction inflicted upon it.

At the tip of this destruction of nature, a person's silhouette could be made out.

It was Gerbera—bloodied, bruised, and battered.

“Nngh...I thought I was gonna die. Egh...” Her limbs were twisted in an unnatural way, and a mixture of blood and vomit dripped from her mouth. She looked as though she’d suffered a fearsome attack, and that was no surprise—after all, she was actually right near Sandalphon’s Downfall Screamer—inside one of the spinning drills.

While Nu could copy people’s appearances and abilities, the copy maintained his nature as a slime. Sechs had shown this during his battle against Shu. Back then, he’d used it to restore himself, as well as move missiles within his body to fire them from a different location. This time, he’d used this quality of slime to put Gerbera—who’d used her ult—into Sandalphon’s drill.

And, after drilling through the space, he’d released her outside.

The centrifugal force of the drill had obviously sent her flying—thus the destruction.

“It doesn’t hurt...but this feels like crap... I feel like I’m gonna die...” Sechs had turned pain off so he could sense Gerbera touching him. Pain or the lack of it meant nothing against Red King, so turning it off didn’t affect their escape plan.

Even if it didn’t make them feel pain, a person spun by a drill could not possibly remain unscathed.

“H-He’s such a liar... He told me that I’d only have to wait for him to transform into Sandalphon and touch it...ueegh...”

Her inner ear was a mess, the insane centrifugal force had broken most of her bones, and the impact after she had been fired out was enough to kill her instantly. The only reason that hadn’t happened was because she’d used her ult to merge with Alhazred. The Embryo had Pure-Dragon-tier toughness, and with it taking most of the damage, Gerbera had managed to get away with only horrific injuries.

Alhazred, almost completely destroyed, had returned to the crest. This undid the effects of her ult, so she had appeared again in this state.

“Nnh...I gotta hurry before I die...” Fighting the unpleasant sensations, she reached for the blood-splattered ground and picked up a ring-shaped inventory.

After removing a large number of high-quality Potions, she poured them on herself. That caused her HP to stop falling and eliminated some injury-based debuffs.

The email she'd received from Sechs had said, "Take my inventory, disappear, and touch me after I transform into Sandalphon." She could hardly believe that that was all it would take to escape, but she'd agreed regardless.

She certainly hadn't imagined that she'd be used like this, though.

Methods like these were something you'd expect from Sechs's rival, Shu—and in a way, the fact that Sechs had thought of it at all was proof that Shu had had an influence on him.

"...I guess this is one of the reasons I had to go through all that training..." Gerbera remembered the hellish training Sechs had put her through, where he'd made her turn pain back on and damaged her body in many extreme ways. Without that experience, she might've not been able to bear being in the current state, even with the sensation of pain eliminated.

"Ughhh...I hope there aren't any monsters here..." Gerbera kept on pouring the Potions on herself, slowly recovering her HP.

However, her trusted Alhazred was still in no state to protect her, and she herself was a total mess.

"...Oh. Right."

Remembering this, Gerbera reached into Sechs's inventory and took something out.

It was an object much larger than herself—a carriage. Putting this out was one of the orders Sechs had given her in the email.

"There we go... Now the bodyguard..." Then, from the same inventory, she removed April.

"You called, my venerable temporary owner?" she said. Perhaps because they were in a forest rather than the café, she was already in her combat mode and spoke smoothly.

"Keep an eye out for me... I'm a bit groggy, so I'll take a rest until they come. I can't use Alhazred yet, so, yeah..."

"Understood." April looked around for danger while Gerbera leaned on the carriage.

A few minutes later...

"Mmm! The air outside the slammer sure is delici... Well, actually, it smells like puke. I don't like it..."

...she was joined by Candy, who had most certainly logged out in the gaol.

"...Looks like it worked," Gerbera said. Candy's appearance here was proof that Sechs's plan was a success. This was a relief for Gerbera, since she could now just wait for Sechs to come and heal her.

"Oh. Gerby's almost dead! That's hilarious!"

"You are such a..."

Candy cut her off by pointing at her battered body and laughing as though it was the funniest thing he'd ever seen.

"Oh, poor girl! You've even lost your boobs... Oh wait—there were never any there to begin with!"

"You got a death wish, shitlord?!" Gerbera snapped, so incensed she even tried to stand despite her injured state. She had indeed lost her pads sometime during the spin in the drill or the impact after, but her actual chest was more or less unharmed.

Candy's teasing and Gerbera's angry squawking continued until they heard another person moving within the carriage.

"I am glad you two are well." With those words, Sechs stepped out of the vehicle as if the action was of no significance.

"Total success!" said Candy.

"...Do I look 'well' to you? Heal me already..." Gerbera pled.

"Of course," Sechs said, transforming into a long-haired woman. This was the form of the Special Superior Job he'd acquired at one point in the past—The Saint.

“...Gotta say,” said Gerbera during the treatment. “I’m surprised we could actually use this to escape the gaol.”

She was looking up at the carriage as she spoke. Her Identification gave her some information about it, including its name: “Save Point Carriage.”

“A mobile save point...I heard you couldn’t use these to come back from a death penalty.”

“You cannot. But we did not use it for that, did we?”

There were three steps that led to wanted Masters being sent to the gaol. First, by getting on the wanted lists, they became unable to use save points. Then, they had to receive a death penalty. After that, they would return to the only save point they could access—the one inside the gaol—and were imprisoned there from then on. Even if they saved at a carriage with a save point, that save would vanish at the second step, making it impossible to come back that way. It was explained to Gerbera that the carriages were more like suspending the game and resuming it rather than a proper save.

“We, however, have simply logged out and logged back in again.” They’d saved at the Save Point Carriage while still imprisoned, and by taking it out now, they were able to create a login point that placed them outside the gaol.

“And Red King didn’t notice? He must have seen you save, right?” Gerbera was the only one who’d actually taken the inventory out of the gaol rather than use the Save Point Carriage, so she was curious about this.

“I observed Red King while I was in the gaol, and through my observations, I found out that he only has one visual point. He may be omniscient in the space he currently occupies, but recently, he has been avoiding the gaol itself because of the epidemic.”

“...Oh, I guess that was the other reason for spreading it.” Even if there were many of the monitor-like observation points inside the gaol, the observer couldn’t look through all of them at once. Things may have been different with Cheshire, who specialized in parallel operations, but Red King wasn’t like him.

Sechs had also confirmed that the other control AIs did not involve themselves with the matters of the gaol. He had learned some of this through chats with Red King himself, in fact.

They had also saved at the carriage while Red King had clearly been focusing on something else—Sechs while Hannya was trying to break out, and Candy while Sechs was talking to Red King.

Clearly, this mobile save point had been part of their escape plan for quite some time now.

"...By the way, did I have to go through this? Couldn't we have just thrown the inventory out...? We have April, and she's tough." Gerbera figured that if they'd just given April the inventory with the Save Point Carriage, she wouldn't have had to be shot out of a drill into a forest.

Sechs shook his head, though.

"You can make yourself impossible to perceive, but Red King could easily notice April. If he saw her inside the drill, he would have certainly done something about it. This was proved when he closed off the tunnel we used as a distraction. Using your skill was necessary to ensure a more secure prison break."

"And what about my security...? Ugh," Gerbera sighed as though she'd given up. "What were you planning to do while I wasn't here, then?"

"I would have hidden myself instead—though I believe that would have been a great deal riskier than having you be the one inside the drill."

Sechs had actually formulated a plan to break out of the gaol before he'd even added Sandalphon to his stock—and even before he'd been jailed. As King of Crime, Sechs had been going to the internet or DIN to gather info about the gaol's workings, then using his findings to build an escape plan. Back then, he'd been planning to use a space-controlling Embryo he acquired before being jailed, but since it wouldn't have had as much power as Sandalphon, the odds of success would've been lower, and Sechs would've lost far more volume—or rather, HP—than he'd lost now.

And since he now had Sandalphon, he'd removed all the other spatial Embryos from his stock.

The reason why Sechs had spent so much time in the gaol was because he was waiting for those outside to prepare, and because he'd thought he could craft a better escape plan by observing Hannya.

He was later joined by Candy and Gerbera, so one could say that his decision had been the correct one.

"I am very grateful that you came to the gaol," he told Gerbera.

"...I see," she replied.

Because he'd used Split Spirit to split into four, Sechs's maximum HP had been reduced to just a quarter of its the original value, but that was still more than he would have had left in his original escape plans. “We have a long trip ahead of us, so I certainly appreciate having more HP,” he explained.

“I haven’t been on a big trip since my XP tour!” said Candy. “Where are we now, anyway?”

“This is a buffer zone between Altar and Legendaria... No, wait—it has recently become part of Altar. Still, I have quite a bit of nostalgia for this place,” Sechs said, recalling the time he cooperated with Shu.

This was the very place once dominated by the UBM known as Divine Disks, Spindle.

Sechs had noticed this when he’d watched Hannya try to break out of the gaol. The location he’d glimpsed through the gaps she opened was one that he would never forget, and he instantly knew exactly where in the world the gaol resided. Before then, he’d entertained the possibility that the gaol was somewhere off the continent—or perhaps even in space. That would have made the prison break more difficult. Discovering that it was in a familiar location made it much easier.

Perhaps the Divine Disks developed spatial manipulation powers precisely because Red King had built his gaol here, Sechs wondered. The creation of the gaol—the hidden realm built by manipulating space itself—may have influenced the evolution of the creature that had once resided here, or so he imagined.

“...Phew.” Eventually, Gerbera was completely healed. She then used Instant Wear to replace her damaged clothes and stood up. “So, what now?” she asked.

“No one passes through here, so we will simply avoid any unwanted attention and head toward Tenchi.”

“Is that so...?” Isn’t that a bit too far to go on foot? Gerbera wondered. Well, we have a carriage, so I guess we just need to get a horse or a landdragon or something.

Suddenly, April, who was standing next to her, looked up at the sky.

Gerbera, Sechs, and Candy all followed her gaze and did the same.

“‘No one ever passes through here,’ huh...? Are you sure about that?” Gerbera asked.

Their eyes were focused on one point in the sky—a black-clad Master, looking down at them in shock from astride a silver Prism Steed. Through coincidence or design, it was someone who had ties to the very person who had sent them to the gaol in the first place.

His name was Ray Starling.

◇◆◇

Gaol

"...I am thoroughly beaten," Red King said as he stood in the gaol, now missing three of its most important prisoners.

Alice had explained to him the process they'd used to escape, and he had understood and come to terms with it. They'd since ended the call, and now, left alone with his thoughts, Red King was looking back on his actions.

"This feeling of defeat is somehow...wistful." Since he'd lost his Master, Red King had rarely been forced to consider his flaws—the moments he had could be counted on one hand.

He'd gained three things from this entire ordeal—an important lesson, a new countermeasure, and a shapeless nostalgia.

"Sechs...I was unable to see your plan, and your thinking has surpassed mine. You deserve recognition for that." The warden earnestly praised the prison breaker who'd risen above him. Red King may have failed to fulfill his duties, but he couldn't help but be honest about this. "However, not even you can see through everything. And because of that...you may very well be back here soon."

The words that he spoke were not those of a sore loser—he genuinely believed what he was saying.

Red King had enough reason to believe that.

"When you were in the gaol, you could only learn about the outside indirectly."

Red King, the ruler of space, could see the multiple entities approaching the escapees right now.

To the north, flying from the city of Gideon, was a Master known as Ray Starling. He was one who would be placed on the side of good, and thus he would certainly clash with Sechs, who went out of his way to be evil.

However, he was not a major problem. Ray's brother may have been capable of it, but the odds of Ray himself stopping Sechs were unbelievably low.

But there was someone else.

The moment Sechs had transformed into Sandalphon and drilled through space, influencing the outside world, an entity far more fearsome had sprung into action.

Red King checked the surroundings of the gaol—and indeed, there he saw them. From the south of the gaol, from the domain in Legendaria, a massive group was on the approach.

“There are many stories that only truly begin after the escape.”

Thus, the control AI who had stood against the prisoners began monitoring the events outside. The participant became a spectator, and he settled in to watch the second act.

Chapter Four: Encounters

Sorcerer, Ray Starling

We were on the way to the leveling zone at the very south of the kingdom.

Before heading out, I'd changed my job to Sorcerer. The reason for this was, once again, the axe.

The immense grudge permeating the thing had convinced me that the damage it did to me was curse-based. And since Sorcerer was a job that granted skills that inflicted curses as well as skills that increased resistance to them, I'd picked it up to see if it would have an effect on the axe. If it reduced the damage, great. If it didn't, I'd just drop the job whenever I needed a low-rank job slot.

"I feel as though you are on the path to wielding both Paladin and Dark Knight," said Nemesis.

"...That's not totally out of the question." I'd heard that mixing sorcerer and knight groupings was the path that led to the dark knight job. It seemed like a combo Juliet would love.

Oh, and it would make me kinda like the protag of the fourth entry in a certain retro RPG series, so Shu would probably like it too.

"Perhaps it is not such a bad idea. It might lead you to a mixed Superior Job," Nemesis added. I guess it would be like Xunyu's Master Jiangshi—she got that by combining the Jiangshi job with the Daoshi grouping.

"But I feel like there's a lot of people who've gone down this route. I mean, it's a pretty classic concept."

A champion who wielded both dark and light seemed like a tale as old as time. Someone must've tried it already, and since it didn't seem like anybody had found a mixed Superior Job as a result, it probably didn't exist—or it was a lost job with crazy specific conditions for unlocking it.

"Instead of daydreaming about a still-distant Superior Job, we should focus on the leveling we must do right now."

"Yeah. Let's level until we get the resistance skill."

When we had it, we were going to use our arena to see if the skill had an effect. If it didn't, I'd switch jobs later and level again.

"...Hm?" As I rode Silver through the skies, I heard a strange sound. It was faint and coming from far away, but I could tell that it would be really loud if I were closer to it.

It was a low hum, like something massive destroying something else, though I couldn't tell if it was shattering something tough or tearing apart something soft.

The hum was accompanied by a distant, destructive sound that resembled none I'd ever heard.

I might've been imagining it, but it kind of reminded me of a sound I'd once heard in Gideon—the noise made by Sandalphon.

"Let's check it out," I said. A strange and vague uneasiness was gripping my heart too, so I couldn't help but change course toward the sound.

"I feel as though we are heading toward trouble yet again," said Nemesis.

That's all the more reason to go there, I replied in thought. This place is pretty close to Gideon, you know?

And so, we moved toward the sound. We made it there in no time—and sure enough, something had been happening here. I could tell that much even from a distance.

"...That one doesn't look so good," I muttered.

There was a woman lying on the ground, covered in blood. Another woman stood beside her and was working on healing her wounds.

Then, standing right by a carriage with no horse or landdragon attached, there was a woman wearing a maid's uniform. It made her stand out, but I knew a guy who wore a bear costume constantly, so in comparison it didn't seem that weird.

And finally, there was one person I couldn't see fully because there were trees in the way, but glimpsed some girls' clothing at least.

It looked like a party of four women, and something had happened here that had injured one of them. She was being treated now, but even from here, I could see that the unfortunate girl had actually lost some parts of her body. Even a high-rank job would have a hard time treating that. They'd probably need Miss Eldritch to fully heal—

"Huh...?" My thought was cut short as I realized that the bloodied woman was in perfect health now.

Wow...I didn't think there was someone besides Miss Eldritch who could treat something like that so fast, I thought. Maybe it's an Embryo skill?

"Oh..." As I looked at them in shock, the women all looked up at me too.

My eyes met the healer's gaze.

I felt that it would be rude to just turn around here and leave, so I decided to make Silver go down to them. Also, one of them had been badly injured, so they might've gotten into trouble they needed help with.

It sort of felt like Silver was paying extra attention to the woman in the maid uniform, but I had no idea why.

"Hm...?" Suddenly, I heard something. Unlike before, it wasn't the sound of something giant. It was more like the sound of many small things moving at once. "What is that...?"

It was coming from the south.

◆◆◆

The Southernmost Edge of Altar, A Mountain Forest Near the Border

Seeing Ray descend put Gerbera into a panic. Why is he here...? she thought.

She already knew who he was. Back when she had been trying to provoke Shu by framing him for a crime, she'd also looked into his brother. Even if she hadn't done all of that, Ray Starling had become a fairly famous figure after his deeds during Franklin's Game.

She certainly knew more about him than she would about some random duel ranker, and the fact that he'd happened to be here at this point in time was more than a little unexpected.

What do we even do in this situation? she wondered.

There was no doubt that they'd win if they fought him. The odds of Ray emerging victorious in a battle against three Superiors were beyond low. However, fighting him would still have been a bad decision. If they fought, Ray would find out who they were—and since he was close to their enemies, they would learn about Illegal Frontier's escape too. Even if Ray got the death penalty, he'd be able to share info about them via online messages or social media in the real world.

If people found out their approximate location, that would be an absolute disaster for them. Anyone could then prepare a kill squad that could give them the death penalty again—

Sechs currently only had a quarter of his HP, while Gerbera's trusted Alhazred was in no state for combat.

If they were sent to the gaol again, it would be difficult for them to escape using the same means. Sechs had lost his levels, while Hannya must've leveled up since leaving the gaol. It was possible that Hannya would be removed from Sechs's stock of transformations while they were preparing for the second try.

And there was the fact that Red King could have already set up a protection against their trick that would make sure it never worked again.

We could run...but that's a gamble too, Gerbera thought.

They could maybe escape the danger if they all logged out at the same time. However, the logout process required thirty seconds of zero contact with anybody. That was enough time for Ray to remember their faces. Sechs was currently transformed into The Saint, so he was safe from being recognized, but Ray might spot Candy. If that happened, it was possible that someone would just camp this area and wait for them to log back in.

And if they fled normally instead of logging out, it would only make Ray more suspicious—he could even chase after them to find out why they'd run away. He was also riding a speedy Prism Steed, so it was questionable if they even could run away from him.

Then how about we just kill him really quick...? Wait, no, that won't work...! In the recent peace talks, it was revealed that Ray had the Death Soldier skill. Even if they killed him, he would stay around for almost a minute—more than enough time to get info about them and take it back.

Also, though Gerbera could only see Ray right now, it was possible that he wasn't alone. He could have friends nearby—maybe even Shu and Rook themselves. Ray was actually all by himself, but Gerbera had just escaped the gaol and had basically no information about the outside, so her fear was hardly unreasonable.

This isn't good... He's the worst person we could've bumped into right now! Ray didn't die right away even if killed, and he had ties to powerful people he could inform about them.

Gerbera had no idea how they had to deal with this, so she decided to leave the thinking to Sechs and Candy.

However...

“...Nhuh?”

...when she looked at them, she saw something that filled her with shock.

Sechs was still assuming the form of The Saint, but in his right hand he held a sword that must’ve been an Embryo from his stock. Candy was in the process of activating Resheph.

They were obviously getting ready to fight.

“Huh? Are we really doing this?! We’re actually gonna fight?!” Gerbera was pretty sure that they—or at least Sechs—would’ve come to the same conclusions she had.

Then again, perhaps they had thought this through even more thoroughly than her and still decided that simply killing Ray Starling was the way to go.

“B-But my Alhazred is almost out of HP... I guess I’ll bring him out anyway, though... Umm...will my bowgun reach from here...?”

“Gerby,” Candy said as Gerbera hesitantly armed herself. “That guy who looks like more of a baddie than us? He’s not the one we’re fighting.”

“Huh?”

Sechs, Candy, and April had already shifted their gazes away from Ray.

And Ray himself was looking away from them, as well.

All three people and the one machine were facing the south—the Altar-Legendaria border.

“A domain...” said Sechs.

“Leader...?” Shock overcame Gerbera as she looked at him. The usual smile on his face, which almost never flagged, was now twisted up slightly. If slimes like him were capable of doing so, he would most likely be breaking out in a cold sweat right now.

“How careless of me. This used to be a buffer zone between Altar and Legendaria, and the border is nearby... I should have considered this possibility.”

“Wh-What’s going on...? A domain? Whose?” As panic gripped Gerbera, Sechs gave her a reply.

It was a single word, simple enough, and a common staple of fantasy fiction...but also something Gerbera had never faced within Infinite Dendrogram.

It was...

“...An Overlord.”

A moment later, the forest grew restless—and a bizarre-looking horde charged toward them.

◇◇◇

Sorcerer, Ray Starling

“What the hell are they...?!” Swarming from the direction of Legendaria was a horde of bizarre-looking creatures shining like mithril.

They resembled clay figures crafted by a child, except even more crude. It was like someone took some clay, made a torso, and just slapped some limbs plus a head on it and left it at that.

There were two kinds of these creatures in the horde: flyers who had wings awkwardly attached to them, and walkers who looked kinda like gorillas. They shared some features, but their shapes were so messed up that it was hard to tell if they were the same type of creature.

Unlike Franklin’s mod-monsters, these things didn’t seem to have any degree of intentional design behind them.

Despite looking like a toddler’s first attempt at sculpture, they all had a very strong presence. If I had to guess, they were high Demi-Dragon-tier in power, if not actually Pure-Dragon-tier.

And there were dozens of them—easily over fifty.

They weren’t nearly as numerous as Franklin’s Suicide Series, but if they had such a strong presence and could actually fight, they’d be a real danger.

“Are those just some Legendarian monsters?” I wondered. “But they...”

Things would’ve been easy if that were the case. However, perhaps the strangest thing about these already-strange creatures was that they were all surrounded by an iridescent aura.

I felt something powerful behind that—something even more powerful than the creatures themselves.

“Assuming that is not merely a skill that the monsters all happen to have...is it the effect of a Territory Embryo? Or is it one of those so-called Advance types derived from Chariot?” Nemesis asked.

“You might be right...” I said with a nod.

The aura could be the work of an Embryo, but the creatures themselves were clearly monsters of some kind and not just part of a Legion type.

There was one major giveaway that this was the case—there was text above them which said “Thrall.” There were dozens of creatures, all in different shapes, but they all had the same name.

Ten of the winged ones flew toward me, while the rest swooped toward the women below.

I’d gone down far enough to hear the women talk, and they seemed to be far more knowledgeable about this than me.

“They’re pretty freaky... Are they a Legion Embryo?” I overheard one of the women say.

“No. They are the result of a skill granted by a job, most likely Overlord. I have fought Overlord Gula in the past, though, so it cannot be her.”

“Affirmative. They are the servant creatures of Overlord Acedia—the result of the skill ‘Enthrall.’”

“But...‘Overlord?’”

I’d heard Azurite mention an “Overlord Ira,” so I already knew they existed in Infinite Dendrogram. Why would someone like that attack us, though?

“I would have guessed you would know about this, April,” said the healer as she stabbed the ground with her sword and used a skill. “Rumbling Treework.”

A group of trees then sprang out of the ground and charged toward the creatures, running on their roots as though they were feet.

“Is this gonna be enough...?”

“No. It will only buy us some time. This skill uses the Resources...or rather, nutrition in the ground, so it is on the weaker side. Though the fact that it can be cast instantly makes it quite useful in spite of that.”

I looked and sure enough, the creatures were absolutely destroying the newly summoned trees.

They really are tough, huh? I thought as the winged creatures approached me.

“Tch! Purgatorial Flames!” I could tell I’d be done for if they got close, so I used Silver’s mobility to stay at mid-range and sent some flames their way.

I couldn’t put out a forest fire if I started one, though, so I made sure to not fire downward. I couldn't use Hellish Miasma either, because that might risk hurting the women we'd come across.

I don't even know if it'd work on those monsters anyway, I thought.

"April, now is a good time for an explanation," the woman with the sword told the woman in a maid uniform as she spawned more tree monsters.

"Enthrall is one of Overlord Acedia's core skills. It turns inanimate objects into monsters."

I could hear their conversation with no issue at all now. I was pretty surprised by that myself, but then I thought that maybe Silver was making it so that their voices reached me. It wasn't in his description, but if he had some control over the air, it was possible that he could do something like that. After all, he did have that mystery skill, and not even Integra could fully make sense of him.

"The power of the monsters it creates—Thralls—depends on the material and SP used. Their material appears to be mithril, and their power is about medium."

Mithril? Well, that explained why the silver shine felt so familiar—it was close to the material Rook's Liz was made of. I doubted these things could transform like Liz could, but I was pretty sure in their current form they were tougher and stronger than she would be anyway.

"Anything else?"

"Thralls obey no one but Overlord Acedia and cannot be transferred to others. In exchange, they take up no party slots or minion capacity."

"Huh? That sounds kinda unfair."

"The price for that is steep, however. With the exception of HP and SP, Overlord Acedia has the lowest stats of all Overlords. Additionally, Overlord Acedia cannot join combat using their own body. All the work necessary for them to secure the Resources to preserve themselves is exported to the Thralls. You could say that these creatures are less like Overlord Acedia's servants and more like their limbs."

"...'Overlord' is a pretty fancy name, but that just makes them sound like someone who needs to be in a hospital." I didn't know what I had to be more surprised by: the details of the Overlord Acedia job or the fact that that woman knew them.

I took a better look at the group and realized that the one they called

"April" had ball joints, like a doll. Maybe she wasn't even human? Silver seemed pretty curious about her too, so perhaps she had some relation to the first Flagman? Was she one of the "Prism Persons" that Integra had mentioned?

"Hm..."

"Leader? What's on your mind?"

"A Sacrifice that cannot fight on their own...transforms inanimate objects into monsters...that is almost like..."

April's words seemed to have made the woman she called "leader" think about something. As she did, though, the Thralls on the surface broke through the trees and closed the distance between them.

The winged Thralls chasing after me were unrelenting too. They didn't seem to care one bit about being set on fire—they were inanimate objects to begin with, so they didn't even try to protect their own lives. Even as the Purgatorial Flames melted their bodies, they tried to ram into me with whatever was left.

They didn't seem to be using any kind of combat technique either. They were only doing whatever they could to charge and crash their bodies into me. I really doubted that it would be enough to kill me, but I didn't want to find out. "Inanimate objects made of metal aren't a good matchup for a god like me, buuut...I'll just spread some little guys that disassemble mithril and see what happens!"

"You made something like that? I can hear every weaponsmith in the world crying right now."

The woman I hadn't seen clearly began swinging a large, blunt object—probably her Embryo. I could hear the sound of something spraying. It must've been spreading something.

Just to be safe, I made Silver create a Wind Hoof barrier to protect us from whatever it was, but...

"...They're not melting."

"Whaaat?" The Thralls on the surface had apparently just been hit by something that "disassembled mithril," but they didn't seem to be affected at all.

"Either the material structure is different, or it's not reaching them. If it's the second thing, then it's gotta be that shiny aura's fault!"

"What is that aura, April?"

“No data found. Overlord Acedia has no skills with such an effect.”

If that wasn’t a job skill, then...it had to be an Embryo, right?

“So it’s a job skill that creates minions and an Embryo that enhances them...? This seems like a standard combo...not what I’d expect from an Overlord,” said the woman with the bowgun as she launched an assault toward one of the Thralls. It didn’t seem to have an effect, though—the creature was just too tough. “Yeah, I don’t have the attack power for this. Mithril and I just don’t get along... Also, is it just me, or are Leader and April the only ones putting up a fight?”

“How about we just leave them to the baddie up there?”

“That’s a great idea.”

They decided to make them my problem like it was no big deal. Also, “baddie”? What the hell? I had no idea why, but hearing that from these women just didn’t feel right to me.

“My friends...and Ray Starling,” said the leader.

“Huh?” I didn’t expect to hear my name here, but...well, the videos had made me pretty famous, so it wasn’t that weird for people to know who I was.

The way this woman talked, though, made me feel like there was some closeness there beyond just having heard of me. Had we met somewhere before...? “Be alert... I believe the main one is coming,” she continued, pointing in the direction the Thralls had come from, where there was now another silhouette.

“What...?” This figure had “Thrall” above its head, just like the others, but it was completely unlike the other Thralls.

First of all, its shape was different. While the others looked like nothing but simple clay figures, this one had a very distinct and proper design. The best way to describe it was “bipedal landdragon.” Its most notable feature was that the tip of its nose, horns, limbs, and tail were all blades.

The shape alone made it obvious that it had care put into its construction that no other Thrall did. But besides that, it also had a different color. It still had the same iridescent aura, but unlike the mithril Thralls, this one shone a brilliant scarlet.

I’d seen this color in Quartierlatin—on the scarlet marionette used by Dr. Mario.

Tom had said that the material was...

"Hihi'irokane!" The Mythical-tier metal...it was pretty much the greatest crafting material in Infinite Dendrogram, surpassed only by MVP rewards.

April had said that a Thrall's power depended on the material and SP used. Here, the material was of the highest quality, and I could tell from the shape alone that a lot of SP was used in its creation.

This had to be the Overlord Acedia's heavy hitter. I'd fought Logan's Legendary Gigaknights before, and I felt like this thing was a cut above even them.

Though, this just made me wonder why this Overlord was going this far just to deal with us. Was I the target here? Was that lab coat lunatic involved in this? And if these things were targeting that group of women, was April the reason? Was it all the knowledge she had about this Overlord Acedia? I had no clue. I didn't have enough info to even guess.

While I considered Overlord Acedia's reasons, the scarlet Thrall looked over the others.

And then...

"...G h e."

...made a strange sound as it used its sword-arm to pierce one of the mithril Thralls.

"Huh?" Friendly fire? What's this all about...hm?!

"Move away."

"Get back!"

The woman the others called "Leader" and I shouted that at the exact same time. However, the change happened before our voices reached anyone. The scarlet Thrall's sword-arm became even more red and began shining like molten metal.

A moment later, the mithril Thrall that it had run through boiled and scattered. The intense heat had made it evaporate from the inside and explode.

"Huh...?!" The mithril clad in the iridescent aura was scattered in every direction like the shrapnel of a frag grenade.

Our warning reached them right as the explosion happened. Everyone jumped back, covering their faces. The heat could burn us, but the actual explosion was far enough away that it wasn't that much of a threat.

It was an attack that sacrificed one of their own, but it wasn't enough to be fatal...or so I thought.

“Huh?” Pieces of mithril broke through the Wind Hoof barrier and touched the hand I’d flung over my face.

A moment later, my consciousness began to fade.

“This...is...” I felt dizzy and couldn’t think straight. My vision was hazy too. But despite that, I was able to check my stats and noticed a status effect—Forced Sleep. “...So...that’s...why.” I didn’t even have to think to know what had caused this.

This must’ve been the plan all along—the Thralls had simply charged at us instead of doing anything resembling combat because their goal was to just touch us with the aura. Contact was all they needed. And what that aura did was force us to fall asleep, essentially ending the battle right then and there.

When we were finally asleep, Overlord Acedia would be able to do whatever they wanted with us.

“Neme...sis...”

“Of...course...!” Before my consciousness faded, I drank an Elixir, and Nemesis switched to her second form. She was being put to sleep herself, but she was still able to complete the transformation.

However...none of that did any good.

We were still falling asleep. The Elixir had once negated the UBM Gardranda’s miasma, while Nemesis’s second form flipped its effects into buffs. The fact that neither of these things were working could only mean one thing...

“Supe...rio...” I’d recalled the time I’d fought Miss Eldritch and how she’d given me a debuff so overpowering I couldn’t do anything against it.

The realization that the opponent was a Superior was my last thought before my consciousness disappeared.

Below, I could see that all the girls except the one dressed as a maid had collapsed as well.

And in the moment right before my mind vanished, an unfamiliar voice reached me from somewhere.

“Welcome to Dreamland.”

Interlude: An Overlord’s Domain

About the Overlords

The created dungeons built by Red King and other control AIs came in three forms.

First, there was the Tomb Labyrinth—a dungeon built to seal away something left behind by the previous observers and judges of this world.

Second, there was the created dungeon in the gaol. Designed as a means to let the imprisoned Masters still enjoy the game, it didn’t have an official name, but it was filled with many of the same features as other dungeons.

Third, there were the created dungeons of the Overlords. The control AI had built them on top of the Overlord job-change dungeons that were already in existence before they assumed control of this world. Since both the previous as well as the current observers had a hand in designing them, they were extremely difficult to complete, but it was said that the reward for doing so was access to a Superior Job from the Overlord series.

While Special Superior Jobs required special bloodlines or talents, the Overlord jobs were the direct opposite of that—they did not need any latent abilities or qualities as prerequisites, unlike other Superior Jobs. They did maintain the limit of one holder at a time, but anyone could acquire them as long as they cleared a relevant dungeon.

However, the amount of people who’d cleared any of these dungeons and became Overlords was extremely small.

There had once been an Overlord Ira who’d lived before The Era of the Peerless Three and was ultimately defeated by The Hero of that time, but besides a select few such notable examples, they almost never appeared—or they came and went without anyone ever finding out.

But that had changed when Masters began growing in number—after Infinite Dendrogram was released.

It was said that there were seven Overlord dungeons.

Tenchi had the Naraka of Strife, Caldina had the Grave of Unwealth, Dryfe had the Palace of Licentiousness, while the Skycastle of Supremacy had an uncertain location.

The remaining Mountains of Hunger, Depths of Jealousy, and the Exile of Peace were all within Legendaria.

The control AI couldn't have done anything about this unbalanced placement. The dungeons had been in Legendaria to begin with, so they would still be there even if they added on to them. The only way to discover the reason for this placement was to ask the very beings who had originally set up everything related to the Overlord jobs—the previous observers.

In any case, the fact that Legendaria boasted three Overlord dungeons in their territory had never been a big problem. Created dungeons had always been things that were just there. They were in remote areas of the country as well, and unlike with natural dungeons, the monsters inside these created ones never left to cause mayhem in their surroundings. Some confident and skilled individuals would sometimes delve into these dungeons in an attempt to become Overlords, but none of them had ever returned.

That was the only significance the dungeons had, and since they were so difficult to conquer, there had been no recorded cases of anyone in Legendaria becoming an Overlord.

And so, their presence in Legendaria would mean nothing as long as everyone there simply let these sleeping dogs lie.

However, that had changed in recent years.

Two things had happened that were catastrophic to Legendaria. First, there was the increase in Masters. The nature of their existence had greatly changed the difficulty of the dungeons. The previous observers had stuffed the dungeons with features that could kill an explorer before they even realized it, making it impossible for all but a few people in history to reach the end of them. However, since Masters only received death penalties instead of permanent death, they were capable of coming back and trying again using the information they'd learned from their previous attempt. Through this, the three created dungeons that had previously been unconquerable by pure power alone had been laid bare.

Second, there were the few who had actually overcome the dungeons. Once information had been gathered, the dungeons could now be conquered by simply being strong enough.

That didn't mean it was necessarily easy. They weren't created dungeons for nothing—their difficulty was so high that simply trying over and over again wouldn't be enough to clear them. Additionally, perhaps due to the dungeons' function in bestowing the Overlord job, their difficulty grew exponentially when multiple humanoids tried to conquer them in parties, basically making it necessary to conquer them solo. This meant that prospective dungeon delvers needed not only information, but also a lot of power as a single unit. Unfortunately, Legendaria didn't have many Masters—Superior or otherwise—who had enough direct combat ability for this task.

That only applied to those who belonged to the country, though.

By now all three of Legendaria's Overlord dungeons had been conquered, and it had been done by Masters who were in Legendaria but did not belong to the country—in other words, Legendaria's wanted.

The three Overlords were all major criminals as well as Superiors.

They hadn't conspired to make this result. Each of them, completely separately, simply headed out into the dungeons and conquered them. Legendaria was the country with the most first-wave players, and thus also had the greatest number of wanted Masters. It even had more wanted Superiors than Superiors that actually served it—enough that there were still some left after three of their number had become Overlords.

The dungeons that had remained unbeaten for so long had finally been brought down. The monstrous Masters who lived in Legendaria had taken all three of the Overlord thrones in the country.

Having become Overlords, the three went on to live as they wished. They obeyed their desires, consuming, playing, and sleeping—in various different meanings of those words—to their heart's content. They had even found tribes that obeyed them and created domains where they reigned supreme.

Their actions were primal and animalistic, making them seem more like wild monsters than Overlords.

These three also never had any conflicts among them, nor had they ever cooperated. Along with the other wanted Superiors of Legendaria, they had formed a kind of nonaggression pact.

They were not a clan with a united goal, but a cartel with the single rule of mutual nonintervention. As they each expanded their own domains, they were careful not to encroach on the domains of the others. The Overlords were essentially carving up Legendaria from the shadows.

This was the origin of the criminal cartel known as “Desire.”

The criminals weren’t hostile to each other, while noncriminal Masters were entirely unable to defeat them. Legendaria’s nature as a coalition of tribes, as well as the landscape with extremely varied areas that favored the tribes living in them—including the ones serving the Overlords—made overcoming them difficult.

Legendaria’s wanted also had no interest in anything outside Legendaria, so when La Crima had invited them to IF, none of them had even wanted to hear them out.

This isolated fairyland was home to a group of monstrous Masters who were more than a match for IF.

Was it pure chance that the country that was the most fantastical ironically ended up being the one that cast the darkest shadow, or was there some reason that it grew to harbor such evil? Regardless, Legendaria had become a chaotic mix between the main country, led by Titania the Fairy Queen, and several rebellious minor states. It was rumored that the recent assassination of the prime minister was related to these conflicts, as well.

The sole silver lining on this cloud was the fact that despite all the chaos in Legendaria, none of the major cities with save points in them had been conquered by the criminals, Overlord or otherwise.

If that ever happened, the chaos of Legendaria would certainly become the chaos of the entire world—and that remained a distinct threat that loomed over the future.

Despite their lack of involvement with Legendaria’s wanted, IF’s escape from the gaol did have an effect on the situation there, if only by chance.

The domain of one of the three, Overlord Acedia, was located to the very north of Legendaria—right next to the UBM-dominated area that had once served as a buffer zone.

Sechs and his group had broken out of their prison right on the Overlord’s doorstep, and they had achieved the feat through the extended use of Downfall Screamer—the skill of a Superior Embryo.

Overlord Acedia’s reaction to this was...

◆◆◆

Overlord Acedia

The depression. The melancholy.

It was a nice, sunny day, and I'd been getting some good shut-eye when I heard something on the horizon that sounded like Dis consuming the sky itself.

I loved this costume for sleeping, but I hated that it didn't block outside sounds for safety reasons.

That meant that this noise was a danger, which just made me more depressed.

"Ugh...what a paiiin..." I was now awake anyway, so I went ahead and sent out some recon Thralls.

It turned out that it wasn't Dis this time—it was a group of four that I kinda recognized and kinda didn't, and I could sense what seemed like two Superiors there.

There were probably three, though. The messed-up-looking one must've been a Superior too—and the one in maid clothing wasn't even human. Thanks to Dis, Benetnasch, and all those other pains in the neck, I could now tell things like that whether I liked it or not.

"Such a paiiin..." Even thinking of how to deal with these bozos was getting on my nerves, and now there was another one. Ugh...he was flying for some reason, but he looked like a real baddie.

Not even G the Bottomless looked like that, and she was the actually Overlord-ish one among us...

Anyway, these four plus the new one were...well, yep. Enemies.

All of them were enemies. Hostiles. They were annoying, they were being a pain, they'd woken me up, and they'd be a danger if they came here, so I'd just have to beat them before that happened. Knock 'em down, you know?

"Uhh...oh yeah...I woke up, so..."

I figured I should ask the maids for dinner. I called one of the sheepkin maids by ringing the bell next to my bed.

After a bit...no, a lot...of thinking, I asked for omurice.

Then, without doing much more thinking, I picked some forces to send out. It turned out that Leprechaun B had made a whole lotta mithril Thralls, so I'd just send them and Cardinal A. Go go gooo! I'd based Cardinal A on Benetnasch's Aragorn, but this'd be my first time actually using him. Test, test.

Well, the new face wouldn't change anything. I'd just throw them into Dreamland and get rid of their bodies like always. Kill 'em all.

Anyway, thinking about what I wanted for dinner had forced me to use my brain, so I was getting sleepy again...drowsy.

It was high time I was off to Dreamland too.

And the ones who'd woken me up...would die. Death penalty to all.

"Anyway, good night... Zzz..."

◆◆◆

That was the situation.

The interlopers were noisy, dangerous, hard to ignore, annoying, and wouldn't let him sleep in peace. For him, that was enough reason to kill them.

He was part of the Desire criminal cartel—Overlord Acedia, ZZZ the Hypersomnia—and he recognized every single person at the site of the escape as enemies.

Ray was in no way involved in the noisy prison break, but that didn't matter to him. It didn't matter whom he was up against, or even if they were all Superiors.

Acedia had set up a domain here instead of the gaol exactly because he had never been defeated.

Thus, Overlord Acedia had decided to kill them all.

Chapter Five: The Dream-Quest of Unknown Meetings

Night Hunter, Gerbera

"Where am I?" After I'd been hit with those fragments of the mithril monster, everything had faded to black, and next thing I knew I was in this weird space.

I was standing on a long and thin road. Looking around, I saw lots of roads just like it going in every direction. There were no platforms or pillars anywhere—just these thin roads twisting and turning everywhere.

They also weren't black like asphalt or white like a stone pavement. Instead, they were all really colorful and unrealistic. They actually kinda reminded me of the Rainbow Road stages from a long-running series of racing games. I'd played them with dad before, and I'd always hated that track...

"There's...nothing down there," I said as I looked over the side of the road. I couldn't see anything through the dense clouds. What would have happened if I fell? "I...I'm not in the gaol again, right?"

I'd just left that place, so I was really sure it didn't look this crazy. Had the explosion sent me flying somewhere?

I'll just check by opening the map window and...huh?

"It's not coming up," I muttered to myself. I couldn't open the map.

But never mind the map—I couldn't even open the menu or check my stat summary. What the hell was going on?

"Hold on...how am I supposed to log out?"

Am I trapped in the game, like I'm in some 2010-era anime...? No way, right?! Someone tell me I'm wrong!

"What...? I don't see our leader, April, or even Candy here either..." Hell, I couldn't even see my own Alhazred.

This was actually the most confusing situation I'd gotten in since I started Dendro, which was saying a lot—I hung around our leader, after all.

"Hellooo...? Is anyone heeere?" I raised my voice, but the only response I got was an echo, spreading through the whole who-knows-how-big space.

Well...it doesn't look like I can do anything but walk...

As I began moving, I thought about the situation.

Before it all faded to black, I'd seen both the leader and Candy get caught in the explosion. If that was the reason I was here now, those two must be here too. I didn't know about Candy, but our leader could do anything, so I was pretty sure he'd know what to do about this situation.

I wanted to meet up with them again, but I couldn't find them anywhere.

"What am I supposed to do by myself?" I didn't even have Alhazred for some reason. What could a non-maxed-out girl like me even do here? If I ran into some of those "Thralls," they'd just beat me up.

"Someone...anyone...show yourseeelves... I need a tank! C'mon, give me a meat shield...!"

Right as I mumbled all of that...

"Hm?"

...the surroundings quickly became more colorful.

A mist with an indescribable color spread around me and covered my eyes. I couldn't see anything.

"What the heck...? This is scary!" This was like in one of my dad's horror games! Will I be okay?! What if there's some creepy monster somewhere in the mist?! What if it's all wriggly and gross?!

"...Hey."

"EEEEEEEEK!" Someone grabbed my shoulder...!

"Hey, calm down!"

"We are not your enemies."

"Y-You're not?" After hearing the voices, I turned around.

This was a weird place where I couldn't know what I'd run into, but if it wasn't an enemy, then I didn't care.

"Yeah. I've been dragged in here too. My name's Ray, and this is my Embryo, Nemesis. Well, your leader knew us...but yeah."

It did turn out to be enemies!

◇◇◇

Sorcerer, Ray Starling

I'd touched the aura, gotten the Forced Sleep debuff, and next thing I knew I was in this place.

My trusted mount Silver was nowhere in sight, and my body felt so light it made me kinda uncomfortable. But I still had Nemesis with me and could transform her into weapons, so I'd been able to relax for the moment.

After that, I'd gotten caught up in some weird mist, and then ran into a member of the other party that'd been put to sleep. It was the girl who'd been injured and received treatment.

"I know I said 'anyone,' but...whyyy...?" For some reason, she took one look at me and then started to panic, grasping her head.

Is something wrong...?

"This must be caused by your apparel," Nemesis said telepathically.

I feel like you always blame my clothes for everything, I replied in thought. There's no way an outfit can be enough to make a stranger act like this, right?

"Have you forgotten the dismay you inflicted upon those bandits that one time?"

That must've been because of the other three. Yeah, that's it.

"Nngh...this is the worst time to not have him with me..." said the girl.

"You okay...?" I asked.

"Yeah. I am. I just gotta calm down a bit..."

"That's fine." I didn't know if it was my fault or just because of where we were, but she seemed pretty damn stressed. "What's your name, though?"

"My name? It's Gerbera...uh." After answering Nemesis's question, the girl once again grasped her head.

"What a fidgety young lady," Nemesis commented.

"I get it, though. Just look at what's happening."

Gerbera, huh? I'd definitely heard that name before. That was the name used by the Superior that Shu and Rook had beaten. I knew that Gerbera owned a terrifying Sentinel that couldn't be perceived in any way, but besides that I'd been told that she was an overconfident, extremely self-assertive woman.

"Nnh...I'm such a dummy. I'm a complete mess... I really am useless..."

The Gerbera they'd described was the complete opposite of this self-deprecating girl who was freaking out with her head in her hands. That other Gerbera was supposed to be in the gaol, anyway, so yeah—she obviously wasn't the same person.

While I thought of what to say to this girl crouching on the ground, she glared at me with tears in her eyes.

"How are you so calm...? You realize you've been put to sleep and sent to this weird place, right...?" Why was I calm, huh?

Well, the answer to that was the simple fact that I'd actually been through something like this before.

"I was once kidnapped by a cult while I was asleep."

"Whaaa...that sounds so scary..."

Yeah...looking back, that was actually pretty terrifying.

"So you're calm because you're used to dangerous situations that make no sense?" she asked.

"I guess you could say that."

"Is that really something you should get used to?"

Silence. It's probably better not to, but I did, so...it is what it is.

There was one other relevant thing I'd experienced before.

"Oh, another reason is that it's not my first time in a space like this."

"Huh...? You know what this mystery zone is?"

I nodded before saying, "We are...in a dream."

Gerbera looked at me like I was talking nonsense, but that was the truth.

"...Weren't we in a game? Wait, aren't dive-type VRMMOs already basically like dreams?"

"We're still in Dendro, but we're in a dream inside of that—the space you're sent to when your avatar gets Forced Sleep or Faint."

I'd experienced this multiple times before. I'd even gotten to use my avatar in dreams thanks to Gardranda and, more recently, the axe.

"Oh. I see..." said Gerbera.

"Though, normally, there are no other people here but me—even my Embryo isn't here sometimes. This time, though, there's me, Nemesis, and even you. So, this is definitely a dream, but not just any dream."

"What do you mean?"

"Someone—probably Overlord Acedia—has connected our dreams."

"What's the point of doing that?" I knew what she actually wanted to say—why couldn't the Overlord just put us to sleep and kill us then? There were still lots of Thralls left. They were more than enough to slaughter us while we were all unconscious.

“I know what you mean. If the Overlord just wanted to defeat us, there’s no need to connect our dreams like this. That’s why I think there’s gotta be more to it...”

Perhaps this space was related to us being put to sleep?

“There’s so many things we just don’t know... Maybe our leader understands something, but...” Gerbera said.

“Oh yeah, why are you alone? You had a party, didn’t you?”

“I’d like to know that myself.”

Regardless, all either of us could do right now was keep walking. I had no idea what this dream-road was leading to, but for now, all we could do was follow it. The silver lining here was that Nemesis and I had found someone to accompany us.

“...This took a weird turn.” For some reason, though, Gerbera followed after me with a complicated expression on her face.

Inside the Dream

“So you know nothing about this Embryo, huh?”

“I do not. The only Overlord I ever fought was Overlord Gula, Dis Satisfactory.”

Sechs and Candy had already met up in the joint dream that Overlord Acedia had sent them to. They were on a road just like the one on which Ray had met Gerbera.

“All I know is that the skills and Embryos of this one are nothing like hers.”

“They’re both Overlords, but they’re not that similar, huh?”

“Indeed. Overlord Gula is someone who fights head-on instead of using such indirect methods as these. She may be classified as either a solo combatant or a wide-scale exterminator.”

Candy almost asked if Sechs had won, but decided against it. The answer was obvious when you considered that Sechs had not been sent to the gaol at that point, while Overlord Gula was still on this side. I guess it was a draw? Candy thought. It wasn’t clear when the fight had happened, but it seemed likely that, at least back then, Overlord Gula was on the same level as, if not above, Sechs himself.

In that case, one could assume that as a fellow member of the cartel and a supposed equal to Gula, Overlord Acedia was also immensely powerful.

“Anyway, back to what we know about this dreamlike place...”

“If our guesses are correct, we are at quite a disadvantage here,” Sechs said.

“My GODly powers are especially useless here.” Candy spun his Resheph and let out a sigh. The sound of something being sprayed out through the Embryo’s holes was audible, but it didn’t seem like it was spewing disease this time. “It’s all empty now...and when I try to make any more, they all just go poof.”

“I suppose bacteria cannot exist here because they have no ability to think.” This was the inside of a dream—a space in which only creatures that dreamed could exist—so Resheph’s bacteria hadn’t been drawn in. Even if new ones were made, they couldn’t stay here, and anything created in a dream did not appear in reality.

Overlord Acedia had certainly not considered this incompatibility, but his Dreamland had completely neutralized Resheph. This might’ve been the reason why the mithril-dissolving bacteria had produced no effect either.

“And Resheph has first-gen bacteria too... It’s kinda unfair how a slime like you can be here. It’s bacteria discrimination.”

“‘Differentiation’ might be the better word for it, and the only way to know the process behind it is to ask Overlord Acedia himself. Speaking of differentiation, April may not be here.”

April had the ability to think, but she was a Prism Person—not a human. The old question posed by science fiction—Do Androids Dream of Electric Sheep?—was irrelevant here, as she was most likely not present in the dream. Even if she could exist here, the only way to enter the dreamworld was the Forced Sleep debuff, which had no effect on her whatsoever. She could enter a “sleep mode,” but it was completely separate from all this.

“...Yeaaah,” Candy said with a nod. “If April wasn’t outside, we’d be sent back to the gaol while still asleep.”

The Southernmost Edge of Altar, A Mountain Forest Near the Border

Saying not a word, April swung the wires in her hands and fought off the charging mithril Thralls.

She was facing dozens of creatures all by herself. This was because Sechs—her owner—as well as Gerbera and Candy had suddenly lost consciousness.

Thus, she now fulfilled her role as a combat-focused Prism Person and fought to protect them.

Running away from here wasn't even an option. Unlike her sister unit, Jet Chaser, April wasn't specialized in high-speed combat. She didn't think she could escape while carrying all three of the others.

With strong movements, she used her Material Slider to bring the defense of the mithril as low as possible, then tore them apart with her wires.

However, even after being broken apart, the Thralls were still coming toward her. Kicking them into the distance, she kept them all away from Sechs's group as best she could. The strong defense of the metal meant little to April, but she was having trouble with their unnaturally high life force.

While she was doing all of this, the Prism Steed in the air carried his sleeping owner on its back while evading the attacks of the winged Thralls. It was a unit April did not recognize, but the design alone was enough for her to tell that they shared a creator—the first Flagman.

They were from different series, so April didn't have much sibling-like affinity for him, but the fact that they happened to meet here, two thousand years after their creation, had made some strange feelings flow through her circuitry.

"Support."

Perhaps that was the reason that she'd expanded her attack radius to include the Thralls in the air and fought the Thralls that were throwing rocks at Silver.

The steed did not respond, but he created a barrier of air to prevent the scattered pieces of a Thrall from hitting Gerbera's unconscious body on the ground.

Their circumstances may have been vastly different, but the ones who gave them orders were currently sharing the same dream.

Thus, April and Silver had decided to assist each other in protecting those they had to protect.

"...Ghe."

The large Thrall—Cardinal A—was simply standing back and watching this happen, though.

It was as though it was waiting for something.

Sorcerer, Ray Starling

How long had we been walking in this dream?

The colorful mist covering everything around the roads here was making it hard to tell how far we'd gone. Also, if Gardranda's and the axe's dreams were anything to go by, the time inside them and the time in reality wasn't the same. It was probably flowing faster in here.

"Hell, if that's not how it is, my body could just die." We couldn't open any windows here, so I couldn't check, but it was possible that my physical body was still being attacked by Thralls. In the worst-case scenario, I could die while I was still walking around in this dream and get the death penalty basically out of nowhere. "But I guess we got no choice but to keep moving." Wishing myself awake and even attacking myself wasn't enough to make me snap out of it. Well, this sleep was strong enough to overpower both an Elixir and the Reversal, so that made sense.

I had no idea if this road would lead to the root cause of this deep sleep, but if I wanted to change anything, I had to keep moving.

"Well, someone's optimistic..." Gerbera, who was accompanying me in this dream, had a look on her face like she thought she was about to die.

The reason for this gloomy expression wasn't just the fact that we were trapped in here. In this dream, she didn't have her Embryo, and apparently she couldn't even take out any of her weapons.

Why was Nemesis here, but her Embryo wasn't? That was one of the many questions we had no answer to yet.

"Nnh...I can't even fight...and if I get the death penalty, I'll be sent all the way back..."

I guess she saved somewhere far away? I thought.

"Hey, don't worry," I said. "I can't do anything about our bodies, but if we have a battle here in the dream, you can just leave it all to me." I didn't know if there were any enemies here, but I had Nemesis, so I was pretty sure I could at least fight. “Help me out by looking for enemies, though.”

“What...?”

“When I asked, you told me you had some jobs from the hunter grouping, right?”

“Ohh. Yeah...well, okay...”

“Thanks.”

This place made no sense, so I couldn’t even guess what could attack us and from where. It didn’t hurt to be extra careful.

As I resumed walking, a question came to mind.

“By the way, when I first saw you, you looked pretty beaten up. What happened there?” That was before Overlord Acedia had attacked us, so it had to have been caused by something else. But what could have damaged her that bad?

Gerbera said nothing at first and instead looked up at the sky, as though deep in thought. I figured she was thinking about how to explain what had happened, but for some reason her legs were shaking.

Still, she was eventually able to give me an answer.

“...I-I got spun by a drill.”

“That’s a thing that happens?!” What could’ve led to that?!

“D-Don’t worry, it’s no big deal... It was just an accidental scrape, I guess—with an Embryo.”

“That’s a pretty scary accident...”

And yeah, there were probably drill Embryos out there... Now that I thought about it, Hannya’s Sandalphon was kinda drill-like. Hannya was in Gideon, though, so she obviously had nothing to do with this.

“You have experienced your share of things, but never a drill,” said Nemesis.

“Yeah. Though my whole body did get broken apart multiple times recently.”

“Whaaa...?” Gerbera seemed freaked out by what I’d said.

I wasn’t lying, though. Thanks to the likes of Behemot, Jubei, and the axe, I was getting blasted to pieces fairly often these days. I was kinda worried that it would have some weird effects on Nemesis’s evolution.

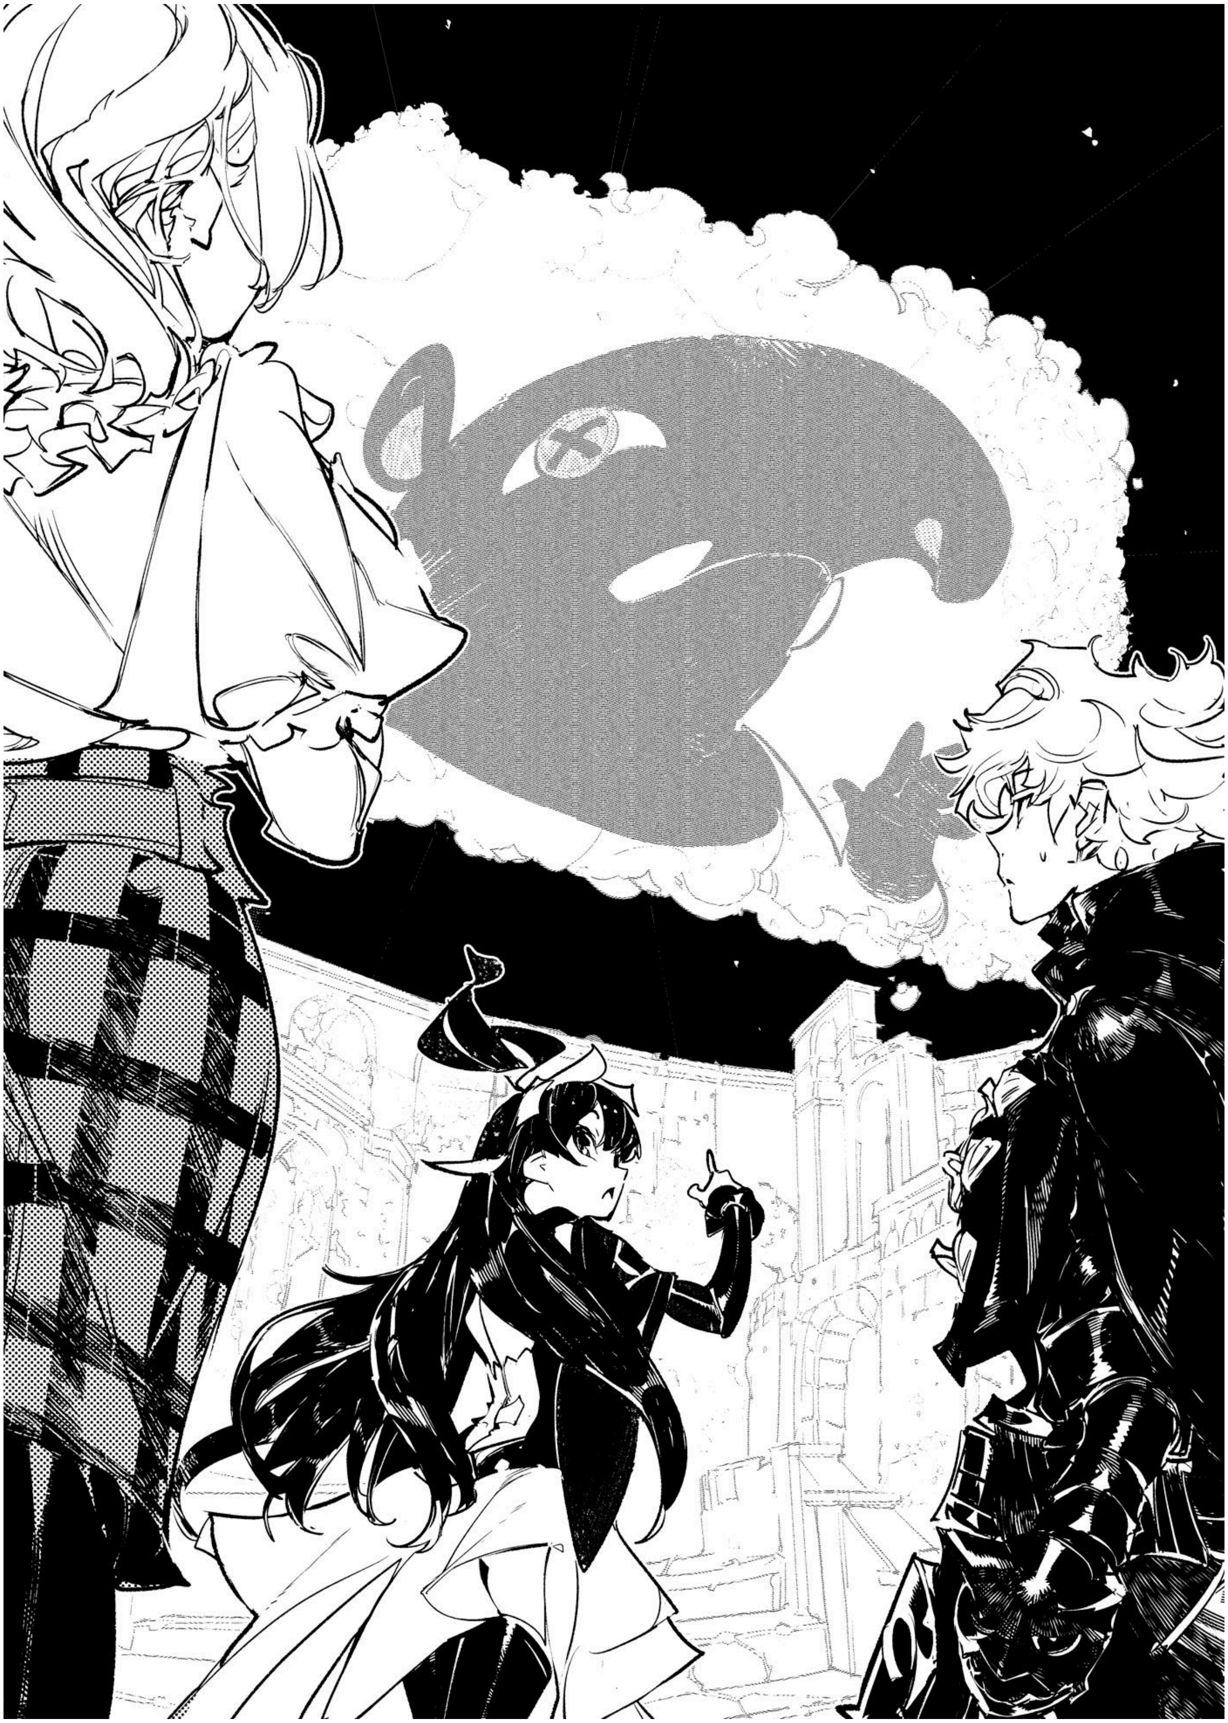
“So our leader isn’t the only one who comes apart all the time.”

“Hm?” Leader? Did she mean that woman? She often came apart? Well, she did seem to have healing powers that rivaled Miss Eldritch, so I guess she could make it work. I could recall Miss Eldritch putting her arm back basically the moment after Figaro removed it.

“Ray, Gerbera...what do you think that is?” As we talked, Nemesis pointed to the right—away from the twisting roads.

Before we’d realized it, there was a rectangular cloud in that direction. The shape was clearly unnatural, and we all focused on it.

A moment later, the cloud began to shine, and then displayed something like it was an electronic billboard.



It showed...a tapir.

More specifically, a person wearing a tapir costume.

I didn't recognize that costume in particular, but it had a familiar air to it—probably because of Shu. Well, him or Carl, maybe.

"Oh yeah, I think Shu actually told me about this." He'd mentioned that there was a Superior in Legendaria who also wore a costume all the time. If I recalled correctly, the name was ZZZ. So, this person in a tapir costume must've been—

"Hello. I'm Doraemon."

Whoops, my mistake.

Seriously, though...what the hell was that introduction? Honestly, it didn't even work as a joke.

"You should only say that if you're dressed as a cat. Or a tanuki, at least."

"Are you an idiot...?"

"Even here I have heard the name 'Doraemon' quite often."

We gave various responses, and the self-proclaimed Doraemon nodded.

"Yes, you're right. I'm not Doraemon. I'm ZZZ. Overlord Acedia. Good job. Yaaay. I like dorayaki, though. It's great that we have it here too."

The tapir...or rather, ZZZ spoke like he was delirious, or maybe as though he was just barely awake. I felt like I was listening to someone who'd pulled a bunch of all-nighters in a row and was now in a really unstable frame of mind.

But...

"By the way, if anyone here has Truth Discernment, let me ask you: did it work?"

"...Huh?" Gerbera tilted her head, then opened her eyes in surprise.

I'd heard that the hunter grouping's Trap Hunter was a job focused on setting up traps, but it also had a low-level Truth Discernment meant for trap finding.

Her reaction told me that it didn't activate when ZZZ had used the obviously fake name.

"Okaaay, I'm now gonna explain that and also the other rules of Dreamland. Explanations are a pain, but it's a condition for using a skill. If only I could let someone else do it. Too bad it's gotta be me... What a pain, such a paiiin... I'm broadcasting to all of you at once, but it's still a paiiin..."

ZZZ took a pillow out from somewhere and buried his face in it. He clearly wasn't into this. But then he resumed talking like it was something he was being forced to do.

"First, in Dreamland sense-based skills don't work right. I mean, it's a dream, so yeah. Do your best with your own mundane senses. You're in a dream, so you don't have a sense of pain, taste, or smell, but you don't have to eat anymore. It won't have any taste anyway. But you do have the sense of touch. And sight. And hearing. But this isn't a lewd dream. Nobuta, you peeerv."

Where the hell did that come from?

Even if I wanted to say that out loud, he was talking too fast to give me a chance. For someone who obviously wasn't enthusiastic about this explanation, he was talking nonstop.

Or maybe he just wanted this to be over with?

"Next, you can't bring anything that doesn't have a mind. Well, Embryos are fine even if they're just things, but normal gear just looks like it's there and doesn't actually exist. It's like 'The Emperor's New Clothes,' but reversed. Nobuta, you peeerv—part II: Electric Boogaloo."

I couldn't tell if he liked Doraemon or hated it.

"If Embryos are fine, then why isn't mine here?"

"No idea, Miss Padding. Anyway, nextnextnext."

"Who are you calling 'Padding'?!"

"Oh. Sorry. The pads are gone too, aren't they? It's great that you look the same though, isn't it? That your chest isn't a sheer cliff here."

"You're dead!"

"Calm down! That's just a broadcast! You'll fall off the road!" I shouted. Gerbera had no weapons, but that didn't stop her from trying to square up with ZZZ, so I jumped to restrain her by the upper arms and hold her back. Our stats seemed to be about the same, so it wasn't easy. I might've not been able to do it if it wasn't for the STR bonus from my Miasmaflame Bracers.

Hm? Wait...why does grabbing her arms...feel like I'm just grabbing bare skin?

"If all gear in the dream simply appears to be there, then I suppose they are like holograms over bare skin..." said Nemesis.

Deafening silence. I gently let go of Gerbera's body, and the fist she'd raised against ZZZ went straight to my face instead.

Welp...

ZZZ gave us a "what the hell are you doing" kind of stare that I could feel through the tapir suit. "Heeey, I just warned you. Oh yeah, I forgot to tell you, and I think you probably realized already, but you fell asleep 'cause of my Dreamland. You fall asleep when you touch iiit. It's the weird-colored aura. My eeeyes." ZZZ kept on with his explanation, regardless of what we did. "Dreamland has a limited range. If my creations and I—well, Thralls these days—are gone from the surroundings, you will wake up. You gotta do some search and destroy. But you can't 'cause you're catching Zs."

So the Thralls were like antennae that spread the Dreamland signal, huh? And as long as they were around, they would channel power and make it impossible for us to wake up.

Wait, doesn't that mean that we can't do anything but wait until our sleeping bodies are killed?

"Heh! I got some bad news for you, you sleepy trunk-face! Our April is still awake...probably! She's a robot! A Prism Person! She's really strong! She's making mincemeat out of all your Thralls right now as we speak!"

Despite the situation, Gerbera aggressively pointed at ZZZ. Her depression from before seemed to have been blown away by anger over the whole "padding" thing. Also, she may have been acting confident because she was completely relying on someone else instead of saying she'd do something herself.

"That so?" ZZZ didn't seem to think much of her words, however. His strategy was falling apart, but it wasn't shaking him in the slightest.

Is there more to this?

"Finally, dying in the Dreamland gives your avatar the death penalty."

"HUH?!" Gerbera exclaimed in surprise, but ZZZ ignored her and waved his hand.

"The explanation's over. Goodbye, everyone. I'm gonna get some shut-eye. Goodnight, don't let the bedbugs bite."

The broadcast ended, and the cloud he'd used as a screen dispersed.

Left behind, we didn't know what to say.

"...Even Candy is easier to grasp."

"Candy?"

"Oh...u-umm...well, you know, candy's pretty easy to drop, right?"

As she said that, she couldn’t make eye contact with me.“I understand. It is truly saddening when sand sticks to them,” said Nemesis.

“You don’t eat the candy you drop, do you?”

“...No, I do not.” She was looking away from me. Pretty suspicious. Knowing her, she’d probably think the candy was still good to eat if you just washed it off a bit.

“I gotta say, that tapir really runs his mouth... Only dumbasses reveal their...tricks...” After saying that, she crouched and grasped her head again for some reason. I strained my ears and heard a shaky, “I was such an idiooot.”

Had she messed up in the past somehow?

“Did he say that the reason he said all of that was that it was the condition for some skill, and because this is a dream?”

“Because this is...why?”

“Look around you. Everything looks clearer, doesn’t it?” The clouds surrounding us had dispersed and the bits that had been kinda unfocused were now much sharper.

And though the road was still floating, it had become completely straight.

“I guess that now that our heads have been stuffed with new info, this Dreamland has begun to take shape in our minds.”

It was said that dreams were what people saw when the brain was organizing information. I didn’t know if the dreams we saw in Dendro were the same as they were reality, but it was possible that this power that bore the name of “Dreamland” incorporated some of the principles of real-life dreams.

That would explain why he had to give an explanation to use a skill. And now that we were given info about Dreamland, it would start showing what it was actually capable of.

For now, though, I couldn’t see any changes besides the increase in clarity.

“Well, now we know that we’ll wake up as long as we just wait,” said Gerbera.

“Oh yeah, you said something about April? The Prism Person?”

I’d heard about Prism Persons from Integra. She’d said that they were stand-alone combat dolls equipped with AI and built by Flagman himself.

I'd also heard that the Prism Soldiers that had shown up from Quartierlatin's ruins were meant to be mass-produced versions of the Prism Persons—though, I had no idea what had to happen in the mass production process to go from April to those things in the ruins. April looked human at first glance, while the Prism Soldiers definitely didn't. The difference in appearance between them was way bigger than the difference between Prism Steeds and SMPS.

"Yeah. If the tapir wasn't lying, April's gonna take care of the Thralls soon and we'll wake up... I'm really leaving it all to everyone else, huh?"

"But there was a Mythical metal Thrall there." The scarlet Thrall based on a landdragon was obviously way above the rest.

"Mythical or not, if they've got nothing but hardiness going for them, they're easy marks for April."

Gerbera didn't seem to worry about the scarlet Thrall whatsoever. There must've been some compatibility at play that I didn't know about. In that case, maybe we really would wake up if we just waited long enough.

"Hm..." But I couldn't shake off my worries. Would waiting really be enough to get out of this situation? We were up against a Superior and an Overlord—someone who stood upon two summits at once. Could he really be beaten by just having someone around who didn't fall asleep and could deal with Mythical metal? "Also..."

ZZZ himself had clearly said that dying in the dream would result in a death penalty. That meant that this dream had something that could kill us somewhere inside it.

"Anyway, I don't think it's a good idea to just wait," I continued. "We should find out if there's anything we can do from—"

"Ray!"

That was when it happened.

With a voice as sharp as an alarm bell, Nemesis transformed into the greatsword and flew into my hand.

I knew full well what this meant.

"We got company?!"

"Aye! Above us!"

I looked up and saw a tiny silhouette far in the distance. Now that the clouds had dispersed and my vision was unobstructed, I could clearly see it falling toward us.

“Gerbera! Stay back!”

“You don’t have to tell me that...!”

The thing falling from above grew larger as it did. Soon enough, I was able to see both its shape and its color.

I could see it very clearly.

“What...the hell...?!” As that question came over me, the thing finally landed several dozen metels ahead.

The dream’s road remained steady, but the area around the landing site was pulverized and cracked.

“...Ghe.”

Through the dust raised by its landing, I saw a giant, scarlet figure. It looked like a dragon with swords growing all over it.

It was undoubtedly the Thrall made of Mythical metal.

“Why is it here...in the dream?”

Something that should’ve been outside had somehow gained an existence within the dream—and now we were its targets.

Chapter Six: Dreamscape Assailant

Sorcerer, Ray Starling

"...G h e g h e g h e."

The scarlet Thrall had suddenly fallen from above. It looked almost exactly like the one I'd seen before I was pulled into the dream, except it wasn't surrounded by an iridescent aura—the Dreamland.

There were no eyes on its face, but I could tell that its attention was fixed on us. It rubbed its arm-blades together, throwing up sparks as it walked closer.

"...Wh-What do we do now?" Gerbera said, beginning to panic.

"We'll just do like we agreed," I said as I took a step forward. "I'll fight. You stand back."

She'd been damaged since before she went to sleep, and she didn't have her Embryo or even her weapons right now. I had to fight by myself.

"But we are not at our best ourselves right now," Nemesis said.

"I know!" My arms, legs, and back...I glanced at each of them and took a moment to think.

"I guess we'll have to figure this out as we go along..."

"Do not rely on your armor! The attacks will reach your flesh!"

As we talked, the scarlet Thrall accelerated toward us. Its speed wasn't supersonic, but I didn't have Silver here, so it was still way faster than me anyway. I also hadn't fully adjusted to this Dreamland, so my senses were slightly worse than usual.

"Tch! Purgatorial Flames!" There was still distance between us, so I went and used my left Miasmaflame Bracer.

It released a torrent of fire. No surprises there—Gardranda had a mind, so I could use her inside the Dreamland with no problem.

The flames touched the Thrall as it approached...

"...G h e."

...but didn't damage it.

"That's simply not enough firepower!"

"Man...Mythical metal's a real pain!"

The Thrall closed the distance and attacked me, but I barely evaded it and tried to remember what I'd heard about this material.

First, if converted to END, its toughness was about equal to that of END-focused Superior Jobs.

Second, making anything from it required special techniques available only to the greatest artisans.

And third, it had an extremely high melting point that made it difficult to change its shape with heat.

It was insanely rare for it to melt in combat, with the only things capable of that being the breath of Tri-Zenith Dragon, Gloria; the heatwaves created by Shinedragon King, Drag-Flare; and King of Blaze's ultimate job skill.

Gloria's case was perhaps the most notable. Upon touching the metal, the breath that made everything evaporate had only melted it.

My Gardranda simply didn't have the firepower for this. Perhaps I could've dealt damage to it if I summoned Gardranda herself and had her use Purgatorial Flames: Zero, but it didn't look like that was an option.

"Ray!"

"I know!"

This clash just now had left me more drained than usual. Normally, I made up for the MP and SP I used by tapping into and converting the grudge stored in my Grudge-Soaked Greaves.

But now, it didn't look like that was working.

"Looks like Gouz-Maise isn't here." Even though I appeared to be equipped with the greaves, they weren't actually here—just as ZZZ had explained. I couldn't open menus here, so the only way to even know if I had my gear was to try to use it.

And though Gouz-Maise was an MVP reward, I couldn't have brought it here because it had no mind.

Miasmaflame Princess: Gardranda and a bunch of other skills I had were all predicated on using Gouz-Maise's grudge. The fact that I couldn't rely on it now had made me a whole lot weaker.

"Ah...!" Nemesis quickly transformed into The Black Shield and blocked the blade the Thrall swung down. She was able to withstand it, but it left a noticeable crack on her surface.

"I cannot do this too many times!"

"I know...!" Instead of relying on unique quirks I could take advantage of, this Thrall was just another enemy that was simply strong. It obviously wasn't on Behemot's level or anything, but it was clearly above Logan's Legendary devils—Gigaknights.

"...Ancient Legendary."

The words that escaped my mouth had two meanings.

First, it was my evaluation of this Thrall's power tier.

And second, it referred to a card I had that could maybe defeat it.

But...could I actually use it?

"G h e..." As I considered my options, the Thrall underwent a change.

Its arms, nose, and tail-blade turned an even brighter scarlet and began to heat up. The same heat that had made the mithril Thrall explode now lit up all of its blades, making them insanely hot. This was an absurd move possible only because the Mythical metal possessed an immense heat capacity.

My instincts told me that the blades had more power than the Swordmaster job's Laser Blade skill. Nemesis's Black Shield form was the toughest of the ones she had, but I could tell that these heated blades would split her in half regardless.

"G h e g h e..."

The Thrall raised its arm-blades up, then swung them down as if going for a Mongolian chop.

I had to move left or right to evade it, but I could tell that this was only a trap—regardless of which side I chose, the tail-blade would swipe toward whatever direction I'd gone and cut me down.

That was why I chose to go right.

Just as the arm-blades cut into the dream path and opened a deep crack in it, the Thrall threw its tail to skewer me.

"Counter Absorption!"

However, Nemesis's Black Shield form didn't preclude her from using Counter Absorption, and she activated it just in time to absorb the damage of the tail-strike. Its arms were left stuck into the ground while its attack was absorbed.

The Thrall was briefly immobilized.

"MONOCHROME!" I didn't miss my chance and called to the Black Warcoat I was wearing.

I won the first gamble—Monochrome actually responded to me. Just like Gardranda, it was actually here in this dream.

It formed its cannon around my left hand.

And then...

"SHINING DESPAIR!"

...it fired a superheated laser toward the Thrall.

This was the single most powerful attack in my arsenal. Even so, I was seriously gambling on it being able to destroy Mythical metal. The laser was more concentrated than the original's, but would it be enough to match Gloria's breath?

The answer to that turned out to be...

"...G h e..."

...yes and no.

The Shining Despair attack did damage the Thrall—and the Mythical metal it was made of. However, the effect was minimal. The Thrall had twisted its body just in time to make the laser aimed at its chest hit its upper left arm instead.

The blast had created a fist-sized semicircular hole there, but that was it.

It hadn't been nearly enough to defeat it. The Thrall could even use the arm still, albeit a little bit awkwardly.

"It's working...! Keep shooting...!" shouted Gerbera.

"Hate to break it to you, but one shot of that takes all the juice."

"It's over, then." Gerbera fell to her knees behind me. I could understand where she was coming from, but it was too early to give up.

"Nemesis, status on the damage counter?" Vengeance is Mine ignored enemy defense, so Mythical metal didn't mean anything to it. I could still win this if I used it on the Thrall's head, chest, or some other critical part.

"... Zero."

However, I could never have expected Nemesis's response.

"...Nemesis?"

"I sense a faint accumulation somewhere awfully far away, but I sense nothing on this creature before us."

"What?" That didn't make sense. We'd taken its attacks with the Black Shield as well as Counter Absorption.

Was this because it was a dream, or...?

"Ah...!"

Before I could finish my thought, the Thrall swung its heated blade at me. Nemesis couldn't defend against it, so she shifted from the Black Shield to the Black Blade. I evaded it as best as I could, but then I started to feel heat in my left shoulder.

"Ray!"

"I know!" This probably hadn't been intentional payback, but I now had a scorched laceration about where my Shining Despair had hit the Thrall. I couldn't check my stats, but my senses told me that I'd lost probably about 10% of my HP to that.

"So? Where did the damage go?" I asked.

"It seems to have been added to the accumulation in the distance."

I see how it is now, I thought. The damage I took here in the dream was almost certainly being credited not to this Thrall, but the tapir himself—Overlord Acedia. I didn't know whether it was because Thralls were like his limbs or because his Embryo turned the damage within the dream into actual damage, but this meant that I couldn't use my counter skills on this Thrall.

Silver wasn't here, so I'd lost a lot of my mobility. VDA and my accessories weren't here, so I'd become a whole lot more fragile. Gouz-Maise wasn't here, so I was unable to summon Gardranda. Monochrome was here, but Shining Despair wasn't strong enough to be fatal. And now, to top it all off, I couldn't even use Nemesis's counter skills.

"This reminds me of our battle against that lab coated maniac," said Nemesis.

"I was thinking the same thing." I had no intention of giving up, but this felt like a real dead end. This was worse than fighting RSK, and that thing had been the result of metagaming against me.

I'd known that losing all my non-sentient gear would give anything within the dream the upper hand, but this was worse than I'd expected. This Thrall's defense and offense were basically equal, and I had no way of dealing with any of it right now.

"...No. That's not quite right. "

I realized that I might have one or two things I could do.

The problem was not only that they'd be a gamble, but also that they were just something...different. Simply trying one of them would have me put my life on the line, while the other—if it was even possible—would have me build up more damage and...

"Buy some more time...!"

Yeah, that, I thought. Wait, huh...?

"Gerbera?" I turned around and saw Gerbera, standing away from the battle and calling out to me with a desperate expression.

"If you keep it busy long enough, April should get rid of the Thrall outside...! You need to buy some time until she does that...!"

Oh yeah, Gerbera had mentioned April. I wasn't so sure about that idea, though. As long as we were fighting this Thrall here in the dream, we couldn't know if destroying all the Thralls in reality would actually make us wake up.

Would this scarlet Thrall here really die if the real one was killed? They were clearly the same thing. Were there two of them—one in reality and one in the dream? Maybe the one from reality had simply slipped into the dream? Or perhaps there was just one of them that existed in both reality and the dream at the same time?

We didn't know any of that. As things were, all of those possibilities seemed as likely as the others.

We gotta get more info, I thought.

"We have no choice but to endure," said Nemesis.

She was right—no matter what the truth was, we still hadn't built up enough damage for the second gamble.

For now, all we could do was draw in the Thrall's attacks and wait for a chance to strike back as we restored our HP.

I feel like it's been a while since I had a battle like this.

"We have been stripped of options. It is best for us to return to the basics."

"Yeah."

I brandished Nemesis in her sword form and focused on the Thrall's attacks.

The Southernmost Edge of Altar, A Mountain Forest Near the Border

When Ray was first faced with the scarlet Thrall in the dream, the battle between the Prism weapons and the Thralls was changing.

"Remaining hostiles...one." The mithril Thralls shattered by April had been trying to fight despite being shattered into pieces, but after some time and a few more pulverizing attacks, they had become completely immobile.

The only ones that were left were April, Silver, the four who were sleeping, and...

"...G h e g h e g h e."

...the Thrall that looked just like the one in the dream—the one ZZZ called "Cardinal A."

It had done nothing but watch the fight, and it still wasn't doing anything except rubbing its arm-blades together, releasing sparks as it did so.

Was this some kind of taunt? Or was it preparing for some sort of attack?

"Battle analysis."

April took a moment to think.

During the battle, she'd used an Elixir on her owner—Sechs—but it did not wake him up. Based on that, she'd assumed that he hadn't been overcome by a normal sleeping debuff, but the result of a special skill with conditions attached.

This phenomenon was unknown to her. When it came to jobs, April knew everything that was known to the pre-ancient civilization. However, she didn't have much combat experience against Masters—these newly appeared entities with a multitude of unique powers.

She'd sparred against Sechs and Gerbera, fought Gakido and his Sixth Realm Chaos, and faced the Incarnation of Maelstroms in her last battle during the time of the pre-ancient civilization.

In that final fight, she'd been stripped of all her energy, entered a dormant state, and was then retrieved by the incarnations.

The battle construct believed to be unmatched in physical combat had been easily suppressed and captured.

The mastermind behind this Cardinal A—Overlord Acedia, ZZZ—gave April the same feeling as she'd experienced during that conflict.

"Resuming combat."

No matter how dangerous it may have been, though, she chose to fight Cardinal A to mitigate the danger to her owner.

In but a breath, she closed the distance between her and Cardinal A, aiming to put it within her Material Slider's range.

"...G h e." Coming into contact with the iridescent aura surrounding Cardinal A—the fragment of Dreamland—did not cause any changes in April herself. The Embryo had no effect on her.

That was exactly why what happened next was so bizarre—April's wires were deflected without dealing any damage to Cardinal A.

"...?"

This made no sense to her. April was using her Material Slider—a skill that subtracted END and physical toughness. She'd even used a setting far above the -4,000 she'd used against Sixth Realm Chaos. Anything around her would have their END stat reduced by a whole 30,000. Meanwhile, her own toughness, when converted to END, was over 50,000.

Their clash should have been like steel striking styrofoam. Not even Mythical metal could remain unscathed by this, but Cardinal A was under some kind of effect that negated it.

"Conjecture: toughness increased by additional effects."

April assumed that the Mythical metal's defenses had been enhanced even further, giving it toughness that not even Material Slider could negate.

But there was something she could do against that.

"My silver brother—increase your distance. Incoming hazard," she told Silver, and he carried Ray away from her in response. She then checked where the other three people were and deemed that she could proceed without issue.

If her opponent still possessed toughness that rendered her attacks powerless, there was only one thing she had to do.

"Limiters: off."

She would simply bring the toughness even further down.

"Material Slider..."

April was Prism Person No. 2 as well as the first Prism Person designed for combat—Diamond Slayer. Her namesake was an area of total obliteration in which physical defense had no meaning.

The skill's name was...

"Diamond Slaying."

The next moment, an invisible force field permeated her surroundings. Her output was pushed to the limit to make her mod-armaments operate at a staggering capacity.

Affected by the skill, her surroundings began to crumble. The stones and trees were unable to maintain their integrity as solid objects, let alone hold up their own weight, and were ground into dust as they shattered.

Even the coarse earth beneath her was broken down into smaller and smaller particles, quickly becoming sand. Not even the remains of the mithril Thralls were spared as they all disintegrated into silver-colored ash.

Everything in a 50-metel radius was affected by an extreme toughness debuff of more than 200,000.

Not even Mythical metal structures could maintain themselves under this effect. There was nothing in the pre-ancient civilization that could withstand this. Even bullets heading for her at the speed of sound would be reduced to nothing before they even reached her.

And, touched by a skill this immense...

"...G h e g h e g h e."

...Cardinal A was still completely unharmed.

"Abnormal variable." Recognizing this opponent as an outlier, April resumed attacking using her wires, but the monster with a body of Hihi'irokane, which must have become as soft as the wall of a sandcastle under her ability's assault, still deflected April's attacks.

It was as though it was truly invincible.

April now understood that this entity's form was maintained by some principle other than sheer physical toughness. Thus, she knew it was a power that she could not overcome.

Assuming the worst-case scenario, April considered a disengagement. She compared stats and calculated how many of the three people she could safely take with her when...

"...G h e..."

...with no prior warning, Cardinal A's left arm was destroyed. A semicircular part of the upper arm seemed to have melted away.

It was as though it had been hit by a laser.

The damage obviously wasn't the result of April's Material Slider, but no matter how hard she calculated, she could not find anything in her surroundings that could have caused it.

Cardinal A had received damage from a place that April couldn't observe.

April then reconsidered her decision to disengage and instead chose to buy time to see if she could unravel the secret behind its invincibility.

Thus, everyone facing Cardinal A—within or outside the dream—had chosen to observe.

And as things were, none of them knew which way this would go.

Whimsical Dreality, Dreamland, Interior

Sechs and Candy stood on one of Dreamland's roads, not saying a word.

Everything around them had become clear. They had received the same explanation ZZZ had given Ray and Gerbera—in fact, it had been shown to all of them at once.

Unlike those two, Sechs and Candy hadn't commented, opting to merely listen and absorb the information.

They may have even understood it better than Ray had.

"Now that was a waste of time," said Candy with a pout. "We already knew that Dreamland only takes in things that have minds, plus it was pretty obvious that dying here totally equals death penalty, and that we had to do something specific to wake up. The info's useless to us, but he now gets to use a skill." Candy let out a sigh and grumbled. "And he didn't even tell us anything about it."

ZZZ hadn't revealed any of the cards in his hand—he'd merely told them something that anyone could have figured out after enough time. He already had the upper hand, and this gave him an even bigger advantage.

"You agree, don't cha?" Candy asked. "...Sechsy?"

That was when Candy realized that Sechs was deep in thought, one hand over his mouth.

"...That is contradictory." It seemed like he was simply scrutinizing the info they'd been given, but that wasn't precisely the case.

"What is?"

He was questioning something far more fundamental. "The fact that the Embryo requires an explanation...as well as this dreamworld itself. I had information about Overlord Acedia's nature as a person. He was a slothful, laid-back sort who desired nothing else but sleep."

"That's pretty much what I heard about him too."

"If that is truly his nature, this Dreamland makes no sense. It contradicts what he is."

"What do you... Oh, I get it."

That was when Candy realized it too.

"A person who merely wants to slack off would never like an Embryo that forces him to work."

Masters generally didn't end up with Embryos whose powers they actively disliked. Sechs the shape-shifting slime, as well as Candy the bacteria generator, were both fond of how their Embryos were.

With that in mind, would a person who only wanted to laze around enjoy an Embryo that turned his time sleeping—one of the fundamentals of laziness—into work time? After all, Dreamland was an Embryo that didn't stop at merely putting them to sleep—it required its Master's explanation to unleash its full potential.

"Our interpretation of one factor is flawed."

Was it ZZZ's slothful nature? Was it Dreamland's ability to pull people into the dream?

Or was there something amiss with their assumptions about both?

This deviation in nature had resulted in ZZZ's Embryo possessing a skill that Sechs and Candy couldn't have anticipated. It was the very power giving severe trouble to April back in reality, and its name was "Nightmare Kingdom—Dreamland."

"We lack the information to truly verify anything, but I believe we should be prepared for the unexpected."

"Okaaay."

The two were about to resume walking when Candy noticed something.

"Sechsy, what's with your finger?" Candy was referring to Sechs's left pinky.

It was gone.

Candy hadn't seen it vanish, but it wasn't there now.

"Does he have a skill that makes you disappear piece by piece as time goes on?" Suddenly worried he was being consumed by a giant creature, Candy examined himself.

Sechs, however, simply smiled his usual smile and said, “No need to worry. This is not Overlord Acedia’s skill. I have done this myself.”

“Hm?”

“I suppose that is enough.” After saying that, Sechs extended his left hand back to the direction they’d come from.

A few moments later, a small slime came into view.

“That’s...”

“Yes. This was a little test. I separated it the moment we arrived here.”

The tiny slime jumped into Sechs’s left hand and assumed the form of his pinky.

“Wait, your slimes...”

“Indeed. Though it depends on size, they disappear when there is too great a distance between them and the main body—that is, the one with the most volume.”

That was the flaw in Sechs’s powers that even Red King had been aware of. But...

“However, this slime did not disappear even when the distance surpassed ten times the maximum.”

“So, distance works different here?”

“Either that or it does not matter as long as my physical body is still all connected. Regardless, I believe I can make use of this.”

Sechs then transformed his right hand into a sword-like Embryo...and decapitated himself.

A moment later, the rest of his body split into pieces and became tiny slimes. A number of them even had wings.

“I split myself into about fifty parts,” Sechs said. “I will use this for reconnaissance. If we are lucky, I might find Gerbera or Overlord Acedia.”

The pieces then scattered. Normally, this would’ve been suicide for Sechs, as the pieces would vanish one by one—but if they didn’t, this was an optimal way to gather information.

Thus, the slimes crawled off in every direction. Some of them even jumped off the dream road into the abyss below.

“Hrmm, not even a GOD like me could use a trick this extreme.”

“I do consider the safety margins, of course, so I will bring all of them back if at least one vanishes due to distance. Oh, also, I have a request.”

“What is it?”

“Could you carry my head? I am focusing on controlling the other parts, so it is a bit difficult to move.”

“I guess now I know how April feels,” Candy said as he put on a wry grin and picked up Sechs’s severed head.

Interlude: The Village of the Overlord

Northern Legendaria, Sheepkin Settlement AKA Sloth Village

There was a small settlement hidden in the Legendarian woodlands near its border with the Kingdom of Altar.

Mithril Thralls roamed around it, protecting it from monsters and other uninvited guests. They were set to be semi-autonomous, letting them patrol the area even when ZZZ wasn't logged in.

And in the heart of the settlement that was surrounded by these servants of the Overlord, there was a mansion that looked a bit too humble for someone with such a lofty title.

It was the largest building in the village, but it was smaller than the residences of Altean nobility, even the provincial ones.

"Zzz..." ZZZ was sleeping in the bedroom of this mansion's second floor. His bed was fluffy, and his sleep was deep and calm. In reality, he was dressed in the same tapir costume he wore in the dream, and though it made for a good sleeping bag by itself, there was still a blanket over him.

There was a group of people watching him through the door, not saying a word or making noise. They were all sheepkin servants who lived in this mansion, and their eyes as they looked at him were filled with relief and unmistakable reverence.

It felt like they were looking at a messiah rather than an Overlord.

That was only natural.

After all, for the sheepkin, Overlord Acedia was nothing short of a savior.

◇◆

The sheepkin were people who had curved horns on their heads and grew woollike hairs on their limbs and backs.

They had settled in northern Legendaria, but that was not where they had originated—it was merely where they'd arrived after fleeing the heart of the country.

Sheepkin hair—especially the fluff of young women—was treasured as a high-grade material for clothing and bedding. Even though they were a humanoid species, this had led to them being targeted by the other races as if they were monsters that dropped rare items. In fact, unlike monsters, they were actually guaranteed to provide the material, making their situation arguably even worse.

They hated being treated like cattle, so they chose to secretly move to the edge of Legendaria and live there in hiding.

Centuries had passed since then.

They did not participate in the Legendarian parliament and lived their lives as a forgotten minor tribe. The country had countless different peoples in it, but their situation was perhaps among the most pitiable.

However, it wasn't all bad for them.

The location they'd chosen to live couldn't have been more perfect, for it was right outside the area dominated by the Divine Disks. Because their settlement wasn't part of its domain, the UBM never asked them for sacrifices, but at the same time it was close enough that other monsters were scared to approach them. This had allowed the sheepkin to live in peace for the centuries they'd spent here.

However, time had eventually brought change.

The Divine Disks were defeated, and the local habitats changed, allowing monsters in the area to become more bold and start to approach the settlement. The sheepkin had no means to defend themselves against them—the tribe as a whole had a low affinity for combat jobs. They only excelled at crafting roles focused on attire—as well as the Sacrifice job, which was thoroughly useless to tians.

Despite that, the monsters that lived in this area were strong enough for it to be recognized as a leveling zone for Masters level 300 and up.

If they didn't find anyone to protect them, the entire settlement would eventually be consumed by the local fauna.

However, though it was near the buffer zone, it was still part of Legendaria, so it had never been annexed by Altar and did not receive their protection. Since they'd lived in hiding for so long, though, Legendaria itself didn't even know the sheepkin existed, let alone had any understanding of their circumstances.

And if they were to reveal themselves, they would only be hunted and sheared once again.

Their choice was between death and becoming cattle again—and, after a lot of thought, they'd chosen the former.

Or, to be more precise, monsters had come into their settlement before they could truly make a decision. They hadn't even had the chance to consider whether or not a life as livestock would have been preferable.

Just as the sheepkin were about to meet death in the jaws of some wolfish beasts, though...suddenly, a group of odd and misshapen monsters came out of nowhere and began mowing down the wolves. These "Thralls" routed the beasts, despite their numbers.

For some reason, one of them was carrying what first looked like a large stuffed toy shaped like a tapir, but it then turned around, revealing that it was actually a person in a tapir costume.

"...I'm not hungry anymooooore..." Ignoring the tapir's sleep talking, the Thralls continued to exterminate the wolves.

And when it was done, the strange monsters stopped in place.

The sheepkin focused on the one carrying the person wearing the costume.

The tapir was a strange creature, but the lack of name hovering above it made it clear that it was no monster.

What was it, then?

Most would conclude that it was a Master, but the sheepkin, who'd been living in seclusion for centuries, had no means of knowing about the recent influx. To them, Masters were something that only existed in legend, effectively synonymous with The Lynx, Schrödinger Cat, who'd lived during The Era of the Peerless Three—when they went into seclusion.

"...G h e." Upon noticing the people looking at the tapir, the Thralls spent a moment thinking how to handle them. However, they were unable to come upon an answer and decided to wake him up.

"Mmnghh...we found people yet?" Upon awakening, the tapir looked around, saw that he was in a village and...

"I'm ZZZ. Overlord Acedia. Nice to meetchaaa."

...introduced himself in that manner. The sheepkin were shocked, for the title he'd presented was yet another thing straight from legend. "I'm almost outta food. Gotta stock up. Huuungry. Uhh, that kinda makes me feel like Dis. Oh—I got money if you need it. How muuuch?"

He spoke like he wasn't fully awake, but none of what he said triggered Truth Discernment. None of it was a lie—not even the claim that he was an Overlord.

Overlords were nearly mythological figures who had conquered a created dungeon—entities that enjoyed power and fortune far beyond what the sheepkin had ever known.

It was said that those who had acquired these titles had caused a lot of mayhem in the world. But Overlord or not, this one was the sheepkin's savior.

Not saying a word, the villagers looked at each other. They remembered how they'd regretted their decision when the wolves attacked them.

That was why they resolved to make the right choice this time.

"Please...! Take us as your retainers! We are ready to give you everything we have, save only our very lives!"

"Suuure, why not?"

The response to their desperate plea was quick and casual. It was hard to tell if the Overlord even knew what he was replying to.

At least, he certainly did not know their circumstances.

"Gimme clothes, food, and shelter, please. I'll just get some shut-eye. Sleepy." And with that, ZZZ went to sleep once again.

Thus, the hidden village of the sheepkin became Overlord Acedia's domain.

◇◆

Because of these circumstances, ZZZ was their savior.

Even after becoming their ruler, he never asked for anything but food and a place to sleep. His Thralls even assisted with security and farming for the villagers, making life there noticeably easier.

The sheepkin could not have asked for a better ruler.

But that also raised a particular question—a question one of the sheepkin maids attending to ZZZ's needs couldn't help but ask. How could someone as unselfish and gentle as him become wanted...and an Overlord?

His response to the former question was "Why am I wanted, huuuh? It's my bad, really. The skill Dreamland got when it evooolved to seventh form had a bigger range than I thought and it kinda fried a city's infrastructure for a biiit...and it's like yeah, I can't blame them for blaming meee. Wanteeed."

While in response to the latter, he said, "Overlooord? Well, uh...I actually have a few buddies: Benetnasch, Dis, and Omega. Friendooos. They all had Superior Jobs, sooo...well, it's not like I was jealous or anything, but I got all sad 'cuz I felt like they were leaving me behiiind. I guess it's like 'Sorry ZZZ. This SJ stuff is just for three.' SJs are one each, though. Solooo. Anyway, that's why I went and took Overlord Acediaaa. It looked like it was gonna be easiest for me since I'm unbeatable when I sleeeeep. Star Mariooo. Here we gooo."

Basically, there was no strong reason or desire behind either of those things.

So the maid then asked, "Why do you want to sleep?"

It was a question referring to his usual nature...

"...'Cuz I can't."

...and it was met with a casual, but contradictory response.

"I can't sleep in real life 'cuz this here doesn't work riiight," he said, tapping his head with his finger. "That's why I just wanna sleeeep here. And if I'm dreaming, I don't even care if I'm lucid or having a nightmaaare. Sweet dreams."

His tone was indifferent, but a profound sorrow could be sensed behind his words. That was why the sheepkin understood that nothing would give him more joy than many hours of peaceful sleep.

Chapter Seven: A Battle He Can Lose

About ZZZ

Overlord Acedia, ZZZ had no real-life memories of the dreams he'd seen while asleep.

When he was little, he'd gotten into an accident which damaged his brain in a way that prevented him from falling asleep naturally no matter how long he closed his eyes or how unbearably fatigued he was. He could only achieve sleep when his brain was forcefully shut down using medication so strong it didn't even allow for dreams. If he had been born earlier and thus had lacked access to these treatments, he may have even languished and died shortly after the accident.

It was inevitable that a person like him would develop a desire to sleep and dream. This was one of the three core needs as a living being, after all, and it was not satisfied for him.

It was no surprise, then, that he would try out dive-type VRMMOs just so he could sleep in them.

However, many of those games outright denied him entry to their worlds. And it wasn't just those that functioned like a dream—games that sent signals to the five senses also didn't work properly with his damaged brain.

He'd almost given up on VRMMOs entirely, but took a chance one final time on Infinite Dendrogram. It could be said that he was drawn to it, just like many other players before and after him.

Ultimately, he was able to log into Dendro without any issue, and upon receiving a healthy avatar, he'd become able to sleep whenever he was within this world.

Thus, his greatest desire was fulfilled.

But that was exactly what caused a certain conflict.

Before hatching, Embryos analyzed their Masters' personalities and desires before assuming forms that were, to varying degrees, based on those things. In ZZZ's case, there was no doubt that both of these were related to sleep. However, he'd acquired everything he'd wanted the moment he first appeared in Infinite Dendrogram.

Thus, his Embryo developed powers based on him in a different way.

Perhaps if he specifically desired peaceful sleep, his Embryo wouldn't have turned out the way it did, instead developing abilities that made his sleep more comfortable.

However, ZZZ only wished for sleep itself. He was beyond caring whether it was peaceful or not—he'd only wished to fulfill the physiological need he'd always lacked as a living being. This lack of necessity and motivation to develop powers had produced an effect on his Embryo.

This phenomenon was uncommon, but not unheard of.

A particular singer who'd begun Infinite Dendrogram was troubled by things such as the gap between languages, her feelings not being understood properly, and her songs not reaching and resonating with the hearts of others.

However, Infinite Dendrogram featured flawless language translation.

That alone had solved her problems, and as a result, her Eden, instead of being born as an Embryo that closed the gap between words, became one that just closed gaps in general and let all things be conveyed—an Embryo that deleted resistances.

Dreamland was no different.

It wasn't merely an Embryo that put people to sleep. It had the power to protect its owner while he was sleeping. It had the power to keep people sleeping. It had the power to prevent reality from influencing a sleeping mind. It had the power to pull anyone it put to sleep into dreams separated from reality.

These were the abilities it had developed as the land of dreams.

Just like Eden, it may have diverged from what its Master intended, but he did not care. He was asleep and he was dreaming. That was enough for him, even if the dream was only an extension of this world's reality.

He never held on to any memories of his actual dreams, but the knowledge that he was dreaming—that was enough for him to be at peace.

His core desire wasn't to rest or laze about, but to just sleep at all.

It didn't matter if that sleep wasn't restful. And it didn't matter if someone was caught up in the dream and was exposed to a nightmare.

Thus, the name of his ultimate: “Nightmare Kingdom—Dreamland.”

◇◆◇

Whimsical Dreality, Dreamland, Interior

How much time had passed since Ray and Cardinal A had begun fighting?

Nightmare Kingdom—Dreamland was a skill that lasted half an hour, so it couldn’t have been that long, but this battle certainly wasn’t short either.

Despite that, Ray was holding his ground.

Cardinal A completely outclassed him in terms of stats. Ray was standing against something above even the Legendary Gigaknights he’d once fought, stripped of one of his MVP rewards and all of his armor.

Switching to Sorcerer had also made all his Paladin skills except for healing magic unusable, yet he kept on fighting. This was made possible by all his experience in fighting opponents who were clearly above him.

However, he was reaching the limits of that skill as well.

In spite of this being a dream, his breathing had become ragged as he got more and more out of breath. The fatigue was weighing him down, and he’d used up all his Counter Absorptions. He had no healing items here, so he had to cast healing magic—but his limited MP was about to run dry, as well.

Right now, Ray was focusing on evasion as he wielded the twin blades of Nemesis’s fourth form to take advantage of their compact size and ease of handling.

Despite that, he was now covered in wounds and his own blood.

“G h e...” Meanwhile, Cardinal A—the Thrall made of Mythical metal—showed no signs of fatigue. Its performance hadn’t dropped one bit since the moment Ray’s Shining Despair had made a hole in its left arm. The counterattacks Ray launched did nothing but leave a few scratches on its metallic surface.

The gap between them was plain to see. No matter how well Ray could fight against opponents that outclassed him, he had clearly reached the limits of that skill.

Normally, Ray and Nemesis could have turned even a situation as dire as this in their favor. However, the specific circumstances didn’t allow that.

This Dreamland was a special place in which Nemesis's counter-skills like Vengeance is Mine had no effect on Cardinal A. Ray was missing the very option that would allow him to win. There was no path that led to victory, yet defeat was unavoidable.

This was a battle that whittled away the heart.

There was something else that Nemesis had noticed, but chose not to mention. It pertained to Ray's movements as he held her.

Ray was doing an amazing job surviving against this powerful foe. He didn't break before the overwhelming difference in power and continued to fight and resist no matter how many gut-wrenching close calls he suffered.

Right now, Ray was standing his ground while giving one hundred percent.

But that was the thing—it was just one hundred percent and not more than that.

In many of his previous battles against overwhelming foes, Ray had exceeded his limits. If he'd done the same here, he might have taken less damage and inflicted more.

However, it was clear that he was in no state to do that.

One reason for that was that his senses were different because he was currently inside a dream—but there was another, far more important reason.

Nemesis had realized what this was. After all, this factor had been present even in the two Tournament battles they'd participated in that very day.

The thing those duels and this battle had in common was...

This is a battle he can afford to lose, Nemesis thought. Just as his defeat in The Tournaments did nothing but prevent him from proceeding, defeat at the hands of this Thrall would not mean much.

As a Master, Ray would simply be given the death penalty. This was not a grand tragedy where mortal tian lives were at stake—not one of the many deadly struggles he'd experienced starting with the battle against that Demi-Dragon Worm.

Thus, Ray wasn't able to channel his true power. He couldn't surpass his limits.

I see. Nemesis looked back at the past.

The majority of his many defeats happened in situations that weren't tragedies, just like this one. The battle against Marie, the countless duels, the first encounter with Tsukuyo...and today's Tournament.

He'd only lost battles he could lose.

Looking back, the Anniversary was no different. In his first battle against Jubei Kaga, Ray wasn't going all out. As someone who wished to face him in true mortal combat, she'd been disappointed in that and said...

"It did not draw out everything good about Ray Starling. Why? What am I lacking?"

Then, during their second battle, she'd threatened that if Ray lost, she would PK Alto over and over again. The battle thus had his friend's Dendro future at stake, allowing Ray to channel his real strength and come out victorious.

Ray was a person who could only exhibit his true power when faced with terrible consequences for losing that could not be undone. Jubei must've understood this as well.

I suppose there's no getting around that central fact, Nemesis thought. Ray was a person who got himself hurt to protect others. That was his nature. He'd surpassed his limits by suffering damage himself so he could keep someone else safe. However, it always came at the cost of saddling him with heartache and physical wounds, and as someone who deeply cared about Ray, Nemesis did not enjoy seeing this in the slightest.

Still, he was fully willing to give so much, and Nemesis knew well that if Ray had let those tragedies come to pass, it would hurt him even more deeply.

That was why, when faced with these dire situations, Nemesis had always supported him and chosen to fight alongside him.

But that was exactly why she now wondered...

Is there any reason to keep fighting a battle he can afford to lose? she thought. This was a situation in which a single direct hit would kill him. Ray himself did barely any damage to his opponent, and there was no telling how long the battle would last. Was there any point in Ray continuing to exert his heart and body here?

Nemesis was even beginning to believe the absurd notion that losing may have actually been the best course of action.

That was when...

"Hey..."

...as though someone had read Nemesis's mind...

“Wouldn’t it be better if you lost?”

Ray heard these words from somewhere behind him.

◇◆

A short while ago, Gerbera was watching Ray and Cardinal A’s battle. Other than that single beam attack which had damaged the left arm, it was completely one-sided.

There was no way Ray could win this. Even Gerbera could tell that it was turning into a war of attrition that Ray would ultimately lose.

What should I do? If he loses, I’m gonna be next, right...? she thought.

Gerbera was even more powerless against this monster than Ray. She didn’t have any of her weapons or even Alhazred here. All she could do was run, but she could tell that she wouldn’t get far.

I guess it dropped from up high thanks to a movement skill... If this whole space is an Embryo, then it’s gotta have a skill that lets it move around the stuff inside it. And, well, dreams let you go anywhere, don’t they?

Gerbera’s concern was not unfounded—Dreamland did indeed have a skill that let ZZZ control the positions of anything within it.

That was why she hadn’t tried running away. If she did and ended up too far away from Ray, it was likely that she would be deemed as easier prey. Cardinal A would probably then be moved next to her.

He’s trying his best, but it looks like he’ll lose at any moment. I don’t care if he loses, but if I lose, then it’s back to the gaol for me. No, really, what am I supposed to...?

Gerbera was at a loss when...

“Gerbera.”

“EEEEK?!”

...someone spoke from right next to her ear, causing her to jump and let out a strange noise. She turned to the source of the voice and saw a winged slime floating and flapping its wings.

“...Leader?” Upon recognizing his voice—and realizing that there simply weren’t any other slimes as strange as this—she spoke to it in a quiet voice so that Ray and Nemesis wouldn’t overhear.

“Yes. I finally found you,” responded Sechs—or a part of him anyway.

After getting confirmation it was him, Gerbera let out a sigh of relief. “I-I’m saved...”

“I see you had a hard time.”

“Oh, you wouldn’t believe it! I don’t have Alhazred, he touched my chest, I’ve got no gear, I could’ve died at any moment, he touched my chest... It was awful!”

Gerbera unrolled everything that’d happened since she came to the dream. Most of it was just complaining, but...

“No Alhazred? Oh, that must be because...”

...Sechs actually gave an explanation for one of the things she’d mentioned.

Dreamland was supposed to take in anything that had a mind—including Embryos. Why, then, was Alhazred not here? Sechs instantly realized the reason why and explained it to Gerbera, who understood it as well.

“Oh, I see... That doesn’t change the fact that I can’t do anything, though.”

“That is true. It will not be a problem, however. I now know where you are, so my main body is making its way to you. It will be here soon.”

Those words filled Gerbera with even more relief than before. Sechs’s entire body was a Superior Embryo that could transform into many other Embryos, no doubt giving him many means of destroying Mythical metal.

It might even be said that allowing Sechs into this dream could ultimately turn out to be the fatal mistake that would lead to Overlord Acedia’s defeat.

“Hurry up and come over here,” Gerbera said to Sechs, glancing over at Ray. He was still fighting Cardinal A. “I dunno how long he’ll hold it off...”

“Actually, it will be bad for us if he keeps fighting for much longer,” Sechs said.

“Huh?”

“I cannot defeat a Mythical metal Thrall without him realizing who I am. I do not know how much Shu told him about me, but it is possible that he will recognize me by my combat style.”

Ray had already seen Sechs use a sword-like Embryo that had possessed the Rumbling Treework skill. That Embryo was useless against Cardinal A, and the moment Sechs used any other, Ray would realize that he was a unique fighter who could wield multiple Embryos—which could only be

King of Crime, Sechs Würfel.

Thus, Sechs could not fight Cardinal A before Ray received the death penalty.

"Then just wait until he loses and get over here then," said Gerbera.

"Waiting is no good either. We cannot be certain how long April can protect our bodies. Your death would be a great loss to us, and if the Contract deems me deserving, Candy's death could lead to mine."

That meant that it was best if Ray received the death penalty before Sechs made it here and defeated Cardinal A.

"He's holding out pretty well, though..." Ray was enduring despite the odds being stacked against him. There was no telling how many more minutes he could keep going.

With that thought in Gerbera's mind ...

"That is why you should stab him in the back."

...Sechs made a suggestion as though it was nothing.

"Whoa whoa whoa, you know I can't do that right now. I don't have a bowgun or even a knife."

"I did not mean with weapons, but with words," Sechs said before whispering something into her ear.

Upon hearing what Sechs had to say, Gerbera nodded in understanding before calling out to Ray.

"Hey...wouldn't it be better if you lost?"

◇

Ray said nothing in response—he didn't even turn around.

He couldn't even turn around.

He was dedicating his entire body and soul to evading each and every one of Cardinal A's fatal attacks.

"Wh-What are you talking about...?!" That was why Nemesis replied in his stead. The perplexity in her voice must have been not only due to Gerbera's words, but also because they matched her own thoughts.

"I mean, it's bad for you if this drags on, isn't it?" Gerbera said. "Your gear and the horse are still outside, right? So...the longer you keep this up, the bigger the chances that your gear's gonna get broken."

"That's..." Gerbera was merely repeating what she'd heard from Sechs, but she herself did believe that this was the right idea. No one within the dream knew the situation outside. April had toughness that surpassed Mythical metal, so she was likely unharmed, but there was no telling what state everything else was in. It was entirely possible that Ray could be met with a miserable scenario in which Cardinal A defeated him despite his efforts, only for Ray's needless extension of the fight to have resulted in the destruction of his equipment and trusty steed.

According to Gerbera, Ray had nothing to gain and everything to lose in this fight, and Nemesis was on the verge of siding with her.

If he lost here, he would lose nothing but some random drops. The chances of him sacrificing his equipment or Silver in that scenario were significantly lower than if he kept on fighting—and the risk of losing something irreplaceable only grew as he persisted.

"That's why you'd be better off if you just took the death penalty." There was a hint of worry in Gerbera's voice as she said that. He may have been her sworn enemy's friend, as well as someone who'd inflicted lots of mental damage upon her since they'd met in this dream, but at the same time, she wouldn't be alive right now if it weren't for Ray valiantly keeping the Thrall busy.

That was why, while a part of her just wanted him to hurry up and get killed, she was also giving him this warning out of kindness.

"Ray..." There was no response from him. Nemesis was unable to find the right words to say, so she'd only called his name.

That was because Gerbera's words had actually convinced her.

This was a situation in which Ray could lose Silver, who was like another partner to him, and the possibility of him actually winning was absurdly low. Not even Nemesis could help him.

That was why even she began to believe that giving up was the correct course of action here.

That was when Ray...

"Nemesis."

...evaded an attack and called his partner's name...

"Why did we come here?"

...before posing a question.

"We..."

"Our last death was against Behemot. Even though we all cooperated, we couldn't carry the momentum until the end. Without Fuso, everything might've been over then and there."

While Nemesis didn't know what to say, Ray continued talking.

"Since then, we've tried to become stronger—and we did. But today, Lei-Lei completely crushed us. We couldn't do anything against her. And that's why we came here—to improve ourselves even a tiny bit."

"That is true." They'd traveled to this zone to gain more power. They'd come to the border because today's defeat had made them realize that they were lacking in strength. Their involvement in the clash between Sechs's group and ZZZ may have been random, but there was an overall motive to their presence here.

"This fight against ZZZ just sorta happened. We may have just gotten caught up in something by accident. Losing here may not mean losing anything of value. And fighting may lead to Silver getting damaged or even destroyed."

Ray agreed with everything Gerbera had said. He himself had already known all that. He was fully aware that losing was better than winning this time.

"Even so...I won't choose defeat."

Despite all that, he continued to fight.

"Ray..."

"I have no idea how we can win this. Our odds of winning are slim. Probably far, far less than one percent."

Ray steadfastly declared that he would continue to struggle in spite of everything.

"This isn't a battle I gotta win at all costs...but we'll soon encounter more like that. They're not even that far away. The fights we'll have to win are right around the corner."

Ray was speaking about the impending war against Dryfe—the war to end the conflict with the imperium he'd been involved in since his first day in Infinite Dendrogram. It was inevitable, and he fully grasped the fact that the decisive war was close at hand.

"That's why I won't choose defeat."

With a bloodied face and a strong will in his eyes, he continued to speak.

"If I looked at the pros and cons of each fight and began accepting 'reasonable' defeats in fights that I 'could' lose, I might start looking for reasons to lose the upcoming battles."

Ray knew that when a spirit broke just once, it would forever be covered in cracks that made it easy to break over and over again.

That was why he never chose to break on his own.

He'd lost many battles he could afford to lose.

However, he had never once chosen defeat. He'd merely done all he could and been defeated in spite of that.

"As long as the moment of defeat hasn't come, I won't stop trying to seize the possibility of victory."

And this time too, he exerted his freedom and chose to resist until the very end.

"Ray... Ah...!" That was when Nemesis noticed something.

Even while Ray was talking, Cardinal A had continued attacking him. Like the machine that it was, it continued wielding its full power against its opponent.

Despite that, it didn't interrupt Ray's words, and none of its attacks landed.

It was as though death was closing in on him from all sides, yet he was evading it all by a hair's breadth.

"This is..." Nemesis knew this state of his better than anyone else. She'd seen it in the many deadly struggles he'd endured. It was the strength beyond his limits—the power to forge on through the most dangerous circumstances.

It was on the verge of manifesting even in this battle that he could afford to lose.

"And we won't just fight...we'll win."

Even greater power surged through his eyes and each of his limbs.

"I'll surpass who I was... We will surpass who we were...and win!"

He evaded Cardinal A's right arm-blade and slashed it with his twin swords. It only made a scratch, but Ray was not deterred and continued fighting.

He evaded, attacked, evaded, attacked... The damage he dealt seemed insignificant, but this did not drive him to despair. He simply kept on taking these small steps toward victory. He wouldn't give up no matter how many millions of steps he had left.

"I don't care if we're up against an Overlord or Mythical metal...!" As he slashed at the Thrall, he let out a war cry. "We...we will grow stronger!" It was the roar of his heart—Ray's will at its purest.

Upon hearing his declaration, Gerbera slightly jumped and put her hand on her chest. As someone who'd once wished to be the strongest, she was affected by his words.

She'd wished to be the strongest, but when confronted with reality, she broke, gave in, and had begun to act as though she was the weakest of all just to avoid any more such heartbreak.

The reason she was morose all the time was because she knew that if she let herself be in high spirits once more, it would hurt even more when she was brought down again.

But even someone like her could not fail to be affected by what Ray said.

Upon hearing Ray's declaration, Sechs smiled. What he'd heard through his fragment made the main body—the head—grin in a way different than usual.

Just like Sechs's dear friend Shu, Ray had turned out to be a person who didn't compromise himself. If Ray had given up at Sechs's suggestion, Sechs wouldn't have spared a second thought for him.

But because Ray remained unbroken...he'd caught Sechs's interest as well.

Upon hearing Ray's declaration, Nemesis smiled as tears ran down her face. This wasn't visible in her weapon form, but she was berating herself for her awful misunderstanding.

She regretted that she had failed to understand this fundamental thing without hearing Ray say it himself.

She reflected upon it, reframed herself, and mentally drew herself up. There was no longer any hesitation in her, and there was no time to look back.

Nemesis once again had a grasp of Ray's desire and will.

That meant that there was only one thing left to do.

His words were "We will grow stronger."

Indeed—it hadn't been "I," but "we." If Ray would reach for victory while surpassing limits he didn't even know were there, then Nemesis also had to become stronger.

Thus, she sought more power, a higher evolution—and a new version of herself.

The XP and Resources that had accumulated deep within her, the combined will of her and her Master, were about to initiate ■■L—the special evolution system left only in Maidens and Apostles—when...

“...Do you seek power?”

...upon hearing Ray’s declaration, an axe posed that question.

Chapter Eight: Finest in the Right, Strongest in the Left

A long time ago...

In the distant past, before a certain world was even born, one of the previous observers—gods, or "Infinite Jobs," as they could be called—was faced with his creations and overcome by an inner conflict.

This entity called the BLACKSMITH was building the world alongside his colleagues.

Everyone in the group had assumed different roles in assembling this garden—this aggregation of information. One built the world's foundation. One gathered the monsters—including the "gulong" or "ancient dragons." One gathered countless physical materials. One wove the system of jobs. One created the young humanoids who would wield those jobs. One prepared the Archetype System—the control substitute. One set up the trial known as the GAME OVER.

Thus, the program known as "the world" was built by many hands, each responsible for a different aspect.

One of them, the BLACKSMITH, created only a single weapon.

It was a weapon meant only for a unique entity bearing a Special Superior Job—a weapon for acquiring this job and a weapon meant to be wielded by it.

It was the possibility that could strike down their trial—The DEMISE—and prevent the end of the world—the GAME OVER.

In short, one could call it the world's strongest weapon.

The BLACKSMITH's brethren entrusted him with the creation of this weapon, and employing all his creative and imaginative prowess, he began forging a masterpiece.

However, he soon found himself in an abyss of indecision.

He was meant to create only one masterpiece, yet in front of him, there were two.

All the skill he channeled into this work had led to him creating one weapon too many.

One was a carver of origins—a two-edged blade that transformed the natural shape of all it cut and sliced even through energy itself.

It was the strongest of swords, one that bore the law of absolute severance.

The other was a determiner of all ends—a killing blade, the antithesis of all and everything that heralded certain ruination.

It was the strongest of axes, one that bore the law of absolute annihilation.

A sword of "one." An axe of "all." Faced with these two mighty weapons, nearly finished, the BLACKSMITH found himself lost in thought.

Even with his authority and power, he could only complete one of them, and the weapon that would remain incomplete would not be able to exhibit even a tenth of its projected power. In his eyes, the weapon he did not choose would fall in status from a masterpiece to dross.

Thus, he pondered. He thought long and hard about which of the two he would leave behind.

And in the end, he forged the sword.

Granted the name of "Altar," the blade had appeared in the completed world many times alongside its Sacred Kings and Sacred Princesses. Even after the downfall of the immense pre-ancient civilization, it still found a wielder and returned to etch its name in history once more.

This weapon was the pride of the world—the strongest sword of legend and the symbol of an entire kingdom. It had become so adored that it was the subject of not just biographies, but children's tales as well.

The incomplete axe, on the other hand, was not even given a name. It found itself submerged beneath the tide of history.

It appeared here and there, but was never wielded by one person for long. Occasionally the axe was held by some of the strongest fighters of an era, but they all eventually succumbed to it.

It was a weapon that hurt whoever wielded it. It could rid them of their body parts and sometimes even strip them of their lives.

This foul association resulted in the axe being reviled as a cursed weapon.

History had seen a few Fallen Knights who had thought they could wield the axe without penalty, but its effects were no curse—merely a feature of the weapon—so they had lost their lives all the same.

Indeed, the damage done to the wielder was by design—and both the sword and the axe had actually been the same in this regard.

When used, the same power that flowed through their attacks also flowed through their wielders. That indeed made them seem like cursed weapons from RPGs—powerful items that could only be used at a steep cost.

Altar, the chosen blade, simply had this effect removed by the BLACKSMITH's final touch—the application of the mechanisms related to the Sacred King job. If the sword hadn't been chosen, it would've become a terrible blade that inflicted the wielder with wounds that never closed.

And because the BLACKSMITH could only finish one weapon, the unchosen axe became nothing but waste and refuse.

It would never be able to display its full potential, for using even 10% of its output was enough for it to blow away its wielder. It harmed all who swung it, making it impossible for it to show its true power.

The moment the sword was chosen over it, the axe's fate was sealed. It became a weapon that would never see the light of day.

The axe itself didn't think much of that fact. It didn't bear any envy toward or grudge against the blade Altar for being chosen, but it still possessed the instincts of a weapon.

It only wished to be wielded by those who sought power.

Though it may have been incomplete dross, it still endeavored to do what a weapon should do.

Thus, it granted power to all those who took it in hand. In exchange for that power, the axe took their limbs and perhaps even their bodies—and because of that, its entire existence was a series of curses it bestowed. The axe became the subject of its wielders' regret, suffering, and despair—and bathed in its victims' grudge and gore. Even those who initially seemed like they could master the weapon eventually died as they drew out more power than they could handle.

This cycle had been repeated countless times throughout its long history. The grudge of those that touched the axe had accumulated and engulfed it in the same manner as it had covered Tenchi's curseblades, and eventually it lost its original white color and became bloodred.

The axe remained the same even after the Incarnations became the managers of this world. Whether due to its lack of name or some other reason, it had not become a UBM. It was still just a weapon that no one could use in any meaningful way.

However, there was a time when things were different.

King of Kings himself had acquired the axe in the wars and took it in hand.

Fearsome as the weapon may have been, he was actually able to use it. He took the damage it inflicted, endured it, and thus wielded the axe's power.

During that time, the axe saw use as the weapon it was born to be—it had fulfilled the purpose of its being.

However, during one battle, the axe lost a piece of itself. Upon seeing this, King of Kings said, "I will not be using this axe again," and stored it away in a vault beneath his capital.

After King of Kings' "disappearance,"' the city in which the vault resided had changed hands many times, but the axe was the only thing in it that had remained untouched. Or, to be more precise, anyone who did touch it had died.

However, shortly after The Evil took over the city, one of The Evil's dependents took up the axe. The dependent couldn't wield it as well as King of Kings, but it possessed enough regeneration to make up for the damage the axe inflicted. It also covered the axe in a cursed cloth that gave more direction to the weapon's power, making it easier for the dependent to wield. It channeled great amounts of the axe's potential and struck fear into the hearts of many people, increasing the grudge upon the axe even further.

However, this wielder eventually vanished as well. During the final battle between the Sacred King and The Evil, the axe finally faced Altar—now bearing the subtitle of "Primeval Blade"—and was defeated alongside the dependent that wielded it.

That was the last battle the axe had seen.

By the end of it, the grudge accumulated within the axe had surpassed its limit, covering it in layer upon layer of blackish-red rust.

After that, it was moved to the birthplace of the Sacred King's wife—Over Gladiator, Freymel Gideon. Her home had a vault specifically designed for cursed items, and that was where the axe was stored away.

Since then, many clergymen ranging from mere priests to Hierophants and High Priestesses had tried to uncurse it, but all of them had failed. The axe had remained in the vault until modern times.

During the centuries since, certain information regarding The Evil had purposefully been wiped out, stripping the axe even of its history and reducing it to nothing but a cursed object. This axe which had existed since the beginning of the world could very well have remained dormant in that vault's inventory until the end of time, its history forgotten, no different from any other weapon abandoned there.

...But then Ray Starling took it out.

◇◆◇

Sorcerer, Ray Starling

"...Do you seek power?" The voice didn't come as a sound—it rang out directly in my head.

At the same time, an insane amount of info flowed into my mind.

I was shown the memory of the axe I'd seen this morning, followed by a bunch of stuff that had happened since that point.

I saw the axe spend countless years hurting the many people who tried to wield it.

I saw people take it up as a weapon, then discard it.

I saw it handled by some monstrous creature who wrapped it in the black cloth I now recognized.

And I saw it defeated by someone wielding Altar—Azurite's ancestor.

And finally, I saw my own face, along with the Thrall right in front of me.

"This is...ah! Shit...!" All the info I'd just been bombarded with threw me off and made me stop dead in my tracks for a moment.

I was barely dodging the Thrall's attacks to begin with. There was no way I could dodge the next one now.

"Hm...?"

But contrary to what I expected, the attack didn't hit me.

Actually, the Thrall wasn't moving at all anymore. It had stopped in place while holding up its left blade, ready to swing.

It wasn’t just the Thrall either. Nemesis, Gerbera, my own body...everything besides my thoughts had been rendered immobile. The world itself had also become monochrome, as though stripped of all color.

Only I was different. I looked down and saw my own semitransparent form. It was like I was having an out-of-body experience.

“What...what’s going on here?” Did Overlord Acedia use some skill? He would have no reason to keep my mind free, though.

Then, this has gotta be...

“Indeed. This is a high-speed exchange of information betwixt you and I alone.”

The voice from before...the axe explained the situation directly to my mind, like Nemesis with her telepathy.

I couldn’t see it anywhere, though.

“An info exchange...? Was that show from a moment ago part of that too?”

“Indeed. I have conveyed to you the information I possess in a manner you could tolerate.”

It was a high-speed digest that wasn’t even voiced—it was all just some clips and images. I didn’t even know who most of the people were. I only recognized Azurite’s ancestor because I’d seen portraits of him, and I obviously knew it was my face at the end there.

Still, that was enough for me to understand what this axe had gone through—what kind of existence it led simply because it was incomplete.

“Now that you understand, I shall repeat the question: do you seek power?” the axe asked me again. “Wielding my power shall bring you harm. It is double-edged in the purest sense—what power is wielded will be returned to its wielder.”

“You...” The axe had told me how it worked pretty clearly. This mechanism had made it hated, yet it remained unbent and unbroken, refusing to change its nature in the slightest.

...This thing’s honest to a fault, huh? I sincerely thought.

“Can I ask something first?”

“I shall permit it.”

“Why did you ask me that here and now?” I mean, you never said anything when I first picked you up or when I fought Lei-Lei, I added silently.

“There are two reasons. First is the peculiarity of this space.”

“The Dreamland?”

“If your perceptions are correct, then this space welcomes only those that possess a mind of their own. Neither the cloth that binds me nor the mire of grudge that has engulfed me have joined us here. This allows me to act on my own will.”

So this thing was silent in reality because of the cloth and the insane amount of grudge, huh? And it must have really been free to do whatever in dreams, because this actually wasn’t the first time it had tried to communicate with me—I realized our first exchange had actually been the dream from this morning.

“The second reason is you.”

“Me?” After a pause that made it seem like it had nodded, the axe continued.

“You wielded me once and had your body broken. You saw the dream and came to know my origin. You suffered defeat, and I brought it upon you. In spite of all that, you have not discarded me. I have brought you harm, yet you continue to seek my power. Such wielders are few and far between. In my entire history, I have witnessed only three.”

I figured the axe was talking about the king-like man, the monstrous creature, and me.

“Thus, I give you this question once more: will you seek my power, though it may shatter your body?”

In response...

“And how much power can I get if I let it do that?”

...I asked a question that hinged on a certain decision.

The axe fell silent for a moment.

“Within the memories I received from you, there are words which echo my answer,” it said before continuing with “Enough power that we might defeat this Thrall.”

He must have been talking about the words used by Nemesis.

“Perfect.”

That was why I replied to it the same way I’d replied to her.

I sought power and accepted its nature—that was why that single word was enough of an answer. I chose to wield the axe—to shoulder it, risks and all.

I’d actually been considering using it against the Thrall right from the first. It could have literally cost me an arm and a leg, though, and I didn’t know if it would be strong enough to break Mythical metal anyway.

But now that I knew for sure that victory was within our grasp, I decided I would just gamble on it.

“I still haven’t thought of a name for you, though,” I said. “You okay with that?” I’d promised I’d name it just this morning, but I didn’t have one yet.

“Wait until the moment my true self is unleashed, and you have become my wielder in truth...”

“All right. I’ll think of a good one, then.”

“I shall anticipate it.”

Then, the monochrome world regained its color, and the moment it began to move again, the Thrall swung its blade down toward me.

◇◆◇

Whimsical Dreality, Dreamland, Interior

Everyone who saw the scarlet blade fall upon Ray was convinced that he’d died.

Ray had stopped moving. He couldn’t possibly evade the strike. The death he’d been narrowly avoiding for so long had finally caught up with him. Gerbera, Sechs, Cardinal A, and even Nemesis knew for certain that the attack had struck home. After all—Cardinal A’s arm had already been swung down. The searing blade of Mythical metal had sunk deep into the Dreamland’s road like it was no more substantial than cake.

Ray was right where it had passed through, and he was certainly split in two now. The bisected pieces of his body were just about to slide apart and collapse pitifully onto the ground.

That was what everyone thought, at least.

“He...EEP!” A moment after that, Gerbera let out a charming yelp and jumped backward. That was because something had flown toward her so fast it had startled her. “Wh-What...huh?” Still shaken, she looked at what it was.

It was a broken blade.

The searing-hot Mythical metal had been snapped like a cheap box cutter.

"...G h e?" Cardinal A itself finally noticed that something wasn't right. It looked at its left blade—this part of itself—and realized that it was half gone.

The lower half had sunk into the road beneath, but the upper half that was supposed to have sliced its target in half had been sliced instead.

"The right will not withstand beyond one more."

"Got it."

And so, the unsevered enemy moved for another attack. Though shocked, Cardinal A rushed to protect its head using what remained of its left arm. Its defense power was the same across its whole body, and normally it never had to protect its weak points. In fact, it had never encountered any scenario in which it would have been easily broken.

However, its animalistic instincts, artificial though they may have been, had driven it to shield itself against the enemy's attack.

A moment later, with an ear-splitting crack, what remained of Cardinal A's left arm shattered.

It was as though the Mythical metal comprising it was little more than a block of ice.

Cardinal A was overcome by confusion, but the same could be said about Nemesis—the weapon in its enemy's left hand.

"R-Ray...! Your right arm...!"

Nemesis noticed that Ray's right arm had shattered from within. Its bones were pulverized, its blood vessels had exploded, its muscles were torn, and its nerves were sending nonstop signals to the rest of his body saying that something was very wrong.

Right now, Ray's right arm was little more than a bag of blood in the vague shape of an arm.

Despite that, it was still grasping a weapon he'd taken out using Instant Equip.

It was a pure-white axe.

"...This isn't as bad as it was outside. I swung you twice, but my arm's still there."

"Indeed," said the axe. "I am currently able to control myself, and thus I am only manifesting enough power to destroy Mythical metal. In the waking world, on the other hand, I am optimized for the hand of my previous wielder. My Blade-Select is limited to damage that is physical and aligned to the element of dark, and the power I possess is considerably higher. The price you shall pay to wield me there will obviously be far greater."

In this dream, the pale weapon was stripped of both the deep grudge upon it and the curse-cloth it was wrapped in. But although a single swing of the axe as it was here wasn't enough to destroy Ray's arm, it had already pulverized it enough that it barely counted as a functional limb. The damage upon it was too severe to be undone by anything but jobs from the priest grouping and similar individuals.

A tian warrior would have already been incapacitated, and no one would fault him for reviling the weapon that had caused such great harm to him.

Ray, however, continued to hold the axe with a smile on his face.

Though his body was shattered, he kept on looking ahead, just as he had in his battle against an apex.

"R-Ray...is this...the axe?" asked Nemesis.

"Yeah. I'm switching hands. Hold on so you don't fall."

"...Very well!" Nemesis replied as Ray took her in his right hand and the axe in the left.

She then slightly changed her form so that she was affixed to the damaged arm.

"Anyway, it's now possible for us to beat the Thrall, but my left arm can only swing you twice, huh?" Ray didn't let the axe's power go to his head, nor was he bothered by the state of his right arm—he was completely focused on how he could win.

In isolation, the self-inflicted damage let him swing the axe twice, but he also had Bleeding and other injury-based debuffs that were gradually draining his HP, so it was within the realm of possibility that he would die before he could use those two swings.

Cardinal A, however, still had its right arm and tail.

If it chose to go on the defensive again, it could force Ray to use up both of his swings. Also, it hadn't been evading any of Ray's attacks because it simply didn't need to—but now that it had seen the axe's power, it was likely to take more evasive action.

The axe would damage Ray even if he missed. Trying to destroy a critical part with just the two swings he had left to him was a gamble.

"...G h e." Cardinal A also took a moment to consider its enemy. The Master before him had suddenly found enough power to actually cause it some harm, but it could instantly tell that this power was a double-edged sword—or in this case, an axe.

If Cardinal A chose to run, Ray would likely succumb to the continuous damage from Bleeding and similar debuffs. On the other hand, hitting him just once would end the battle then and there.

The Thrall also remembered the Shining Despair skill that Ray had used at the start of the battle.

The laser and the axe—this enemy had already played two powerful aces up his sleeve.

If Cardinal A focused on running away, it was possible that its opponent would play another one—and for all it knew, it could be something that targeted its creator instead of itself.

It had to prevent that at all costs, so it chose to go on the offensive, flinging out its long tail in a swipe that doubled as a defensive maneuver.

"...By the way, axe."

"What is it?"

"You mentioned something about optimization and being limited to physical and dark damage, didn't you? You're able to..."

Both sides of this battle now possessed a means of destroying one another—and right as they were on the verge of starting the proper fight, Ray posed a third question to the axe.

"...Right?"

"Indeed. Thus my law: 'absolute annihilation.'"

"Okay. In that case..."

Just as the axe's response caused Ray to think of something, Cardinal A made its move.

It used its extended tail-blade to try and decapitate Ray. If this attack killed him, that would be the best outcome for the Thrall. If it forced him to use his self-damaging axe, that would be second best. And if it made Ray evade and break his stance, that was perfectly fine too.

No matter Ray's response, the attack would make the situation better for Cardinal A.

"That means we can do this," Ray said, using the axe to cut off the tail-blade—the second-best scenario for the Thrall.

"Ghe...!" Cardinal A did not miss the opportunity and quickly closed the distance between them. It charged with its right blade forward—if Ray intercepted it with the axe, he would become incapacitated, opening him for a swift death by the Thrall's blade slicing through his head.

But then, Cardinal A suddenly stopped and jumped backward—driven once again by instinct.

The Thrall stopped when it suddenly felt as though it was making a fatal mistake.

The blade of the pale axe had just passed through where Cardinal A's right arm was.

One for the tail, one for this missed attack. That was supposed to deplete the two times Ray could swing the axe with his left arm...but it hadn't.

"Yeah. Looks like we can do this."

Ray's left arm was still completely unharmed. It wasn't bleeding, and it hadn't shattered.

The only change was that it was entirely covered by a black cloth.

"...Ghe?" Cardinal A could not understand. Was the self-damage not a feature of the axe?

But then, it noticed something else.

The cross section of its freshly severed tail was red-hot.

It was as though it had been hit by the laser from early in the battle. While its left arm had been shattered, this new injury was the result of unbearably high heat.

"Blade-Select: Light," said the pure-white axe. The weapon responsible for this too. Though it was still pallid, its color was somewhat different than before. Its blade was shining white as though it was under the effect of a Swordmaster's Laser Blade skill.

"It worked..."

Blade-Select.

This was the power that put the axe on the same level as Altar, giving it the potential to be a true masterpiece.

Altar was a weapon of "absolute severance," which let it cut through all and any existence and energy.

The axe, on the other hand, possessed the law of "absolute annihilation."

It annihilated anything it hit using energy that was directly opposed to it.

The axe was a counter-weapon against all phenomena, capable of using all elements and attributes—including those unknown to tians and Masters. Even if it didn't employ an opposing element, it could destroy things with the sheer amount of pure energy it delivered.

The power of burning, scorching, evaporating light was no exception, though using it would deliver the same evaporating light upon the wielder, as well.

The self-damaging power of the axe was inescapable. No wielder of this weapon was capable of avoiding this.

However, they could withstand it.

"...Look how it all slots into place," Ray said, looking down at his left arm.

The dark cloth enveloping it was the Black Warcoat, Monochrome—the MVP reward that absorbed all light.

The two swings of the axe had indeed delivered a blast of damaging energy to the arm that held it, but Monochrome had taken and absorbed it all.

Additionally, the Miasmaflame Bracer on the left hand was the one that fired Purgatorial Flames, giving it a naturally high fire resistance. Combined, these two MVP rewards had effectively neutralized both the light as well as the residual heat that followed it.

This meant as long as the axe was light-aspected, Ray could use it with almost no drawback.

"Now I can fight without caring about the backlash."

And because of this, Ray and Cardinal A had become more or less even.

Both had attacks that could end the other, and victory would go to the one who delivered the killing strike first.

"...The situation has turned so quickly that I am unable to keep up," said Nemesis, unsure how to feel about the speedy and immense—but certainly positive—change the axe had brought. She had only been able to scratch the Mythical metal, but the axe was destroying it with little effort.

She was starting to feel as though it had taken over her position as Ray's weapon.

"I did expect to eventually be joined by a weapon that surpasses me in attack power, but this is nonetheless somewhat difficult to take in," Nemesis said.

"I was designed to be unmatched," the axe said. "It is an inevitability that the power of a novice weapon would be less than mine."

"Who are you calling a novice?! You are the pale newcomer here! Are you picking a fight?!"

"You are a novice. It is simply true. And only a contest between equals can truly be called a 'fight.' That does not apply to us. Please explain to me what you mean, umbral novice."

"Why, you little...!"

Caught between the two, Ray put on a wry smile and said, "...Could you two cut it out?"

It also reminded him of something and made him think, Is this how she is with anything white?

"B-But, Ray! You're only using that axe now! And I feel that it is the reason I failed to evolve!"

"Don't worry." As her Master, Ray also felt that a power had been budding within her, only to go dormant again.

However, that was not a problem. They'd already seized the possibilities.

"We already know how to win this, and we see our new possibilities, don't we?" Ray said. "Isn't that enough?"

All they had to do here was use the cards they had to approach victory.

"But...well...the axe is so immensely strong that... My role..."

Ray laughed at this.

"Stop that!"

"Laughable," commented the axe.

"You be silent too!" Ridiculed by both Ray and the axe, Nemesis was starting to get a bit upset, but...

"That's not really something you'll ever have to worry about, though."

"Huh?"

"I mean, even if this axe here is my strongest weapon, of all the things I can wield..." Ray said with a grin, "Nemesis is the best, right?"

Ray repeated a familiar phrase—from the heart this time.

"...Yes!" she replied joyfully.

The axe said nothing, only watching the exchange between the longtime wielder and weapon.

It found their bond enviable, and it hoped to experience that someday.

"Aaanyway..." Done talking, Ray faced Cardinal A once more.

After the axe had begun to shine and stripped it of its tail, the Thrall had also drawn back to analyze the situation. It was done with that, however. It seemed to have found a means to defeat Ray, and had rushed forward to face him fully prepared.

But Ray was ready for it as well.

“All right...let’s win this!”

“Certainly!”

“Indeed.”

In Ray’s left hand, clad in light-eating black cloth, there was a pure-white axe that brought annihilation by burning light.

In his right, bloodied and bruised, there was a jet-black greatsword he trusted more than anything else.

His hands, covered by demonic bracers, held both the strongest and the best weapons he could wield.

And so, Ray charged at Cardinal A one last time.

Chapter Nine: The Dream’s End

Whimsical Dreality, Dreamland, Interior

Whimsical Dreality, Dreamland—the Superior Embryo belonging to ZZZ.

Its ultimate skill, Nightmare Kingdom—Dreamland, was an ability that switched the dreams and reality of its Master and any servants he included in the effect.

ZZZ had no knowledge of real dreams. Instead, he thought of them as nothing but an extension of reality. This aspect of him gave rise to an ultimate skill that placed the real body—the player’s HP—into the dream.

Anyone harmed in a dream could not be harmed in reality. Conversely—and through the same principles—the real body of anyone under the effect of this skill was immune to damage.

Though there was an SP limit tied to the number of, as well as additional costs for, extending the skill’s duration, those affected by this skill were invincible in reality. While they were within the dream, they would remain unharmed no matter what happened to their real bodies.

This was what was happening to Cardinal A—the servant of ZZZ now fighting as though it were nothing but its master’s limbs.

Its real body couldn’t be harmed even after April reduced its toughness to absurdly low levels. And as long as Cardinal A’s real body was in the dream, it would remain its guardian—its existence prevented the Thralls imbued with Dreamland from being exterminated, thus making it impossible for those sleeping to wake up.

On the other hand, even if someone within the dream fought with Cardinal A, that would do nothing to deal with the Thralls in reality, which would inevitably lead to their real bodies being destroyed by the Thralls. Someone trapped in the dream would have to somehow destroy all the Thralls in reality except Cardinal A, and then defeat Cardinal A inside the dream—which was simply impossible if they couldn’t somehow fight in both the dream and the real world simultaneously.

This was the primary reason that Overlord Acedia, ZZZ remained undefeated.

But now that April had exterminated the Thralls in reality, all of this would fall apart the moment Cardinal A was destroyed in the dream.

And as it happened, there was now someone in the Dreamland who was capable of doing just that.

◇◆

The deadly battle between Ray and Cardinal A had now become extremely taxing to both sides.

Ray’s right arm was still bleeding, and even more blood gushed out from countless wounds all over his body every time he swung his blades.

On the other hand, Cardinal A’s Mythical metal body was being carved open every time the axe of searing light struck it, molten metal flowing out as though it were the creature’s blood.

Silently, Sechs watched them fight.

He knew the background of this battle better than anyone else here. From the designs of the white axe, Sechs realized that it had a connection to the celebrated blade of Altar, while his observations of Overlord Acedia’s skill suggested to him that the job was related to The Evil.

He knew this because he had witnessed the powers of The Evil himself—namely, her ability to make monsters out of trees and stones—and felt that Overlord Acedia’s Thralls were far too similar to be a coincidence.

That, combined with his experience with the power of the Overlord Gula, whom he’d fought before—the ability to absorb the Resources of the dead—Sechs guessed that each one of the seven jobs in the Overlord series specialized in one aspect of the skills and traits belonging to The Evil. He figured that they were prototypes for The Evil, or perhaps the other way around.

With that in mind, this fight could be looked at as a clash between lesser versions of Sacred King and The Evil—a strange reflection of the battle that had been waged a few centuries ago.

Ray and ZZZ themselves were completely ignorant of this, but as an onlooker, Sechs saw all of this very clearly. Neither the Sacred King nor The Evil were that important to him, but he thought that there was value in gathering information about them for later.

Even if there wasn't, he was beginning to develop an interest in Ray himself.

Thus, he continued to watch them from the sidelines.

This battle wasn't the only thing Sechs was observing. He also had a full grasp of everything his head saw as Candy carried it, as well as whatever was around all of the tinier slimes he had split into.

He was processing so much visual information it would overwhelm any normal human.

Sechs was a slime and thus did not really have anything that could strictly be called a brain—but on the other hand, it could be said that his entire body constituted a brain.

Whether it was the years he'd spent inside Infinite Dendrogram or just a natural talent, over time Sechs's mental faculties had diverged more and more from what was strictly "human."

"...There you are." And at that moment, one of his many visual points discovered something.

It was Overlord Acedia, ZZZ himself—the Master was inside his own Dreamland with them.

"I presumed you must be here somewhere," Sechs mused. He had guessed that ZZZ would be inside his own dream—this would be the easiest way for him to explain his skill and use it within Dreamland.

And now, with his body dispersed across Dreamland, Sechs had finally found the Overlord that controlled it.

Currently, ZZZ was using the cloud-screens he'd been seen with earlier to watch the battle between Ray and Cardinal A. With all his attention on those screens, Sechs could easily kill him.

ZZZ was wearing a tapir costume, but it wasn't clear if it offered him any protection, for nothing without a mind actually existed in Dreamland. But even if it did have a mind somehow and functioned as equipment inside the dream, Sechs would certainly be able to deliver a powerful enough attack to break through that. Catching ZZZ off guard and killing him was child's play for Sechs.

However...I will wait a bit.

Despite that, Sechs chose not to assassinate ZZZ yet. That was because he had developed an interest in Ray and wanted to observe Ray's battle a bit longer.

Sechs decided to postpone ZZZ's death until that fight was concluded. Perhaps this was not the most rational choice—but if Sechs was a rational man, he wouldn't have become King of Crime, nor would he have been sent to the gaol.

Sechs Würfel was someone who followed his heart—or searched for its desire—and this decision was simply the result of doing just that.

But...this is... After making his decision to keep watching, Sechs actually noticed that the battle had changed somewhat.

Ray was fighting just as he had been before. He used his instincts to evade his enemy's attacks and fight back with the shining axe.

What had changed was Cardinal A's movements. It was acting more and more meek—less aggressive. Despite being a temporary form of life similar to a golem, Cardinal A had become hesitant to attack—almost as though it was afraid of dying. At first it seemed as though the overpowering axe had somehow struck fear into its heart, but...

I see. This is certainly the most efficient way to fight.

Sechs had noticed what Cardinal A was doing and realized that this was something Ray couldn't counter.

Ray, in Sechs's estimation, would almost certainly lose.

"Hey, leader," Gerbera whispered to the piece of Sechs that was currently observing the battle.

"What is it?"

"I'm just guessing here, but..." Gerbera spoke hesitantly and with little confidence, as if she was afraid that she'd guessed wrong. "Isn't that thing just...buying time?"

Sechs said nothing in response at first. He didn't show it, but he was actually impressed by what she'd said. It showed that she'd gotten to the point where she was observant enough to notice such things on her own.

"Buying time for what, do you think?" he asked.

"He's fighting that thing because dying in the dream would give him the death penalty, but..." she said as she looked at Ray, still giving it his all, as she thought about what she'd realized—the reason why Ray was actually powerless against Cardinal A's strategy. "That's not the only way to get the death penalty here, right?"

◇◆◇

The Southernmost Edge of Altar, A Mountain Forest Near the Border

April instantly noticed the change in Cardinal A's movements.

This was in addition to the many changes in its shape that had happened already.

Its left arm-blade was first broken, then completely shattered, and then the same happened to the tail-blade.

April's attacks did nothing to it, but it was now breaking apart by itself.

This damage was the result of the destruction it had suffered in the dream, but it was accompanied by a change in its actions—more than the effect that the loss of limbs had on its movement.

Though it was still facing April, its focus seemed to be elsewhere.

Thralls had no need for eyes or anything of the sort to begin with. The poorly made mithril Thralls could sense their enemies despite not having any faces, and Cardinal A was no different in that regard—it could focus on something without even looking at it.

As a battle-hardened, combat-focused Prism Person, April noticed detail and waited to see what it would do next.

Was it targeting Sechs? Gerbera? Candy? April herself? She prepared to counter whatever was coming no matter what the creature attacked.

"G h e..." And so, Cardinal A took to action and fired its head-blade at the speed of sound to sever Silver's legs.

The two Prism creations were overcome by surprise. The crimson blade that Cardinal A had fired was a kind of hidden weapon it had, and it truly fulfilled its purpose as a surprise attack.

Both April and Silver had been on guard, but there were no lumps of mithril that the creature could have used for the same kind of explosive ranged attack they already knew how to deal with, and Silver was outside its melee range, so they were both unable to counter this new assault.

On top of that, since Ray had suffered heavy damage in the dream just like Cardinal A, that made it even more difficult for Silver to take any intense evasive action.

And thus, the Mythical metal blade that flew toward Silver severed both of his left legs. Silver couldn't actually fly, strictly speaking—he merely made platforms in the air that he galloped on like an ordinary horse would on land. Losing his legs on one side made it impossible for him to remain in the air, causing him to lose his balance and fall.

Despite that, he used Wind Hoof to create an air barrier to cushion the fall and minimize the damage on Ray. Thanks to that, Ray's HP didn't drop to 0 and his death penalty was prevented.

However, the loss of his legs had rendered Silver unable to move anymore—which of course made Ray an easy target as well.

"Ghegheghe..." Cardinal A charged toward them. It was obvious by now that its target had already changed. Before, it had been targeting Sechs—the most powerful one here—and April—who was protecting him—but now, it was completely focused on Silver.

Or, to be more precise, Ray's unconscious body which was still clinging to Silver.

That was the realization that both Sechs and Gerbera had come to—the Thrall was now basically treating Ray as he'd been treating Sechs earlier.

Its usual strategy against strong opponents was focused on killing their helpless bodies. Once Ray received an overwhelming power, Cardinal A had given up on defeating him in the dream. The Thrall was still invincible in reality, so now that it had recognized him as the true threat, it had decided to kill Ray's unconscious body there. For the Thrall, the battle in the dream had now been reduced to nothing but a way to buy time—and it was almost done now. Cardinal A's surprise attack had stripped Silver and Ray of any mobility, making it impossible for them to escape.

April's eyes widened as she considered the situation.

Back in pre-ancient times, her role was the protection of VIPs, so having to choose what to prioritize was an everyday thing for her. Her processors quickly analyzed the situation and came upon two possible actions: assisting her brother and his owner, and protecting her own owners.

Cardinal A was currently focused on Ray, but it actually didn't have to do that. There was plenty of distance between Sechs's group and Ray, so if April went to protect Silver and his owner, Cardinal A would no doubt go after Sechs instead.

Either way, the Thrall got what it wanted.

It would gladly kill its dreamscape opponent, and it had nothing against killing the other enemies while Ray was being protected. Regardless of whether April helped Ray or not, Cardinal A would be able to kill one of its owner's enemies.

April ran her calculations, taking into consideration every aspect of the situation, and concluded that someone would die here. She had no choice but to protect her owners.

Ray's group was cornered—they already had no chance of winning.

◇◆◇

Suddenly, Ray felt something strange on his right shoulder.

He was still evading Cardinal A's attacks, but for some reason, he felt as if he'd just been hit by something blunt.

"Oh...I get it now." Ray instantly realized that he was feeling damage his body had received in reality. He'd already noticed the change in Cardinal A's actions and didn't need much time to figure out that it had begun trying its hardest to kill him outside the dream.

That didn't change what Ray planned to do, though.

He couldn't wake up until Cardinal A was defeated, so his only option was to give his all to the fight that lay before him. He had to set aside the fear of being killed in a world he couldn't see and fight in the world he could.

"RRRAAARRGHHH!" He roared and swung the shining axe as he closed the distance between him and Cardinal A. The creature moved to defend itself as though it were frightened by the attack.

The force of Ray's swing with his left pulled him forward, so Nemesis supported him in his right hand to help him maintain balance. He managed to charge at Cardinal A without losing his footing, keeping Cardinal A close even as it tried to retreat to buy time.

"...G h e." Ray's unyielding, unbreakable charge filled the Thrall with panic.

However, the battle was as good as over. Cardinal A had already stripped Silver of any mobility, and it would kill Ray in less than a minute. That meant all it had to do was hold Ray off for that long.

"G h e...!" In order to do that, Cardinal A employed the same secret weapon that had severed Silver's legs—the fireable head-blade.

The blade flew toward Ray as he tried to charge at it yet again. The surprise attack could surely have been fatal, but Ray's instincts allowed him to evade it, however barely.

Still, it made him lose his footing.

Ray's eyes widened as he raised the axe in his left hand, bracing for Cardinal A's follow-up attack.

However, it never came.

In fact, the Thrall had put even more distance between them—it had actually turned away and was now running away from him.

Using all the AGI it had, it was speeding off on the dream-road toward the horizon like a startled rabbit.

In its mind, it would've been great if the surprise attack had actually hit—but even now that it hadn't, it could use the distraction the attack had caused to run away.

That had been the actual purpose of the attack.

Even if Ray lost his balance, as long as he had the axe, there was still a chance that he would retaliate. But if it just ran away from him as it was doing now, the speed difference between them would make it impossible for Ray to catch up. Even if he used the same laser attack he had earlier, the Thrall could avoid it by just looking in the direction of the cannon.

Cardinal A had considered what was most likely to result in a victory and had chosen to buy time by running away. It was the kind of utilitarian conclusion that truly arose from a mind that was both living and inorganic—the mind of a Thrall.

Alas, it was a critical mistake.

"Nemesis, stop it halfway."

"Form Shift—Shooting Wheel." Nemesis responded to Ray's words in an instant. Fixed to Ray's right hand, she changed into her third form β—the Shooting Wheel.

At the same time, she sped up and began to spin.

It seemed like a meaningless action. The Shooting Wheel was a form focused on the ranged, homing counterattack called Payback Beyond the Stars. However, because of some trait of the Thrall or Dreamland itself, Cardinal A couldn't add to Ray's damage counter and thus couldn't become the target of the skill. Because of this, Ray's counterattack skills didn't work against Cardinal A.

However, this Shooting Wheel seemed different.

Normally, the transformation from The Black Shield to the Shooting Wheel made the shield bloom like a flower or a star before taking on a shape similar to a windmill. But now, although its handle had grown, the Black Shield wasn't open.

It looked as if it had failed to transform.

Ray then fixed his eyes on the enemy in the distance and touched the dream-road with the semi-transformed Shooting Wheel.

The next moment, Ray disappeared.

"...Huh?"

"Heh heh..." Gerbera lost sight of him, but Sechs had seen everything, so he chuckled.

"G h e?"

Cardinal A suddenly heard something behind it, and its eyes met Ray's, who was quickly approaching it.

"G h e...?!"

The Thrall was overcome by shock. It had been certain that this opponent had no means to move that fast.

Its surprise only grew when it looked at down at Ray's feet.

He was riding the Shooting Wheel.

The tip of the Shooting Wheel—the shield that was supposed to open up—was still closed and spinning at an immense speed.

Obviously, it couldn't fire the shooting star in this state. But even though it was closed, it could still do the preparatory action for Payback—the spinning windup.

That turned the sixty second-long spin into a wheel and closed the distance between the two of them like an electric unicycle.

Effectively, it was now a vehicle that could deliver Ray right to Cardinal A at an incredible velocity.

"The fact that you can even think of such acrobatics is certainly something," Nemesis said.

"I just looked at things from another perspective. There was one other thing that inspired it, though."

The reason Ray could think of something like this on the spot was actually his first battle in that day's Tournament.

Lang had a motorcycle-like Embryo that he'd used for high-speed stunts. That battle had put the idea of "fast, acrobatic movement on wheels" into the back of Ray's mind—and in this battle, right when it counted, that thought came to the forefront and resulted in the ludicrous idea of "high-speed movement using the skill prep-stage Shooting Wheel."

"You are a reckless sort," said the axe.

"Well, this is simply how he is," Nemesis replied. This really was an extremely dangerous thing to do, though. Ray's right arm was already badly damaged, and it was possible that this ride would've torn it right off, and it wouldn't be out of the question for the Shooting Wheel to end up dragging him straight through the dream-road, finally dealing enough damage to kill him.

However, Ray was able to ride it all the way despite this being his first time trying this kind of stunt.

This action truly showed part of what made Ray who he was, for the flair that could make him think of such moves on the spot was yet another one of his strengths.

"We'll end it with the next one...! Raise your output as high as you can!"

"I shall."

As time passed, the Shooting Wheel accelerated its spinning. Holding on to it, Ray gave the axe an order, and it instantly responded. "Give rise to power: a tenth for light—ten percent."

The light on the axe became even brighter. Though it was limited to just the element of light, it now channeled a tenth of its output—the theoretical limit.

The light coming off the part of the axe clutched in Ray's hand was absorbed by Monochrome, but it was now so intense that it burned Ray's face and body without even touching him.

He still held on to it, however, and watched as the distance between him and his enemy closed.

Cardinal A began to panic as the beacon of heat powerful enough to utterly destroy it drew inexorably closer—but at the same time, it knew that victory was at hand.

Outside the dream, the real Cardinal A had approached Ray's sleeping body before the Ray inside the dream had caught up. It had just broken through Silver's final Wind Hoof barrier like it was paper.

Cardinal A now had the upper hand. In the dream, Ray's axe would reach Cardinal A and defeat him in only about five seconds, but the real Cardinal A would kill Ray in no more than three.

However barely, Cardinal A would win this.

◇◆

"G h e g h e g h e!"

Silver faced Cardinal A as it swung its right blade toward his owner. The steed was trying to protect Ray, but his efforts were not enough to stop the blade.

It was already clear how this would end. Cardinal A, April, and Silver had taken into account everything they could see and calculated the outcome.

All of them had arrived at the same result—they'd seen no way to turn this around.

Thus...the situation was saved by something they couldn't see.

Right before the final moment, Ray's body—which was most certainly in the trajectory of the blade—slightly changed its position.

"...G h e?" The real Cardinal A's blade cut through nothing but the air. Ray and Silver had moved out of the blade's range as though something invisible had pushed them. Because of that, Cardinal A had sliced through nothing.

But despite there being nothing, there were bits of light scattering around.

It was as though it cut something invisible instead of Ray—as though this unseen thing had come to protect him.

◇◆

"G h e...?" The event made so little sense that Cardinal A briefly forgot itself in both the dream and reality.

Two seconds later, the pursuer caught up with the Thrall in the dream.

As Ray passed by the creature, still riding the Shooting Wheel, he swung his left hand and used the shining axe to split Cardinal A's torso and head in one stroke.

Thus, the scarlet Thrall wrought of Mythical metal shattered without ever understanding or realizing why it failed and what it had overlooked.

◇◆

Ray and Cardinal A’s battle reached a conclusion.

Cardinal A’s real body was split by immense heat, then vanished from the world of dreams. Death had stripped it of its mind, making it lose its right to exist here.

Ray—now victorious—dismounted the Shooting Wheel, and fell to his knees. He was breathing raggedly, no doubt because of the fatigue and injuries.

Gerbera looked at him with a somewhat gloomy expression on her face. Then, she dropped her gaze to the back of her left hand.

Her Embryo was focused on stealth, so even her crest was invisible. She herself could see it, however, and for some reason she was staring at it now.

“...I see,” Sechs said as he looked at both of them and immediately understood exactly what had happened here.

The real Cardinal A’s attack had nearly reached Ray’s sleeping body, but Ray hadn’t died, and then something unexpected had made the Thrall freeze, giving Ray a chance to finish it.

Ray himself didn’t know what had protected him, and Cardinal A hadn’t understood what had come between it and its opponent either.

The only ones who did know were Gerbera and Sechs.

It wasn’t April—she would’ve prioritized protecting Sechs’s group even if Ray was at the risk of dying.

Thus, the thing that had protected Ray must have been Gerbera’s Alhazred—the Embryo that had remained in reality.

B-But my Alhazred is almost out of HP... I guess I’ll pull him out anyway...

It had happened when Ray had found Sechs’s group and they had all been attacked by Thralls. While Sechs and Candy had sensed the approaching horde and prepared to fight, Gerbera had also done what she could.

Half-dead though the Embryo may have been, she still had pulled Alhazred out of the crest.

He had been so damaged she hadn’t even made him fight the Thralls—but he’d still been there.

Soon after that, Cardinal A had blown up a mithril Thrall and spread

Dreamland's aura in every direction. This indiscriminate, wide-scale spread had obviously caught Alhazred as well.

Faint though it might have been, he was an Embryo with a mind of his own, which meant that he, too, should've been drawn into the dream.

However, he was a Superior Embryo specialized in stealth. He couldn't be seen, heard, or felt.

That was why not even Dreamland had realized that it had touched Alhazred, and as a result had been unable to pull him into the dream. It simply hadn't even noticed that he was there.

After that, Alhazred had simply stood by his sleeping Master. The Embryo had been left behind by the dream and remained in reality.

That was the reason why Gerbera was unable to use him in Dreamland.

However, when Sechs had told Gerbera his guess about Alhazred's state—that, having been barred from the Dreamland, he was likely still nearby in reality—the situation had changed.

Knowing that he was out there, Gerbera called out to him from the dream and sent him a thought: "protect me."

Normally, he could share his vision with her, but the barrier between the dream and reality prevented that. She couldn't know what was happening in reality and could only give him the vaguest of orders, but Alhazred still did as he was told and stood ready to protect her if need be.

But then the order changed.

When Gerbera realized that Cardinal A had changed its strategy and was now trying to kill Ray in reality, she ordered Alhazred to "protect him" instead.

She might have done this unconsciously, but something within her had asked for this. Upon receiving the order, Alhazred moved to protect Ray.

The prison break had left Alhazred half-dead, so he didn't have the power to fight Cardinal A—but he still did whatever he could to save Ray and Silver from the Thrall's attack—to fulfill his Master's command.

"Hmm." Sechs was in the dream, so he obviously hadn't actually seen any of this. However, he understood what had happened when he saw Gerbera looking at her crest.

She'd sacrificed her Embryo to protect someone else.

This was something that neither the old Gerbera nor the Gerbera that had received Sechs's guidance would have ever done.

That meant that something had happened during the brief time she'd spent here in the dream that had an effect on her. She'd been influenced enough that she no longer wished for Ray to be defeated in this way.

The influence he has on other people may be even greater than Shu's, Sechs thought, wondering about the degree to which they themselves may have been influenced in return. Anyway...

However, there was something Sechs had to do first.

The battle was over, but they were still in Dreamland. Though the Thralls binding them to the dream were gone, they could now do nothing but wait until they woke up naturally.

After all, you couldn't wake from a nightmare by just wishing for it or struggling fruitlessly.

It would be quickest if April woke them up, but it didn't seem like she was doing that yet.

However, they couldn't stay here for much longer——it was possible that a second wave of Thralls could come before they woke up. For all they knew, more Thralls might already be on their way.

Time to kill Overlord Acedia and escape this Dreamland, Sechs thought, moving his focus to the piece of himself that he was hiding near ZZZ.

He would use the element of surprise to deliver a fatal attack, and that would be the end of this. Though a great many unforeseen things had happened since his escape, that would return everything to its expected course.

They would kill Overlord Acedia, wake up, and leave before Ray realized who they were. Then, they would pass by the defeated Overlord's territory and move to the east of the continent while avoiding contact. And if they could meet Rascal's group in Caldina, they'd be in the clear.

"Hm...?" As Sechs pictured what would happen next, he was overcome by a strange feeling.

Actually, it wasn't the feeling itself that was strange. He'd experienced it many times here and even in the gaol.

However, he hadn't felt it once while in this dream.

It was...

"Wind...?"

...the feeling of air flowing across his skin.

The air in the dream had been completely still the entire time, but it had suddenly begun to move.

The source of this wind was the thing in Ray's hand—Nemesis. Even now after they'd chased down and defeated Cardinal A, the Shooting Wheel was still spinning.

The windmill that had been closed for his victorious ride against the Thrall was now blooming like a flower.

"Is he actually...?!" Sechs suddenly realized what Ray was about to do.

Ray wasn't done yet. He might've beaten Cardinal A, but in his mind, the fight was still ongoing.

There was still the enemy who'd actually contributed to his damage counter—Overlord Acedia, ZZZ.

They were up against someone who'd sent a horde of Thralls after them. It was naive to think that nothing else was coming just because they'd defeated the one unique monster they'd encountered.

Thus, Ray was now preparing to defeat the Overlord.

He'd come upon the same idea as Sechs, and as damaged as he was, Ray was in no condition for any more prolonged fights. Instead, he decided to use something that would end it right away.

"Payback..."

The acceleration of the spinning blades topped out, and they reached their highest speed. And so, for the first time since the battle against the Hell General, the shooting star prepared to fly once more.

This was the power Ray and Nemesis had created to reach things too distant for them, as well as the strongest attack currently possessed by the Maiden of Vengeance, Nemesis.

The Shooting Wheel wasn't a wheel that blazed on the road...

"...Beyond the Stars."

...but a star speeding through the heavens.

Nemesis became a star moving close to the speed of sound and arced through the clouded dreamscape.

The total damage Ray had suffered at the hands of Cardinal A was easily above 50,000. It was far greater than Ray's current HP—a volume of built-up damage so great it would've killed him if he hadn't used healing magic.

The overwhelming speed it provided was now propelling Nemesis through the world of dreams. She followed her damage counter and went directly toward its source. Her eyes didn't help here, but her unique sense was showing her the way.

The target was, of course, Overlord Acedia, ZZZ.

He was the one who'd sent the Thralls—his limbs—and was thus the true source of the damage inflicted upon Ray.

Just like Sechs, Ray had also realized that using skills in this dream would require ZZZ himself to be here too.

That was why he figured that Payback would be able to reach him.

"There you are!"

Nemesis finally caught sight of the man clad in a tapir suit. However, ZZZ himself also noticed the enemy flying toward him and immediately responded with a skill.

"...Sleepwalking." This was the ability that allowed him to control his army's position within the dream. It was what he'd used to send out Cardinal A, and now he used it to place himself far away from Nemesis. Though it had a long cooldown and only worked within the dream, it was a teleportation skill that let him change positions as he wished.

Using it had placed ZZZ at the point in the Dreamland that was farthest away from both the piece of Sechs and Nemesis. Dreamland had a limited size, but it still put him dozens of kilometels away.

"That should do it," ZZZ muttered. He didn't know anything about Ray and Nemesis, and she hadn't gotten the chance to show many of her powers in the battle against Cardinal A. He obviously didn't know how Payback worked, but its homing range was limited to just a tenth of the total damage counter. The range of this flight was just about 5,000 metels, and now that the distance had increased, Payback couldn't reach him anymore.

ZZZ had made the right move...

"...Still coming after me, huuuhh?"

...or at least, he would have, if this hadn't been a dream.

5,000 metels. 10,000 metels.

Nemesis surpassed her maximum range and continued flying.

The reason for this was simple—this was a dream.

It was the same principle that had allowed Sechs to spread his divided body without limit—in a dream, the concept of distance simply didn't exist, though it was unclear if this was just a general property of dreams or because none of them had actually moved in reality.

However, ironically enough, this facet of the dream worked against its own Master.

“You will not escape me this time...!” Nemesis continued to chase after ZZZ. She flew without limit, following the source of the damage counter, not slowing down her spin one bit.

Eventually, she had ZZZ in her sight once again.

“Found agaiiinnn...” ZZZ drawled, realizing he couldn’t escape a second time. Sleepwalking could only be used on the same target after a 30 minute cooldown. If it didn’t have such a limitation, he would’ve used it to support Cardinal A when it had tried to run away to buy time.

The cooldown applied to ZZZ himself as well.

Overlord Acedia also had some of the lowest stats in the Overlord series of jobs. All but a few of his stats were below Cardinal A’s, and he had no hope of evading the coming attack.

ZZZ let out a sigh and looked at Nemesis as she flew toward him. Then, he raised up his arms to cover his head and heart.

“Dreamland...” He spoke to his Embryo—this very space itself.

And right when he was about to deliver an order, the Shooting Wheel pierced into the arm covering his head.

The very next moment, the tripled damage from Payback was delivered upon him.

The pure damage flowing into ZZZ’s right arm was starting to shatter it, when...

“Self-destruct.”

...he finally issued his final order.

At that moment, Dreamland lost its color. It lost its sound...and was finally undone.

Epilogue: Alone in the Dark

Northern Legendaria, Sloth Village

ZZZ woke up in his bedroom and, following a brief moment of silence, slowly got up.

The sheepkin maids attending to him were surprised, as it was rare for him to wake up before dinnertime. But then, they realized that blood was seeping through the right arm of his costume, dripping to the ground. There was so much of it that it made a puddle.

"Master Z?!" The maids began to panic, hastily taking out some healing items and rushing to treat him. "We will treat the wound! Please remove your clothes..."

"...'kay." Urged by the maid, ZZZ took off the tapir costume, revealing his true form and avatar—a youth with a face that would be handsome if not for the bags under his eyes.

ZZZ let out a rather gloomy sigh. It wasn't the treatment or the need to take off his clothes that was bothering him, but the enemies he'd faced in the dream.

If it had hit a critical part of his body, that final attack would've actually killed him. He had no means of preventing fatal damage—nobody could bring Lifesaving Brooches to the dream, and he was no exception.

However, he'd only used Dreamland's last skill after he received the tripled damage from Payback—not before.

The reason he survived was because he'd covered his critical body parts with his arms, and because he just had massive amounts of HP.

As far as Overlords went, Overlord Acedia had staggeringly low stats. Despite being a Superior Job with nearly 1,000 levels, his STR, AGI, and similar stats weren't much higher than a maxed out high-rank's would be.

However, when it came to HP and SP, he was far above the average Superior Job.

His HP was easily above 6,000,000, and his arm was able to preserve its shape even after Nemesis damaged it for 150,000.

If that damage had been dealt to his head or chest, though, it would've inflicted him with injury-based debuffs that would've surely killed him eventually.

This battle was actually dangerous to ZZZ himself. It had been a while since he'd almost died in the dream.

Or maybe... ZZZ knew that the Shooting Wheel may not have been the only attack he'd had to watch out for. And he was completely correct—Sechs had come extremely close to assassinating him. I hope they all retreat now, at least...

The Dream's End was Dreamland's last skill, usable only at the expense of Dreamland destroying itself.

It had two effects.

First, it canceled the Sleep and Forced Sleep effects on those trapped in Dreamland and everyone around ZZZ in reality.

And second, it reduced the MP and SP of all affected creatures by an amount equal to ZZZ's own SP.

That was the other stat besides HP that Overlord Acedia excelled at, and since most skills relied on MP and SP, The Dream's End made most of them unusable. There were consumable items that restored MP and SP, of course, but the amount they could restore at a time was limited and depended on item quality.

Because of this, The Dream's End guaranteed that those affected wouldn't be fit for much more combat.

This skill that destroyed the land of dreams was like the concept of awakening given real power. It may have been a reflection of the person ZZZ once was—someone who wished for sleep and didn't seek much else.

"...Man, but it's sure been a long time since I used it." The Dream's End was one of the aces up ZZZ's sleeve, as well as the reason why he'd become wanted. While testing his skills one day, he'd used it in the city he'd been staying at.

There were two things he'd failed to consider back then.

First, there was the fact that it was a skill that temporarily destroyed Dreamland.

Second, the range of the effect was far greater than ZZZ had expected, engulfing half of the city.

The infrastructure of Legendarian cities depended on magic to function, so the resulting loss of MP was the equivalent of a blackout, if not worse.

Intentional or not, ZZZ had committed an act of terrorism, and though nobody had died, it placed him on the wanted list.

He hadn't used the skill since, both because he simply hadn't needed to and because it made his Dreamland self-destruct and become unusable for a few days until it was restored. ZZZ hadn't even been Overlord Acedia back when he'd first tried the skill, and he had gone against his own wishes and chosen to spend the time until Dreamland refreshed logged out—in the world where he could not sleep.

Brief or not, the destruction of Dreamland was a major loss to him.

Though...I have other ways to fight these days... He'd sent dozens of mithril Thralls to fight today, but he still had several times more than that placed around the settlement. He also still had one party's worth of custom golems which he'd used before the Thralls became available to him.

And then there were the special Thralls besides Cardinal A—the ones made using UBM MVP materials.

He wouldn't send them out, as they were part of his defensive forces, but for the most part they would be enough to intercept and defeat any attackers. But if someone did manage to break through to the village, ZZZ would have a problem.

Based on what he'd seen in the dream, he already knew that his current enemies were capable of that.

In the past, ZZZ would have just fled if he encountered a situation where he couldn't use Dreamland.

But now he had a reason not to do that.

He looked over at the sheepkin maids earnestly treating his wound. They were all people who could only live here because of ZZZ, and they were the real reason why he'd chosen to intercept the group of Masters that had appeared.

If these enemies of his went on to bring harm to these people, he would...

"Umm, is anything the matter?" One of the maids looked up at him with worry in her eyes.

He quickly assumed his usual relaxed demeanor and said, "All's fine, all's goood. Don't worry, no probs heeere."

ZZZ had been living in this settlement for a while now. He'd stumbled upon it shortly after becoming Overlord Acedia, and over two years had passed in Dendro since then.

ZZZ had entered Infinite Dendrogram in search of nothing but the sleep he lacked in reality, hoping to finally live a life that included true rest.

There were only two other things besides sleep that he cared about—the few friends he'd made here, and the sheepkin living in this village.

The Overlord who treasured the people around him had already decided that if necessary, he would use his final power as the Overlord.

The Southernmost Edge of Altar, A Mountain Forest Near the Border

Sechs's party woke up right after Dreamland collapsed.

They quickly checked their stats and realized that their MP and SP were at 0.

Immediately, each one of them realized that ZZZ must've done something to them when he'd canceled Dreamland. They all tried to recover a bit using the items they had on hand, but it was far from enough healing to make them fully ready for combat.

"Ughhh...well, that's awful," said Gerbera, downing a bitter potion. She was talking both about the taste and the fact that she had now confirmed that Alhazred had vanished in reality. Then, she glanced downward and spotted Ray, lying on the ground bloodied and still unconscious. "...Why isn't he waking up, though?" she asked.

"Looks like he just Fainted," said Candy. "Nothing to do with any weird dream stuff. I guess he just took a little too much damage."

"Ohh, I see," said Gerbera.

The damage Ray had received in the battle against Cardinal A had been immense. It couldn't have made him Faint in Dreamland because he was already unconscious, but it was so severe that the moment Dreamland's Forced Sleep was dispelled, he seamlessly shifted to Fainting.

Even Nemesis was nowhere in sight, either in human or weapon form. She must've been so fatigued that she was forced to retreat to the crest to recover.

"This is good for us, though," Candy said. "This way, he won't find out who we are."

All Ray knew about them so far was Gerbera's name and that the woman who'd treated her—Sechs wearing The Saint's skin—was their clan leader. He didn't know Sechs and Candy's names, jobs, or even the name of their clan. He lacked the knowledge to conclude that IF had broken out of the gaol, and since IF didn't exactly want people to know about that yet, this was a good outcome for them all.

Gerbera continued looking down at Ray, not saying a word.

He was bleeding and steadily losing health—he would surely die if ignored. Ray's battle with Overlord Acedia would effectively end in a draw, and he would remain clueless about who they were.

That was the most convenient outcome for IF.

However...Gerbera sighed as she took out a potion and poured it over him.

It was low-quality and had no effect on his broken bones and other more serious injuries, but it did stop the Bleeding effect.

Once she confirmed that was the case, Gerbera tossed the empty bottle aside.

“Gerby?” asked Candy, who was starting to feel that Gerbera wasn’t acting quite like herself.

“We should probably leave. Let’s go,” said Gerbera, who was thinking the exact same thing. She began walking off into the woods.

“What? Did you fall for him or something?” Candy asked as he caught up.

“Keep saying stupid stuff like that and I’ll kill you in your sleep,” Gerbera replied with a terrible scowl.

Indeed—it certainly wasn’t love or anything that she was feeling now. Gerbera wasn’t lying about that.

If she had to say how she felt about Ray, she would probably say that she found him “dazzling.”

She was overwhelmed by the radiance of a man who refused to break before an overwhelming foe and never chose defeat. When she compared him to her current self—which was the result of compromise—she couldn’t help but be dazzled by Ray...and admire him a little.

Noticing this change within Gerbera, Sechs followed her and Candy into the forest.

Behind him was April, who seemed to be communicating with Silver. The Prism Person and the Prism Steed may have had something to talk about.

However, when Sechs and his party walked off, April excused herself to Silver and followed after them.

Once they were far enough away from Ray, Sechs said, “It appears we will have to change our plans a little.”

“We got out of Overlord Acedia’s dream, but we won’t go through Legendaria and Caldina like we planned, huh?” asked Candy.

“We cannot take that route because Overlord Acedia is still alive, yes. Though we also did not know about his domain to begin with, so...perhaps he lived in a hidden village of some kind?”

Their original plans had involved going south and heading toward their destination while avoiding well-populated areas and Desire’s domains. La

Crima had gathered the relevant information for this back when he'd tried to recruit them.

However, Overlord Acedia's domain—the hidden settlement of the sheepkin—was in a location they hadn't accounted for. ZZZ never left the village and thus had never been encountered by La Crima, so they obviously didn't know its location.

They'd all made a mistake there, but Sechs was concerned that not killing ZZZ in the dream would turn out to be an even bigger error.

"But we won, didn't we?" asked Gerbera.

"Yes, but we did not kill him." Overlord Acedia was defeated, but not dead. That was the biggest problem for them now. "We do not know if we have seen all of that Embryo's abilities. Also...April?"

Sechs urged April to reference the records of the pre-ancient civilization—the Overlord data recorded in the history predating even her—and reveal more about the job.

"The Overlord series of jobs all, without exception, have a final ultimate skill," she said.

"A final...ult?"

"The final ultimate of the Overlord Acedia is 'The End of Sloth.' It removes the user's combat restriction and turns them into 'a terrifying monstrosity bearing the combined stats of all Thralls the user has ever made.'"

It was a skill that would birth an anomalous being that had the stats of Cardinal A and all of ZZZ's other Thralls. This would no doubt raise him past Mythical-tier and perhaps even give him the stats to match the ultimate form of the Physical Apex herself.

"It's like the second form of some evil overlord from an RPG..." said Gerbera with a scowl before putting on a wry grin and saying, "Wait, that's exactly what it is..."

"He would surely use it if we give him a reason to," said Sechs. "The battle we just had must have put him on high alert."

ZZZ's unbeatable strategy had fallen apart, while he himself had received damage and was functionally forced to retreat. If there was a second round, he would certainly use forces far above the ones he'd deployed this time.

"Even if we decide to use Candy's diseases to defeat him from a distance, his monstrous transformation would render viruses that attack humans utterly useless, would it not?"

"What a pain in the butt." Candy's diseases were terrifying in their capacity for wide-scale extermination and suppression, but they had no effect on targets he knew nothing about. He could do something while Overlord Acedia was still human, but he certainly didn't have any data on the monstrosity he would become if he used The End of Sloth.

In fact, it was questionable if anything Candy had could work on ZZZ if he was clad in Dreamland's aura either. Overlord Acedia couldn't deploy Dreamland at that moment, but the group had no way of knowing that.

"Because of all this, we should continue on while avoiding his domain in northern Legendaria. This will make the journey longer than planned, and the meeting with the others as well as our arrival to the destination will be delayed by quite a while. We are left with no choice, however."

Sechs only had a quarter of his maximum HP, Candy had compatibility issues, and Gerbera's Alhazred was completely gone. They weren't at their best, so fighting ZZZ was far too risky. Even one of their deaths would be a major blow to the whole group, so it was better to stay away from him, even if it meant that their arrival would be delayed significantly.

"I must say, it really is something that a wrench was thrown into our plans so soon after we broke out. He certainly did not intend to do this, but...still. Quite impressive."

Thanks to Ray getting caught up in all this, they had defeated ZZZ with little effort on their part. However, they would've likely won even if Ray hadn't been there. They had April protecting their defenseless bodies in reality, and inside the dream they had Sechs on their side.

Sechs would have been able to defeat Cardinal A before his real body was killed, and it was even possible that he could have assassinated ZZZ before the Overlord used his final skill.

But thanks to Ray persevering as he had, the battle ended with ZZZ still alive.

One could say that Illegal Frontier's plan had been so heavily delayed because Ray happened to be there.

I could have killed ZZZ instead of watching... No. I wanted to see what happened. I suppose it is what it is, Sechs thought. If his curiosity had negative consequences, Sechs would accept that.

He seems to possess a fate that invites such chance meetings. Does it run in the family...Shu? Sechs thought of his friend and true rival's face and put on a wry grin before turning to Candy and Gerbera and discussing the new route with them.

Sorcerer, Ray Starling

"This place is..." Before I realized it, I was in a place different from Dreamland—a space that consisted mainly of roads above the clouds.

Right now, I was in complete darkness, but I could stand on my own two feet and see my own body. This was the place I occasionally visited while Fainted or Unconscious.

Well, this wasn't Dreamland, at least.

How had the battle ended, anyway?

"It looks like...you won?" I turned to the source of the voice and saw Gardranda—not the smol version, but the standard one.

"I have confirmed the collapse of the space from moments ago. This is a space within yourself. No one else is connected to it," said the white axe, floating a bit away from us.

I guess that's pretty easy to believe when it's coming from you two. You mess with my dreams on the regular, I thought.

"Where are we, if I may ask?" It seemed that this time, though, Nemesis was here too. This was new—she hadn't been in any of these dreams before.

Was this because of Dreamland, or was it something else? I wondered.

"Until now...I was closing her out..."

"As was I."

Oh, so they were leaving her outside on purpose. Man, they really did mess with my dreams however they wanted, huh...?

"Hm...?" I noticed Gardranda looking up at me, and her eyes had a hint of bitterness in them.

"What's wrong?" I asked.

"I didn't get to do anything...this time." Oh yeah, now that she mentioned it, I didn't use the Miasmaflame Bracers for much the whole time I was in the Dreamland. Purgatorial Flames couldn't do much against Mythical metal.

As for the powerful Miasmaflame Princess, Gardranda herself...

"I don't personally have enough MP to summon you." Without the Grudge-Soaked Greaves, I had no way to cover the skill's exorbitant costs.

That had all added up to the bracers basically being useless this time.

Honestly, I felt like the root cause was really that I'd been fighting way too many enemies who were above me. Both the Miasmaflame Bracers and the Black Warcoat had been adjusted in a way to help me fight stronger opponents, making them poorly balanced and hard to use in a lot of situations.

Most of my gear only really became useful through some sort of synergy between them. The thing with the axe and the Black Warcoat was a good example of that.

"We didn't even get to use Big or Small this time..." said Gardranda. "Maybe...next time?"

"Speaking of which, if I used it and called you with Maximum...it would obviously increase your stats and the cost of summoning, but what about the drawbacks? Would it make them worse?"

She quickly turned away from me and said, "...Dunno."

"HEY!" Look me in the eyes when you say that! Are you trying to scare me?!

"Ray, if I may ask... Is this a good time for such tomfoolery? What about your wounds?" Nemesis asked, clearly worried.

Oh yeah—the battle with the Thrall had left me pretty battered. I didn't get the death penalty, but I could still Bleed to death while Fainted.

I became a bit uneasy when...

"The wounds are deep, but not fatal. Your bleeding has ceased as well. You will awake in a while."

"Really?"

"It is certain." The axe told me all of that as if to dispel my worries.

Nemesis and I didn't know what was happening in reality, but the axe somehow did.

I now know its origin, but it's still full of mysteries, huh? I thought.

"This knowledge is not important enough to be seen as a mystery. I merely happen to possess a function that allows me to sense the state of my wielder. It is meant to enable me to reference your remaining life force and adjust my power output in a way that would not kill you or bring you close to death."

Well, that made sense. Knowing how it worked, with the whole self-damage thing...yeah, this feature was probably necessary.

"There is more knowledge I must impart upon you before you awaken," the axe said.

"Yeah?"

"Though you were able to wield me in the dream, you will be unable to wield me in reality for some time."

"Yeah, I figured..." Dreamland was a space that excluded anything without a mind, so the axe was free of the grudge binding it—but all of that was still there in reality, and it remained too dense for Gouz-Maise to uncurse it.

"As long as the grudge and the curse-cloth lay upon me, I cannot choose the nature of my power nor control my output. Unlike King of Kings or The Evil's dependent who came before, you are not yet powerful enough to withstand the price of wielding me. Swing me, and you will find yourself destroyed."

The reason why I could use the axe in that battle just now was because the axe could control itself, and I could use Monochrome to minimize the damage to myself. If I used it in reality, I'd just be repeating what had happened this morning.

"All right. I guess I'll be using your powers some other time, then."

"Indeed."

"Until then, I'll keep on absorbing the grudge and look for a way to remove the cloth. Oh, and think of a name for you, of course."

"I shall anticipate it." The axe said the same thing it had said right before I'd wielded it against the Thrall.

"That aside...it seems that you have become a Sorcerer for naught," said Nemesis.

"...Ohh." I'd taken the job thinking that I could use it to let me wield the axe, but now I knew that it wouldn't help with the self-damage much. Based on what the axe had shown me, even Fallen Knights were helpless against that effect, so when I needed to open up a low-rank job slot, Sorcerer would probably be the first to go.

"Indeed. The sorcerer grouping does not contribute to the act of wielding me. However, you should not purge Sorcerer. Or, to be more precise...you should not close off a future possibility."

"Huh?" The axe itself was suggesting that I keep Sorcerer. But why? It just said that the job was irrelevant to it.

"You have chosen Paladin and Death Soldier, you wield fire, and you know near-death experiences. I did not see this in your memory, exactly, but this degree of alignment did not feel like a mere coincidence..."

"Wait, what are you talking about?"

The axe fell silent for a good moment before saying, "A mixed Superior Job."

My eyes widened. While SJs like King of Destruction were unlocked through focus on a single grouping and the likes of The Unsheath were available to those with one transcendental technique, mixed Superior Jobs were the result of mixing jobs from multiple completely different groupings. A good example of this was Xunyu's Master Jiangshi.

"That...exists? There's an SJ like that?"

"Indeed. It is currently unclaimed, and your memory tells me that the conditions for attaining it appear to be lost. That is understandable, as they are peculiar even by the standards of mixed Superior Jobs."

"Do you know them, then?"

"I do. However, I cannot reveal them in detail. There is a restriction upon me."

A restriction...?

"While I was created by the BLACKSMITH, jobs were arranged by the FINDER. Those who satisfy the conditions are granted even greater power—that is the grand principle. The more difficult and peculiar the conditions, the more obvious this becomes. Thus, I cannot reveal them. To be more precise, we are not allowed to describe the conditions of unclaimed Superior Jobs."

Well, looking at it from the perspective of the person who created the jobs, it made sense that you wouldn't want anything going around and giving away the answers.

I listened as the axe continued. "Thus, I am incapable of imparting to you the name or conditions of the Superior Job at the end of the path you walk. I can only reveal what you have already achieved. What you have already heard from me is the limit of what I am permitted to say."

That stuff about Paladin, Death Soldier, and Sorcerer, huh...?

"I have a question," said Nemesis. "Can you reveal the conditions of taken Superior Jobs?"

"Indeed I can. There is no such restriction for occupied Superior Jobs."

...Really?

"Wait, you're able to tell if a job is taken or not?" I asked.

"Indeed. It is one of my functions."

This thing sure has a lot of features.

"To make it brief," the axe added, "it is a derivation of the function meant to create a link with a job, akin to the one between Altar and Sacred King. As there cannot be two Sacred Kings at one time, we are capable of seeing whether Superior Jobs are taken. However, as I am incomplete and was never linked to any specific job, this function of mine will never see proper use."

I guess that makes sense, yeah.

"Then...what is the most difficult condition for a taken Superior Job?" Nemesis asked, clearly out of mere curiosity.

The axe said nothing at first—it seemed like it was thinking. I couldn't tell whether it was checking if the jobs were taken, comparing conditions, or both, but eventually, it gave an answer.

"The most striking is the Superior Job with the following condition: 'While fighting alone and without having any high-rank jobs or Superior Jobs, kill 10 Superior Jobs whose total level and combined STR, AGI, and END are at least 10x your own.'"

"What the hell kinda condition is that?" That meant you had to kill 10 SJs while still only having low-rank jobs yourself—and since the combined stat thing focused exclusively on physical stats, you couldn't satisfy the condition by using surprise attacks to kill people with more vulnerable magic or crafting jobs.

It was also "at least 10x," but knowing the difference between people who got Superior Jobs and those who only had low-rank jobs, the odds of the stat gap being just 10x were pretty low.

Hell, because it was "at least 10x," that also meant you could only take like one or two low-rank jobs before you started to risk raising your stats too high to find enough SJs to qualify on top of that.

And back when there were just tians, everyone going for it would have been literally putting their lives on the line, so there would've been no SJs who'd just let themselves get killed. No matter how I looked at it, this condition seemed absurdly difficult.

"The kills are only recognized as such if the Superior Job becomes vacant. Thus, it does not count the use of barrier devices and deaths of your kind, who revive when slain and maintain their Superior Jobs."

Now I was sure the condition was totally impossible. I felt like FINDER had to have thought up this condition knowing that it would never be fulfilled.

"Hm...?" Wait, hold on, I thought. The axe had said that it could only reveal the conditions of taken SJs, right? Someone...had actually fulfilled it?

"So, what is the Superior Job that has this deranged condition?" Nemesis asked.

In response, the axe...

"The job belonging to one of my previous wielders—King of Kings."

...brought up a legend from six hundred years ago.

"King of Kings..." I'd seen him in the axe's memories—he was the wielder who'd mastered the weapon. Even before I'd seen the memories, I'd heard that six centuries ago, during the Era of the Peerless Three, King of Kings had been a dominant, nigh-unstoppable hegemon who had split the world in two before disappearing at the end of that era.

"This is my conjecture, but I believe he is most likely still alive. While I was without an owner, I often looked into it, and King of Kings has never once become vacant."

I didn't know what to say. I'd heard there were long-lived humanoids, but was he actually still alive somewhere? After disappearing six hundred years ago?

"What if this is a sign of even more immense trouble in the future?" asked Nemesis.

"Don't say stuff like that. You're tempting fate." This day and age had plenty of problems already. I really didn't want the guy who split the world in two to come back and make things even worse.

◇

“...Hm?” I’d been talking to the three when I suddenly found myself looking up at the sky.

Apparently, I’d woken up.

The sky above was being veiled by night. I looked to the side and saw Silver, lying on the ground and staring at me.

Both of his left legs had been severed.

“You didn’t have it easy either, huh?”

All silent, Silver brought his nose to my face and returned to my inventory on his own.

“...You did good.” I didn’t know if Silver’s legs were accounted for by his self-repair function. If they weren’t, I’d have to consult Integra and her knowledge of the pre-ancient civilization, or Blue Screen at the SMPS factory. Gold Thunder had suffered worse damage than this and had still been successfully repaired, so I wanted to believe Silver would be okay too.

“Hm...?” I felt something hard touch my fingers.

It was an empty potion bottle, lying on the bare ground.

I also realized that my body was a bit wet.

“I guess they gave me first aid.”

I couldn’t see the women anywhere. I figured they must’ve walked off after giving me the potion.

I still had no idea who they were—but, for some reason, I felt like we would eventually meet again.

“Anyway. Looking at the time, I’m guessing the Tournament today is about to end.” Silver couldn’t move, while I was injured all over. The many status effects on me included binding-type debuffs stemming from damage. This prevented me from returning to Gideon by logging out.

It didn’t look like I could return to the city before Lei-Lei won the Tournament and it was time to fight the UBM. Lei-Lei was a busy person, so she probably had to beat the UBM as quickly as possible. I had to use a comms magic item to tell Shu that I wouldn’t make it.

Also, it’d be nice if I could get someone to come pick me up.

“...Phew.” I had to get in touch with someone in real life, but before I did that, I let out a sigh and looked up.

The sky was completely dark and my surroundings were all quiet. I couldn’t hear any flying birds or even insect noises anywhere in the dark forest. Nemesis was still asleep, the axe wasn’t speaking to me in reality, Silver was stored away, and I hadn't summoned Gardranda.

I was alone, sitting in a dark and silent forest.

"This whole thing...was hard in a different way than usual."

Through that battle in the dream, I managed to feel like we'd grown somehow. It wasn't growth in terms of levels or numbers, but something more abstract.

And this growth might've been exactly what I needed right now.

In silence, I looked to the north. I pictured what was in that direction: Gideon, Altea...and the land of Dryfe that I'd yet to see.

I remembered the words I'd said in the dream.

"...'The fight we'll have to win,' huh?"

It was no doubt drawing ever closer.

The Gaol

The gaol was awfully quiet.

Three Superiors imprisoned there had broken out, while all the other Masters were killed by Candy's viruses, and there had never been any tians here to begin with.

The gaol was now a ghost town where death reigned supreme.

However, somewhere away from the town, there was a single person who was still alive.

It was a boy sitting on the bare ground, not saying a word.

At his side, there was a humanoid Embryo whose stature as well as face were hidden.

One sat and the other stood, but they were both immobile.

However, a keen observer might notice that they weren't exactly doing nothing.

Gradually and ever so slowly, the boy's Embryo was consuming the gaol. He eroded the Resources comprising it, adding them onto himself and slowly breaking it apart. It was like digging a tunnel with a spoon—the old-fashioned method of breaking out of prison.

Yet this was what the boy and his Embryo had been doing all this time. He'd been imprisoned before his Embryo was even born, and since the moment it hatched and throughout all the evolutions leading to Superior, they'd been doing nothing but this.

They'd continued this even as other Masters wandered in and became their prey.

And now...the end was in sight.

This would take only about a year more, if not less.

He alone would do what had required the power of three Superiors to achieve.

His name was Fu'uta.

He was the first prisoner of the gaol and the first Master to become a Superior. Unshaking, undoubting—he was a being who existed for one purpose alone.

There was no Master who enjoyed Infinite Dendrogram less than he did.

"...It's so quiet today." Fu'uta noticed that he couldn't hear anything outside the dungeon.

At this moment, he was the only person still alive here. Red King was working on removing the viruses inside it, but until then the prisoners would be unable to log in.

The silence of the gaol gave Fu'uta a slight bit of hope. He'd thought that maybe everyone got bored of Infinite Dendrogram and quit.

He'd hoped that they did.

However, the reality he knew told him that it wouldn't happen.

This entity known as Infinite Dendrogram, which presented—misrepresented—itself as realistic, was not something that could end that easily. Even if there was no one here in the gaol, there were still many outside of it.

That was why Fu'uta didn't stop.

"Set time passed." Suddenly, Fu'uta's Embryo—Apocalypse—began to speak. "Thirty days have passed since the previous order. If you wish to continue, present the order once again."

With a mouth fully hidden by a plain mask, he spoke to his Master. For a Type Apostle, his words were extremely mechanical.

"...Erode, break, rebuild," Fu'uta answered, annoyed.

"Present target to absorb-destroy."

"I don't need this world." Fu'uta didn't change even now that he was all alone in the gaol. He continued to stay in the prison, eroding it and gathering Resources while waiting for that day to come.

He imagined the day he would escape from the gaol and destroy Infinite Dendrogram itself.

He wanted to deny everything—to delete Infinite Dendrogram entirely.

With nothing but that in mind, as contradictory as it seemed, he continued to remain inside the game he hated.

“Present target to rebuild into.”

The thing he was reaching for...

“Just NEXT WORLD.”

...was the next world, lost long ago.

“Affirmative.” Apocalypse spoke, then resumed standing in silence.

While the Apostle stood there like a scarecrow, Fu’uta was sitting on the ground...and clenching his fist. The boy who sought the next world sat with his arms around his knees and waited.

Eventually, he knew he would have to fight—and win—against every single person who valued the world as it was now.

Afterword

Cat: “Time for the afterwooord. This time it’s brought to you by me, Cheshire the Cat, and...”
Bear: “Shu Starling the Beaaar.”
Cat: “The standard duo’s back, eh? I feel like it’s been a while since it was just us two.”
Bear: “Yeah. I took a break last time, and befur that the bear wasn’t me, but Carl.”
Cat: “Speaking of Carl, this volume gave us another character in a costume.”
Bear: “ZZZ, huh? Honestly, fur him it’s less like a costume and more like a sleeping bag.”
Cat: “First Carl, now that guuuuy...this is the second time we’ve gotten somebody in a costume who’s kinda invincible. These costumed types sure like their weird combooos. Tenchi’s Bachigo Futae is another one that comes to mind.”
Bear: “Really? I’m a costume guy too and I’m pawsitively normal.”
Cat: “A guy who uses a giant robot to break space itself isn’t normal at aaall.”
Bear: “Actually, does Dendro even have any tough guys who don’t use any combos at all?”
Cat: “Good point. Jobs, Embryos, and MVP rewards—these three systems are all intertwined with each other. I can’t deny that things go crazy when they’re mixed in just the right (or wrong) waaay.”
Bear: “Three systems?”
Cat: “Jobs are the foundation, since they were here from the very beginning. Then there's the Embryos we brought, and after that we've got the MVP rewards, which are the result of us meddling with, modifying, and further processing the non-humanoid inhabitants. That one's actually the system we did the most work on. We didn't even touch the other two."

Bear: "Hrmm. I feel like you just dropped some impawtant info like it was nothin'."
Cat: "There's gear that's stronger than even these MVP rewards we worked so hard on, though. The axe from this volume is a prime example of that. As far as weapon tiers go, that thing is actually above Gloria. And it's as dangerous as it is powerful. It's gonna be a long time before Ray can use it without any problems. He only managed it this time because it was a dream. It's like he got a preview of the gear you get in the endgaaame."
Bear: "I've thought this for a while, but...you really talk more than you should, huh?"
Cat: "I hear that a lot from my colleaaagues too. Then again, I'm the Embryo of a Master who wanted companionship, so you can't blame me for being talkative, can youuu?"
Bear: "Look at you, em-bear-acing it."
Cat: "That's it for the chat, though. It's time for the author's commeeents."

Greetings, dear readers. Thank you for your purchase. I am the author, Sakon Kaidou.

In this volume, you saw Ray grow in some way to win a battle he could afford to lose. With this, he has finally overcome one of the weaknesses he's had since the very beginning.

This story is a long one, and many of its characters change and grow as it moves along. A good example of this is Gerbera, whom you saw accompany Ray in this volume. It would give me much joy if you dear readers continue to watch how the characters change as the story keeps moving forward.

With that in mind, the next volume will be focused on Hugo/Yuri. She is another character who is in the process of changing, so please look forward to seeing what kind of trials await her. Volume 10 of the manga is currently out as well, depicting Hugo's battle against Rook with all the quality you have come to expect from that adaptation. Please do take a look at it.

That said, with the next release of this light novel, it will be twenty volumes long. As the author, I can't help but be overwhelmed by how far we have come.

You all are the reason this series has continued for this long, and it will definitely keep going, so as always I will do my best to make it into something you, dear readers, will enjoy.

And because breaking the twenty volume mark is cause for celebration, we plan to try something different for it. I am personally looking forward to it, so I think you won't go wrong if you get excited for it too.

Nothing would give me more joy than seeing your continued support for Infinite Dendrogram.

Cat: "Anyway, time to announce the next voluuume."
Bear: "The announcements were months off multiple times in a row now. You sure you're good fur this?"
Cat: "Heh heh heh. Don't worry—I have an idea...VOLUME 20 IS SET TO COME OUT IN WINTER SOMETIME!"
Bear: "He wussed out of actually naming the month!"
Cat: "If you're gonna miss the release date, then just don't say it in the first place! Simple!"
Bear: "But what if it comes out in March? Saying 'winter' doesn't account fur that, does it?"
Cat: "It...probably won't come out that late! And even if it does, if it's cold, it's still winter!"
Bear: "Well, whatever happens with the next volume...please look furward to it."

Bonus Short Stories

Bags Under the Eyes

2044, Legendaria

"Knead knead...knead knead knead...knead knead..."

Colossus Meister, ZZZ—the one who would eventually become Overlord Acedia—was kneading clay in an abandoned Legendarian graveyard.

He was using his own clay instead of what was found at the graveyard, but it was an eerie sight regardless. Combined with his looks—particularly, the pronounced bags under his eyes—his actions made him look like an undead monster or some kind of deranged Necromancer. He'd actually been attacked by a number of Masters who had assumed that was exactly what he was, but he'd used Dreamland to put them to sleep.

"A bit more...just a bit more..."

ZZZ's strange behavior was just part of the process of making a combat golem. Golem construction depended on the builder's stats and the natural magic in the environment, but those weren't the only factors that went into the final product. For example, golems built in places dense with grudge had a chance to come out with the ability to deal damage to ethereal, spirit-like monsters—and that bonus was exactly why ZZZ was building one here in a desolate graveyard.

The reason he needed a golem with this power was simple: peaceful sleep. He'd recently discovered an isolated area that was perfect for sleeping, but for some reason, a powerful spirit monster had begun wandering around the location. It was immune to physical attacks and couldn't be put to sleep using Dreamland's effects, so ZZZ was now playing the golem-building gacha to create something that could fight it. He was a man who spared no effort to sleep soundly.

ZZZ quietly continued his work—albeit with lots of mumbling—when...

"Excuse me. Can we talk for a bit?"

...someone called out to him from behind.

When he turned around, he saw two people. One of them was a girl with purple hair and clothes, but the one who had spoken was a young man with a gaunt frame, a bad complexion, and bags under his eyes. That was a trait he shared with ZZZ, but while ZZZ had added them in order to make his avatar match his real life appearance, this young man's tired expression was just the result of the life he lived here. In that regard, he was the direct opposite of ZZZ, who could sleep all he wanted here in Infinite Dendrogram and thus would not normally look so exhausted.

As for why this person had called out to him...

"So he really was alive..." said the young man, sounding slightly surprised.

"As I told you, Master Dearest," said the girl with a sigh.

Apparently, this newcomer had also thought that ZZZ was undead. Unlike the others, though, he didn't attack ZZZ on sight, so he seemed more rational, at least.

Hrmm...maybe I should wear a cutesy animal costume or something? Doubt anyone would think I'm undead then, ZZZ thought, perhaps not realizing that someone just standing around in a graveyard wearing an animal costume was terrifying in its own right.

"Oh, I'm sorry..." said the young man. "I just heard that there were dangerous undead in this area. I'm Benetnasch. My job is King of Tartarus."

"And I am Master Dearest's Embryo. Persephone is my name."

"I'm ZZZ. As you can tell, I'm a Colossus Meister just building a goleeem." The two newcomers tilted their heads, as though unsure if that was really as obvious as ZZZ thought it was, but that was all the introductions they were going to get. "Sooo...why are you in this creepy plaaace?" ZZZ went on, still working on the golem.

"I'm traveling around and extinguishing grudge."

"Whaddya mean?" ZZZ asked.

It didn't seem to be a secret, so Benetnasch went on to explain that the grudge of this world changed the nature of its dead. Under its influence, corpses became zombies or skeletons, and even the souls of the dead could be transformed into wraiths.

Because of this, Benetnasch traveled all over the world to purge all gatherings of grudge before they corrupted the souls of the dead...before it was too late for them. It was a kind of philanthropic work—just one that wasn't focused on helping the living.

"What do you think of my activities?" Benetnasch asked as he wrapped up his explanation.

"They seem fine to me," ZZZ answered.

He didn't know if Benetnasch's efforts would bear fruit or if there was even any point in them to begin with, but he was honestly amazed that the young man could continue to do something so unrewarding and torturous. ZZZ himself would never want to do anything like that, and he felt as if he was looking at a person—an actual living being—who was fundamentally different from him. Nevertheless, he found it admirable.

Everyone's got their own values, so...yeaaah, ZZZ thought. As one whose dream, so to speak, was restful sleep—something most people took for granted—he was extremely aware of that.

But if he had to say one thing...

"I guess I don't really like that you're losing sleep because of iiit."

...he had a problem with the bags under Benetnasch's eyes, clearly caused by fatigue and lack of sleep.

"Do tell him that. He must hear it," said Persephone with a strong nod.

"Ha ha..." Benetnasch chuckled with a bitter smile.

The truth was that Benetnasch didn't actually like sleep. To be more precise, he was afraid of being too late to do something because he had wasted too much time idling. The day he'd first entered this world, he'd found himself too late to save a girl from starving, and that had left him traumatized. That was another reason he might have begun avoiding sleep—he was likely to remember such things in his dreams.

Regardless, ZZZ and Benetnasch had a completely different outlook on sleep. The former sought it endlessly, while the latter avoided it out of fear.

One could say that they were diametrically opposed to each other, but since neither of them was the type of person to force their values on others, this didn't result in a clash of any kind.

They would both become Superiors in time—but mellow ones, as far as Superiors went.

"Oh. I'm dooone."

As they were talking, ZZZ completed his golem. Being constructed in a graveyard had given it a dark purple hue reminiscent of grudge as well as the ability to attack spirits, just as ZZZ wanted.

"Yaaay. I got iiit. I'm gonna call you 'Violet GB.'"

"And what does the GB stand for?" Persephone asked.

"Ghostbusteeer."

That made a particular tune play in Benetnasch's head for a moment, but then he said, "Speaking of which, why were you making a golem in a place like this? And why does it have to be able to attack spirits?"

"A strong undead started popping up around my sleeping spooot. I needed a guaaard."

Benetnasch's expression darkened. "Can you tell me more about this monster?"

"It's got three arms, two heads...it's all floaty and has no lower body...and it's also very aggressive and it even eats other spirits."

Upon hearing that, Benetnasch and Persephone looked at each other and nodded.

"Could you show me to this place? That monster may be my target."

"Sure thiiing. If we're gonna go beat it and get my peaceful sleep back, I'm ready to let it all hang out toooo. Wow, how lewwwd."

"Lewd...?"

The extended hours of work had left ZZZ sleepy and in a strange state of mind. Carried by the newly created Violet GB, he began leading Benetnasch to his sleeping spot—the place where they would fight the undead monster.

◇◆

Thus ZZZ met Benetnasch, cooperated with him against a powerful foe, and became his friend. This relationship endured and they had many similar experiences together—all stories for another time.

Self-Proclaimed "Small-time Baddie of the Gaol," Tasteman

Good day or evening, ladies and gentlemen—this is Tasteman, coming to you with another tasteful video.

Recently, I've been doing nothing but streaming everyone's favorite monster-hunting game, so it's been a while since I touched Dendro. It's a shame you can't really stream that one.

Anyway, since most of you can't go here yourselves, this is gonna be another video where I show you around the gaol and tell you stuff about it.

Last time, I told you about the created dungeon set up by the devs, and this time, I'll tell you about the Masters here. First, you should know that they can be split into two groups: small-time baddies and big-time villains.

This is because of how save points work.

As you all know, the gaol is the place where Masters are imprisoned when they get on wanted lists and run out of save points they can use. You can also have a "backlog" of save points, so even if you're wanted in the most recent country you visited and can't use their save points anymore as a result, you can still log back in using your save points in countries you visited previously where you aren't wanted. This works even if you're coming back from a death penalty.

That's why there are two kinds of people who run out of usable save points: small-time baddies who never even left their starting country, and big-time villains who've been all over the world.

The former are done the moment they get on their country's wanted list. They get sent here not because they're such notorious criminals that every country's out to get them, but because they don't even have what it takes to travel out from where they started.

The latter, on the other hand, are these terrifying bad guys who've got save points in multiple countries, but still did enough to get on all their wanted lists. They're much less common than the former, though.

This means that the mid-level criminals who are only wanted in some of the countries they've been to are still at large—but personally, I feel like that's a problem with Dendro's international laws rather than anything to do with the game mechanics.

Anyway, that's why the gaol's Masters are either local small-time baddies or global big-time villains. I myself am a small-time baddie who never left Legendaria and got on its wanted list for theft.

I swear I didn't kill anyone, but what I stole was valuable enough to send me here. I should've known that a cup used by Her Majesty Titania was, like, some kind of national treasure.

Please promise to learn from my mistake and don't commit crimes as casually as you would in a conventional game. If you want to experience the gaol, though, just keep watching my videos.

That aside, have you noticed?

I've been recording throughout the entire explanation, but nothing has happened yet.

Normally, someone would've called out to me or dragged me into some trouble by now...

Actually, I don't see anyone anywhere. It's a total ghost town. Usually, this place is packed with thieves—or worse.

I feel like I'm making an abandoned village exploration video.

I don't want to restart the recording, so I'll go look for villager—I mean, prisoner number one. There's a popular café in here, so I'll start there. Its hours are all over the place, so hopefully it's open right now...

Oh. And there it is. That's the café...and there's a piece of paper on the door.

If it's closed, they normally just put up a sign. What's this about...?

"The first one to visit will receive the rights to the store."

...W h u t?

◆◆◆

A few days had passed since King of Crime, Sechs Würfel and his clan IF had escaped from the gaol.

The rights to his café, Dice, went to the prisoner by the name of Tasteman, who'd just happened to miss everything that had happened here.

After this, he started the "Gaol Café Series," covering the various incidents surrounding the establishment left behind by the King of Crime, but that was another story.

The Oddballs

April, 2042, Reiji Mukudori

"Hey prez, you gathered all the EGRS members personally, right? Like you did with me?"

"Yes. I made the club, and Vice Prez Sauda was the first member. We didn’t have enough people at first, though, so it was just an association back then...but the name was the same as it is now. ‘Electronic Game Research Society’ sounds better than ‘Electronic Game Research Club.’”

N High School of N City in the N Prefecture—the school I went to respected its students’ independence and made it really easy to start new groups and the like. That meant there were all kinds of clubs, and EGRS was one of them.

“...What standards did you use while scouting us out?”

Our club was a place you could call “a den of oddballs.”

First we had President Koyomi Hoshizora—a girl from a wealthy family who was crazy about card games and had a gacha addiction. She told people’s fortunes by building decks, drawing cards, and doing other things that didn’t seem like they’d actually work. The only problem was that she got things right so often it was scary.

Next there was Vice-President Elmo Sauda—the tall and silent hit man. His pseudo-VR (that is, VR with only video and audio) FPS skills were so insane he could completely hide his presence and shoot his enemies from point-blank range before they even realized he was there.

Then there was Yubu Munegami—the biggest and scariest-looking guy in school, but who was actually a gentle giant who did volunteer work at least three times a week. When it came to gaming, he was an all-rounder who placed high in tournaments for anything ranging from fighting games to puzzle games.

Then we had Molly Forester—the virtual madwoman who thought messing with people in games was the best thing in the world. She enjoyed tricking people in Mafia-like and trap battle games more than she enjoyed getting her three daily meals.

And finally, we had Hitsuji Kata—my perverted classmate who freaked out the entire class when he, as part of his introduction, said that he was more aroused by lips than by an actual naked body. He was also a fairly popular content creator.

With me included, that made six of us—two from each school year. That was the current EGRS member composition.

“I feel like everyone besides me is very...colorful,” I said.

“The fact that you’re excluding yourself makes it clear that you’re not looking at this objectively...wait, no. It’s more likely that your standards are just ridiculous. Please don't use those around you as a baseline. Especially your sister."

Good point. Compared to my sister, the EGRS people were pretty normal.

Not Kata, though.

"Anyway, to answer your question...I invited you based on my gut instinct."

"Oh, so it wasn't fortune-telling?"

"No. I just picked people I sensed had a common fate and thought would be fun to have around."

"And you invited me at the most perfect time..."

She'd invited me right when I was looking for a club that wouldn't mind if I quit after the first year.

My dad had given me a condition I had to meet if I wanted to move to Tokyo—I had to pass UTokyo entrance exams in my last year of high school. After all that had happened with my older siblings, he was really apprehensive about letting me move out, so he gave me this insane condition hoping I wouldn't manage it. Not like that would stop me. If the possibility was there, I'd do everything to seize it.

I'd thought it would've been difficult to do it if I didn't go all-in on studying once I was in year two, though, so I'd been looking for a club that would have been fine with me quitting after the first year. That was when prez invited me, literally saying, "Would you like to join us for just one year?"

Thanks to Shu's influence, I played retro games and the like pretty often, and when I found out she was talking about a club where we'd play games, chat, and attend tourneys for genres we were good at, I felt like it was fun and had direction too, so I didn't hesitate to join.

"Besides profit, the only reasons people ever get together are gut instinct and a common fate," she said.

"You think so?"

"Yes. If that is your fate, you might eventually create a group like this yourself."

"...A group of oddballs, you mean?"

"Odd or not, if the group is fun, that means it's a good one."

◇◇◇

I hadn’t thought much of that back then, but now that I had Death Period, looking back at the president’s words filled me with a kind of awe.

Could she actually see the future?

"Minus."

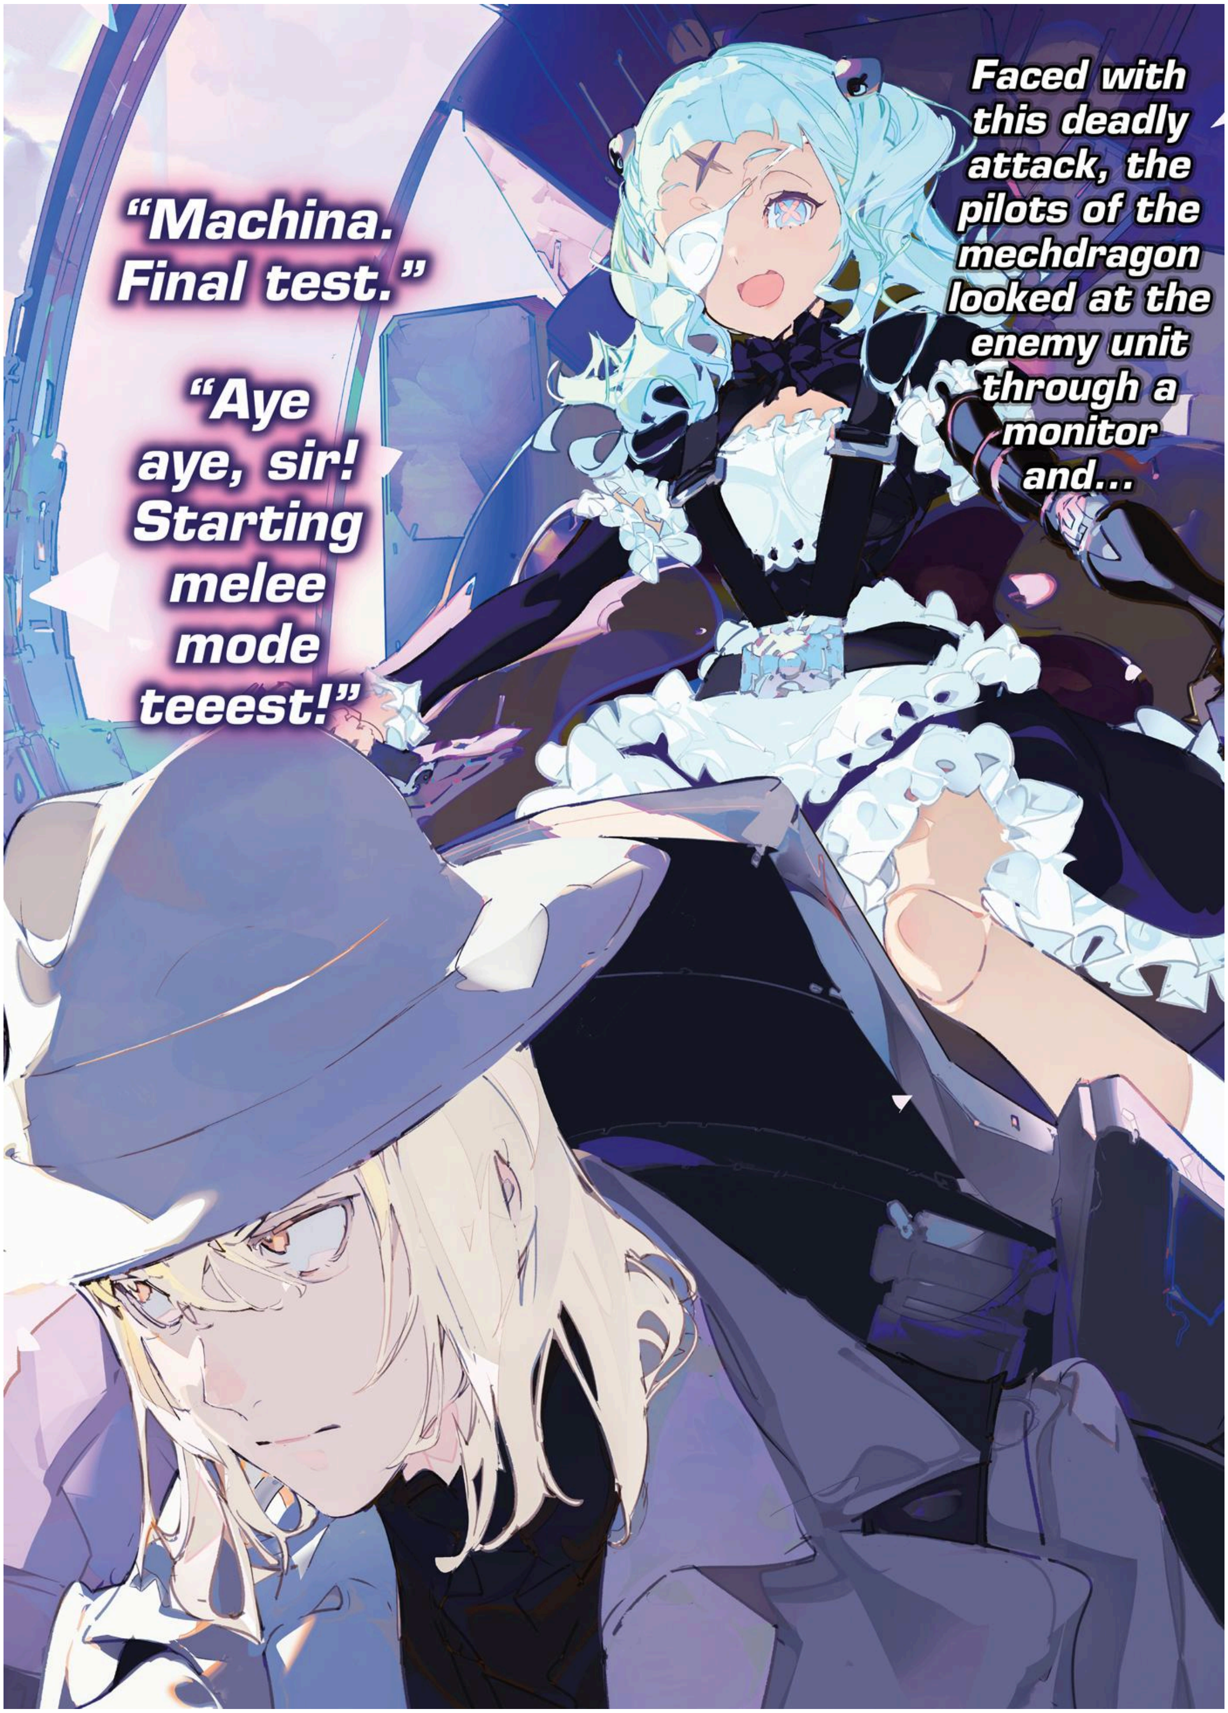
There was no way he could withstand an attack with nearly 40,000 STR behind it with nothing but his own body.

His arm would be severed and the hatchet would go on to cleave his skull.

The inevitable clash with surely fatal consequences occurred in a split second...

...but then, there was a loud clang, as though two metallic objects had met instead.

"You're wide open, Murder-Demon."



Faced with this deadly attack, the pilots of the mechdragon looked at the enemy unit through a monitor and…

“Machina. Final test.”

“Aye aye, sir! Starting melee mode teeest!”

Prologue: The Three’s Circumstances and a Single Stage

Yuri Gautier

“Yuri...where does all the money go?”

“What? What’s this about?” It was nearly the middle of April, and I was sitting in the cafeteria of the prestigious Lorraine Girls’ College when my friend—and fellow Dendro player—Sonya posed that question to me. This was a pretty wealthy school, so her words felt like they came out of nowhere and didn’t really make sense to me.

I could only think of one reason someone like her would be laying her head on the table and whining about her finances.

“You wasted your money again, didn’t you? In Dendro, I mean.”

“Nooo, I didn’t waste it... There was a gacha machine at a shop in Gideon. I saw someone roll a really nice piece of interior, so I tried rolling for something like that myself—and before I knew it, my wallet was empty!”

If that wasn’t “wasting” her money, I didn’t know what was. “Gideon’s gacha has a possible drop range that increases depending on how much money you put in, doesn’t it?” I asked. “There’s basically no restriction on the kind of stuff it can give you, so I really doubt you can get what you want from it.”

“I know that, but... Wait, I didn’t know you’d been to Gideon.”

“O-Oh. I mean, that’s what I heard, anyway.”

I need to be more careful. I didn’t tell her that I was involved in Fran’s scheme.

“Ughhh... Moments like this make me wish I could trade real money for Dendro money...”

“You can’t. RMT is forbidden worldwide.”

“NNGHH! BUT WHYYY, THOUGH?! I HAVE SO MUCH ACTUAL MONEY THAT I COULD TRADE FOR LIR!”

The Real Money Trading Ban—I felt like the full name of the law was slightly longer than that, but it had been in effect all over the world since the 2030s. It banned all and any exchange of in-game virtual currency and property for real currency and property or vice versa. The law was put in place shortly after the announcement of the first dive-type VRMMO, NEXT WORLD. Many people believed that the law's purpose was to make it so that the wealth earned in these kinds of games wouldn't have a strong impact on the real economy, since these new virtual worlds had the potential to become second homes for a lot of people.

While NEXT WORLD hadn't lived up to such expectations, Infinite Dendrogram had greatly exceeded them, so it was now widely believed that creating this law was the right move.

You had to make your own Dendro money even if you were wealthy in real life, and you couldn't trade your lir for real money even if you were rich in Dendro. And this allowed both reality and Dendro to have stable economies...at least according to Fran.

"Looking at you makes me glad we have that law," I added.

"Come ooon! Don't you get it?! It's not like I can go shopping in the dorms! I can't get that much new stuff! I can only really cut loose in Dendro, but I can't even bring my actual money there!"

"Whoa, calm down." My friend's frustrations with a lack of shopping and money in her life were obviously really getting to her, so I wanted to help her relax. "Teachers use this cafeteria too. You don't want to attract Miss Nina's attention, do you?"

Our sociology teacher was very strict—the true picture of the "ice queen" kind of instructor. She was also extremely serious about proper behavior, so she would definitely give Sonya a talking-to if she saw carrying on like this.

"Why's the school so strict about leaving the dorms, anyway? I wanna escape..."

"You really shouldn't do that. Going outside without permission will get you suspended."

We had soundproof private rooms where we were free to perform music, build models, and even log in to Infinite Dendrogram, but as a trade-off we were strictly forbidden from going outside. This was because one of the school's goals was to prevent the young ladies here from interacting too much with the wrong kind of people.

"Gnrhh...I guess I'm only really free in Dendro... Ugh, but I'm so poor there. The Love-Duel Festival is right around the corner, but I won't have enough money for anything."

"The Love-Duel Festival?" That name really didn't conjure the image of happy couples.

"It's an event in Gideon based on some romance from a long time ago. My party came to the city for some quest related to it...but my wallet isn't ready."

"Romance?"

"Yep. It's an event where you go on dates with a special someone and maybe even confess your feelings. You know, typical love festival stuff."

A love festival, huh? I thought. Wait. Hold on. Why did Ray and that Rook guy who verbally abused me just pop into my head? No! No way! That's out of the question!

"Yuri?"

"D-Don't mind me. I'm fine. Anyway, who are you going with?"

"I'll enjoy what the festival has to offer and do some quests on the side, but I don't plan to go on any dates."

"Not even with your party members?" Sonya was in a three-person party with two guys, and she'd told me lots about them and everything they'd done together. Granted, a lot of what she'd said were complaints, but the group seemed to get along despite all of that, so I thought there was a chance that something more had grown between them.

However, Sonya looked like she didn't know how to react to my question.

"Hrmm...Asuma is a kind, capable, and reliable gentleman with a good heart, but he doesn't talk and pushes around a baby carriage, so I'm not sure how a date with him would even work. And Grimms is just a scumbag."

Wow, her opinion on the two sure is uneven, I thought.

"Speaking of Grimms, you won't believe this! He recently told me that he's actually the second prince of some country and that he's only a NEET now because it became a republic. I get wanting to brag, but 'prince'? Seriously?"

"Uhh...I get what you mean." If someone had told me that, I would've just been weirded out.

"I wish I'd used Truth Discernment. I'm sure it would've gone like, 'BEEP BEEP BEEP.'"

"Is that how the skill works?" Well, even though she called him a scumbag, at least they seemed to get along well enough to crack lighthearted jokes about it.

"That reminds me that while I was losing my money at the gacha, Grimms lost his at the arena. Asuma sure got mad at us for that...I'm glad he still gave us enough to cover our daily spending after that."

Poor Asuma...you two should really fix your lives so it makes his a little easier, I thought.

Sonya planted her face right back on the table and resumed her whining. "Aaahh... I'm so brooooke... I need more Dendro moneeeyyy..."

"Come on, now—oh." With Sonya's head out of the way, I was able to see the person standing behind her—Miss Nina, the infamously strict teacher obsessed with propriety. She was looking straight at Sonya, who was still whining about having no money.

Sonya's really in for it now, I thought. I could already imagine Miss Nina approaching Sonya and saying something like "What do you mean, you 'have no money'? Did you break the rules and leave school grounds?"

However, contrary to what I expected, Miss Nina just stopped looking at Sonya and walked away.

"Uh...huh? Yuri? What's wrong?" asked Sonya, clearly unaware that she'd just escaped Miss Nina's wrath.

"Nothing," I responded, and shortly after that, breakfast time was over.

The rest of the day went by in the blink of an eye, and soon the day's classes were nearly at an end.

"That will be all for today's lesson, but we still have five minutes of class time left, so I will continue a bit further," said Miss Nina as she concluded her sociology lesson and looked us over. "Today, I talked about how climate and geopolitics influenced the history of industry and commerce all over the world. However, industry is not the only thing that changes in response to its environment."

She then went on the computer whose display was being projected for the class, opened a paint program, and began drawing something. When she was done, the screen showed two...bears: one big and one small.

"The polar bears inhabiting the cold arctic have grown larger to retain heat, further supported by their thick fur. On the other hand, you have the sun bears, which have developed smaller bodies and have short hair better suited to the warm tropics."

Bears seemed a little out of place as the subject, but Miss Nina's drawings captured the quirks of the species. Personally, I thought they were very cute. My classmates probably thought the same, but then Sonya whispered, "Regional forms," making a few of the girls chuckle.

"These wild animals developed different features because of the environment they lived in. And this is doubly true for humans. Just like animals, we have certain broad traits we developed over a long time because of our natural environments, but we also have individual personality traits developed by the social environment we grew up in as individuals."

Social environment and personality traits... I felt that this was the main subject that Miss Nina wanted to get to.

"In modern society, you are oftentimes required to adopt a personality that is suitable for the social environment you are in. People in roles like teacher or nun must possess the bare minimum amount of dignity that one would expect of someone in that profession. And the 'bare minimum' for students of this school is far higher than it is for boys and girls in society at large."

Though it had become more relaxed since the previous century, Miss Nina emphasized that this was still a prestigious, serious school for high-class ladies.

"Last week, one of our students left her dorm late at night to fool around with male students from another school. Thankfully, it did not lead to any illicit sexual relationships, but it was still a serious violation of the dorm's rules. Thus, the student in question was severely punished."

Students who left school grounds without authorization were punished with suspension. I'd told Sonya that very thing this morning.

Miss Nina had gotten there in a roundabout way, but now it looked like the point of this whole thing was to give us a preachy warning.

If Fran were here, she'd probably say something like "Miss Nina drew those little bears and talked about them just to draw you in and trap you in a goddamn sermon."

Wait, that was more like Fran when she was role-playing

Franklin...though honestly, I felt like my mental image of her was really starting to take Franklin as the default.

"'Blend it with vermilion and it will all turn red.' That's an oriental idiom similar in meaning to the quote 'he that toucheth pitch shall be defiled therewith.' You must remember that the environment you are in is the Lorraine Girls' College, and that your role is to be a student of this school. Please make an effort to live with modesty, propriety, and fidelity." She looked over us again, her gaze lingering an extra long time on Sonya.

That was exactly when the bell of the in-school church began to toll.

"And there's the bell. That concludes today's lesson."

Having said what she wanted with precision timing that almost seemed intentional, Miss Nina ended the lesson.

"Finallyyy..." Upon returning to my room, I jumped right onto my bed. It probably wasn't good for my uniform, but I'd be handing it over for cleaning soon anyway, so that didn't matter.

This was the last day of school before a short break. The week's lessons were over, and I could finally relax.

I grabbed my dog plushie next to the bed and rolled around a bit with it clutched tightly to my chest.

"'Blend it with vermilion and it will all turn red.' Hmm..." Somehow, the first words out of my mouth once the week's fatigue had started to subside were the exact ones said by Miss Nina.

Then, I remembered my current environment in Dendro. Modesty, propriety, and fidelity—there was a huge vermilion stain in my life there that was completely the opposite of all those things.

And by that, I really just meant Teach.

"I don't think she's rubbed off on me yet." There were things about her I found cool or worthy of respect, but I'd never, ever try to be as unscrupulous as her. Yeah—on that front, she was kind of an example of how not to behave.

"Well, we're separated for now, anyway." Teach had told me that she had an urgent matter to attend to and that we couldn't work together during my break. To make up for it, she'd offered me a part-time job. Apparently someone Teach worked with needed some help with something, and she suggested I take the job since it would also be a learning experience.

"She also said 'he's a piece of work, but he pays well.'" I wasn't sure what to expect from someone whom she, of all people, would call a "piece of work."

Unlike Sonya, I wasn't in desperate need of Dendro money, but maintenance for Fran's White Rose was more expensive than for Marshall II, so it wouldn't hurt to have more funds.

"And I'll be working on a fancy sand-cruiser..." Even though it was in Dendro, this would be the first part-time job I'd ever had.

And with the location being so luxurious, I was actually pretty excited for it.

2045, April, Arizona

The hospital was located near mountainous forests, away from any urban area. The exterior of the building was spotless and well maintained. In fact, it was practically overflowing with beauty and cleanliness.

However, since there were no towns nearby that could provide it with patients, it could be argued that it didn't fulfill its fundamental purpose as a hospital. The moment anyone noticed the high walls and multiple fences surrounding the grounds, though, that impression would completely change.

The building looked more like a mix between a hospital and a prison, and a sign on the entrance read "Buer Mental Hospital."

That alone made the reason for its location obvious. This was not a place for emergency patients, and it was not a place meant to be seen by ordinary folk.

The facility's main gate—as secure as everything else about it—opened up, and a luxury car entered the hospital grounds. There were signs at the roadside, but the driver clearly had no need for them. The way the car headed straight for the underground parking lot made it obvious that they'd been here many times before.

"I'll be there for about two hours, as usual. Wait for me here," a young man in a nice suit said to the driver as he stepped out of the car. His apparel would not be out of place for a patient at a regular hospital, but this was a mental facility for people who had both sufficient wealth and circumstances. Knowing that, his clothes took on a different meaning—he wasn't someone who came to be admitted, but rather someone who had made it so that someone else was.

"Hello, Craig. We've been waiting for you," said a doctor who'd been waiting at the entrance for the appointed visitation time.

"Hey, doc. Thanks, as always," said the youth in response, his tone friendly. "Anyway, let's get down to business. How is she?"

"She's doing quite well. Her symptoms have subsided and she hasn't had any episodes."

Although it came at a great monetary cost, this hospital guaranteed state-of-the-art facilities, treatments, and privacy. The girl that the young man had hidden away here also had circumstances that made it necessary to conceal her from society at large.

Guided—and observed—by the doctor, the young man was led to a visitation room. There, a girl waited at the other side of the special glass that divided the space.

Upon seeing the young man, her face lit up.

"Rascyal!"

"Hey, Emily. I came to visit you." The girl—Emily—called out to the young man with a face full of joy and the inflection of a child not quite used to speaking.

However, the word she used puzzled the doctor. He knew this young businessman's first name, and "Rascal" wasn't it.

The young man—also known as Rascal the Bloodonyx, a sub-leader of the Illegal Frontier clan in Infinite Dendrogram—noticed the doctor's confusion and, with a wry grin on his face, said, "It's like a nickname."

"I see," the doctor said in response. It sure is a mean one, he thought to himself, but didn't say it out loud.

He then left the room, leaving only Rascal and Emily, still separated by the glass.

"It's been a while since we met here," said Rascal. "You got any requests?"

"Shooboost!"

"Shooboost...? Shoe? And boost? You want rocket boots or something?" That seems like something more to Machina's tastes, he thought. Well, she definitely could make a pair in Dendro*, but I don't think they have those in the real world. Or were they already talking about making something like that on the other side...? It wouldn't be the first time that piece of scrap has* used my money and mats to make new stuff.

Rascal's thoughts drifted to the one-eyed robot maid that he owned. She was in charge of the clan's tech, but she was so goofy and gave him so much trouble that just thinking about her caused a look of exhaustion to cross his face.

"No. It's not boots, but sweets!" Emily said, shaking her head.

"Huh...? Oh, do you mean 'chiboust'?" Chiboust meant a cake covered in what was called crème chiboust—a mix of custard and meringue—that had its surface caramelized by scorching.

"That!" said Emily, her smile growing deeper from getting Rascal to understand her. "Gerberya made some and it was very very tasty!"

"That dumba—that simple girl is delicate enough to make pastries?" Rascal muttered in surprise. He'd only known Gerbera before Shu had sent her to the gaol—though she'd actually had that particular skill even back then, before Sechs's instruction. "All right. I'll bring some next time we meet."

"Yaaay!"

"Anything else you want? Doesn't matter if it's here or there."

"Umm...I wanna..."

The two went on to speak with each other for about an hour.

"We'll meet on the other side next time," Rascal said as the conversation ended and he went to walk out of the visitation room. "And I'll see you here again next week."

"See youuu!" said Emily with a wave of her hand.

Instead of going straight for the exit, Rascal went to the doctor's reception office. He sat down on the sofa, and the doctor waiting there handed him a collection of documents—the clinical files of the girl who had been here for over a year.

"These are her records for the latest month."

"Still a long way to go until she's fit for society, huh?"

"The episodes may have stopped, but her mental age is still only about half of her actual age..." Physically, Emily was just slightly shorter than an average girl her age, but her manner of speech still seemed unusually childish. However, both her mental age and height were not a result of something innate—they were something she acquired.

"Her condition isn't just the result of the incident, but also the many years she spent in that family environment. It is not something that can be cured simply with antidepressants or sedatives. It seems quite clear that what she needs most of all is time."

"No changes there, huh?" Rascal said, his face troubled and his eyes closed, before nodding and saying, "Very well. Please continue as you have. And please continue with the treatment that I've suggested."

"The VR game? Her condition has certainly improved since she began playing it. It does seem that meeting other people is a plus for her, even if it's in a game."

"Yes. I'm sure it is."

The doctor didn't play Infinite Dendrogram himself and didn't inquire about the details. He thought of it as little different from the video games he used to play in his own childhood.

"And she can't exactly kill anyone in a video game, can she?"

"...Yes. That is true."

The doctor's careless words didn't even make Rascal change his expression. He merely nodded—after all, the doctor was half-right. At the very least, as long as she was logged in, the real Emily would never decide that someone was a "minus" or commit any more crime. Not even if, on the other side, she was the Murder Princess herself.

After talking to the doctor, Rascal returned to the parking lot and walked back to his car.

The driver fired up the engine. Rascal, seated in one of the rear seats surrounded by bulletproof and soundproof glass, took out a tablet device and scrolled through it, focusing on data files that had been added or updated.

"Nothing of note, huh?"

The data files were a map of a world and the happenings within it. However, it wasn't a map of the Earth, but the world in Infinite Dendrogram, and the data on it had been gathered by Illegal Frontier's supporting Masters.

"Dryfe's preparing for those peace talks I heard about. Altar too, but they've also got the Love-Duel Festival. And Caldina's...initiating negotiations with Granvaloa."

Rascal had been prioritizing the info related to Caldina—the country that currently hosted his and Emily's avatars.

"More localized info says that the armed organization calling itself 'Dryfe's Legitimate Government' is becoming more active, and that Eltram, a luxury sand-cruiser that Crys Fragment worked on, is gonna be put into commission..." To Rascal's eyes, he'd spotted a handful of sparks that could catch into a roaring fire.

"I wonder what the best course of action is for our clan's development...and for Emily," he said to himself. "For now, though..."

Rascal put away the tablet and took out the device he used for his real job. Though he had IF to worry about, there were also living expenses and hospital bills to pay, so Rascal couldn't neglect his real company either.

A Story from a Civil War

It was November of 2044 (reality time), and the imperial army base located in the outskirts of the imperial capital of Vandelheim was aflame.

The army that had sworn to protect the imperium had been torn in two, and now it was at war with itself. The burning base was littered with corpses of soldiers and the broken remains of disabled weapons.

And in the heart of it all, a battle raged between one giant machine and countless human-shaped entities.

The former was a Magingear with a generally humanoid body plan, but it stood out among the conventional Marshall II units because of the unusual feature fixed on its torso—a draconic head that made its overall silhouette look more like an upright dragon than a person.

The creatures it faced were wooden marionettes equipped with firearms.

"SMTF Captain...no...Marquis Barbaros! Your conspiracy with Reinhard ends here and now! Missile Darts!" The dragon-headed unit pointed its left arm at the marionettes—and then the armor on its forearm rose up to fire numerous missiles at the wooden marionettes, reducing many to splinters.

"Major General Eldona. You know the rules of inheritance established by the previous imperator. The throne of Dryfe now rightfully belongs to that child. There is nothing to be gained from any more fighting amongst ourselves."

The marionette soldiers responded only with more gunfire, cooperating as though coordinated by but one mind.

The dragon-headed machine's pilot continued. "The gall! My cousin, first prince Gustav—his son, Hallon...how dare you say that after killing them and so many other members of the imperial family...?!"

"I..." The machine pilot's words had robbed the marionette commander of any ability to respond.

"Or are you simply arrogant because your side has King of Beasts, yourself, and Lady Claudiah?! Do you truly believe your power will be enough to claim this land?! With the exception of Dryfe's strongest soldier, SMTF Commander Mord Machiné, you all are the strongest individual combatants in the country. However..." The dragon-headed unit thrust a close-range weapon behind it, skewering a marionette soldier that had tried to approach it from behind. "Not a single weapon here surpasses this unit I drive, nor is there anyone whose piloting skill exceeds my own!" The unit continued to destroy each and every single marionette that came too close, and it moved with flexibility and finesse that made humans look dull, fighting with technique that could pass for art.

"As long as I exist, our true imperium will never fall!"

"You were given that unit so you could protect this land. How shameful that you would instead use it to fuel a civil war."

"If this isn't protecting this land, I'd like to hear what is...usurper!"

"I know that trying to find any justice in this war is a fool's errand—and I suppose that is why we have no choice but to fight. But surely you know there is one thing at which I am truly unmatched. And that is numbers."

The marionettes around the dragon-headed unit had all been destroyed—but they were but a fraction of the entire army.

The marionettes dispersed throughout the base were starting to gather at the site of the battle, and new ones were being made from the metallic remains of the weapons scattered about. These innumerable puppets moved as one to overwhelm and destroy the hostile unit.

The strongest pilot in Dryfe—Over Pilot Curtis Eldona. The wielder of a Mythical MVP reward—Zero General Gifted Barbaros.

This was a deadly clash between the two extremes in the imperium's army: quality and quantity. It would all come down to which one of them would break through the other's offense and claim the life of his opponent. The two knew full well that it would be over for them the moment their enemy's attack reached them, so they gathered their resolve and prepared to face death when...

"The SMTF forces who assaulted the false imperator have been destroyed! And when the Superior...I mean, when Splendida realized that, he stopped restraining King of Beasts and ran away!"

...Curtis received news from his forces that brought the battle to a sudden end.

"What...?!" Curtis could ask for no clearer indication that his side had been defeated. The soldier's words had revealed the harsh truth—they had gambled everything on this operation, and they had failed.

"This is it, Major General. Let us end this civil war."

"No! It's not over yet! This doesn't mean our ultimate defeat...!" In his heart of hearts, Curtis wished for the battle to continue, but as an army man, he understood full well the choice he had to make now that his forces were being overwhelmed. "I will retreat...for now!" Curtis said, activating the smokescreen installed in his unit.

"Major General!"

"Marquis Barbaros!" Even as Curtis retreated, he gave voice to the will still burning within him. "We will not accept the reign of a usurper! Never forget this moment, and one day, we will surely free..." Here, one of his words was drowned in the noise of an explosion. "...from your vile grasp!" Curtis cried before finally disappearing from the scene.

Those who heard Curtis's words presumed the inaudible word must have been "Dryfe," but the truth was unknown to all except the man who had said it.

Whatever his declaration might have been, the civil war sparked by the inheritance of the throne had reached its end, leaving behind only this one smoldering ember.

◆◆◆

April, 2045, Caldina

Curtis Eldona woke up inside his unit.

"...Another dream of that day." It was more like a nightmare, really—the detestable memory of his escape from his homeland. "I suppose it's on my mind because we're preparing for a major operation."

After losing the civil war that day, the group Curtis commanded—

Dryfe's First Armored Battalion—had moved their operations to Caldina. Reinhard or his pawns would have easily found them had they remained, and Caldina was the only place where they could procure supplies.

These days, the Battalion did their maintenance themselves, obtaining the required parts from the Caldinan black market by either purchase or theft.

"Major General? Are you awake?" a subordinate asked him over the comms.

"I am. I must say, though, as dear as this unit is to me, it is certainly not designed for a pleasant night's sleep," Curtis replied, only half-serious.

"There's no need to sleep in the cockpit every night, is there? Why not use a bed?" the subordinate replied, sounding concerned.

Curtis was well aware that a bed would be preferable, but there were reasons he always chose his unit over a bed.

"Every warrior is at his most defenseless when asleep. If I am to die, I want to rest here, within this machine. This will be my coffin...my Inventory."

Merchants making long journeys, adventurers undertaking jobs given by the combat guilds, career soldiers, and other people in a similar line of work were at high-risk of dying far away from home. Because of that, it was customary to store their remains in time-stopping Inventories when the worst came to pass and bring them back to their homes for burial. That was what Curtis's odd choice of words referred to.

Another reason he chose to sleep in the cockpit was that he was especially wary of some specific people coming for his head in his sleep.

His group—known as Dryfe's Legitimate Government or DLG—was a known anti-government force in Dryfe and an armed militia in Caldina. As it was a nuisance to both countries, there was a high chance the group's leader would become a target for assassination.

"Very well. Also, I am sure you are aware, but the briefing is in ten minutes."

"I know."

Curtis cut the comms and opened the cockpit. A leader like him had to look at least passable, so he stood in front of a mirror to get himself ready and caught sight of the look in his own eyes—haggard, so unlike how he'd looked when he was still in Dryfe.

“I certainly have sunk low,” he said in self-derision.

Curtis had lost count of how many crimes he’d committed here in Caldina in order to maintain his group and its power—but he had a goal he had to achieve no matter the cost.

“We will bring down Reinhard. And then...”

For the sake of the desire that he refused to name out loud, Curtis had resolved to accept a particular task.

Ten minutes later, the members of DLG had gathered in the warehouse that doubled as their briefing hall. There were hundreds of them, and they all wore the same clothes—the uniform of the Dryfean military. They were forming orderly lines, and before them stood Curtis’s unit—the majestic dragon-headed Magingear.

“Comrades, we are about to commence our biggest operation since we moved here to Caldina.” Curtis spoke to his subordinates, his Magingear behind him.

A moment later, multiple pictures were projected on the warehouse wall.

“Our target is the desert liner, Eltram. We will break into it, take the passengers hostage, and claim our target object from the energy block. An inside sympathizer has arranged the infiltration process for us.”

The projection showed the ship’s exterior and a sketch of its design, along with a photo of some sort of large device. Curtis used a pointer to indicate specific parts of the picture and lay out the details of the operation.

“If we keep going as we are, we will lose a large amount of our supplies. Because of this, I have sent Lieutenant Colonel Berlin’s squad on a routine supply mission. Now, I am sure you have realized this by now, but this operation will endanger more civilians than any we have undertaken before.”

That last sentence was received with nervous gulps from a few—if not more than a few—of his subordinates.

“But as you know by now, Caldina is our enemy. Do not let their casualties distract you,” Curtis continued, his voice hardened with absolute certainty. “While the false imperator Reinhard was a fool to start a war with Altar in the first place, Caldina intervened in it by attacking only Dryfe, directly contributing to our homeland’s dire situation. And this was not their only hostile action. They ceased food exports to Dryfe while our people were going through a famine and used that opportunity to hoard wealth for themselves. As far as the imperium is concerned, they are evil!”

Curtis justified their upcoming actions out loud in order to alleviate the psychological burden his battalion might carry as they embarked upon their mission. He’d been doing this since they’d begun taking people’s supplies by force.

“And this operation will reward us with something we must have! Something that will grant us power and will be indispensable in taking back our homeland! Indeed—this will be a weapon against the murderer of first prince Gustav and his son Hallon! The blade that strikes down the vile, tyrannical false imperator Reinhard!” Curtis’s assertion of their justice was deceitful, but he didn’t let them realize it—and if they did regardless, they simply looked away from it.

If they didn’t believe themselves to be just, they would be unable to carry out any military actions so far away from their homes.

“To empower our justice and to secure a future for Dryfe, we must make this operation a success even if it means sacrificing all who stand in our way!”

And so, the battalion replied with a passionate roar.

“This operation will bring us closer to our true goal! Victory to the true Dryfe!”

“VICTORY TO THE TRUE DRYFE!” The soldiers of DLG saluted in unison, and Curtis responded the same way.

They would soon carry out their operation—to them, it was righteous, but to others, merely criminal.

Thus the capriccio set on a sand liner was about to begin.

Chapter One: The Part-Time Job and the Man Who Calls Himself Vulgar

Armored Pilot, Hugo Lesseps

Eltram was a newly built desert liner that had just set off on its maiden voyage. Focused on providing a safe and pleasant trip to its wealthy passengers, it was equipped with a casino, a shopping mall, a pool, a theater, and a lot of other fancy amenities. It reminded me of the cruise ship we'd gone on in reality for a family trip back before our parents divorced.

There were two big differences between that ship and Eltram, though.

First, when looking outside, I didn't see a blue ocean, but instead a white desert—this ship was moving on the sand. This would have been an impossible sight in reality, so this view had a pretty big impact on me.

The second difference was on the sides of the ship, and in a way, it was even more startling than the first.

This ship was equipped with rows of cannons. That was definitely something that a real cruise ship didn't have, because it didn't have to deal with monster attacks, obviously.

The cannons were there to deal with giant worms and other aggressive creatures that would undoubtedly approach Eltram. In addition to that, this ship was accompanied by a convoy of many smaller sand-ships ready to protect it if necessary.

This was a world where a "safe and pleasant trip" basically meant there would be a lot of force at the ready to protect you.

"Tasteless, isn't it?" said a person sitting at the same table as me, bringing my attention back to the inside of the ship.

I was seated at the best table in the ship's open-air restaurant. The man with us had said that we'd talk business once we'd eaten, and invited us here for a meal.

"It is. Can the passengers actually relax like this?" I asked.

"The tians can. They were born and raised in a world full of man-eating monsters. They understand the necessity of protective power on a level we can't comprehend. In fact, don't you think that all these cannons would make them more relaxed?"

Good point, I thought. This might look extraordinary to me, but I guess tians see it as completely normal.

"But we aren't like that. Even if the taste of food doesn't change, these cannons make the feeling of the flavor a bit empty. Next."

Despite complaining about the impact the defenses may have on food, he'd polished off the meat on his plate and was now asking for the next dish.

"Phew. This ship's chef isn't an SJ, but this still tastes great. Then again, skills generally don't have a strong effect on cooking."

"Really?"

"Cooking is a sense skill that lets you create food of taste you want to make with a degree of perfection based on the skill's level. In the end, it all depends on your own sense of taste. If yours is awful, you will make terrible food even if your Cooking level is high. Conversely, if you have the technique, you can make delicious food even if you don't have the actual skill. For example, my Isara here is also an excellent cook."

"Thank you for your kind words," said Isara—a tian woman and the man's bodyguard.

"I see..." I said.

"There are exceptions, though, like the leader of our clan... Ah, next," the man added as he emptied another plate.

It was strange how he could speak so fluently while eating. He didn't even make any chewing sounds.

"Hmm. You're not eating much," he said. "Is there something in the food you don't like? That slutty AR-I-CA girl told me that you're a vegetarian and your companion here has a strange diet of only white things."

"O-Oh, this is very good. It's just...I'm a bit overwhelmed by how fast you're eating."

I'd already seen how Nemesis ate, and I wouldn't have expected anyone to compare to her, but this man certainly gave her a run for her money. Also, with Nemesis, I could handwave it as one of those eccentric diets Maidens tended to have—but he was a Master, not an Embryo.

He didn’t really look like any Master I knew. He was, well...how could I put it...?

“You’re eating too much, fatty.”

“Yes, you’re very corpule...wait, CYCO?!” That’s too blunt even by your standards! You do realize he’s our contractor and a Superior, right?!

“Hmm. ‘You’re eating too much, fatty,’ eh? It’s true—I can’t deny it. Don’t you agree?”

“I do. You are indeed a gourmand, sir.”

Unaffected by Cyco’s verbal abuse, the man exchanged a few words with Isara.

Well, he was clearly obese. Coupled with his rather short height, it almost seemed like he was wider than he was tall. His stomach area was especially big. It looked like he was hiding a ball under his shirt...no, it was more like his whole torso was one huge ball.

But despite that, he had a pretty face. It felt like he'd made a pretty-boy avatar and then gone on to get fat afterward.

"Umm...did you make yourself look like that in character creation?" There were people out there who gave themselves silly features like huge mohawks, and Fran and I myself were so different from our real selves we weren't even the same sex, so maybe it was a similar situation with him.

"Heh heh heh. No, actually. Be careful—if you eat too much and don't get a death penalty for long enough, you'll end up like this too. I'm actually the only person I know whose avatar got fattened up to this point, but it's not like I did it just to see what would happen."

Okay, yes, I'll keep that in mind, I thought. This is another person whose mistakes I can learn from, just like Teach.

"And even though it might sound like it contradicts the advice I just gave you, when you're on this side, don't be afraid to enjoy food to your heart's content. Unlike in real life, overeating and overdrinking won't affect your health at all, and even if you do die anyway, you'll just come back from the death penalty exactly as you were before."

That was an interesting way to think about it...

"Oh, and in Dendro, you can also have as many lovers as you want."

"...What?"

"No matter how many people talk behind your back about it on this side, it doesn't mean anything in real life. And there's many more beauties here than over in the real world. I have lots of lovers myself. Isara here is my favorite, though."

"Heh heh...and I wonder how many of the others you've said that to, hmm?"

Ohh, so that's the situation with these two. I get it.

"Ugh, how vulgar."

"Cyco! Don't just say that!" The way she just pointed straight at him as she insulted him shocked even me.

Yet, again, he didn't seem bothered whatsoever.

"Indeed. I am vulgar. I basically play Dendro just to eat lots of incredible food and spend my nights with beautiful ladies. I don't see it as anything to be ashamed of. I have the money for it, after all."

He claimed to be vulgar—essentially boasting about it—and didn't seem to feel any guilt or shame over it. It felt as if he was completely true to his job's name.

After all, he was King of Revelry, Moneygold.

Just like Teach, he was a Superior who belonged to Sefirot.

She'd told me that he was "the man who'd created the most wealth" and that he was a person of debauchery and vulgarity—but on that second point, he was even worse than I'd heard.

"And if the RMT ban didn't exist, I'd be better off in reality too..."

Sounds like he's got the exact opposite problem of Sonya's.

After saying that, he once again resumed eating as if to distract himself from something.

"Hungry, hungry, lewd fatty," said Cyco.

"Indeed! Speaking of which, are you interested in being my lover as well? My starting offer is ten million per month."

"Hey! That's my Embryo you're talking to! Don't make proposals like that!" He dropped that bomb like it's nothing! Even Cyco is so shocked she's practically frozen solid! "And why her, anyway?! Are you into little girls or something?!"

"A beauty is a beauty. Age is irrelevant. In fact, I believe that even species doesn't matter. Legendarians and even some nonhumanoids aren't off-limits for me."

How is he so open about his sexual proclivities?! "Are you sure you're not one of Legendaria's Superiors?!"

"Don't joke like that. That'd make me a colleague of LS Ergo Sum. I'd never want to be grouped with that degenerate."

My threshold for "Legendarian perverts" just keeps going higher, I thought. Also, I'm pretty sure Teach said pretty much the same thing as him.

"Wait, are you and Teach like that too?" I asked. She'd said that she was into both men and women, after all...

"Huh?" But despite what I expected, Moneygold made a very disgusted face. "Even I have some standards. Just imagining sleeping with that dumb slut sends a chill down my spine..."

Oh. I see how it is, I thought. When talking about Moneygold, Teach had told me that he was “a piece of work,” and now I knew why—these two were just too similar to get along. At least when it came to sexuality, they were basically the same type of people.

“Oh, and unlike her, I have no interest in homosexual encounters, so I won’t be offering a lover’s contract to you.”

“I wasn’t planning on asking!” Actually, I really couldn’t tell if he was worse or better than her. As he continued to weird me out with every new sentence that came out of his mouth, we finished our food and moved on to enjoying some post-meal tea. Cyco had also recovered from her shock and was now drinking a drink that looked like lassi.

“Anyway, let’s get down to business. There’s actually two matters I’d like to discuss,” said Moneygold.

“Two?”

“First is the part-time job AR-I-CA told you about, while the second is just a trade offer. Let’s start with the job. What I want you to do is protect me.”

“Protect?” A Superior was asking for my protection? “Do you actually need that?” I asked.

“I do. I may be part of Sefirot, but when it comes to combat, I’m one of the weaker ones—just like that dumb slut, in fact.” One of the weaker ones in Sefirot—and similar to Teach? “My stats are especially low. I can’t keep up with people moving at the speed of sound, so someone with that capability would kill me right away. That’s why I have Isara, a combat SJ, as my bodyguard and lover.”

“Heh heh. Exactly,” Isara said with a smile and a nod.

This made sense. For a noncombat-focused Superior like Moneygold, the best bodyguard was a tian like her, since unlike us Masters, they were around all the time.

“But that seems like even more reason you don’t need me...” I said.

“Ah!” I instantly knew that he was referring to one of the Orbs that had UBMs sealed within them. When one of them had been broken recently, it had released a giant monster in the middle of Cortana...

“Someone obtained the Orb by chance, and this ship is where we will negotiate a transfer to us. Now...it’s not clear how relevant she was, but Murder Princess Emily Killingston was involved in the Cortana incident, wasn’t she?”

“Yes...” The immortal Superior, Murder Princess Emily—the girl who had killed an unthinkable amount of people, though I didn’t know why. Just remembering her made my heart feel heavy, and I couldn’t help but wonder what her reasons were.

“Are you okay?”

“...Yes.” I supposed thinking about Emily had made me look so down that Moneygold had gotten concerned.

If you ignored his vulgarity and debauchery, he was probably a decent person after all.

“Then I will continue. The presence of the Orb here makes it possible that the Murder Princess or someone associated will show up here too. I heard that she is immortal, and it’s clear that not even my Isara can overcome such absurd odds. My matchup with her isn’t exactly good either.”

Murder Princess Emily could come back from the dead over and over, and she grew stronger every time she committed murder.

Logically speaking, there really was no way to win against her. But if anyone had a chance, it would be...

“Absurd as she is, though, there is one Master who does have a good matchup against her—you.”

“So...you’re hiring me in case she shows up?” Cyco could unconditionally freeze targets based on their kill count of their own kind, while White Rose had Boucliers Planetes, which would prevent Emily from committing suicide—both of which were a direct counter to her abilities.

“Exactly. Will you do it?” Moneygold asked.

I hesitated for a moment. I wasn’t sure if it was really a good idea to fight against Emily. But if she started a rampage on this ship like she had in Cortana, someone would have to stop her. And if I was the only one who could do it...

“I will.”

“It’s settled then. Thank you. I’ll prepare a reward that I’m sure will satisfy you.”

“Thank you. So, what was the other thing? A trade offer, right?”

“Yes,” Moneygold said before taking a sip of his tea and looking right at me. “Once you’ve done your job here, would you be interested in selling your White Rose to me for ten billion lir?”

“No.” The trade suggestion came suddenly and out of nowhere, but my response was even faster. I was pretty sure it was reflexive at this point—faster than my actual thoughts—and that I would’ve said the same even if his offer had been a hundred times bigger.

He was already offering more than White Rose had cost to produce, but it wasn’t a matter of money. The Magingear had been Fran’s birthday present to me. I could never, ever sell it to someone else.

“Didn’t even have to think on that one, eh? All right, I’ll give up on that.”

“...Huh?” I knew that I was the one who’d refused, but it surprised me how quickly he backed down.

“Are you surprised that I gave up so easily?”

“Well...yes.”

“I have principles—one of them being that I seek out anything I can get with enough money, but give up on things I can’t. I may make a bigger offer if I think it will work, but that’s not the case here, right? And I would never, ever try to take anything by force.”

He really was kinda like Teach. She also made a lot of propositions, but if they clearly weren’t interested, she never got aggressive about it.

“I’m satisfied with just things that I can actually buy. It’s also the reason I’m in Sefirot.”

“Hm?”

“So AR-I-CA never told you this, did she?” Having no idea what he was talking about, I shook my head. “We Sefirot are a clan of Superiors gathered by demand of the Caldinan congress. Even those of us who were unaffiliated with any country before are now under this country’s management. We have to do personalized quests like this one, so we lose some freedom, but in exchange we are granted certain privileges.”

I did know that Sefirot was created by Caldina’s decree, but the fact that they’d gotten anything out of the deal in return was news to me.

“In my case, I got the right to participate in rare auctions and exclusive markets available only to certain merchants...though, I do limit my spending there. Overbuying causes problems and makes a lot of enemies. I want to be a buyer whom the sellers can appreciate.”

“Is that what Teach got too?”

"I wouldn't know—that's no concern of mine. Prying into the perks the other members got would only cause trouble. I'm only revealing mine because I'm satisfied with it, and also because it's relatively tame."

Teach always seemed like such a free spirit. What could she have wanted that was worth joining Sefirot?

"Anyway, that's it for business. Your period of employment starts tomorrow, when we'll do the Orb trade, and ends when we make it to the final stop at Drac-Nomad."

"Tomorrow?"

"Yes. That's when the party we'll negotiate with will get on the ship. That means today is basically a day off for you, but if you can, use it to get a grasp of the ship's structure."

Moneygold then handed me a comms device.

"If anything happens, use that to contact me. You can judge whether or not something's an emergency. Oh, and tell me if you have to log out to eat or bathe or anything else that takes a while."

"Okay."

"All right. I'll be counting on you." Moneygold then left me the key to our cabin and walked out of the restaurant. From what I could see, he paid for everything the both of us had eaten.

"That fatty's lewd and lavish, it seems."

"Yeah. He's, well...quite the character."

He also wasn't shaken by Cyco's insults, so it seemed like he was pretty bighearted too.

"His heart's not the only thing that's big."

It felt like Cyco was even more harsh with him than she was with Fran. Was she bothered by his offer to become his lover? No, she'd been acting that way before he'd said that.

"Anyway, we have work to do until we make it to Drac-Nomad. Let's do a good job."

"Oui, ma'am." Someone could come after the Orb. We had to be on high alert.

Eltram

The day Hugo boarded Eltram, it made a stop at a particular city after it got dark. There, it picked up some new passengers and resumed its voyage.

On the deck, a group of three people who had just boarded were engaged in a conversation.

"We...actually made it on here, leader."

"Yeah. We were clear even by the standards of a luxury liner. Looks like Caldina doesn't even have us on their secret wanted lists... I guess that's because they didn't see our faces even when they defeated us."

"That means we can do our thing without worryin' about nothin'! Caldina really is the best! There's so much money here! Oh...this actually kinda reminds me of when we went to Granvaloa and our ship broke and we all drowned. Hope that never happens again."

It was a trio of one man and two women. They were all Masters, as indicated by the Embryo crests on the backs of their left hands.

One woman was a spectacled beauty with a stern expression, while the other was a girl whose scarred face gave her the look of a true bandit.

And finally, the man they called "leader" was a youth with fiery red hair. He was wearing a crimson jacket lined with fur that looked like a lion's mane. While the red of his hair was a natural color, his jacket looked as though it had been painted in blood.

"Let's find out how this thing's built, then find what we're here for. Niala, Fey."

"Yes."

"Roger thaaat!"

The man then faced the two...

"This is where we'll start rebuilding Goblin Street."

...and spoke his will as King of Burglary, Eldridge.

Chapter One: The Luxury Liner and Its Troublesome Passengers

About Goblin Street

Goblin Street had once been an Altarian PK clan that was infamous even by the standards of PK clans. Unlike other well-known PK groups like Mad Castle or K&R, Goblin Street had not hesitated to rob tian merchants as well.

Of course, this had gotten them on the wanted list, but the clan had been composed of high-level Masters and boasted King of Burglary, Eldridge as its leader. His great power as a single unit was evident, but he also excelled at analysis and was a skilled tactician.

Because of that, Goblin Street had been a PK clan that many knew and feared.

However, it had since suffered through five failures that had reduced the clan into the dirt.

First had been the counterattack to the blockade at Altea they'd put up alongside other PK clans. While Eldridge was away, they were attacked by a Superior, Lei-Lei, Prodigal of Feasts, who destroyed the clan for the first time. However, it hadn't been a fatal blow to the group. Though many members who didn't have save points in other countries were lost to the gaol, about half of them were spared. On top of that, it wasn't as though Lei-Lei had defeated Eldridge—the strongest among them. Eldridge was a match for Superiors, and his clan still believed that he could win against them.

That belief had died with their second defeat, which came soon after they'd moved operations to the border between Caldina and Altar.

The members of Goblin Street had spotted a group that possessed a mobile save point carriage—an immense luxury only a few in Altar could boast. This treasure had both practical and monetary value that they simply couldn't ignore.

Because of this, Eldridge and the rest of Goblin Street had tried to attack them, but luck hadn't been on their side. As it turned out, the group was accompanied by one of Huang He's Superiors—Xunyu. Her ultimate was a sure-kill skill that had torn out Eldridge's heart and quickly given him the death penalty.

The other members had not stood a chance after that, and Goblin Street was destroyed for the second time.

This was when people began to leave the clan of their own accord.

After that, their third destruction came when they simply happened to be too close to The Earth, Fatoum, as he was making his way back home to Caldina. The Superior had sunk them along with an entire mountain—a luxurious burial, no doubt.

This defeat had led to people quitting the clan en masse even if they hadn't been sent to the gaol. Whether they'd lost faith in Eldridge or simply noticed that their luck had run dry was uncertain, but there were still a few who stayed.

The next time was when they acquired a ship and tried their hand at piracy in Granvaloa.

However, right after they started, they stumbled upon another Superior, Great Admiral Antimicrobic Soy Sauce. The man nicknamed "The Human Bomb" had used his explosive powers to deliver Goblin Street's fourth destruction. With that, the clan had lost almost all of its members, leaving only Eldridge himself, Niala, and Fey.

Then, they got their hands on another ship and tried to ply their trade in a part of the South Sea close to Tenchi—an area where Granvaloa had comparatively little influence. However, by some accident—which was starting to look like an inevitability—they encountered The Slash, Saki Muryo-Taisu, as she was rafting to the continent. This meeting ended quickly, with the Tenchi Superior splitting them in two along with their ship.

This was their fifth destruction.

All of these defeats came at the hands of Superiors, which made this entire sequence of events quite unusual.

Regardless, it had left Goblin Street absolutely destitute. Not only had they lost their ships and dropped items upon each death, they were also forced to buy replacements for what they lost and repairs for the items they kept. By the fifth defeat, they had almost completely run out of funds.

Without money to buy a new ship, they had no choice but to travel by land to Caldina and spend some time making money through normal quests and monster hunts.

Odd as it might have been at this point, they suffered no absurd Superior encounters while doing this.

This had caused Niala to put on a contemplative face and speak of “karma” and “retributive justice,” something she called an “eastern proverb.” Of course, this wasn’t really a “proverb” at all, but a concept originating in Buddhism.

Eldridge had spent those days lost in negative thoughts. He’d been killed in an instant so many times now that he was questioning if he was worth anything at all. Up until now, he’d been able to analyze the strengths of his enemies and figure out a good way to counter them. However, Superiors kept killing him so fast he had no time to cook up any kind of plan. His self-worth had dropped so low that he began to believe that he was only strong by pre-Superior standards, and that he had no chance against the Superiors themselves.

He’d also started to feel bad for the two women that continued to stick with him even after all these failures.

They stay with me cause they believe Goblin Street can make a comeback, but what if I don’t actually have the power to make that happen? he wondered. Maybe the best thing to do here is to follow that armor-clad Barbaroy’s example and just end the clan.

In reality, the reason Niala and Fey continued to stick with Eldridge despite his recent failures had nothing to do with the clan—it was because of entirely different feelings. They would stay with him even if the clan stopped all its burgling activities entirely, but he had no way of knowing that.

Blind to their thoughts about him, Eldridge continued to worry about his Dendro future.

“Maybe I should talk to them about disbanding the clan. They’d probably be better off somewhere else. With a leader that’s not as pathetic...”

If he’d actually said that directly to them, the two might have revealed the actual reason they stayed around, and their relationships might have changed. Coincidentally, this was right about the time when their old country of Altar held the Love-Duel Festival.

Before he could actually convey any of that, though, something intriguing had reached his ears.

It was information that something of high value would be brought to the sand liner known as Eltram.

Eldridge had his doubts about the veracity of the rumor, but he also couldn't deny that the implications if it was true were tempting.

Since this particular item would certainly be worth a great amount of money, claiming it and selling it off would help revitalize the clan and finally let him make up with the two girls who had put up with him for so long.

With that thought in mind, Eldridge entered the ship, ready to take its treasure.

◆◆◆

The first night since they boarded had passed, and the three were now at a relatively cheap café here on the ship.

Last night, they'd split up and gathered information, but they had yet to find out where they'd find what they were looking for. Then again, it was possible that it just hadn't yet been loaded onto the ship.

Or maybe the info I got was false. Eldridge thought. If that was true, then there was no chance Goblin Street would make a comeback here. They'd have to return to doing simple guild quests again, and Eldridge feared that that would finally make the girls lose patience with him.

"Leader, I'm sure it will work out."

"...Thanks, Niala." Her encouraging words genuinely made him feel a bit better.

"This place is so big, though... It's like a real luxury cruise ship," said Fey.

"It's so luxurious that even the third-class tickets cost us most of our savings," said Eldridge. "This café is the cheapest here, but even that is so expensive I'm not sure we'll have enough for all three of our daily meals."

Their awful financial situation made the three of them sigh heavily.

"That's exactly why we gotta get what we came here for, though.

There's still two more days left until we arrive at the final stop—Drac-Nomad. Everything will be fine as long as we find it before that...hm?"

Eldridge suddenly looked off in another direction.

"Leader?" Saying nothing, Eldridge signed to them to be quiet and crept closer to the pillar next to his seat, keeping his eyes fixed on one particular point.

There, he saw a Master who had a pretty face and a round, corpulent body.

That face, build, and crest... That's Sefirot's Moneygold. Eldridge was a man who gathered info about known Superiors and rankers so he could come up with ways to counter them. He'd obviously heard of Moneygold.

Why is he here? Is he after the same thing as us? No, I doubt it. But whether his goals were the same or not didn't matter. What did matter was the fact that there was a Superior on this ship.

We go back to burglar stuff for the first time in forever and immediately, this happens... Maybe karma really does exist.

Overcome by a bad feeling and sensing an oncoming headache, Eldridge let out a deep sigh.

Armored Pilot, Hugo Lesseps

It was the second day since we boarded Eltram—the day Moneygold would negotiate for the Orb.

Currently, we were having a conversation over a late breakfast.

"By the way, do we actually know anything about the Orb itself?" I asked. Since they'd already discussed a possible purchase, it seemed likely they'd been informed about the particulars.

And as I expected, Moneygold replied with a nod.

"We do. Apparently, it's sealing a UBM that turns nonhumanoids into humanoids—monsters into tians, basically. And they say that the resulting tian is always beautiful."

"That's a very...specific effect."

"The previous owner of the Orb was a slave dealer who allegedly sold monsters he'd turned into humanoids. I guess turning common Little Goblins into attractive men and women must make for some incredible profit margins.”

“The previous owner...? So you’re negotiating with someone who isn’t that previous owner, then?” I asked. Moneygold nodded again, his chin wrinkling as he did so.

“Turns out that the transformation is temporary, and the humans turn back into monsters in about three days. Of course, that made the buyers very upset, which put the other slave dealers in hot water. And so, as punishment for messing with the market, the other dealers sent a hit man after the scammer, and that was that.”

“That’s...wow.”

“It also could’ve been a disgruntled buyer who sent the hit man, though. If a beauty turned into a goblin while we were doing the deed, I’d be mad too. That would be traumatizing.”

How am I supposed to comment on that? I thought.

“Anyway, the one who offered me—or rather, offered the Caldinan congress—the task of taking the Orb from him is someone who actually worked for the late scammer. In the chaos after his boss’s death, he grabbed the Orb and skipped town. Problem is, he didn’t know what to do with the thing, and it could make him a target, so he wants to sell it as soon as possible.”

“I see.” It seemed like this person had the right idea—the thing at Cortana made it obvious that the Orbs could cause some serious trouble.

“What will you do with it after you buy it?” I asked.

“Bring it to the congress. That’s my job here,” Moneygold replied. “Huang He would be pissed if we beat the monster inside it and turned it into an MVP reward, so we gotta be careful. I really don’t think they should act so big when they’re the idiots who let the damn things get stolen and spread all over in the first place, though.”

Looking somewhat irritated, Moneygold took out a cigar, and Isara, who was standing next to him just like last time, cut the tip using her fingers and lit it up with a lighter. The cut part of the cigar was completely smooth, so I could only assume that was because of a job or skill she had.

“It’s such a pain,” he went on. “Cortana’s change of mayor and rebuilding efforts and whatever else caused their auctions to shut down for the foreseeable future, so this Orb business affects me too, damn it...”

Moneygold took a long draw of the cigar and let it out with a sigh.

Caldina had had nothing to do with the Orb theft in Huang He, so you could say the country was just an unfortunate victim. Cortana was a major trade center, and now thanks to the mayor's death and the giant hole in the city, it couldn't fulfill that function anymore. That clearly made Moneygold upset.

"The congress is still negotiating with Huang He. If it goes well, maybe we'll get to do whatever we want with the Orbs."

"But there's no demand for that lewd Orb, is there?" Cyco asked.

I'm pretty sure the human transformation Orb can be used for other things, I thought.

"On the contrary—the demand for lewdness will exist as long as humanity does. If we were allowed to break it, I'd want it for myself," said Moneygold.

"I thought this yesterday too, but...aren't you just a bit too open about stuff like that?!"

"Perverted, fat freak," Cyco said.

"What I'm worried about is that AR-I-CA would probably want it too," Moneygold added.

"You're not wrong!" I said.

"So many perverts..." Cyco said. "I hope you all die."

The power to create lots of beautiful men and women? I thought. Teach would be all over that! And if they both want it...what if we get another Clash of the Superiors over something this stupid?!

"Well, moving on," Moneygold said. "If Caldina gets permission to break the Orbs, we'll be able to make up for the losses they caused us. That's why I hope our prez comes out on top in the negotiations."

"I really don't think a bunch of MVP rewards can make up for the casualties..." In the end, MVP rewards were just equipment and materials usable by only one person. A few of these couldn't possibly be enough to cancel out the damage suffered by Caldina's largest trade center being put in such a dire state.

"Oh no—they will pay for themselves and then some. We'll eventually acquire lots of new trade routes thanks to them."

"Hm?" Trade routes? Did one of the Orbs have a power that makes it easier to travel on the desert? I wondered.

"Anyway, I have a question too," he said, as if he was trying to change the topic and bring the conversation closer to the job at hand. “Did you memorize Eltram’s structure?”

“Yes,” I said. “I spent yesterday walking around everywhere that’s not off-limits and got a good idea of what’s where.”

“Well done.”

“It made me wonder, though...how many people are powering this ship, anyway?” Dendro was a world with magic and, specifically, magic power—usually known as MP. MP was a colorless type of energy that could be transformed into heat, electricity, wind, and many other kinds of energy, which meant that technological advancements were also generally powered by magic. Caldina’s sand-ships, Granvaloa’s powered vessels, Dryfe’s Magingears—everything like that required MP to run. Some larger ships were equipped with charged MP tanks, but if not that, the source of their energy was generally people.

And the more massive the thing was, the more MP it required to stay operational, so with Eltram being as big as it was, I couldn’t even imagine how much magic power it was draining.

“Zero,” said Moneygold. “This ship is powered by a restored core from the pre-ancient civilization.”

“Huh? They actually found a core?” That was really rare. I knew that the pre-ancient civilization had advanced technology that enabled them to build cores that produced magic power by themselves, but I hadn’t seen one since Ray’s Zephyrus Silver. Even that had been a small one, though. I definitely had never seen one large enough to move a ship this big.

“I didn’t even know they could be restored,” I said.

“There’re engineers that specialize in that,” said Moneygold. “The specialist who restored this ship’s core is particularly famous, though. If I remember right, the name is...Crys Fragment.”

“You mean people like that actually do exist?” I suppose Dryfe wasn’t the only country with skilled engineers.

“This person is mysterious and pretty damn weird, though. Crys has a knack for restoring all kinds of pre-ancient civ items and selling them to people right when they need it the most. For example, the large ship core installed here was sold to the biggest transportation company in Caldina. It’s high quality and barely needs any maintenance. Crys even went the extra mile and threw in a blueprint with ideas on how to improve the ship itself."

Moneygold then took a break in favor of another smoke from his cigar.

"There were always plans to build gigantic sand-ships that would transport both passengers and cargo, but they were always scrapped because no one could solve their energy problems," Moneygold went on. "Even I was surprised that someone restored and brought in a core that fixed it right away... Crys really should've sold it to me, though."

His expression as he said that was the same as it was when he'd offered to buy White Rose from me.

Talking about this energy core made me think, though. If I had something like that—a smaller version, at least—wouldn't it solve White Rose's energy problem? Fran had made the robot for me, but because of its heavy Mythical alloy armor and focus on defensive skills, its biggest flaw was that I didn't have enough MP to keep it running for long.

"You look like you'd like one too," said Moneygold. "Be careful, though. The name 'Crys Fragment' is so famous that Caldina's full of scammers using it to sell garbage."

"I'll keep that in mind." I didn't have Truth Discernment, after all.

This reminded me that Fran and the others in The Triangle of Wisdom had actually told me that they'd worked with a pre-ancient civilization energy core once.

Before the civil war, the army recognized the clan's achievement with Marshall II and its mass production. They came to The Triangle of Wisdom with a well-preserved core that they had stored and requested that they create the strongest ever Magingear. They also provided limitless funding, letting the members go all out on their design...to which they responded by going too far and overloading the robot with gear and functions.

While my White Rose and Teach's Blue Opera were experimental units Fran herself had built with Marshall II as a base, that robot was the result of the concentrated efforts of everyone in The Triangle of Wisdom—a golden unit I'd only seen in photos from that time. Unlike Marshall IIs, which were designed with mass production in mind, that Magingear was a one-of-a-kind super robot.

Unfortunately, it had disappeared somewhere during the mess of the civil war, and both Fran and the other members said that it felt like a big loss.

Actually...I wonder where it is right now.

◇

The ship arrived and stopped at the next city and the other party came aboard, just like Moneygold had told me.

“So what you want in exchange for this is Drac-Nomad citizenship and ten million lir so you can start a business, right?”

“Yes...that is all I want.”

Moneygold was negotiating with a man who was accompanied by a small child—the man’s daughter.

For a moment after I first saw them, I thought that they might’ve been Emily and that man who was always with her, just disguised as father and daughter like they had been back when I’d encountered them earlier. However, Moneygold had used some item he had to confirm that they were definitely the right people.

The negotiations were already approaching their end.

“It’s a deal, then,” said Moneygold. “We’ll also cover your living expenses here on the ship. We have a cabin for you too. You’ll get business funds and a place to live when you sign this and bring it over to a government office in Drac-Nomad.”

Moneygold then took out a coin pouch, a key, and a Contract and gave it to the man.

“You thought of everything...thank you so much,” said the man.

“I should be thanking you. I’m glad this went so smoothly.”

The two exchanged a handshake, concluding the trade.

“That’s one thing dealt with,” Moneygold said. The only ones here now were Moneygold, myself, and Cyco—Isara was leading the man and his daughter to their second-class cabin in a different part of the ship.

Moneygold was holding the Orb he’d just bought in one hand, using his other to smoke a cigar.

“You look like you’ve got a question,” he said, looking at me.

“Yes,” I said. “It’s about...the price you paid for that Orb.”

“The ability to open a business in Drac-Nomad, ten million lir in funds to get started, and a place to live sounds pretty good, but I know what you’re thinking. You think I could’ve gotten more for it, right?”

"...Yes."

"Well, here's your answer. The Orb is worth way more than that, and I could've paid ten, if not a hundred times more. There's really no limit to how much I can spend, and if he'd been planning to raise the price sky-high, I was ready to respond in kind."

Moneygold took out a wallet-like Inventory and turned it upside-down, letting the contents spill out on the table. The whole surface was covered by a pile of coins—some of them so valuable that almost nobody used them. I couldn't even guess how much money there was in that mound, but a single glance was enough to know that all this was worth many billions of lir.

"But that didn't happen, did it?" Moneygold said. "And since negotiating a price raise on something I'm buying would be stupid, our deal ended exactly as you observed."

"Why didn't that man try to raise the price?" Cyco asked.

"There's people in this world who don't have it in them to be vulgar," said Moneygold, breathing out a cloud of smoke.

"People who can't be vulgar? Do you mean people who are humble?"

"This isn't about humility...I'm talking about those folk who can't let their greed take the wheel even when they're faced with the opportunity of a lifetime. The ones who can be charitably described as careful, and uncharitably as cowards."

His words made it seem like he was making fun of the man for his inability to be greedy, but his tone and expression showed a different feeling.

"But that's a kind of virtue," Moneygold went on. "Overall, you'll be happier if you're like that."

"Hm?" Cyco looked at him with a look of confusion on her face, which made Moneygold chuckle a little before he began explaining what he meant.

"Your threshold for happiness goes up as you experience more luxury. More delicious, more fun, more pleasurable, more wonderful... There's no limit to human desires, but satisfying them comes with a price. This is especially obvious with desires you satisfy by paying for them. The amount of money you have to shell out just keeps on growing." The man who claimed to be satisfied with just things that he could buy took one ultra high-value coin in hand. "A person becomes rich, gets a taste of luxury, and their desires spin out of control. Then they reach for luxury beyond their means and are brought down to ruin. That's a common story, isn't it?" he said, now looking at me rather than Cyco—and I wasn't sure why.

"It is," I said.

"And that's why I try to satisfy my desires here. In reality, I just came back from delivering newspapers."

I couldn't even begin to imagine this embodiment of vulgarity and luxury as a simple paperboy. The idea left me speechless.

"Over here, I'm the definition of excess. My desires are always out of control—I've completely cut the brakes on them. When you consider that, the guy we just dealt with was much more of a proper human being than me, simply because he still has working brakes he could step on to stop himself," Moneygold said, looking somewhat amused.

If it was true that he was only rich here and his real self was actually living in poverty, those might've been his honest thoughts.

◇

There was something else that Moneygold's words reminded me of.

It was my...I mean, Yuri Gautier's father.

He also satisfied his wishes with wealth, as well as someone whose desires had no brakes on them. He'd amassed great wealth in his own generation, took an actress—my mother—as his wife, and lived an extravagant private life. He'd used more money than he had to, always boasted about it to others, and was satisfied in being like that.

A vulgar nouveau riche—that was how most onlookers saw him. In fact, even mother had described him to me that way.

She'd hated him enough to tell her own daughter that her father was a bad person.

But contrary to those words, father had always been very nice to me. And I'd been told that after Fran disappeared and mother and I ran away, he'd actually changed the way he lived his life. I didn't know if that was because of loneliness or something else. We'd stayed in touch after mother and I had run away, but we'd never talked about that.

I could remember how his voice sounded whenever we talked by phone, and it always seemed kinda happy. I also liked him and I liked talking to him, so I always looked forward to seeing him again.

But the last time I'd ever heard his voice was some time before last year's Christmas.

That was because he...

◇

"This isn't really related, but there's something that bothers me about the guy himself. The one we just traded with, I mean," said Moneygold, bringing my attention back from the past to the present. He sounded more serious than he had when he'd been talking about his desires or himself.

"What do you mean?" I asked.

"It's the fact that he even managed to make it here. The power and presence of the Orb, and the desires and grudges surrounding them are no joke, but he—along with his daughter, might I add—were able to outrun it all and get to this ship in one piece. That confuses me. You know that, right now, both Caldina and its dark underbelly are really sensitive to anything related to those Orbs, right?"

The people of Caldina already knew that the horrible event at Cortana was caused by an Orb that had leaked into the country from Huang He, and that there were several other Orbs throughout the world. Teach had told me that people were already selling fakes that were made using modified Jewels.

"So you think there's something suspicious about those two?" I asked.

"They themselves are fine. I can vouch for that. But..." Moneygold looked outside—toward the town growing distant behind us. "...Someone might've protected and led them here in secret."

Eltram, Stern, Deck

At the same time as Moneygold was voicing his concerns, a man was looking at the flowing scenery with a comms device against his ear.

He had an appearance that didn't stand out from the crowd here on the luxury liner, but upon closer inspection one would notice that his right arm, hidden by a long sleeve, was completely covered in bandages without even an inch of skin showing.

"Rascal, it seems that the negotiations went through without a problem," he—Great Soul Daoshi, Zhang Zangqi—said to the party on the other end of the comms line.

"I see. So you got them there just fine."

"Yes." The person on the other side was The Weapon, Rascal the Bloodonyx.

The one who'd secretly protected the merchant and his daughter until they'd made it to this ship was none other than Zhang—a supporting member of IF. This was the job he'd been given after he was done with his task in Cortana.

"You stay there and keep on gatherin' data," said Rascal over the comm.

"Very well." From this point, Zhang's task was the same as it had been in Cortana—the Orb would create conflicts, and he was to gather info about the combat abilities of those who gathered, as well as any other valuable data.

"Odds are that our activities as IF will increase in the near future. I'd like to complete our list of unavoidable threats and possible allies while there's still time to do so," Rascal said.

"I am aware." Zhang knew that well, as he himself was one of the people IF had picked up through a conflict caused by an Orb.

"Also, Machina and I are going there too."

"You're going yourself...?!" Zhang was keeping his voice down for the call, but he still couldn't hide his shock. Rascal had entrusted Zhang with everything in Cortana and the protection of the Orb as it made its way to the ship, and yet he would still be showing up here in person—the significance was obvious.

"Why...?" he asked.

"Because there's somethin' there that's gonna cause trouble for us later if we don't completely destroy or retrieve it."

"Why not leave that to me?"

"You'd have no choice but to destroy it. I wanna retrieve it if I can. It's precious," said Rascal.

"Huhh?" said another voice on Rascal's end of the line. "But I could probably make it too. It's probably just a Pure-Dragon-type."

"You're the one who said that it'd be 'stupidly expensive.' And this is right after you made three of the so-called ‘cheaper’ Demi-Dragon-type versions. Do you have any idea how bad of a headache I got once I saw the recipe? You used up several types of rare mats you can only get in Ruins.”

“OWOWOWOW! STOP GRINDING YOUR FIST ON MY HEAD! THAT’S STRONG ENOUGH TO KILL A SMALL CHILD, YOU KNOW! Oh, wait, maybe don’t sto—OWOWOWOW...!”

“And then you went and said, ‘Oh. Just two would’ve been better for the unit’s balance. We didn’t need the third. Whoopsies!’ Seriously? Are you screwin’ with me?”

“NHHEEAAAAHH...!”

Zhang was conflicted, for he truly did not know whether to intervene in the ridiculous-sounding exchange on the other side of the comms unit.

“Anyway,” Rascal continued. “I’m going there, and that’s final. I’ll take care of some minor business first...and I should be there by tomorrow, early dawn, since it’d be a pain to get there when it’s too close to Drac-Nomad.”

“This vessel is set to arrive there tomorrow at noon.”

“If I get there at dawn, their reinforcements won’t make it. Everyone who can cover large distances fast has already been sent out. The only ones left are King of Toys, Grandmaster; The Fight, RAN; and their leader.”

“Sent out?” Rascal’s words made Zhang confused.

Drac-Nomad was the seat of the Caldinan congress, the country’s most important city, and Sefirot’s headquarters. How could it be that there were only three of them left?

“As you already know, King of Revelry, Moneygold is on that ship with you.”

“Yes, I’m aware.” Since he’d been in charge of protecting the man and his daughter during the negotiation, he obviously knew who they were negotiating with.

“Then there’s the three who were sent to the west. King of Termination, Albert Schwartzkaiser; God Hand, Yumeji Iryo; and God Hunter, Carl Lourlou. They ran into some Legendarians on the way there, though.”

Zhang was wondering how Rascal knew such details, but he quickly figured that IF probably had supporters like him all over Caldina.

“And The Earth, Fatoum; The Cannon, Eve Selene; and The Ace, AR-I-CA are all at Vennsayle the Lake City to the south.”

“Why are they there...?”

"Preparing for war. It's not like they'll activate the War Boundary, though."

Most of Caldina's combat power was focused in its Masters, and there were many clans of all sizes there. Because of that, unless Caldina was given a longer time to prepare than other countries, a sudden War Boundary activation would kick out an unusually high number of Masters. Even if it didn't affect the country's combat potential, it was worth avoiding its use for economic reasons.

"War? With who...? Wait, you said 'south'..." Zhang was briefly befuddled by the sudden outpouring of information, but he soon came upon the answer.

"Yeah. When it learned about the Orbs, Granvaloa landed on Caldina's shores. They actually sent all of the Seven Great Embryos of Granvaloa who can actually do shit on land."

Those words shocked Zhang, since they meant that Granvaloa sent four of their Superiors.

"They're negotiatin' right now, but there's no way it won't fail. The south's gonna be a hellscape dominated by wide-scale extermination specialists."

That mental image made Zhang break out in a cold sweat—everyone involved in this conflict was extremely fearsome.

AR-I-CA rode a flying Magingear and used a Superior Embryo that granted foresight. Eve Selene had the Superior Embryo with the greatest combat range currently known. And then there was the man with unmatched magic power—the one the entire world knew as the "Magical Apex," Fatoum.

All of them were known and feared in and out of Caldina. However, Granvaloa's forces weren't any weaker.

Miroslava Swampman had a Superior Embryo that was a gigantic amphibious superweapon. Scala Edwards rode a Superior Embryo that could break the sound barrier several times over, and Maude Edwards fired a Superior Embryo with absolute homing ability.

And then there was the man who could turn any liquid into explosives, making entire patches of ocean vanish. Known as the "Human Bomb" or the "Apex of the Four Seas," he was a man who'd defeated an SUBM—Antimicrobic Soy Sauce.

Zhang had lots of combat experience, but even he couldn't imagine how the battle would unfold. The only thing he knew for sure was that the resulting storm of devastation would be something beyond human comprehension.

"Wouldn't it be better for me to go there instead?" he asked regardless. The destruction that would surely hit the south wasn't bad enough to convince him to abandon his duties. If it was his role to gather combat data, then Vennsayle would be the best place for that after the negotiations failed.

Needless to say, however, there was almost no chance that even Zhang could survive an area being ravaged by Superior wide-scale exterminators.

"You need to value your life more," Rascal said. "Like I said before, if you feel like you're in danger of dying, you're free to abandon your mission. I obviously wouldn't send you into an environment like that—the odds of your survival aren't ones I'd gamble on. I'll leave the south to some Ideas. They can be replaced."

"...Thank you," Zhang said, appreciating Rascal's consideration for his safety.

"Don't mention it. Also, that ship you're on may be attacked by a group of tians. They're probably after the same thing I am. I want you to intercept them if it comes to that."

"Understood."

"Then again, if that happens, Emily might take to action before you do... Speakin' of, is she wearin' the accessory I sent her?"

Rascal was referring to a piece of equipment that one of their go-betweens had delivered to them.

"Yes."

"It's an item Machina made as a counter to the kinda thing that happened in Cortana."

Zhang made a bitter face at those words. Back then, he had been rendered powerless—completely unable to help Emily in her time of need. That had made him even more determined to make sure something like that never happened again.

"Don't worry. Emily has only two weak points, and that accessory takes care of one of them."

Emily had almost no actual weaknesses to speak of. When it came to pure combat prowess, she was no match for the "Apex" Superiors, but she had a limitless ability to revive. Even the Apices would have a hard time killing her until she ran out of lives.

Because of this, there were only two ways to defeat her.

First was long-term binding, like what had been done to her in Cortana. If forced into a situation where she couldn't move or log out, she would have no choice but to forcibly log herself out using the Suicide function.

However, the accessory that Emily had been given completely nullified this weakness.

The other means of defeating her was achievable by so few people it was hard to call it a weakness in the first place.

"I'll take to action as soon as I arrive tomorrow at dawn. Until then, keep an eye on Emily and try to keep her from going on a rampage."

And so, the call ended.

A moment later, Zhang felt something pulling on his sleeve.

"Zhang. Are you done?"

It was Emily. From what he could tell, she'd been waiting for him to finish talking.

Looking somewhat drowsy and a bit gloomy, she was holding on to Zhang's sleeve.

Emily was a wanted criminal, but nobody here on the rear deck was wary of her, for she was wearing an accessory created by Machina that made her look like someone else. They'd also entered the ship by means other than the main gate, so no one had given them a thorough checkup.

"Yes. Rascal said that he's coming here tomorrow too. Let's wait for him in the cabin."

"Okay...I'm sleepy, so I'll take a nap..."

The two then went to the cabin Rascal had prepared for them ahead of time.

And anyone who looked at them walk off saw nothing but a father and his child.

Interlude: The Test and the Mechanical Dragon

Caldina

The second-in-command of Dryfe's Legitimate Government, Lieutenant Colonel Berlin, was currently leading his men on an operation.

This particular excursion was the most common kind of DLG missions—one to secure supplies. The organization had acquired information pertaining to a ship smuggling Magingears and related parts, so they set out to attack it.

Operations like this were not an uncommon occurrence for the DLG. The weapons they used were damaged and sometimes destroyed upon use, so in order to compensate for that, the DLG was forced to acquire any materials leaking out of Dryfe that they could. At first, they'd used the funds they'd brought with them to buy materials, but after Caldina had stopped food exports to Dryfe and invaded it during the war, the DLG had begun seeing that country as a hostile force whose wealth should be plundered rather than purchased.

Thus, this operation really should have been routine.

"What...?"

However, what was currently happening was anything but routine.

"What is that...?"

It had turned out that the ship they'd assaulted was a trap. There was no cargo, and the crew on it had transformed into bizarre creatures that recent rumors had dubbed "Ideas." These monsters had quickly started to overwhelm the infantry that was supposed to take over the ship.

The Magingear pilots outside the ship were under attack, as well—but not by the Ideas inside.

"What is that?!" At first, Lieutenant Colonel Berlin thought that he was looking at a high-speed sand-ship crewed by either Caldina's guards or a group of Masters.

However, it immediately became clear that it wasn't a ship at all.

It looked like a dragon, but while its silhouette had a long neck and tail like a skydragon, it lacked wings. That would have made some guess it was a landdragon, but that wasn't the case either.

It had a body made of metal, as well as a single sensor-eye. The sunlight falling upon its crimson and white armor revealed a striped pattern all over it.

And finally, its open maw contained not a tongue, but a cannon.

This was no dragon, but a machine that merely looked like one.

The crimson-white machine dragon was sliding on the surface of the sand at speeds approaching sonic. And without pausing in its sliding—or maybe hovering—its headlike cannon fired at the unit next to Berlin.

"Ah...?!" Over the comms, Berlin heard the brief final gasp of a subordinate who'd been fighting with him since they were in Dryfe. The cannon had torn through the Magingear's heavy armor like it was paper.

The units used by this squad were the Marshall II DC model, where "DC" stood for "Desert Custom." Optimized for desert environments, they were dust-proof, airtight, air-conditioned, and equipped with the ability to hover. For better or worse, the original Marshall II lacked the attention to detail that characterized many player-made designs, and these DC units were a direct attempt to correct that. Their mobility in desert environments not only surpassed many weapons of their type, but also most AGI-focused high-rank jobs as well.

"Lieutenant Colonel! Lieutenant Colonel Berlin! AHH—!"

But now, these units couldn't even run away fast enough. The dragon's cannon fire mercilessly shredded the Magingears' cockpits, scattering the destroyed remains of both robot and pilot across the desert sand.

The DLG's pilots hovered in a zigzag pattern in an attempt to avoid the dragon's assault, but the precision and the speed of their enemy's projectiles was just too great. On the other hand, their own attacks were all sidestepped by the mechanical dragon. It moved as though it could perfectly track every shot.

Before long, the dragon had destroyed five of the ten units under Berlin's command—all while the lizard-like Ideas were busy exterminating the infantry on the ship. The losses suffered by the DLG were already dire.

Is that a Prism Dragon?! Who's it affiliated with...?! Did Dryfe send hunters after us?! But...! Berlin's thoughts raced as he tried to make sense of the situation. The creature they were fighting reminded him of something he knew about from history—Prism Dragons.

Believed to be pre-ancient civilization technology, the Prism Dragons were among the greatest weapons of their time. Everyone who was familiar with ancient history, including Berlin, knew what they were.

However, this mechdragon didn't match the descriptions of Prism Dragons he'd found in historical texts.

For one, it was far smaller—only slightly bigger than their own Magingears—and it had no wings to speak of. It also didn't quite possess the fearsome extermination ability the old writings had emphasized.

And most importantly, the name shown by Identification wasn't found in any historical records.

Regardless, the dragon still outclassed the Marshall II DCs they piloted.

"Retreat! I'll bring up the rear!" Berlin ordered, moving out in front of his men.

His unit was a Marshall II HC, where "HC" stood for "Heavy Custom." Equipped with tough armor and immense firepower, it was a unit that would quickly drain the MP of any ordinary pilot.

However, Lieutenant Colonel Berlin was anything but ordinary. Tians were often limited to certain jobs and had level caps far lower than 500, but he was among the talented few who could reach level 500 solely with jobs related to piloting. He was a battle-hardened fighter who'd fought alongside Dryfe's strongest pilot more times than he could count.

"Come on, you foul beast!" he roared, brandishing an axe that was nearly as big as a Magingear by itself. This weapon was called Heatsplitter, Meltdown, and it was an MVP reward from a UBM he had felled.

When faced with this threat, the mechdragon fired its cannon, as though testing its opponent.

However, Berlin saw the projectile's trajectory and cleaved it out of the air with his axe. "TOO SLOW!" he shouted.

This feat of strength greatly bolstered his men's flagging morale. They let out a cheer...

"Wow, you're better than I thought."

...which was accompanied by praise from an unfamiliar woman's voice.

The sound shocked Berlin and put him even more on edge. The voice was coming through a speaker—and its source was the mechdragon.

"Hmph...it was lookin' like this shit...was gonna be just target practice... But it looks like...they got someone good enough for an actual test," said a different—male—voice.

"Master, why do you sound like you're in pain?"

"...'Cause the way you're pilotin' this damn thing...is crushin' my damn lungs..."

"Wait—you're barely breathing!"

The conversation coming from the mechdragon sounded like a joke. Berlin had no idea why they were letting it run through the speakers.

"Anyway, the rest are only good for testing out our weapons," said the man's voice. "Do it."

"Roger that! Rush Missiles!"

Following that command, sixteen missile silos appeared on the back of the mechdragon. Released one by one, the missles soared upward until they reached a certain altitude, where they changed trajectory and descended at supersonic speeds.

They hurtled straight toward the retreating Magingears and infantry sand-boats—Lieutenant Colonel Berlin's subordinates—and immediately incinerated every single one of them.

"They all hit!" said the woman's voice.

"Hold it. I'm pretty sure those were loaded with armor-piercing warheads, so where did the incendiary rounds come from?"

"Huh? I replaced them to make them more deadly."

"You realize they just turned the loot into burning garbage, right?"

"...Oh."

"You're getting penalized later."

"OH NOOO!"

This exchange between the man's and the woman's voices over the speaker seemed as lighthearted as the last, but Berlin—the last one left alive to listen—was in no state to see it that way.

His subordinates—DLG's limited forces—had been reduced to ash in but an instant. He didn't know anything about the enemy or their motivations, and yet they were about to take everything from him.

There was only one thing he could do now—and that was ask the question that consumed his mind. "Who...who are you?! Why did you attack us?!”

“Our goal here’s to test this unit.” One of the people inside the dragon answered as though it were nothing.

“To...test...?”

“There aren’t many places here in Caldina where you can fight Magingears. That’s why we chose to practice on you guys—the DLG.”

Caldina was vast, but it contained surprisingly few groups that chose to use Magingears. DLG was more or less the only one, and that was apparently reason enough to target them.

“You’ve probably realized it by now, but we’re also the ones who sent out word about that ship. We made sure you’d catch wind of it, in fact.” The man inside the mechdragon casually admitted to being behind the trap they’d fallen into.

Ideas disguised as the cargo ship’s crew. A mechanical dragon that attacked right after they came here.

It all connected in Berlin’s mind now. Everything so far had been planned from the very beginning, and its sole purpose was to provide a test for that unit—and falling into that trap had cost Berlin nearly everything he had.

Berlin groaned in despair. “You...you don’t...” The defeat in the civil war. The escape from their homeland. The hardships they’d suffered in this foreign land. The constant stream of terrible news from Dryfe. The hope that the DLG would make their comeback soon. The subordinates who had fallen so far from home.

All of that flashed through Berlin’s thoughts in an instant...

“YOU DON’T DESERVE TO STAND BETWEEN US AND OUR GLORIOUS GOOOOAAAALLL!”

...before he spurred his unit into a suicidal charge toward this bitter enemy.

Hovering at full power, Berlin raised his axe high. The attack he readied had enough firepower to rival the ultimate skill of a high-rank job focused on fire magic, backed by the strength and weight of his custom heavy Magingear. It was enough to split open even the thick shell of the defense-specialized landdragons.

Faced with this deadly attack, the pilots of the mechdragon looked at the enemy unit through a monitor and...

“Machina. Final test.”

“Aye aye, sir! Starting melee mode teeest!”

A moment later, sounds of clashing metal rang out in the desert, and the unit armed with a giant axe fell on the sand.

The axe, Heatsplitter, was then retrieved by a control AI and vanished.

There was no better proof that the pilot of that Magingear had died.

◆

After destroying Lieutenant Colonel Berlin’s group, the two people within the cockpit had a conversation.

“Master! We just fought Magingears! Tell me your thoughts!” said the one-eyed girl dressed like a maid—Machina—as she swung around her bare, obviously mechanical left arm.

The person she was talking to—Rascal—was a man in a gray suit and a hat that could have belonged to a gangster. He let out a sigh before answering.

“Using vernier thrusters is fine and all, but it takes a toll on the crew. My avatar’s not as tough as Emily’s or Sechs’s. You gotta be more careful.”

“I made sure to use shock-absorbing seats, though. I guess this baby may be a bit too heavy—or maybe it’s the weight of my love!”

“That so? Then drop the love by at least ninety percent.”

“That’s so mean! Wait, so you’re okay with the remaining ten percent?”

“I got a question, actually. Is it responsive to piloting?”

“Very! It doesn’t buckle even when I’m in control!”

Generally, machines in Infinite Dendrogram were controlled by the semi-sense skill known as Piloting. It improved the piloted machine’s stats and provided the pilot’s mind and limbs with awareness of the actions and movements needed to control that machine. Because of this, even Masters who were very ordinary people in real life could control these exotic weapons without a problem.

However, there were also people who could pilot machines without any skills—sometimes with inhuman proficiency far greater than Piloting could provide—and Machina was among them.

“It’s also got two of the landdragon-type cores I made, so energy’s no problem.”

“I see. And? Assuming we’re the ones piloting it, how powerful do you think this thing would be?”

“About as powerful as a solo battle type Superior, I guess. Not counting the Apices, of course.”

“That’s good enough for some controllable firepower,” Rascal said with a nod before looking at one of the monitors.

There, he saw the mass-produced lizard Ideas—Lacerta Idea—preparing to leave the scene.

“I don’t see any problems. Let’s head to Eltram and secure their core.”

“Roger!”

And so, leaving this battlefield behind, they moved toward another—their stage.

Once they were gone, the remains of the DLG soldiers were swallowed by the foreign sands. The unforgiving environment would soon claim everything that was left of them.

The desert didn’t discriminate against people based on their ideals, achievements, or even their crimes—but whether that was good or bad remained an unanswered question.

Chapter Three: The Search and the Encounter

Armored Pilot, Hugo Lesseps

Now that Moneygold had the Orb, my job as a bodyguard had officially begun. I had to be on high alert until we made it to Drac-Nomad tomorrow at noon.

“Hugo,” Moneygold said. “Cyco can sense the Murder Princess, right?”

“Yeah,” Cyco herself answered. “I can sense that insane lisper right away.”

La Porte de l’Enfer was a skill that checked the target’s kill count for their own kind and applied Freeze to them. As an additional effect, Cyco could sense that kill count on anyone in her effective range.

Apparently, this sense of hers used to be more vague, but after she’d met Emily—the person with the highest kill count we’d encountered so far—it had sharpened considerably.

“It’s possible she got onto the ship from the town it just stopped at,” Moneygold said. “You should go on patrol again.”

“All right,” I said. “Will you be okay, though?”

“Looking out for him is my job,” Isara answered in Moneygold’s stead. “No need to worry.”

“Yeah. Isara’s pretty used to this,” Moneygold added. “Oh yeah, while I’m logged out, I’ll give the Orb and the comms device to her. When I’m not here, she’ll be giving the orders.”

“Okay,” I said. “I’ll go look around, then.”

“Bye,” said Cyco. “You fat lunatic.”

“Cyco...” Yet again she insulted him right to his face, but yet again Moneygold didn’t seem to care.

A bit later, Cyco and I were walking through an empty passageway. With just the two of us here, I felt like it was a good time to speak about what had been on my mind since yesterday.

"Cyco, I think you're being too harsh on Moneygold. Sure, he's a bit too honest, but he's not actually a bad person—so be nicer, okay?"

In response to my words, Cyco made a slightly grumpy face and fell silent for a bit before replying.

"...It's because that fatty is in second place."

"Second place?"

"Second place," she repeated. We were just echoing each other now. Looking irritated, Cyco continued. "My count for him is the second highest after Emily." By that, she could only be referring to the kill count of their own kind.

Emily's was by far the highest, and there was no doubt about that. But...Moneygold was the second?

"You mean, he's above Teach, Gideon's duel rankers...and even King of Destruction?"

"Yeah." Her answer made me realize that you couldn't get a kill count that high by fighting just Masters or in duels. It also did a lot to explain why Cyco was being so mean to him.

"That fat is probably a wide-scale extermination type. And he used his power on humans many times."

"He doesn't seem like someone who'd treat people's lives lightly. But..."

"Seeming like a bad guy and actually being a mass murderer are separate things. The guy with the annoying succubus said something similar."

Does that get in the way of him starting a massacre? The words that had been said to me in Gideon came rushing back. At the time, I'd insisted that Fran understood tians were living beings, and he'd said with total certainty that this understanding wouldn't stop her.

Soon after that, Fran initiated the secret Plan C and tried to massacre the people of Gideon with a force of over fifty thousand monsters.

That was proof that even if I didn't see her as a bad person, Fran was capable of committing tian genocide nonetheless.

Now that I think of it, Cyco is a lot meaner to her too.

"I bet that pig is exactly the same way—the type of person who won't hesitate to pull the trigger if it serves his goals."

Moneygold had said that he would never, ever try to take anything by force, and I didn't think that was a lie.

However, that didn't mean that he would never use force for anything.

"And I think that..." Cyco began a sentence, but couldn't finish it.

I immediately knew who she wanted to bring up. "You think Teach is the same?"

"Yeah. I'm pretty sure Sefirot is totally made up of people like that...actually, no. This entire country is like this."

A country of people who can eliminate others for the sake of their own goals—looking back on it, I'd found conflict surrounding the Orbs when I'd tracked them down in both Hermine and Cortana. And even though negotiations had been attempted every time, they'd always come with the expectation that they would most definitely fall apart.

"I'm not really fond of this country," Cyco said as she stared at the desert outside the ship. This made me think of all the times she'd complained about the weather here, but I knew this wasn't the same thing at all.

"It's a dog-eat-dog country. Its people's biggest enemies aren't monsters, but other people, and they're probably used to that. This is a country where people want too much."

Caldina was in the middle of the continent, and it attracted more wealth and goods than any other country. Many people moved here simply because they wanted something it had.

"But satisfying them comes with a price."

I remembered Moneygold's words, and by now I was pretty sure the "price" wasn't just referring to money.

"To me, it feels so...oppressive," Cyco said. Cyco's ability to sense people's kill count of their own kind was hers alone—the rest of us could never understand how she felt. The people of Caldina might be hard for her to tolerate. And neither Moneygold nor Teach were exceptions to that rule.

Maybe Cyco had been feeling this way ever since we'd come here to Caldina, and she'd kept it hidden even from me, expressing it with only a bit of foul language.

But now, she was revealing it all.

"But this sense and skill...they're the reasons why I was born as myself."

"Cyco..." The reason Cyco was Cyco... I already knew where she was going with this.

"Hugo...I was born with this power because..."

She stopped in front of me, then looked me directly in the eyes.

“...Because your father was murdered.”

We were alone, so I was the only one who could hear her.

◇

My father died near the end of last year.

I learned of it while I was at school, shortly before I was supposed to come home for Christmas.

I’d always felt that my relationship with him was good even after he and mother divorced. He called me every year and invited me for a Christmas dinner with him. He covered the tuition and other expenses to let me go to Lorraine Girls’ College, saying that it was his mother’s—my grandmother’s—dream. He sent me birthday presents every year, always worrying if I’d be happy with what he got me.

He was nice to me—and only me—from beginning to the end.

So, upon hearing that he’d died, I actually collapsed from the shock.

The most shocking thing of all, though, wasn’t the fact that it had happened, but how.

The cause of his death was clearly murder. Someone had shot him dead in his own home—the very place I grew up in.

The culprit might’ve been a burglar, or maybe someone with a grudge against him. He’d made many enemies while building his business, so the latter wasn’t out of the question. The case was never solved—in fact, the police were still searching for the murderer.

However, at the time, I just couldn’t believe it.

I couldn’t believe that someone who’d always been so nice to me had been murdered.

When the funeral ended and it was time to bury him, not many people remained. The only ones present were his legal team and some people from his company.

And as far as family went, I was the only one.

My father’s parents—my grandparents from his side—were no longer with us, and he was an only child. Mother said that she didn’t feel like going, while Fran was still missing after running away from home.

Rain fell as I watched his casket descend into the ground.

After that, the legal team talked to me about the inheritance. Apparently, someone would buy his company, but the money from that and everything else he had would be split between me and Fran.

In France, if there was no will saying otherwise, all the inheritance went to the children. And since he probably hadn't expected to die, father hadn't prepared a will—so according to the law, his immense wealth would be split between us.

That was when he gave me his final present.

The real gift wasn't the wealth itself, but what came with it—a reunion with Fran. Because they had to distribute father's money, the legal team hired detectives and investigative firms in many countries to find her, and when they did, I got to meet her for the first time in years.

That was how we got in touch again, and she ended up inviting me here to Lorraine Girls' College. Even in death, father had helped me with my life.

And that was why I could never come to terms with the fact that he was murdered.

Mother managed it, and even though Fran looked a bit sad about it, she didn't seem very shocked.

But I just couldn't do it. I just couldn't accept what had happened.

Perhaps mother and Fran had many different—and more negative—feelings about him. But he'd been a nice, caring father to me until the very end.

I just couldn't tolerate the idea that someone had killed him.

That feeling festered within me ever since that day.

In my desire to see that culprit punished, a part of my heart became as cold as ice.

And out of that was born Cyco—the frozen hell of Cocytus.

◇

"I'm an Embryo born from your anger," Cyco said.

This was the first time she'd ever spoken openly about the reason for her creation, but I'd suspected this was the case from the moment I first met her.

"But however Embryos come out, they're always based on their Masters."

That was what Fran told me while she was explaining category-based personality analysis to me.

A Master's personality, skills, desires, life, nature...or maybe even their traumas and psychological complexes. Embryos referenced all of these things in order to assume forms and powers that reflected their Masters.

That was why Ray's Nemesis possessed the power to avert any tragedy he saw before him.

That was why Fran's Pandemonium commanded limitless, unrestricted creation.

And that was why Cyco was born as an Embryo that punished murderers—kin-slayers.

"And since I'm the one who made you like this, I'm part of the reason you're feeling so uncomfortable," I said.

"Yeah," Cyco answered with a nod.

She didn't hide anything or try to sugarcoat it—she stated flat out that I was the reason she was who she was. The part of me that couldn't accept my father's murder had turned her into a bringer of judgment.

This was the first time she had ever expressed this discomfort, and I was the origin of everything.

"But that doesn't matter," she continued. "You don't have to let it bother you."

"Huh?"

"There's something way more important than that," she said, as if to disperse the clouds gathering on my heart, and puffed her chest.

"Something more important...? What do you mean?" I asked. However, before answering, Cyco folded her arms and took a moment to think about something—specifically, it seemed like she didn't know whether she wanted to say something or not.

"No. Not now," she eventually said.

"Cyco..."

"I will say it someday—and there's something I wanna ask you too. But now isn't the time, so you'll have to wait for it. For now, just focus on what you have to do."

She was looking right at me as she spoke. As always, her face was expressionless, but I could see a strong will reflected in her eyes. I got the feeling that whatever she wanted to say, it was something she would never compromise on, and that's why she wanted to wait for another time...

"All right." And that was also why I chose not to push it.

"But I can't just ignore how uncomfortable you feel right now," I added. "If you really can't handle it, I want you to return to the crest and rest."

"Mhm." Cyco nodded before touching my chest with her fist. I couldn't tell whether it was her way of saying "I'm fine," or "I'll keep that in mind." For all I knew, it could've been both.

Regardless, I would do as she said and focus on what I had to.

My role here was to reduce casualties in the event that Emily attacked the ship looking for the Orb—to prevent what had happened in Cortana from happening here.

And so, we resumed walking toward the part of the ship where the passenger cabins were.

◇◆◇

Eltram, Commercial Area

The luxury sand liner had many shops and other establishments in it, and there were many that offered the same kinds of wares and services as others. This was because there were several classes of passengers aboard. Those in first and second classes were generally far wealthier than the ones in third, and the establishments targeting a specific class provided quality and prices different from those in other classes.

They might have been on the same ship, but they lived in totally different worlds.

Most passengers knew that well, so they stayed away from shops and services that didn't cater to their own class.

"Ohh..." That was why the scar-faced girl looking into a high-class boutique stood out like a sore thumb.

The girl—Goblin Street's Fey—stared at the expensive clothes with wistful eyes before checking the Inventory she used as a wallet and sadly shaking her head.

"What are you doing?"

"Oh. Niala."

Addressing Fey was a fellow Goblin Street member, Niala.

“Do you have any idea how badly you stand out? What are you doing here? Shouldn’t you be looking for the thing our leader mentioned?” Niala went on.

“But that dress is so pretty...and there’s gonna be a ball this evening,” Fey said with a sad sigh. “It’d be so romantic to wear that and dance with him...”

“I have three reasons why you should give up on that,” Niala said, holding up three fingers. “First, while first and second-class passengers have access to the ball covered by their initial fee, we third-class passengers need to buy tickets separately, and we don’t have the money for that.”

“Noooo...”

“Second, we also don’t have the money for the dress. I can’t even lend you enough to buy it.”

“Ngh...”

“And third, we don’t have the time. We still haven’t found what we’re looking for.”

“Guh...” While Fey griped and groaned, Niala continued to speak.

“What does that mean?”

“It’s a bit like the English ‘no rest for the wicked.’ We don’t have the wealth or the time to go to that party.”

“That’s so painful...” Unable to counter anything Niala said, Fey’s shoulders slumped as she succumbed to despair.

A moment later, her stomach growled.

“I can treat you to some lunch, though.”

“Thanks! You’re the best friend and rival I could ask for!”

“Whatever you say.”

By “rival,” Fey meant their role in the competition for Eldridge’s affection.

“Okay, so let’s have lunch at the open-air restaurant with the best food on the shi—”

“Don’t get carried away. We’re eating at the café terrace for third-class passengers,” Niala said, lightly tapping Fey’s head before she began walking. Fey rubbed her head and followed after her.

Once they arrived, Fey wasted no time stuffing a sandwich into her face.

“Mghmgh...thish makesh me feel sho alive...” she said with a peaceful expression.

“Don’t talk while eating. It’s bad manners,” said Niala, politely eating a salad with a fork.

“Hrmm...I’m having a harder and harder time using my brain... I feel like I’m gonna starve and get the death penalty soon...” Fey whined. Niala thought that was definitely an exaggeration, but she also understood that their financial situation wasn’t anything to laugh about.

“There might be more Masters with financial problems than we realize,” she said. “Even in real life, I have a stu—an acquaintance who said something like that.”

“We can’t even buy food...and we used to eat so good before! The last time we had a feast was...oh yeah, when we got some delicacies from the port during the Altea blockade,” Fey said, sounding nostalgic.

Those delicacies they’d stolen were actually what had drawn Lei-Lei’s ire and ultimately destroyed their clan, but they didn’t know that.

“That is true,” said Niala.

“Huh? What’s wrong...? Ah! Don’t tell me you don’t even have enough to pay for this food we’re eating!”

“I do. I’m just a bit sad that our leader seems to consider himself responsible for this desperate situation we’re in.”

“Ohh...” Fey nodded in understanding. “Yeah, that guilty face he makes sometimes does make me feel down.”

“I understand.”

“And down bad.”

“That’s just you.” Niala smacked Fey’s head again before she sighed and said, “It’s true that we’re going through a rough patch right now, but it’s not good that our leader seems to blame himself for all of it. We’ve just had some unlucky encounters recently—it wasn’t like there was ever a problem with our leader himself. Despite that, he thinks it’s all his fault and feels terrible about it.”

“Didn’t you say something about it being karma?”

“That was just a figure of speech. It wasn’t directed at him. Anyway, what we need to do now is to get this job done so he can regain his confidence,” said Niala.

“Yeah!” Fey said with a nod. “And then I’ll use the momentum to shoot my shot and we'll have ourselves a Dendro marriage!"

"I have no intention of letting you have him, but is that a real thing? A Dendro marriage, I mean."

"I'm sure it exists. There's probably someone out there who's done it!"

"I don't think it's common enough to be its own thing." This conversation was happening at the exact same time as the Love-Duel Festival in Altar, which had once culminated in two particular people becoming a couple, but that was another story.

"Anyway, if we want to help our leader, we need to hurry up and find the targets," Niala went on.

"Maybe they're not on the ship yet."

"That's possible, but we're arriving at Drac-Nomad tomorrow at noon. I don't think they'd cause an incident right at the doorstep of Caldina's congress."

"Since we're so close and they haven't done anything yet, maybe they already gave up. If that's the situation, we should give up too and just enjoy the cruise... I really wanna go to the ball."

"I'm telling you we—"

"Beautiful bambina and signorina! What's this I hear about wanting to go to the ball?" Suddenly, their conversation was broken by an unfamiliar—and awfully energetic—man's voice.

Overcome with shock, the two looked toward the source—Niala with wariness of how much he'd overheard, and Fey with pure surprise.

They were met with a sight that left them at a loss for words.

"Eugh..." A sound escaped Fey's lips, and who could blame her? The man was wearing a shirt that barely covered his chest and his face was slathered in makeup—he looked like a real pick-up artist that had decided he wanted to really embody the visual kei style. People like him were a rare sight in Dendro.

"Perhaps little ol' me can help?! I happen to have a few spare tickets!" he wheedled, tickets in hand, and it was soon clear that this situation was just as outrageous as his appearance. "What do you say, bambinas? Would you accompany me to the ball—as my dates?"

He said those words with a wink, but the two women had no taste for Italian visual kei playboys. They were both into a weird combination of an intellectual and a bad boy—specifically, they were both into Eldridge.

“No, thank you.”

“Not a chance. We’re already interested in someone.”

And so, they bluntly refused.

“Oh, what a shame! I envy whoever has stolen your hearts!” The man gave an exaggerated shrug, but he didn’t seem too shocked—perhaps he was used to rejection. “I see now that my very offer was terribly rude. Allow me to make it up to you with these tickets—as a gift. Ha ha ha! No need to thank me! Ohh, and there are dresses you can rent, so why not give that a try?” he said as he placed the tickets on the table.

“Oh, we really shouldn’t—”

“YAY! Tickets!”

Niala tried to refuse, but before she could, Fey gladly took the tickets.

“Ah ha ha! Well then, ciao!” the playboy said before pompously blowing the two of them a kiss and leaving the café terrace.

Left with no way of giving the tickets back, the two could only watch him leave.

“We got the tickets...! That guy sure was weird, though.”

“Fey, take a moment to think. There’s an Eastern idiom that goes ‘nothing is more expensive than what is free.’ These tickets could lead to something bad down the road.”

“But it makes things so much easier for us. Now we just have to rent dresses and we’ll get to go to the ball!”

Niala sighed, realizing nothing she said would matter. The Eastern idiom “reading the sutras into a horse’s ear” came to her mind, but she didn’t say it.

Still, she couldn’t deny that they’d received a windfall here—a “bean mochi from the shelf,” as another idiom went.

Honestly, I also think the idea of going to a ball with our leader is pretty appealing, she thought. And it looks like we could actually have enough for the dresses if we rented them...

On the inside, Niala shared Fey’s desire—she’d only kept her cool because she’d put effort into doing so.

“Anyway, let’s tell the leader about this,” she said. “We’ll go to the ball if he says it’s okay... How many tickets are there, by the way?”

If there were only two, there would be no avoiding a catfight over which one of them would accompany him.

“Three,” said Fey.

“That’s perfect, then,” said Niala. “Wait, three?”

That number seemed strange to her.

She could understand if there were two, since Niala and Fey were the only ones here. She could also understand if there were four tickets, since the man might have given them tickets for each of their crushes.

But there being three tickets made it feel like he knew that they both had a crush on the same person.

“Maybe it’s his own ticket. These tickets could’ve been the only ones he had.”

“But if he went to pick up more girls after this, wouldn’t he want to keep at least one?”

Or perhaps the number was just a coincidence?

Regardless, there was another thing that bothered Niala.

“That man also seemed kinda familiar...” she said.

“Huh? I don’t think you could ever forget a weirdo like that.”

“No, I just feel like I’ve seen his face somewhere... Also, for a passenger on this ship, his clothes seemed kinda...cheap.”

His gear was weak and certainly not made from high quality materials. The design was decent, but ultimately, he was wearing just a shirt and a pair of jeans—the kind of clothes you could buy in bulk.

It definitely didn’t suit the kind of person who would carry around multiple tickets to a high-class ball.

“You definitely have a better thief’s instinct than me...and I am a thief.”

“You could just say that I have a keen eye. Anyway, that’s another thing we need to bring up with our leader.”

Niala trusted Eldridge a great deal, so she assumed he would know something.

“All right! Let’s go pick out a dress to rent!”

“...Again, we need the leader’s permission first.”

Eltram, Interior

While the two women were having their unserious exchange in the café...

What the hell's going on here?

...Eldridge himself was sitting on an empty staircase near the cargo area, hanging his head and whining to himself about the current circumstances. How am I this unlucky...?

All of this was because of the people he'd spotted while taking a look around the ship.

It's not just Moneygold. There's also Fullmetal Princess, Isara—one of the best in her field in Caldina. Hugo Lesseps, who's rumored to have stopped the Murder Princess herself. And to top it all off...there's another Superior.

It was this gathering of big names that had caused Eldridge to lose hope. Once, this would not have affected his confidence whatsoever, but now that he'd lost so many times and had been left with only a tiny fraction of his original clan, this situation was an unbearable burden.

Why? Why are all these tough guys on this ship? Did I miss some important info about all this?

That assumption was correct, but Eldridge had no means of knowing what, exactly, he had missed. Regardless, the instincts he'd honed in his multiple brushes with disasters and his natural analytical ability told him loud and clear that this place was dangerous.

Things were looking so bad that Eldridge was starting to think it might be a good idea not to steal anything at all and just disembark at the next stop.

"It'd be real easy if I could do that," Eldridge mused. If they weren't successful here, though, it'd be over for good. His clan didn't even boast enough people to fill a party now, and this was most likely his last chance to fix its financial situation.

Despite that, he hadn't even seen his target yet.

If we don't finish this job...

Eldridge was bracing himself to tell the girls that he would disband the clan, if it came to that.

"...Hm?" Suddenly, Eldridge felt something strange and shifted his gaze toward a specific direction.

It was the large door he could see from here—the entrance to the cargo area.

The cargo area was a giant safe, and its inside was full of Inventories—their combined content no doubt bigger than the ship itself could physically hold. Many passenger ships in Infinite Dendrogram simultaneously served as cargo ships.

Focused, Eldridge looked at the cargo area's door.

He felt something strange behind it. The thick door made him a bit uncertain about it, but he could have sworn something else was looking around the area.

Eldridge readied his skills as King of Burglary on both of his hands, wary of whatever it was and ready to fight if need be.

A minute passed, and by that point the strange presence had completely vanished.

Was I just imagining it? Or was there actually an intruder in the cargo area?

It went without saying that Eltram's cargo bay was filled to the brim with expensive materials and goods. If someone was planning to steal something from this ship, that would be the first place they'd go.

However, Eldridge wasn't planning on taking anything from the cargo area. You couldn't put Inventories into Inventories, so if he tried to take any cargo, he would either be forced to pick certain items to store in his own Inventories, or just run out with the Inventories in their entirety. He wouldn't have time for the former because of the number of powerful people he knew to be gathered here, and he didn't have enough allies to accomplish the latter.

And even if he did steal something and managed to flee the ship, he'd be stranded in the middle of the desert.

Things would've been different if he had a ship of his own, but Eldridge no longer had the money for that.

"I'm not suited for it, anyway." Unlike the thief grouping, which focused on stealing through stealth, the burglar grouping that Eldridge belonged to specialized in just taking things directly. If he tried something, he'd probably trigger the alarm right away.

His clan member Fey was a high-rank thief job, but she also didn't have proficiency to not trigger the alarm.

I guess Zeta...King of Thieves could do it, he thought. That reminds me of the national treasures. Weren't they stolen by King of Thieves, actually?

It was said Huang He's national treasures—some Orbs holding sealed

UBMs—had been stolen and spread across Caldina, where they were now causing trouble. It was rumored that King of Thieves was behind the crime—and as it happened, those rumors were true.

The Orbs, huh? Not interested. They seem hard to handle, so they probably wouldn't solve our money problem.

Eldridge figured that if they got an Orb and brought it before the Caldinan congress for a trade, they—as Masters and criminals in Altar—would just end up having it taken away from them by Sefirot. Maybe someone on the black market would buy the Orb, but he didn't know anyone who would deal in something so dangerous. He'd only recently come to Caldina and hadn't had enough time to establish himself here.

Not like I'll ever see any of those Orbs anyway, he thought. This ship sure as hell wouldn't have one, that's for sure.

Not even stopping to consider the possibility that this assessment was entirely wrong, Eldridge got up from the stairs and left. By then, he'd already more or less forgotten about the strange presence he'd felt from the cargo area, dismissing it as something not worth thinking about.

He then went to meet his clan members at their rendezvous point, where Fey—and even Niala—pleaded for his permission to attend the ball. Uncertain if this job would go well and feeling terrible about all the trouble he'd caused them so far, Eldridge agreed, wanting to give them at least a little hope.

That made Fey jump with happiness and rendered Niala unable to hide her joy, which filled Eldridge with relief and made him think, They wanted to go that badly? I'm glad I agreed to it, then.

And he remained as clueless as ever about the true reason for their joy.

Armored Pilot, Hugo Lesseps

We walked around the section with all the passenger cabins, but Cyco couldn't find Emily anywhere. Had we been worrying for no reason? Was Emily not even on this ship? Or...

"Is she offline?" I wondered. If that was the case, it would be impossible for us to find her at all. And if she stayed offline right up until the moment she did something terrible, there was no way we'd be able to counter her in time.

I thought that we could also try to find Emily by looking for someone she was traveling with, but that proved to be difficult as well.

According to Cyco, she could easily sense and locate extreme outliers like Emily, but Caldina had no shortage of people with kill counts so high they could qualify as mass murderers.

But that was the problem—Cyco didn't know if they actually were mass murderers. She couldn't differentiate between tian-killers, player-killers, player-killer-killers, and regular duelists. That was exactly why Fran's plan had placed her against Gideon's Masters.

"The fact that she can't tell them apart won't make this any easier..." Cyco had actually sensed a big number on a Master wearing a crimson jacket with a lion motif, but again, we didn't have any knowledge to guess how he'd actually gotten that kill count.

Only Emily herself had a number big enough to be conclusive evidence that we'd found her. Without that, the only thing we could really do was investigate everyone we found suspicious.

"I don't think I'd be good at that." That seemed like a job for a detective...and that thought made me remember the boy who'd seen right through me, which just made me kinda upset.

"What now?" Cyco asked.

"Let's end the search for the time being," I said. "We'll resume when we stop at the next city."

There was one last stop on the route to Drac-Nomad. If Emily and whoever she was with were planning to get on this ship, that would be their last chance.

Maybe I should talk to Moneygold first, I thought.

"Umm, may I have a moment?" Someone called out to me just as I was thinking through all of that.

My attention instantly shifted to whoever it was—and I jumped in surprise when I saw who had spoken.

"Ohh! Please don't be afraid!" said the person—a petite woman wearing a hood, probably to hide from the sun. Below the hood, wrapped just above her eyes, there was a piece of cloth covered in complicated patterns. It reminded me of some nineteenth-century native costumes from central Asia that we'd seen in Miss Nina's class.

More importantly, though, she had gloves on her hands, so I couldn't tell if she was a tian or a Master.

"I saw you walking and looking around, so I spoke to you because I thought you were searching for something..." she said. "Umm, I'm nobody suspicious, though! I'm not your enemy!"

So I'd caught her attention because I was poking around somewhere that was mostly empty of people. I'll have Cyco check her anyway, just in case. I thought.

When I looked at Cyco, though, she said nothing and shook her head. That was her way of saying that this lady wasn't "it." She wasn't Emily wearing a disguise, nor was she a murderer. Cyco even held up her fingers in a circle to indicate that the woman's kill count for her own kind was zero—meaning everything was okay.

"Umm...?" the lady said, probably unsure what to make of our silence.

"Oh, sorry," I said. "Thank you for being concerned. I was just looking for someone."

"Oh, then you should go to the information booth at the mall. If you make a request, they'll use the ship's speaker system to tell whoever it is that you're looking for them and where they should go to meet you."

That sounded like a lost child announcement...I didn't realize this ship had a service like that. I'd be really surprised if Emily actually showed up in response, though, and it felt more likely that making an announcement would just attract other trouble.

"Thanks for the advice," I said.

"Oh, you're welcome," she replied with a smile on her face—but it didn't seem like she was planning to leave.

"Uhh, is there something else?" I asked.

"Sorry if I am mistaken, but are you Mr. Hugo Lesseps? The one who distinguished himself so much during the Cortana incident?"

My heart skipped a beat before I remembered that the Cortana thing had indeed given me a bit of a reputation.

"I wouldn't say I distinguished myself," I said. "I just slightly reduced the casualties, and I wasn't the one who ended the situation anyway. That was King of Tartarus, Benetnasch."

"Don't be so humble! Benetnasch may have prevented the Orb from causing disaster, but you were the one who stopped the Murder Princess's slaughter, weren't you?"

She sure knows a lot about it, I thought. Newspapers might've summarized the events, but you'd only know those kinds of details if you'd bought them from DIN or something.

"This is who I am, by the way!" the woman said, handing a business card to both me and Cyco. On it, there were the words "Freelance Journalist: Stal Tune." "These days, I'm following all the incidents happening here in Caldina, and since you were so deeply involved in the one at Cortana, I was wondering if I could get an interview!"

"I'm sorry, but I'm working right now. I don't have time for interviews."

Being a journalist explained why she was so well-informed, but I couldn't spare her the time when I had my bodyguarding job to do.

"Noooo! Umm...are you...really sure that...you can't?" Stal looked up at me with teary eyes, and honestly, it made me feel kinda guilty.

"My lady," Cyco said to me telepathically. "We shall stop your tears. I promise that you will greet tomorrow's morning with a smile on your face."

Could you stop bringing up my old lines like that? I thought. It's true that ignoring a lady's plea is against my code of honor and it's going to make it hard for me to sleep at night, but we have to keep looking around. It's our job!

"Umm, if just an interview's no good, what would you say to an info exchange instead?" Stal asked.

"An info exchange?"

"Yes. You answer some questions in exchange for my latest information about the incidents surrounding the Orbs! It's all precious intel I haven't even published any articles about yet!"

Okay, I'm a bit interested now, I thought. That information could be useful for my job—and maybe even Teach's Orb search as well. But...

"What do you think I should do?" I asked Cyco.

"You're free to decide yourself," she instantly answered.

"Okay," I said. "We can do the info exchange."

"Thank you very much! Let's go to the mall, then—there's a café with private rooms there! Oh! Don't worry, I'll pay for everything! Go go go go!"

"Uh, wha—?!" Dragged along by Stal, who was all smiles, I found myself led to the ship's mall area.

After almost half an hour had passed since she'd dragged me to the café, I was exhausted.

"Thank you for the interview!" Stal said.

"...You're welcome." She'd spent the entire interview asking me this and that about the Cortana incident, and now it was finally over.

And while I was getting a sore throat from all the talking, Cyco had been enjoying one of those lassi-like drinks again the whole time.

"Anyway, thank you for your time," Stal said as she prepared to walk away.

"Hold on. I never got the info you offered me," I countered, grabbing her hand. She'd almost gotten away with a free interview and I wasn't gonna let her do that, especially after I'd practically lost my voice talking to her.

"Ngh...I thought just ignoring that part of the deal might have worked, but I guess it didn't..." Stal said.

"So, what info do you have?"

"Nnghh...okay. I'll talk." she said before sitting back down. "Umm, you're gathering Orbs, right?"

"I'm really just helping with that, but yeah." She'd already known that Teach and I were gathering the Orbs, so when she asked to confirm, I could only nod—especially since she probably had Truth Discernment.

"In that case...this is the info for you," she said, reaching into her Inventory and taking out a document folder. "Take it. It's a copy, so you can keep it."

The document in question was a map of Caldina with six locations marked on it. Two of those were Hermine and Cortana, and another was the city that the man Moneygold had negotiated with came from.

"These are...the locations of the other Orbs?" I'd been told that the stolen Orbs numbered seven in total, and this showed the locations of all but one. This would be totally new information to Teach—and Sefirot as a whole too.

"Yes. These places have eyewitness accounts of Orbs creating strange phenomena."

We'd already found the ones in Hermine and Cortana, and the one from that third city was currently on this ship. That left three more markings on the map.

“Which one of these marks the Orb that turns water into land?” I asked.

“I believe that would be this one,” Stal said. She pointed at one of the markers.

That was the Orb Teach had gotten through a trade with Benetnasch. Now I knew where that one came from, so that left just two.

“Wintersorb the Northernmost City, and Vennsayle the Laketop City...” These two locations were at the opposite sides of the country—one to the north, other to the south. It was possible that the Orbs might have moved since this map was made, but I could confirm that three out of six of these markers were correct. That made it likely that the rest of them were too.

“The Orb locations... This is some really important info,” I said. “Couldn’t you have made a fortune if you sold this?” I felt like this map was worth way more than the interview I’d given.

“Oh, I’m not playing with that fire,” Stal said.

“Fire?”

“Imagine if I sold this info to someone looking for the Orbs and it turned out that they weren’t in those marked locations. I’m sure the Orb hunters would get revenge by stealing everything from me, flaying me, and harvesting my organs before killing me outright...”

Well, that made a certain kind of sense—this really was a dangerous game. Four of those Orbs had already left the cities marked on the map, so not selling it was most likely the right call.

“I actually got my information on these events by trading for it with other freelance journalists who were looking into it, and...one of them was found dead recently...” Stal continued.

“That’s pretty scary,” I said. But it all made sense now—I’d been wondering how she knew Orb locations that not even Sefirot had uncovered, but if this was the result of many people’s hard work, I could definitely understand it.

“And that’s why it’s best used for info exchanges like this,” Stal said. “Also, if I give this info to the people who really need it, that might move the situation a little and lead to some events I could write articles about.”

I nodded in understanding and thought, I guess it’s not just DIN’s Journalists who are like this.

“So...are you satisfied with this?” Stal asked.

“Yes. Very,” I said. “Can I ask one thing, though?”

"What is it?"

"Do you know anything about the Orbs' powers? There's nothing about them in the document." Even though they weren't listed, when I asked about one of the Orbs by referring to its abilities, she instantly showed me its location. That meant that, even though their powers weren't written down here, she was actually familiar with them.

"Very well. Consider this a bonus. The one in the north is said to be a healing Orb, while I think the one in the south has a power related to frost."

"I see...thank you." A healing Orb and a frost Orb. They seemed way more straightforward than the maggot Orb in Cortana or the human transformation Orb here. Well, at least the lightning Orb we got first was pretty standard.

"So that's all the info you wanted in exchange...?" Stal asked.

"Yes. Thank you, Stal."

"Don't mention it. Oh, but I gave you a bonus this time, so do talk to me the next time we meet!"

She then stood up from her chair and left the café, taking the check as she did.

For someone who had been planning to walk away without giving me any of the information she'd promised, she did seem to have a bit of integrity.

"Okay, I guess we should go back to Moneygold and talk to him about this and our job," I said. We had to tell him that we suspected Emily was staying offline right until the moment she planned to do something.

"What a stroke of luck, though," said Cyco.

"Yeah. We got some good information just now. Though..."

For some reason, this brought to mind an incident from the past. Specifically, the time Fran gave Ray a potion spiked with an Animal Ear Drug and a PPS—the Peeping Spy Slime.

"No way, right?" I shook away the worry that Stal might've had some ulterior motives.

Eltram, Deck

Come evening, Eltram stopped at the final city before it set its course toward the end of its route at Drac-Nomad.

Though this journey on the sands would only last until noon tomorrow, there were still many people boarding the ship at this city. Many of them were simply heading toward the capital, while some were the eccentric, wealthy elite who were solely interested in the ball that was set to happen that night.

Thus began the final night of this luxury sand liner's maiden voyage.

The ball meant to celebrate it would be an extravagant event that would leave its participants with no shortage of stories to tell. That was why the first- and second-class tickets that came with an invitation to it were awfully expensive, and the separate ball tickets available for the third-class passengers were a luxury few of them could afford.

"Hm-hm-hmm..." And despite that, there was someone who'd given no fewer than three of these tickets away for free—the man dressed head to toe in visual kei who'd approached Niala and Fey earlier in the day. Right now, he was humming a cheerful tune as he watched the evening sun sink into the desert.

There was no one nearby—which was unsurprising, for he was taking in this romantic view not from the deck full of people, but from the vessel's very topmost roof.

"A trip like this wouldn't be complete if tu don't bear witness to something like this and inscribe it upon your memory. The scenery in Dryfe wasn't exactly pleasing to the eye. Indeed, a desert sun deserves a lingering gaze far more than the sun setting over a dying land." The man spoke as he watched the evening sunset with spellbound eyes. "Would tu like to join me in watching this scene?" he said without even turning around.

He was no longer alone. There was someone else standing there—a person wearing a long, crystal-colored woven cape and a mechanical mask.

"Unnecessary. This unit has witnessed the Caldinan twilight hundreds of thousands of times."

The mask changed the person's voice to give it a mechanical flavor. Despite that, it could still be construed as feminine.

"Tu have sure lived a long time, haven't tu?" said the man. "But there is not a day in the world which is not unique, wouldn't you say? And whether tu witness each day's passing alongside someone else is important as well!"

"Still unnecessary. The core of your relationship with this unit is transactional, not friendly."

"How cold of tu, Crys Fragment," said the man, addressing the person using the name of the elusive engineer said to be the greatest in Caldina.

"Do not use this unit's name lightly. I may be using a deception barrier that prevents us from being noticed by hostiles, but all risks must be minimized," she said, checking the barrier made through imitation of the Incarnation of Dreams.

"Ha ha ha. I am well aware. That is exactly why I trust that I can say it out loud!"

"Tch..." the face behind the mask—Crys Fragment—clicked her tongue.

"Oh come now, there's no need to be upset. We've known each other for so long, after all."

"Two years is not long by any means."

"It's still about half of my entire playtime. It's a long, looong time. The people I've been acquainted with longer than tu are few and far between. Oh, wait, I guess that's not exactly true!" the man said, right before bursting into an inexplicable peal of laughter.

Seemingly irritated by his attitude, Crys said just one terse phrase.

"Progress report."

"I gave the tickets tu gave me to a few Masters I thought would make things interesting. I have especially high hopes for the remnants of Goblin Street. Though their leader is among them, so I suppose they're actually the main force now!"

"And the Superior?"

"Moneygold? That walking bag of cash will go to the ball with or without my help. It's a premium event meant to celebrate the last night of a luxury liner's maiden voyage. Someone as vulgar as him will be there no matter what."

"And you?"

"Hmmm? Little old me? Of course I won't attend. I may be here to see the sights—and I do want to go—but an evening party is just not it. I'm a morning and daytime person. I get very sleepy when night falls."

In response, Crys said nothing.

"Well, I suppose tu are already aware of the real reason I'm refraining—it isn't safe," the man continued, raising his hands in resignation. "It is rather unfortunate, though. If only they'd scheduled it for noon. I would've gladly been there in that case!"

"You would not participate even if this unit requests that you do so?"

"Of course not. After all, our relationship is a shallow one. I am simply a spectator who goes here and there to see the sights, while tu are my sponsor. I tell tu of things I see and learn, and sometimes fulfill a simple request like the one tu gave me today. There is nothing more between us." The man smiled before adding, "And the information I gather is good enough to make up for it, isn't it? There is no one who can draw out an opponent's power and learn all about it quite as well as little old me. My Apex info is especially valuable, wouldn't you say?"

"...Rebuttal impossible." Her words didn't suggest it, but Crys's mechanical voice held a hint of discontent.

"There is also the next job to keep in mind, so I don't want to stand out too much before that comes. I don't know the details, but tu are hiding a few cards, aren't tu? Like the soldier has-beens or the thing hidden in the cargo area."

"You..."

"Of course I would notice! My stance is to enjoy things from a safe distance! Though for now, tu are the only one I share them with." Silence. "I'm not lying, am I? Unlike tu, little old me doesn't have that handy little feature, so I can't hide my lies. I don't think I've told a single lie since I got on this ship, actually. That's why, well...I might've actually gone to that ball if I got a date, even if it wouldn't have been safe—and thus would be against my principles," he said, his own words making him grin wryly.

That was when the sun finished sinking into the sands.

"Anyway, looks like it's time for me to log out. I'll come back when the night ends. I don't know what will come of this plan tu have, but if tu have any simple errands for me then, I'll be ready to accept them."

"I will request as necessary."

"Va bene! Anyway, ciao!" said the man, mixing Italian into his words as usual, before logging out and disappearing from the rooftop...and the world.

Once left alone, the other person—or unit, as she herself would say—clicked her tongue in frustration.

Crys saw the other Master as clueless, insolent, and hard to understand. Nevertheless, he was useful as a source of information, so she occasionally had him fulfill tasks for her. She knew that rather than despising all Masters and keeping them all away, it was better to make use of them wherever it was appropriate.

The preparation is complete for the things that will happen on this ship, as well as the things that will follow—the plan entrusted to us by Integra...and the Creator. Caldina's environment and circumstances are favorable for the process of investigation. Though..."IF" was their name, wasn't it? The fools who spread those Orbs throughout this land...

Just like the man who had stood there earlier, Crys looked toward the now-dark horizon.

"It will not be long before they learn what they were playing with...what the Orbs were seeded with."

She looked over the world as though she pitied it.

"A known calamity will awaken soon."

Chapter Four: A Party Battlefield and Terrorism

Eltram, Special Ballroom

The luxury sand liner, Eltram, was on its maiden voyage. And on its final night, in the vessel’s special ballroom, a lavish, splendid affair would be held.

All along the walls of the ballroom, there were plenty of fancy foods and quality beverages anyone could eat or drink, letting the event function as a standing buffet party.

“Sho good...it’sh sho good... I haven’t eaten thish good in shooo long...”

And glued to one of those walls, there was a girl wolfing down that food.

It was none other than Goblin Street’s Fey. Clad in a rented dress and wearing light makeup to make her facial scars less pronounced, she was, in her own way, enjoying this party.

“Fey...didn’t you say something about how romantic it would be to dance at this ball? Why are you all over the food now?” asked Niala. Dressed up nicely herself, she was rather perturbed by the way her fellow clan member was eating.

“I mean, it’s not like our leader’s here, right? I don’t feel like dancing with anyone else. That’s why I’m storing up energy for when I’ll dance with him. Getting all those SP, you know?”

“‘SP’ stands for ‘skill points,’ not ‘stamina points.’”

“Huh? But that’s confusing, isn’t it? If ‘MP’ is ‘magic points,’ then the opposite of that is gotta be stamina, right? ‘SP’ is also used for lots of physical skills, so ‘stamina points’ just feels right, doesn’t it?”

Fey’s a silly goose, but every now and then, she can be rather perceptive, thought Niala.

Thinking about it a bit more, while it did make sense to “use magic,” it was hard to understand what was meant by “using skill”—as in, not employing individual skill, but some general measure of “ability.” The help section said that SP stood for “skill points,” but what quality did that refer to and what differentiated that quality from “magic”? Beyond the fact that the words used for them were different, she didn’t quite understand the distinction.

Well, it’s probably like that for some game reason, Niala thought. If everything used MP, then even physical vanguard jobs would have to get high MP somehow.

“Well, forget about SP and whatever it is,” said Fey. “I gotta prepare for when he arrives!”

“If you say so,” said Niala. “By the way...”

“What ish it?”

“Huh?” Upon hearing that, Fey looked down and froze as her expression transformed into one of shock. “N-Niala...when we were renting, you said that this dress would look good on me...”

“I did. That is an attractive dress that truly emphasizes a woman’s shape...at least, as long as the wearer doesn’t overeat and end up with too much belly flab,” Niala said as she adjusted her glasses and gave a slightly malicious smile.

“You planned this, didn’t you?! Wait—aren’t you going to eat anything yourself?”

“A ball is no place for a lady to eat. Even if you ignore the risk to your curves, smelling of food when you’re dancing and your partner’s face is close is not ideal. This is common knowledge in the girls’ college I graduated from.”

“So that’s why you took so long to stop me! And what’s with the ‘I’m such a high-class lady’ act?! You show-off!”

“Our leader is a nice man, so he would dance with either of us. But you’re chubby and smell like all the food you ate, while I am slender and smell only of perfume. I wonder which one of us would leave a better impression...”

“You’re awful! That’s playing dirty, four-eyes!” Fey said, terrified of the cunning trap her rival had set before her—or rather, the trap she herself had walked right into.

Oho ho ho, Niala laughed, sounding exactly like a high-class villainess —in her own mind, anyway.

"I-I'll go buy a deodorant item!" Fey said, dashing out of the room and rushing to the commercial area. She could reenter using the ticket she'd used the first time, but whether or not she could fix herself up before Eldridge returned was another matter.

"...Perhaps I overdid it," Niala said as she imagined her rival's struggle. "Anyway, I suppose I'll be alone until the leader and Fey return...hm?"

Niala looked around the hall, but her eyes stopped on one of the ball's attendees—a beautiful male Master. That wasn't an uncommon sight here in Infinite Dendrogram, so Niala didn't understand why this particular person had stood out to her.

He's taller. His hair color and face are different. They're not even the same gender... Niala thought, tilting her head. So why did he make me think of Yuri?

Niala...or rather, Nina was reminded of one of the students from the girls' college she taught at.

The man that caught her attention—Hugo—didn't seem to notice her gaze.

He had more important things to worry about.

Armored Pilot, Hugo Lesseps

After exchanging info with Stal, I reported to Moneygold and gave him the documents I'd gotten. He took a look at the information and used comms to report it to the president.

As far as Emily went, though, he came to the same conclusion as me: that there wasn't much we could do about her now.

Since it was likely that the Orb would attract some sort of conflict, he said that the only thing I could really do was stay by his side—and by extension, the Orb's.

"You said she may come after the Orb, right?" I asked Moneygold.

"Well, it's more like she would cause an incident focused around the Orb. What about it?"

Sitting next to him, I was starting to get a bit irritated. It wasn't just because of his words, but the whole situation we were in.

This was Eltram's special ballroom. It was the largest space on the ship, the site of a massive party...and a place full of people just having a good time, totally unrelated to this Orb business.

They were right here next to us—which made them Emily's potential targets.

"Shouldn't we...go somewhere with fewer people?" I asked.

"I get what you're saying. If she came after me or the Orb at this moment, it'd be a real bloodbath," Moneygold said like it was nothing. "This ball is full of wealthy people, celebrities, and the elite. It'd be pretty bad for Caldina if something were to happen to them."

"Then why...?"

"Because this is, overall, the safest option."

"Hm...?" Overall? The safest? I didn't really understand what he was getting at.

"If Emily Killingston and whoever she's with are after the Orb, then everyone here is a poor sap who'll get caught up in all this through no fault of their own. But what if this place gets attacked for some other reason?"

"Some other...reason?"

"Consider the massacre in Cortana. You could assume that she simply lost control in the middle of a Caldinan city, and that it would have happened with or without the Orb. It's possible that they're not after the Orbs at all, but something else instead."

I just sat and listened as Moneygold went on.

"In that case, this ship could also be attacked for some other reason. For all we know, they might just be planning to strike a blow against Caldina's wealthy elite by slaughtering those gathered here. If that's the case, they'd attack this very ballroom. And if that happened, we definitely wouldn't want to be far away like you suggested we should be, since we'd be unable to counter that attack in a timely manner."

I was starting to understand what he was trying to say. "So minimizing casualties as much as possible is our secondary goal?"

"Yeah. It's not an all-or-nothing thing where we either prevent everybody from dying or nobody. It's about making sure it's not as bad as it could be. That's the choice we're making here."

That made sense...but it wasn't a choice I was comfortable with. It was too much like the decision I myself had made back when I was overcome by doubt—the decision to participate in Fran's plan so I could minimize both Altar's and Dryfe's casualties.

My feelings back then and the feelings I was having now started to blur together, and I clenched my fist.

"Mr. Lesseps, please don't make that face. I am certain it will not be too bad," Isara said, gently reassuring me. "It could be that nothing happens at a —"

"Isara, don't waste your breath on useless reassurance like that. There's no way absolutely nothing will happen."

Isara's words were cut short by Moneygold, who sounded stricter than he ever had before.

"I apologize for crossing the line," Isara said before bowing her head and falling silent.

"What do you mean by that?" I asked Moneygold.

"There are three reasons I'm attending this ball. First is security, like we just talked about. Second is that I just wanted to, as a personal thing. And then there's the third reason, which is the most important of all."

"Which is...?"

"The prez told me to." I could detect a hint of fear or awe on his face as he said that. The person those feelings were directed to must've been the president...the head of Caldina.

"How much do you know about the president?" he asked me.

"Her name is La Place Phantasma," I answered. "She's long-lived and has been serving as the head of the Caldinan congress for a long time. And, umm..."

"That she's called 'witch,' 'enigma,' and a whole host of other names, right?" I nodded in response—that was the impression she'd seemed to have left on society.

From what I could tell, though, her skill as a politician left no room for doubt.

"People call her many names, but there's one that hits the mark," he said.

"And that is?"

"'Clairvoyant.'"

"Clairvoyant? You mean, she can see the future? Like Teach's Embryo, Cassandra?" Cassandra foretold the dangers approaching Teach and enabled her to dodge them, and I thought it was the only Embryo capable of seeing the future. That was the first thing that came to mind, but Moneygold shook his head.

"That slut's nearsightedness can't compare. I'd call the prez's thing farsightedness, but it sounds like something that happens to old people, and that's a comparison I'm too scared to make. My point is that she tends to see things coming long before they happen—as far out as years away."

"There's no way..." I said in genuine disbelief.

"I get why you're surprised. Infinite Dendrogram is full of Masters doing whatever they want. That should make such a power impossible, but I'm telling the truth. She uses her foresight to entrap many of her political opponents and...well, her political opponents."

Moneygold was probably going to say "political opponents and other countries." I'd been told that Caldina's plotting had placed the imperium in an even worse situation than it had been previously. He must've refrained from saying it because he remembered where I was from.

"Anyway, a person who can see that far into the future told me to participate in this ball," he said. "She hadn't said anything like that for any of my previous boat trips, but she did this time. There's no way something won't happen."

Those words seemed to be filled with a mix of awe and trust.

"You know, the prez had actually begun preparing to welcome Masters before the game was released."

"Huh?"

"Seems impossible, right? Tians don't know about the real world. There's no way they could see us coming. Prez did, though. You know what that means?"

"...That she's part of the dev team?" Infinite Dendrogram did have a few Masters like Altar's Tom Cat who were believed to be associated with the devs. Was Caldina's president also one of them?

"That's possible," Moneygold said. "We think she's something else, though... It's not like she told us, or that we asked her. Well, only Fatoum probably knows exactly what she is."

"What do you—?"

Right as I was about to ask him to elaborate, multiple sudden explosions cut my words short.

I heard them from outside this hall—as well as from within.

The walls of the ballroom shattered as smoke from the explosion rolled in. And then, multiple towering figures came into view.

They were Marshall IIs—about a dozen of them. Painted to resemble the desert, these units had head shapes and joint covers meant to protect against the sands, which made them look quite different from the original. They were also wielding weapons that were probably made outside of The Triangle of Wisdom. The machines were accompanied by dozens of infantry—some of them equipped with armor-type Magingears.

The shattered wall, the dancing flames, and the menacing presence of these soldiers immediately told the passengers that this wasn't some sort of act, but a real assault. Their screams resounded as they rushed to escape, filling the room with an air of panic.

Isara stood before Moneygold to protect him, while he himself looked at me with an expression that clearly said, Told you there'd be trouble.

As chaos overtook the area, words suddenly blared out of the speakers. "We are Dryfe's Legitimate Government. We have an announcement for everyone aboard Eltram."

"Dryfe's Legitimate Government...?" I repeated to myself. The group bore the name of my own country, but I had never heard of it before.

"We request that you show no resistance while we do what must be done here. If you obey, we promise no one will be harmed. But if you resist, we will not hesitate to use indiscriminate force—even against civilians."

Those last words were directed at Masters and other passengers who could fight. They clearly stated that if we stood against them, they would start killing any passengers they could—even women and children. It was the kind of ultimatum that could only come from someone truly vile.

And it reminded me that Fran had once said something similar.

"You will be released once we complete our objective. Until then, do not move."

A moment after they said that, the door through which passengers were trying to escape was smashed open, and more units appeared through it. With that, multiple Marshall IIs were standing at every exit, keeping every passenger in the ballroom from leaving. It was probably the same situation all over the ship.

"...Tch. They've blocked it off," said Moneygold, clicking his tongue in frustration as he placed a hand against his ear. I noticed that he had Telepathy Cuffs equipped and guessed that he must've tried to use them, but they hadn't worked.

After a moment of thought, he looked at Isara. Then, saying nothing, he pointed at himself, Isara, and then me.

"Can you hear me?" Suddenly, I heard his voice as though it was ringing inside my head. My eyes widened in surprise. "Don't talk through your open mouth. Just keep it closed and whisper and we'll hear it."

"O-Okay... What is this, though...?"

"We're connected by Isara's osteophony wires. Think of it like a phone made of two cans and a string. Don't touch your temple—that's where the wire is. Even a brush from your fingers would break it."

There was a wire on my head? I really couldn't see it, though...

"Isara's the Fullmetal Princess. That's the earth and metal manipulation magic SJ. This is within her power. Oh, you can still move, though. Isara will adjust the wire's length."

I looked at Isara in surprise, and she gave me a gentle smile.

"Anyway, the trouble's finally arrived," said Moneygold. "That damn prez. I wouldn't be surprised if she actually knew that we'd be attacked by DLG specifically."

"Who are the Dryfe's Legitimate Government, anyway?" I asked.

"The remnants of the side that lost the Dryfean civil war, basically. The ones who didn't die, surrender, or get arrested ended up escaping here to Caldina. And they brought a lot of Marshall IIs with them."

The group's name and the Marshall IIs made it easy to guess, but this confirmed they really were from my country.

"What do we do about this?" I asked.

"What, indeed..." Moneygold said as he rubbed his double chin and hummed. "Isara, how far can you reach?"

"Long-range manipulation is a weakness of mine, so I doubt I can reach farther than halfway through the hall."

"Uh-huh. I see. Anyway, like I said before, Isara is a solo battle type and can't protect large areas in a fight. Conversely...I can only fight in a way that would also harm the civilians."

Those were the major problems with solo battle types and wide-scale extermination types. Fran brought them up pretty often. In a situation like this, where one side had to protect something, the ones that came out on top were wide-scale suppression types—and those who simply outnumbered the other side.

"Could you suppress them all by Freezing them all at once?" Moneygold asked me.

"Cyco's La Porte de l'Enfer can't differentiate well enough." I could choose to target only tians, only Masters, only monsters, or several groups at once, like how I'd targeted both Masters and monsters while fighting Rook. However, there was no convenient setting for just "hostile tians." The skill really worked closer to having me choose who not to target—back in Gideon, I'd had Fran and Veldorbell registered as exceptions before we set the plan in motion, making it so that the skill only targeted all other Masters.

Compare that to what had happened in Cortana—I hadn't had time to register any exceptions and ended up freezing every other Master along with Emily.

"If I targeted just tians now, some passengers would Freeze too," I said. Like Cyco had disapprovingly explained earlier, Caldinans had a relatively high population of kinslayers. If I froze even a single part of them in this situation, they would be at risk of getting shattered.

This wouldn't be a problem with La Porte de l'Enfer Deuxième, which worked based on the damage the target dealt to me—but if I let them attack me, they would damage the passengers too.

"Well, most powerful skills have flaws," said Moneygold. "Yours could even have some weaknesses that neither you nor Cyco are aware of."

That was entirely possible too. I didn't actually get that many chances to use it in battle, so I couldn't deny that it could have quirks I hadn't figured out yet.

"Anyway, I get the situation," Moneygold said. "We don't have enough people to take care of this while keeping the casualties low. Let's add someone, then."

"Huh?"

"Isara. Connect to one more person. Your target is..."

And with that, Moneygold pointed at one of the passengers in the ballroom.

Eltram, Special Ballroom

Following the assault, everyone in the room was overwhelmed by chaos and confusion—but there was one man among them who was smiling.

...Jackpot! Niala! Fey! The gamble paid off! That man was none other than the leader of Goblin Street, Eldridge.

He was utterly thrilled by DLG's attack on the ship, because this was exactly what he'd been waiting for.

The DLG were Goblin Street's target. The Marshall IIs that the group piloted were luxury items that went for no less than eighty million lir per unit on Caldinan markets, and that was without considering their equipment and other tech they might be carrying. Eldridge had happened upon information suggesting that this prize prey would attack Eltram and came aboard the ship to take them. When they'd entered the final night of the trip with no sign of the Marshall II units, he was worried that this was a waste of time—but it seemed the heavens had not abandoned them quite yet.

All that's left is the timing, Eldridge thought. The situation after I rob them will change depending on when I do it.

The robbery itself wasn't that difficult. Eldridge had the skills for it, and he'd come prepared with an Inventory which could store many Marshall IIs. Nothing could really stop him from beating the DLG and taking their goods.

The problem was that acting against them would lead to many tian deaths.

Eldridge didn't have much of a problem with that on its own, but it would have negative side effects for him.

If his actions here led to the deaths of any passengers—many of whom were Caldina's upper class—things might go badly in the future. He could even end up on the wanted list, or at least the trader blacklists, which would make it impossible for him to sell the Marshall IIs here in Caldina.

The grudge he'd invoke from killing so many tians might even make him a prime target for hired mercenaries like the Superior Killer.

Taking such risks into consideration, Eldridge waited for the right time to strike with all the care he could muster.

The best time would be the moment the people on the ship begin fighting back. As long as he wasn't the first to strike, Eldridge thought, it would all work out.

During the chaos and conflict that would unfold, he would steal as many Marshall IIs as he could.

The best outcome for him would be one where he avoided responsibility for this incident while still profiting off of it.

All I can do now is wait, Eldridge thought. I wonder where Fey is, though...

He'd already looked around the chaotic hall and seen Niala, but the other clan member was nowhere in sight.

There's several kinds of jamming preventing us from using Telepathy Cuffs. How should I go about this...?

With timing being an important factor, coordination between them was invaluable. And while Eldridge might've been able to take the Marshall IIs, Fey and her Embryo were better suited for disarming the infantry.

I need to ask Niala or look for her myself...but we've been told not to move, so doing that could set them off, and—

"Hey, you're Eldridge, right? King of Burglary?"

His thought was cut short by a sudden, spine-chilling voice in his head.

"Ngh...!" Eldridge stopped himself from lashing out purely by reflex and slowly looked around.

There wasn't anybody suspicious close to him—everyone was actually cowering right now because of how stern Eldridge looked as he scanned his immediate surroundings.

But then, a fair distance away, he caught sight of someone who was looking right at him.

It was a man with a rotund, corpulent body—King of Revelry, Moneygold. He'd gotten Isara to connect with Eldridge using her wires, just as they'd connected to Hugo.

"I'm talking to you through an osteophony wire. Don't touch your temple and speak without opening your mouth."

That gaze and those words made Eldridge instantly understand how this communication worked. However, there were still things that didn't make sense to him.

How does he know my name? Does Sefirot actually know our plans? Such suspicions whirled around in Eldridge's head, but he needn't have worried. Caldina had been the ones behind the Altean blockade in Altar, and Sefirot had simply been provided with details on all the PKs they'd hired for it—with the exception of the Superior Killer.

That was why Moneygold recognized Eldridge and noticed him in the crowd.

"I have a vague idea of what you're after, but you shouldn't do it just yet," said Moneygold.

"I know," replied Eldridge. Moneygold's words made him even more alert, but as Eldridge himself had no intention of making a move yet, he had no objections to staying put.

"We wanna keep the casualties low, you see. If you're gonna do it, match our timing and go after the ones we can't."

With that, Eldridge realized that Moneygold wanted him to join them in the counteroffensive.

That was something Eldridge would do gladly. If he mounted a counterattack on the orders of someone directly serving the Caldinan congress, there was no way Caldina would hold him responsible for whatever happened afterward.

Assuming Moneygold wasn't planning to double-cross Eldridge and make him take the blame, this was a fantastic proposal.

However, Eldridge hid the fact that this would benefit him from Moneygold, instead replying with, "And what's in it for me?"

If there was any advantage to be gained, Eldridge would go for it, and his experience and instincts told him there was still something more he could get out of this situation. In a way, he was letting his greed take the wheel, and in response...

"You won't make an enemy of me."

...he got only a few simple words that still spoke volumes.

The pronouncement left Eldridge speechless. It was borderline blackmail, but it was certainly worth the cost.

Eldridge was currently in a downward spiral after his repeated defeats at the hands of Superiors, and he certainly wanted to keep that from happening again.

Since it was Caldina who'd ordered the Altean blockade that had led to Goblin Street's first failure, though, it could be said that Eldridge's downward spiral had been caused by Moneygold's faction in the first place.

Eldridge, however, had no way of knowing that.

"Of course, that only applies if your group doesn't go after the other passengers. Also...I'll hook you up with a buyer who'll pay full price for the stuff you farm up here."

Eldridge liked that offer quite a bit. He still didn't have any contacts in Caldina's black market. If he could get one by cooperating with Moneygold, that would be well worth it.

There was no way Eldridge was going to refuse this proposal now.

"All right...I'll play along."

Thus, Goblin Street and Sefirot formed an alliance.

◇◆◇

DLG had taken control of Eltram.

Their primary target was the special ballroom, but many of their members had been sent to the other areas of the ship so they could suppress anyone who wasn't participating in the ball—and take hostages to prevent anyone attempting a counteroffensive from the ballroom.

There was an elevator leading from the cargo area to the mall, and the mall was now occupied by DLG forces. Among them were several Marshall IIs and infantry that had split up and headed out to the passenger cabin area.

And there was someone watching all this unfold from behind one of the planters that decorated the commercial area.

Wow, there's somethin' pretty big goin' on. The one hiding behind the planter was Fey—the girl who'd rushed here to buy a deodorant item. Currently, she was using Presence Manipulation—a skill available to jobs from both the onmitsu and thief groupings—to keep herself concealed. It wasn't strong enough to make her truly impossible to notice, but it was good enough to keep her from being spotted as long as she remained still.

Those have gotta be what we're after. That means we're eatin' good tomorrow too!

The Marshall IIs passing by were beginning to look like bags of money to her—but as things were, she was counting her chickens before they hatched.

Man, they really seajacked this ship, huh? Looks like the info I got in that back alley wasn't wrong, Fey thought, proudly nodding to herself over a job well done.

But then she silently gasped and looked up as though she'd just realized something important.

We're in a desert, so this isn't a seajack, but, like...a desertjack, I guess.

As it turned out, what she'd realized wasn't important in the slightest.

What now, though? I ain't very smart, so I don't really know what to do by myself. I wanna go back to the ballroom and ask, but I feel like I'll be found if I move...huh?

As she looked around the mall, she noticed something strange.

It was a golden, dragon-headed Magingear. Accompanied by two other units and some infantry, it was in the process of leaving the mall and moving somewhere else.

That one sure is flashy. It looks like a boss. I wonder if our leader could take it... It's goin' somewhere, though. Hmm...

Fey felt that losing sight of that particular prize would be bad.

I'll make one follow it, she thought before poking the back of her left hand, which was emblazoned with a crest showing countless hands reaching out for something.

A moment later, a semitransparent liquid flowed and dripped out of the crest.

Gespenst No. 1! Follow goldie over there! The liquid shook a little, then slid along the floor in the direction of the golden unit.

Wait—oh yeah. I can use this to contact our leader. I'll make No. 2 send a message.

She poked the crest again, making more liquid drop out of it.

"In the mall. Orders, please." There. This is like a secret message just between the two of us...eh heh heh heh...

All smiles, Fey wrote a short text and placed it on the semitransparent liquid mass she'd called No. 2, which then began to slide toward the special ballroom.

Phew. Now I just have to wait. This is the point where Niala would say something like "There's an oriental idiom that goes 'Fortune comes to those who rest.'"

Fey was satisfied with the work she'd done just now...

"Hey, a slime or something like that just came out of those planters."

"Whoever you are, you better show yourself or we'll shoot!"

...but her satisfaction was short-lived, as she was soon discovered and found herself in the crosshairs of multiple guns.

◇◆◇

Eltram, Special Ballroom

At the ballroom, Moneygold, Hugo, Isara, Eldridge, and Niala—who was added to the communication loop on Eldridge's suggestion—were discussing their plan of attack through Isara's wires.

DLG's soldiers occasionally passed the places the wires were spread, but Isara carefully manipulated them so that they weren't pulled out or spotted.

"So when do we start?" Eldridge asked.

"When conflict springs up in a different area of the ship," Moneygold replied. "If whoever's fighting back is successful, the casualties both here and there will be minimized. And if the DLG's warning wasn't a bluff, we'll know exactly how they'll act."

This plan made it possible for the counteroffensive to begin on two fronts, which would likely result in fewer casualties. And since the conflict would start elsewhere, they'd be able to reasonably say that they were fighting to protect the hostages from the DLG. Both Eldridge and Moneygold had the same thought.

"But there'll still be lots of casualties in every block, right?" asked Hugo, unable to fully accept the plan.

"Who knows?" Moneygold replied. "The DLG is made up of deserters from Dryfe's First Armored Battalion, and Dryfe already revealed their names and numbers. There aren't even two hundred of them in total."

The imperium had exposed the members of the DLG to make it clear that whatever the group would do in other lands, it was unrelated to their country of origin.

"That's not a small number, but this ballroom alone has over fifty of their infantry and a dozen of their Marshall IIs. Considering the importance of these hostages, this must've been where they focused most of their forces, so there's probably not as many of them in other parts of the ship."

Moneygold was right. Purely by numbers, about four-fifths of the DLG was present in this single location. Their strongest—Curtis—might not have been there, but that didn't change the fact that protecting this room would be the safest thing to prioritize if they wanted to minimize casualties.

"And frankly—to Caldina, the people here in this ballroom are way more valuable than everyone outside it."

"Moneygold...!" The Superior's cold and calculating words filled Hugo with rage. It was a miracle that he managed to avoid actually shouting Moneygold's name out loud.

"Calm down. Moneygold, you're acting like an asshole. And Hugo Lesseps, you're getting too worked up."

The one who stepped in to break things up between the two—or rather, to calm Hugo's growing anger with Moneygold—was Eldridge.

"Hugo Lesseps," Eldridge continued. "The reason Moneygold is waiting for someone outside this hall to fight back before making our move is because fewer people are likely to get hurt that way. Otherwise, we would've already taken action. Right?"

Moneygold did nothing but smile with his flabby cheeks, but that seemed like a "Yes."

"More importantly, we should think of what we'll actually do when it's time to act. We can't predict when the conflict outside will start. We need to at least come up with a simple plan before that happens."

"That's true..." Eldridge's words calmed Hugo down, and he nodded in agreement.

I don't know who he is, but he's really composed and has good judgment, Hugo thought. Unlike Moneygold, he hadn't been informed about Eldridge's identity. Is he the leader of some powerful Caldinan clan or something?

"I have a good idea of how we'll do this," said Moneygold as he looked at the four walls of the ballroom. "I'll delete everyone in front of the walls ahead of me and to my right."

Those words were spoken with absolute certainty.

"I'll also tank their attacks," he continued. "We'll catch them off guard by striking first. While they're out of it, Isara will take the ones behind me, while Eldridge and his clan member will handle the ones to my left."

"Understood," said Isara.

"Three Marshall IIs and sixteen infantry, huh?" said Eldridge. "Sounds good to me. Niala, you take out the infantry that's far away from the Marshall IIs."

"Roger that!"

We're gonna catch less prey, but we got no choice, Eldridge thought. The six units Moneygold will go for are gonna be gone, but if I can, I'll also try to grab the three left to the Fullmetal Princess.

"What about me?" Hugo asked, realizing that he hadn't been mentioned.

"You're on standby," said Moneygold. "Since Cyco's skill won't be effective here, we'll hold it back for a situation where it's useful. They don't seem to care much about the passengers themselves and still haven't noticed us, so that's the best course of action for now."

"You gotta be really careless to not notice a Superior," said Eldridge, who knew firsthand how fearsome Superiors were.

With the DLG, though, this attitude was only to be expected. They only knew Superiors from the civil war, when Splendida—the one they hired—ran away without defeating King of Beasts—and Behemot, too, was unable to defeat Splendida. Because of that, they had a tendency to severely underestimate Superiors in general.

Furthermore, the usefulness of Masters in war had only really become obvious to the world during the First Knight-Machine War, which had been sparked by Imperator Reinhard, whom they hated, after the group had already left Dryfe.

Because of all this, the members of the DLG were in the unusual position of just not realizing how fearsome Superiors actually were.

Once the plan had been laid out and silence settled over them once again, Eldridge thought, It's a rough strategy, but it should work out. We can deal with the ones we were tasked to handle, and I'm sure the same goes for the Fullmetal Princess. Honestly, Moneygold alone could probably take care of them all.

Eldridge had realized Moneygold's intentions the moment he said he'd handle the ones before the front and right side walls. Eldridge had already memorized the ship's structure, and he knew that there was nothing beyond those walls but the outside.

That alone explained everything.

"So the only problem left is whether anyone else will actually fight back." Eldridge was concerned about the scenario in which no one outside the ballroom launched a counteroffensive, giving them no chance to act.

“You don’t have to worry about that,” said Moneygold. “Eltram is surrounded by escort vessels. They’re all made for combat and have hired Masters to protect this ship. Even discounting them, this ship itself probably has plenty of Masters with a strong sense of justice, but not enough brains.”

“...I see,” said Eldridge. The comms jamming alone made it clear to the escort vessels that something was wrong. It was possible that the vessel’s guards would take action—and even if they didn’t, some Master or other was likely to do something. That was always how it went with incidents like this.

“And we can’t forget the time bomb that’s probably around here too,” Moneygold added.

“Ah...”

Hugo instantly realized what the Superior meant, but Eldridge didn’t, and the word alone put him on edge.

“The time bomb? What are you talking about?”

“What?!” That name belonged to the most fearsome PK in the whole continent, and just hearing it unexpectedly was enough to fill Eldridge with shock.

“What are the chances of this happening...? Is this really just karma...? Why would there be three Superiors here now, of all times...?”

Eldridge couldn’t help but mumble to himself, and he said something the others could not ignore.

“Three? What do you—” Moneygold tried to ask, but he couldn’t get an answer before something happened.

The comms carried by the soldiers keeping watch on the ballroom suddenly blared out an emergency siren.

Everyone’s eyes widened as they instantly realized that it must have been caused by exactly the thing they’d been discussing—a conflict on a different part of the ship.

It’d happened earlier than they expected, but they weren’t about to miss this chance.

They all launched into action before the soldiers could even raise their weapons.

“Do exactly as we planned,” Moneygold said before standing up and rushing to a location in the room that was free of other passengers.

“What?! Take aim, men!” The soldiers were quick to react. Moneygold was clearly showing resistance, so they all trained their sights straight at him.

However, drawing their focus was exactly what Moneygold wanted. That prevented them from attacking the other passengers, and let him do something more important.

“FIRE!”

Moneygold had no cover to speak of and was fully exposed to the DLG’s weaponry. The Marshall IIs were equipped with pre-ancient weaponry presented to them by their collaborator, Crys Fragment. They fired shells that rivaled Crimson Spheres in destructive power, and all of them were heading straight toward Moneygold.

Those shells would be enough to instantly kill even endurance-focused high-rank jobs, and Moneygold’s END wasn’t any better than his AGI.

He would certainly die if they were to hit him.

“The Untouched Land of Gold—Jipangu.”

But they wouldn’t.

Explosions and smoke surrounded the place where Moneygold was standing. However, beyond the fiery-gray wall, the soldiers saw golden and silver lights.

The sounds of the explosions were mixed with the pleasant sound of metal clinking against metal.

And when the smoke cleared, they saw Moneygold still standing there—completely unharmed.

At his feet there were piles of gold and silver.

“Thank you for the funding,” he said with a grin spreading across his round face. “But I am already wealthy. I’m not the one who receives, but the one who gives.”

He then took one of his wallet Inventories and turned it upside down.

“So...let me give you something.”

The piles of gold and silver around him grew even taller.

Next, Moneygold held up his hand in the shape of a gun. Like a little boy playing a game, he pointed the two fingers mimicking the barrel toward the wall in front of him—and the soldiers before it.

"Charge: 20,000,000." Moneygold stomped on the floor, making the coins around him jump off the floor...

"Treasure Cannon."

...and then fly toward the soldiers ahead.

A moment later, several lights and sounds filled the space—shining gold, sparkling silver, shock waves, tearing, crushing, and screams of death that lasted for but a moment.

In less than a second, the scenery of the hall changed completely.

The wall in front of Moneygold had vanished. Both the soldiers and the Marshall IIs that had stood there were gone, as well. It had all disappeared, leaving nothing behind but a hole through which the desert outside could be seen, covered in the veil of night.

"Wha—huh...?" The scene left the other soldiers paralyzed with shock, and Moneygold didn't miss the opportunity.

"Treasure Cannon."

He fired again, this time scattering the soldiers before the wall to his right.

In just a few seconds, half of the DLG forces present were completely obliterated.

"Flawless victory" did not even begin to describe it—Moneygold had crushed them like insects.

This was all possible because of Moneygold's status as King of Revelry, and his Superior Embryo—Type Another Rule, Impregnable Golden Bastion, Jipangu.

Jipangu was an Embryo from the Territory tree focused on but a single function. The skills it had developed were direct upgrades to the ones it had possessed since its creation, and the ultimate was no exception. In a way, it was like Logan Goddhart's Rumpelstiltskin.

And this sole power that Jipangu focused on was the transformation of damage into money.

This Embryo went beyond mere damage absorption by turning the damage it absorbed into currency. Using it drained a set amount of MP over time, but while it was active, it turned any damage received into money, no matter how great the amount. It was costly and thus couldn’t be channeled for too long, but not a single point of damage could touch Moneygold while it lasted.

This defensive power was among the greatest in Sefirot, surpassed only by that of Carl Lourlou the Multifariously Invincible and AR-I-CA the Blue Sky Songstress.

However, if it only possessed this single skill, that would make this Embryo only good for defense—and even then it would have the glaring flaw of expiring if given enough time.

That was why Moneygold also had a means of attack.

This was the skill that had made the enemies vanish—the ultimate job skill of King of Revelry, Treasure Cannon.

King of Revelry was the Superior Job of the playboy grouping, which focused on spending money, and the effect of its ult was simple—it launched an explosive attack that grew in power depending on the money spent.

1,000 lir created a 1,000 lir attack, 10,000,000 lir created a 10,000,000 lir attack, 100,000,000,000 lir created a 100,000,000,000 lir attack, and so on.

Not even Moneygold himself knew if there was a limit to how powerful it could be.

Defense that could create endless gold, and an offense that grew in potential without end—this was the heart of Moneygold’s power.

“And that’s that,” Moneygold said as he took out a cigar, and Isara—who was already next to him—cut off the tip using her metal-covered fingers.

Isara had already taken care of the soldiers she was entrusted with. She’d used her power over metal to turn the guns they wielded into shackles and the Marshall IIs they piloted into coffins.

And though they were a bit slower, Eldridge and Niala also stole the three Marshall IIs and defeated the infantry they had been tasked with. The Martial II units were sent directly to Eldridge’s Inventory, leaving the pilots poised as if still in the cockpit before they fell to the ground, thoroughly confused.

“You do your job well, huh?” said Moneygold.

“Thanks to the show you put on, I had enough time to load up another robbery," Eldridge said. The King of Burglary skill meant for stealing items, Greater Pickpocket, could be loaded onto both hands at once, but after being used on two of the units, it had to be reloaded.

However, thanks to everyone's attention being focused on Moneygold, Eldridge was easily able to ready another Greater Pickpocket and take the third as well. He even had enough leeway to take some of the infantry's gear too.

The combined panic from the siren over their comms devices and the disappearance of their comrades had made the theft especially easy.

Well, that's the ballroom cleaned up, Eldridge said. I guess we'll go support the other areas now. It'd be great if we could get some more of those Marshall IIs...

Three was already a good haul, but Eldridge wanted to make the most of this opportunity.

It's pretty clear that Moneygold's gonna ask me to keep cooperating, he thought as he glanced at Moneygold. As a member of Sefirot—the clan directly serving the congress—Moneygold was explaining the situation to the passengers in the ballroom.

But even if I'm cooperating with him, I don't know what the other two Superiors are planning, Eldridge thought. If I can avoid it, I really don't wanna fight them...though, I wonder who started that other conflict anyway. If that leads to anybody dying, they could be held responsible...hm?

Suddenly, Eldridge felt something poking his foot and looked down to see what it was.

It was a familiar Embryo—Fey's Gespenst No. 2—carrying a message in Fey's handwriting that said, "In the mall. Orders, please."

If Eldridge had been speaking out loud, this would've rendered him silent. What if Fey was actually the one who started the fight? A cold sweat began to form on his brow.

If that was the case, they could be held responsible instead, and his cooperative relationship with Moneygold would fall apart.

Eldrige moved at supersonic speeds as he took the message and waved Gespenst No. 2 away, wordlessly telling it to "Go back! Hurry!"

"Is anything the matter?" Hugo asked, noticing the sweat dripping down Eldridge's face.

"No, it's nothing. Anyway, we gotta support the other areas, right? Let's go," Eldridge replied before he and Niala—who immediately grasped the situation just from seeing his expression—headed straight toward the ballroom's exit.

Hugo had also decided that it was time to check the situation elsewhere, so he followed after them.

They looked back at Moneygold, who responded with a nod and also began to move toward the exit. He was done with his explanation to the people, and he'd entrusted the defense of the ballroom to the other Masters here.

Thus, their first battle on this ship ended as quickly as it began, and they all exited the scene.

However, none of them had any idea that this would be their easiest battle within Eltram.

Interlude: The Girl and the Spark

Three Minutes Ago, Eltram, Commercial Area

"Whoever you are, you better show yourself or we'll shoot!"

Hearing the voices and seeing the guns directed straight at her completely terrified Fey. Oh ...! Th-They found me! Wh-What do I do?!

From what she could tell, she was surrounded by four soldiers. She couldn't see anyone else around, and the two Marshall IIs positioned in the mall weren't visible from where she was.

Umm...uhh...in a situation like this, I gotta...umm...! On the verge of completely panicking, Fey poked her crest over and over. That made multiple semitransparent liquid masses drop out of it until they reached a total of eight.

I'll just put my safety first! Fey then raised her hands and stood up from the planters. "I give up! I surrender! Don't shoot!" she said, asserting that she had no will to fight...

"Truth Discernment picked up a lie! She's gonna resist!"

...only for that particular skill to expose her true intentions.

"AHHH! Seriously, that skill?!" she wailed. Most experienced people in Dendro always took the existence of Truth Discernment into account, so it was actually fairly rare for people to be caught by it.

And now, knowing that Fey was planning to fight, the soldiers started to squeeze their triggers...

"Steal!"

...just as Fey made use of her AGI advantage and activated her own skill before they could fire.

However, that was meaningless. The thief grouping's Steal was a skill that stole the target's items with a success rate based on skill level and the DEX stat—but it required the user to be close to the target. With there being ten metels between her and the soldiers, there was no way she could touch them.

Thus, this skill was useless for her own two hands...

“Stehlen.”

...but it wasn’t for the eight hands that reached out toward her target.

The eight puddles near the four soldiers’ feet spoke one single word—the very same semitransparent liquids that dropped out of Fey’s crest.

However, there were now hands sticking out from each of them, and in their palms...

“Hm...? What?”

...were the four soldiers’ stolen guns.

Four hands held a gun each. Three of the remaining ones held nothing, while the last one clutched one soldier’s pants.

“Not a bad result,” said Fey to herself. “Wait, now’s not the time for congratulating myself! Sleeping Fang!”

“Schlafen Fangzahn.” Though satisfied with the results of her arms, Fey hastily used Sleeping Fang—a dagger weapon skill.

The arms then let go of the weapons they held and transformed into blades before repeatedly attacking the soldiers, who were still confused by the disappearance of their weapons.

The damage of the attacks was low, but after a few cuts, the soldiers received the Forced Sleep debuff and passed out. This was Sleeping Fang’s effect.

“Neutralized!” Fey proudly said, having rid the soldiers of their weapons, consciousness...and one pair of pants.

This wouldn’t have been possible without her Embryo: Type Legion, United Barrage, Schiffs Gespenst.

It was based on the Japanese yokai called “funayurei,” or “boat spirits”—hordes of wraiths created from people who had been taken by the water. They stuck out their hands seeking ladles, only to use them to sink other ships and drag their passengers down to join them in their watery grave.

Schiffs Gespenst was an Embryo that used skills given to it by Fey. If Fey used Steal, the ten arms she could create would also use Steal, and if she used Sleeping Fang, they would also use Sleeping Fang.

This was due to the Embryo’s unique skill, Added Hands, which allowed her to multiply the effect of any skill that used her hands. Including her own activation, she could use such skills a maximum of eleven times at once—and she could do it from a distance as well.

These features came at the cost of making each Gespenst weak as far as Guardians went, and if defeated, they required some time to be restored.

Even so, their utility and versatility more than made up for that.

“Heh heh heh! I’ll take these four pricey-lookin’ guns—and the contents of your pockets! It’s the winner’s right!” she said as she began emptying the sleeping soldiers’ pockets, living up to her name as a member of a bandit clan. “I’ll be eatin’ good for a while!”

But while she was doing that, the comms devices on their waists suddenly let out a siren.

“Gaaahhh?! What?! What’s goin’ on?! Was that me?!” Fey was terrified that she was the cause of the siren, just like Eldridge was worrying in the ballroom, but that wasn’t the case. If these soldiers were the ones who reported the emergency, it wouldn’t be their comms devices ringing.

The cause was elsewhere, and it had happened before Fey took to action.

Five Minutes Ago, Eltram, Second Class Cabin Area

“Hic... Sniff...”

A girl was running through the cabin area’s hallway. Tears were streaming down her face and falling on the carpet below, leaving tiny stains.

“Dad...” Her name was Doris, and she was the daughter of the man who’d made a deal with Moneygold.

Her father had long been stuck in a dead-end job as the subordinate of a slave dealer. Although such businesses were legal here, society didn’t look at them the same way as other merchants, nor was the income good enough to make up for the stigma. Doris’s mother had lost all love for her hopeless husband and abandoned him and their daughter a long time ago.

However, things had begun to change for them when the slave dealer Doris’s father was working for acquired the Orb with the power to turn monsters into beautiful men and women. The monsters used as the base were easy to acquire, and the results were still more than good enough to satisfy human cravings.

The slave dealer instantly began using the Orb to make a fortune—but then it was found out that the humans turned back into monsters in three days.

The slave dealer quickly gained a reputation as a scammer, his store was destroyed, and his life ended soon after that.

The Orb that caused all this, however, ended up in the hands of his subordinate—Doris's father's—and he quickly crafted a plan.

Perhaps it wasn't complex enough to be called a plan, though. Seeing the fate of his boss, he had no intention of using the Orb for business—in fact, he wanted to get rid of it as soon as possible.

And that was exactly what he chose to do. Thus, he sent an anonymous letter to the most powerful entity in Caldinan commerce—the Caldinan congress—and offered to sell it to them.

The congress responded with directions telling him to board Eltram.

Fearing those chasing the Orb as well as those who weren't satisfied with only punishing the slave dealer himself, he and his daughter desperately rushed to the city Eltram would stop at.

And after they'd made the deal here, he'd looked at Doris and said, "I'll finally have my own business...a business in Drac-Nomad, at that. I'll be able to make you happier than you ever were...Doris..."

With those caring words, he gently patted his daughter's head. This had happened a mere six hours ago.

But now, Doris was all alone.

She and her father hadn't participated in the ball at the special ballroom. They'd been on the run for so long that they chose to simply rest in their cabin instead.

But then they were awakened by the DLG's announcement ringing through the speakers.

The sudden voice made Doris's father jump up from the bed as if it put him on high alert, but he wasn't actually processing the situation that well.

A moment later, the door to their cabin opened up, and a military man rushed inside. He was one of the soldiers going around the cabins and gathering the passengers in one place to make them easier to watch.

Doris's father was instantly overcome by terror and panic, so he threw a flower pot at the soldier.

This might've been nothing but an irrational action caused by the residual fear from their life on the run. However, it was enough for the soldier to see him as a threat and quickly fire at him.

Struck by countless bullets, he was mortally wounded.

"D-Doris...run...away...to...M-Moneygold..." Spewing bloody foam from his mouth, he used what little energy he had left to leap on the soldier. Knowing he wouldn't survive this, he did it just so he could give his daughter a chance to escape.

Despite that, Doris didn't move at first...

"GO...!"

...but when she saw the desperation in his expression as he said that final word, she darted out.

"Hic... Hic..." She'd been running since then, sobbing all the way. Her destination was the room in which her father and Moneygold made the deal, but there was no telling how long it would take her tiny legs to bring her there.

The DLG's soldiers scattered throughout the ship would probably find her first. However, she was in no state to think about that and try to hide instead.

She merely listened to her father's final words and ran.

She cried, she ran, and she thought, We were about to be happy... Why...? It hurts... I'm so sad... Dad...

The hopeful future her father had told her about was no longer in reach, and the tears in her eyes made it hard to see even what was right in front of her.

That might've been why she soon collided with someone.

"Oh...I-I'm...s-sorry..."

"Oww...I fell on my butt...huh? Are you cwying?"

"...Oh."

The person she bumped into—a girl who couldn't speak very well—commented on Doris's weeping, and Doris raised her hands to her face.

The tears were flowing still, showing no signs of stopping.

"What's wrong? Do you have an ouchie?"

"My dad...was shot... He told me...to run...and..." Through the sobs, Doris tried to answer, but as she spoke, the sadness welled up once more and her tears flowed uncontrollably again.

At first, the girl did nothing but look right at Doris. But then, she abruptly took out a handkerchief and gently touched it to Doris's face.

"It's ok to cry. Cry all you want. Crying is what you do when you're sad," the girl said, talking slightly better than she had a moment before, as she wiped away the tears.

The two had a moment, but then...

"There! There's two children!"

"Get them! And fire if they resist! They could be Masters that just look young!"

...they heard the heavy footsteps of armed soldiers.

"Y-You should...run too...! The bad people...are here...!" Doris said, still scared and desperate. She was terrified that the ones who'd killed her father would also kill not only her, but also this nice girl she'd just met.

However, the girl she spoke to had a completely blank expression on her face.

With cold, mechanical eyes, she was observing the approaching soldiers.

"Raise your hands! And come with us! We'll fire if you resist!"

The girl then saw them aim their guns at her and Doris.

"Minus." A moment after that word, a helmeted head rolled on the floor.

No, it wasn't just one.

A hatchet flew through the air in an arc, decapitating three of the soldiers.

"Huh?!" Another soldier voiced his shock—but not at his comrades who lost their heads.

It was because a girl raising an axe above appeared before him in an instant—a sight that looked almost like she had dropped several frames in an animation.

"Minus." With that word, she decapitated the soldier. Moving at a supersonic speed the eye couldn't follow, she slaughtered them one by one.

“EE-EEAHHH...!” A nightmarish scene was unfolding before the eyes of the screaming soldiers. A young girl wearing a dress was massacring these well-trained warriors.

But this was something they had predicted themselves: “They could be Masters that just look young!”

Indeed. This girl was a Master.

In fact, she was among the worst they could ever have encountered.

Murder Princess, Emily Killingston had deemed them to be minuses.

“E-EMERGEN— Guhhh?!” The very last one pressed the comms device button announcing an emergency, but died before he could explain what was happening.

The siren alone rang out, spreading news of a disturbance, but not what or where it was.

“Emily...there you are.”

As the siren still rang, they were joined by a man with a bandaged right arm—Zhang.

Emily had logged in without warning, and he’d been looking around for her in the cabin area.

“This is...” A single glance at the remains of the soldiers instantly made him understand what had happened here. He’d heard the DLG’s announcement and had a feeling that it would lead to combat on the ship.

I hoped that nothing would happen before Rascal arrived, he thought. However, this was a sudden and unexpected event. Zhang didn’t have much control over it.

Anyhow, he figured that the best course of action now was to take Emily, hide somewhere, and observe the conflicts here unfold.

“Emily...hm?!”

However, he quickly realized that that wouldn’t happen.

Emily was still in her killing mode. Despite killing every opponent here, she was still ready for combat.

She’s like how she was in Cortana...but there are no hostiles or neutrals here! Back then, after eliminating the enemies, she’d continued the slaughter by focusing on neutral Masters instead, but things were different this time. The only ones here were Zhang and Doris—who’d fainted dead away when the soldiers pointed their guns at her.

That other girl is the daughter of the person we protected, Zhang thought. I don't know why she's here, but Emily doesn't see her as an enemy. She would've already killed her if that was the case...

The fact that the girl was alive at all near Emily in killing mode was the only proof needed that she was no enemy. It slightly confused Zhang, but then Emily did something that confused him even more.

Still in her killing mode, Emily lowered her weapons and gently, with care, took Doris in her hands.

"Wha—?" Zhang was shocked to see Emily in this state do anything other than kill. If he'd been there to witness it, even Rascal would have been left speechless by it.

Then, not saying a word, Emily handed Doris to Zhang.

"Emily?" he said in question, but she ignored him, turned around, readied her weapons again, and walked through the hallway leading to the commercial area.

It felt as though she was saying, "I'm entrusting her to you." The presence of her still-active killing mode was Emily's way of expressing, "I'll go kill some more."

Zhang was more confused by Emily's actions than he'd ever been, but figured that the best thing he could do now was do as she wanted and keep the girl safe.

And so, he sent a jiangshi to watch over Emily and carried the unconscious Doris away from danger.

Thus, a giant spark fell upon the gunpowder keg that was Eltram.

Chapter Five: Cascading Chaos

Armored Pilot, Hugo Lesseps

After leaving the special ballroom, we split up.

Moneygold went to the bridge where the ship was controlled, while Isara went to the cargo area with all the goods it was transporting. Both were important parts of the ship that had to be protected, and the captain on the bridge needed to hear about what had happened in the ballroom and the situation in general.

The rest of us were tasked with getting rid of the remaining enemies on the ship, starting with the commercial area.

Eldrige was actually the one who suggested we go there first. His reasoning for that was that the DLG had used the ship's information equipment to deliver an announcement, which meant that they had most certainly taken control of the commercial area. That made perfect sense to me, but...

"Hey. What are you hiding?"

...Cyco posed a question to him.

"Cyco?" I said.

"What do you mean?" Eldridge replied.

"You look like you're in a rush," Cyco then explained. "It seems like you've done something bad and are nervous that someone will find out."

Eldridge was silent at first. But looking at him, I felt like I could practically see cold sweat going down his neck.

"...One of my clan members is at the mall. I'm anxious to know if there are any problems on her end. Sorry for bringing personal stuff into this."

"It's okay," I said. "You're not wrong about DLG taking the commercial area." It didn't matter that he had his own reasons for suggesting we got there—we had to do it anyway. "Also, it's normal to be worried about your own," I added.

"Thanks. That helps," Eldridge said with a relieved expression.

He really looks out for his clan, huh? What a good leader, I thought.

And with that, we left the hallway and headed into the commercial area.

“And there they are,” said Eldridge. “Get ready!”

We were quickly targeted by one Marshall II—a heavily customized one at that—and nearly ten soldiers. Eldridge instantly swung his right hand, trying to use his Skill to steal the unit, but it didn’t seem to work. Instead, it kept approaching us.

Why? I wondered.

“Looks like it has a high-level anti-theft effect on it,” Eldridge said, answering the question in my mind. “I used Greater Pickpocket twice and it failed both times. It doesn’t just look different than the ones at the ballroom.”

It wasn’t uncommon for Magingears to be equipped with modifications that gave them anti-thievery or anti-burglary skills. However, the very best of these protections from theft cost as much as the Magingear itself, so you’d rarely see mechs with such high-level defenses even in The Triangle of Wisdom. My White Rose and Teach’s Blue Opera were about the only ones that came to mind.

“I guess we gotta destroy that before we can move on,” said Eldridge. I could see a hint of impatience on his face—probably because he was so concerned for his companion in the mall.

“Leave them to me and go on ahead,” I said. “Cyco!”

“Oui, ma’am.” I used Instant Release to remove White Rose from my Inventory and immediately jumped in as Cyco merged with the machine.

“All right,” said Eldridge.

“We’ll leave this to you,” said Niala. “Wait...? ‘Ma’am’?”

With those words, the two of them headed in the opposite direction as our enemies.

After seeing them off, I joined the battle.

“Cyco, how’s La Porte de l’Enfer?”

“Good to go. They’re all in the double digits.”

If both the Marshall II pilot and the infantry had a high enough kill count of other people, this fight would not be a problem for me. I’d already marked Eldridge and Niala as exceptions, and I couldn’t see any other people nearby, so I could use it without worries.

“Reduce the effective range to 50 metels. La Porte de l’Enfer.”

The next moment, all infantry within 50 metels were covered in ice.

Some only had it creep into their limbs, while others froze almost completely. A few were lucky enough to avoid getting any ice on them at all, but the situation still threw them off guard.

Those who could retaliate tried to do so, but the bullets from their gunpowder-based firearms were all deflected by White Rose's Mythical alloy armor.

Unlike guns that used magic, traditional guns had the same amount of firepower regardless of who used them. Personal firearms of this type couldn't hope to break through White Rose's defenses.

There was only one foe I needed to worry about.

"The contents of the mech didn't freeze," said Cyco.

As if confirming her statement, the custom unit moved to attack us with mobility that was simply impossible for a mech piloted by someone whose body was encased in ice. I'd seen how powerful the DLG's Magingears were when they'd attacked Moneygold back at the ballroom, and I knew that not even White Rose could withstand it unscathed.

That was why I evaded the attacks instead—I wanted to make sure I didn't take any direct hits.

"Thirteen seconds." As long as La Porte de l'Enfer was active, time was on our side. Once thirteen seconds passed, the second tick came, expanding the ice on those who were already Frozen as well as Freezing those who had gotten lucky the first time. Many of them were completely encased in ice now.

Despite this, the custom unit moved just as well as it had before.

"Cyco, what's the count on the pilot?"

"Probably around 80."

Failing with an eighty percent chance twice in a row was within the realm of possibility, but this still sent a strange shiver down my spine. I felt like something was off here.

"We'll fight the normal way," I said hesitantly.

"Oui, ma'am."

Whatever the reason was, I felt like La Porte de l'Enfer wouldn't work here. Instead, I equipped a firearm and an ice blade before charging in to face the custom unit.

And as I did, Moneygold's words echoed in my head.

"Most powerful skills have flaws. Yours could even have some weaknesses that neither you nor Cyco are aware of.”

Eltram, Commercial Area

As the siren blared, Fey took anything worthwhile off the sleeping soldiers.

“It’s so damn loud,” she said to herself. The sound had surprised her at first, but nothing new had happened since. She’d even hid herself again, but it didn’t seem that any reinforcements were coming. That was why she’d begun ignoring the siren and looting the soldiers—but by this point the sound was beginning to annoy her.

“Oh yeah.” She then Stole the blaring comms devices, silencing them forcibly by storing them in her Inventory.

“Having some kinda comms thing sure wouldn’t hurt,” she said. “Heh heh heh. I’m bein’ a real MVP here! The leader’s gonna love this—and me! My chubby belly won’t matter at all!”

Fey put on a bright smile and pumped her fist in the air victoriously—until a desert-customized Marshall II hovered into her line of sight.

“Whaa?! But I did a perfect job! Wait, is this because of what I did with those sirens?”

“This is where the comms were cut!” The Magingear’s pilot said. It turned out that the enemy had been using the comms devices to track their allies, and upon realizing that the markers here had vanished, someone had rushed to the scene. And of course, it was all because Fey put the devices in her Inventory—so much for her perfect job.

Oh. This ain’t good, Fey thought. This wasn’t an enemy Fey could handle. Her build was AGI and DEX focused, and the dagger debuffs she used in combat couldn’t break through thick carapaces or armor. She could try to run, but based on the speed with which the Marshall II had appeared, it had to be faster than her. Likely whoever was controlling it had the Gale Pilot job.

On top of that, Magingears were far too big to be taken using Steal. The only reason Eldridge could do it was because he had access to Greater Pickpocket—a King of Burglary skill.

Wh-Wh-Wh-What do I do?! O-Oh yeah! Feeling cornered, Fey quickly bent down and picked up one of the soldiers affected by Forced Sleep.

"You better not attack me if you value his life!" she cried, placing her dagger against the soldier's neck.

It was truly the act of a lowly scoundrel.

Heh heh heh. This should bring that pilot to a stop and...huh?!

The Marshall II stopped moving only for a second before training its gun on her.

"I'm holding your friend here! Don't you see?!" Fey insisted.

"A proud army man would rather die than be taken prisoner by men who fight dishonorably!"

"Hey, you shouldn't cut off your people so easily! And I'm not a man!" Her villainous tactic failed spectacularly, and the pilot was about to fire at both Fey and the soldier when...

"Kill your own people all you want...but I won't let you kill mine."

...a voice rang out from behind the Marshall II unit—which then vanished.

"What?" The pilot was completely unable to process the situation.

"You're wide open now!" said Fey as she showered the unlucky pilot with debuff attacks, putting Forced Sleep on him just as she'd done to his allies.

When it was all over, Fey started to cheer. "Woo-hoo! Justice wins again!"

"Justice? We're a bandit clan... Anyway, I'm glad I made it in time."

Those words made her turn around to see Eldridge—the very person who'd just stolen the Marshall II and saved Fey.

"Leader! I wanted to see you so bad! I was sooo scared!" she said, taking the chance to leap into his embrace.

"I won't allow that."

Niala, however, intervened.

"...Oh. Niala. I wanted to see you too."

"That isn't the reaction you gave him," Niala said. "I do understand it, though."

They sure get along, Eldridge thought as he watched his clanmates.

"Anyway, Fey," he said. "Now that I know you're safe, I'd like to ask you something."

"My favorite foods are hot dogs with lots and lots of sauerkraut!"

“Not that,” Eldridge said, and Niala merely smacked Fey on the head. “Did the siren go off before or after you did something?”

“Uhh...” He’s gonna get mad at me if I tell the truth! Fey thought. Even she could figure out that much.

“Let me rephrase the question,” said Eldridge, glancing at the soldiers lying on the floor. “Are they the ones who activated the siren?”

“No, they’re not! I took them out silently!” she said, speaking quickly as though she was seizing a chance to prove her innocence.

“I see. That means we should get away with it...hm?”

As Fey’s words filled Eldridge with relief, he noticed a change in the surface he was standing on.

The ship just shook... Did its speed change? As he wondered what had happened, Eldridge heard heavy footsteps approaching them.

“Eldridge. Is everything okay here?”

The footsteps belonged to a pure-white Magingear—Hugo’s White Rose.

“Ah! Leader! Another one! Take it!”

“No. That one’s our ally for now.”

Eldridge’s words confused Fey, so Niala pulled her to the side for an explanation of the events that had led up to this moment, while Hugo and Eldridge had an exchange of their own.

“Sorry for leaving you back there,” said Eldridge.

“Yeah, and I only made it in time thanks to you. Though, uh...” Eldridge instantly noticed the state White Rose was in. The frame was still untouched, but the surface armor was damaged here and there. He could tell it hadn’t been caused by infantry firearms, but by Marshall II weapons. “Did La Porte de l’Enfer not work on it?”

Hugo had told him about this skill back when he registered them as exceptions. It delivered a Freeze effect that grew stronger the more of their own kind the target had killed, with a guaranteed full body Freeze when the number was 100 or above. Eldridge assumed that it would be quite effective on career soldiers who’d been through a civil war, so he didn’t expect Hugo to have this much trouble with them.

“Actually...there’s something I want to ask about that.”

◇◇◇

Armored Pilot, Hugo Lesseps

The battle ended shortly after I chose to actually fight.

That was because the pilot of the custom unit actually Froze not long after the battle began.

It was on either the fourth or the fifth tick. As we were dealing damage to each other, 80% of the pilot's body Froze, making piloting impossible, and then the next tick Froze the rest. The most obvious conclusion would be that the pilot was just lucky enough to avoid Freezing until then, but I—Hugo Lesseps—was convinced there must be more to this.

I felt that there must've been something that had blocked La Porte de l'Enfer.

That was why I showed Eldridge the custom unit I'd fought. "What do you think?"

The Frozen Pilot had already been removed from it and placed next to the infantry that had turned to ice first. I imagined that I'd have to unfreeze them once we handed them to the authorities.

"This mech's got the highest quality anti-theft defenses," said Eldridge. "And way more comms equipment than I'd expect."

"Comms?"

"My guess is that this is the source of the jamming, and it probably also hosts their whole comms network." The commercial area was close to the middle of the ship, so it must've been the most effective place to set up a comms bypass. It played an invaluable role in coordinating the DLG, and that explained why it was equipped with an anti-theft skill.

However, we still didn't know why the pilot didn't Freeze when I used La Porte de l'Enfer. Anti-theft, comms jamming, and comms hosting—none of this seemed like anything that would affect my skill.

"Did you use the skill on Magingears before?" Eldridge asked.

"A number of times during tests with the clan." If I recalled correctly, that had been part of an experiment led by Fran. I was put up against duel rankers from our clan, and the skill Froze them just fine.

Looking back, it was probably a test to see if it would work on Gideon's duel rankers too.

"Then it has to come down to some difference between then and now."

"Well, that thing's just different, right?" said Eldridge's clan member—Fey—as she knocked on the custom unit's chest armor. "It's nothin' like the Marshall IIs I saw on the internet. The color is different and uhh...yeah, it's just real different."

"Looks like they spent lots of money redesigning it for deserts," said Eldridge. "That's good for our purposes."

"You know so much!"

"I just did my research on what I was gonna take. That's all there is to it."

"But how did they modify it this much?" Niala asked. "They're just soldiers who escaped their country, aren't they?"

"They're a bit more than that, Niala," said Eldridge with a shake of his head. "They're deserters, sure, but they're also the First Armored Battalion. Aside from the SMTF with all their super special abilities and lore, they are Dryfe's most elite soldiers. They've been handling, repairing, and modifying Magingears for a long time. When it comes to the power suits and tanks, they're actually better at it than The Triangle of Wisdom. It's really no surprise that they can customize their units to better suit a different environment."

"...I see."

"Since my Greater Pickpocket didn't work, I would've had tons of trouble with it myself. I don't think I can aim for a Greater Takeover without breaking the armor."

Eldridge touched the custom unit's chest-armor exactly as Fey had done.

"By the way, Hugo," Eldridge said, pointing at what looked like a crack in the armor. "Did you cause this?"

"Yes. With this blade," Hugo said.

"Did the pilot freeze before or after you made this crack?"

"Huh? I think it was...after."

"Ah...I guess that must be the reason it didn't work before," Eldridge said as he began fiddling with the unit.

"Have you figured it out?" I asked.

"Yeah. The damage made all the difference. Figure out yourself what that means—you gotta examine your own abilities as best as you can. It's important to have a good grasp of them and not just do things haphazardly. That's what separates the first-rate from the second-rate."

"Wow, you're so right!" said Fey.

"You...know you use your skills more haphazardly than anyone in the clan, right?" said Niala.

"I'd say that's part of what makes her Fey," Eldridge commented. "Embryo traits are based on their users, after all...ah, there we go."

As he talked, Eldridge removed a part of the custom unit—the part responsible for the anti-theft effect.

"Can I have this?" Eldridge asked, and after I gave him a nod, he thanked me and took the unit.

"Anyway, that's the commercial area cleaned up," he continued. "Should we go to the passenger cabin next?"

"Ah! Oh yeah—I just remembered." Fey suddenly raised her voice. "There was a huge, golden, strong-lookin' Magingear that ran by here recently! I made No. 1 follow it, so I know where it is!"

A large golden Magingear? I thought. Could that be...?

"Where is it now?"

"Umm..." Fey groaned, poking her temple in an attempt to focus before pointing diagonally down. "Over there!"

"That's...the power block?" I asked.

"Unless the mech's gotten off the ship, yeah," said Eldridge. "And this is just my guess, but that unit is probably the head of the DLG. I heard that they're led by a Magingear that looks like that."

"Should we go find it?" Niala asked.

"I'd like to meet up with Moneygold first. It probably has anti-theft measures on it, so I doubt we could handle it by ourselves."

I nodded to that. It was possible that La Porte de l'Enfer wouldn't work on it, just like it didn't work on the custom unit.

"The cause of the jamming is gone now, so maybe you can contact him?" Eldridge asked.

"I'll try," I said as I activated the comms device Moneygold had given me.

"Hugo?" Moneygold instantly replied. His voice was clear and there didn't seem to be any problems with the device.

"Yes," I said. "We're in the commercial area and we just took care of the unit that was causing the jamming. Also, Eldridge's clan member said that the leader of the DLG went to the power block."

"All right, I see. On my end, I retook control of the bridge. The staff are all safe too. The energy core was deactivated, and the ship's running on residual magic. It'll soon slow to a halt."

"Ohh, that explains the change in speed," Eldridge said as he listened.

"Did the DLG deactivate it?" I asked.

"That's the natural conclusion...but it's strange how they went through the deactivation process so quickly. It's as if they knew exactly what to do to turn it off."

"That's true," said Eldridge. "Maybe it's just because they're Dryfean? Regardless, I'll go there and—what?"

Suddenly, I heard panicked voices on the other side as well as the sound of an explosion, which was followed by an explosion I heard not through the comms device, but with my own ears.

"What...?!"

"The first escort ship was sunk!"

"The second one has been hit!" The people on the bridge were reporting the situation. They must've been talking about the escort ships meant to protect Eltram from monsters and the like.

"Forget what I said," said Moneygold. "I can't go there now. Try handling it yourselves."

"Moneygold?" I asked. We couldn't see outside from the commercial area, so we didn't know what was happening.

"The second escort ship's damage is spreading... It sunk!"

"The third one was hit!"

"An unidentified entity is approaching from the horizon at four o'clock!"

But those words I heard over the comms told us that the situation wasn't good...

"I-It's a dragon! A mechanical dragon is attacking the escort ships...!"

...and that furthermore, it was about to change drastically.

◆◆◆

Five Minutes Ago, Twenty Kilometels Southwest From Eltram

A crimson and white mechdragon rushed over the sands, veiled by night.

In its cockpit, there was a man and a woman. The man was The Weapon, Rascal the Bloodonyx. The woman was the goofy maid merged with his Embryo, as well as the creator of this unit—Machina.

"Master! We're about to reach Eltram!"

"We're here...faster than...I expected..." said Rascal, clutching his hand to his chest. He was doing that because his ribs were cracking—the price he paid for moving at supersonic speeds, which he hadn't planned on doing. When their comms link with Zhang on Eltram were cut, Machina had said, "Oh! It's an emergency! We gotta hurry!" and then pushed the mechdragon to break the sound barrier so they could make it there faster.

This had the unfortunate side effect of damaging Rascal's bones.

They'd originally planned to move at a speed he could handle, so after such a massive boost, it was no wonder they'd made it here so quickly.

"Rascal." As the unit slightly slowed down and Rascal administered a high quality Potion to heal himself, he heard a voice over his comms device. That voice belonged to Zhang.

"Zhang? Did comms recover?"

"Yes. I believe the cause of the jamming was eliminated by the ship's forces."

"I see. What's the current status?"

"Dryfe's Legitimate Government has taken control of the ship, but the special ballroom with all the VIPs was liberated by the Superior, Moneygold, and those working with him. They're currently eliminating the rest."

Just as they'd planned, there was a conflict in place that they could use as a chance to analyze the combatants involved. The conflict had nothing to do with the Orb, though, so it hadn't gone exactly as they were expecting.

"Emily, however..."

"Did somethin' happen to her?"

"She sees the DLG as enemies and is traveling the ship to eliminate them. Normally, she would have recovered from her kill state already, but it does not seem to be happening."

"I see."

Usually, Emily would return to normal the moment all the enemies in her immediate area were gone. But now she was wandering around and looking for more foes.

This was a definite increase in her combat capabilities, but it was hardly something Rascal wanted to celebrate.

Did her illness get worse? In that case, should I tell the hospital to take off her headset? But that would count as a Suicide in-game, though. It won't help our overall plans if she goes to the gaol, Rascal thought to himself. If she hasn't overcome this yet, it's not a good idea to stop her.

"Rascal?" the voice over the comms asked.

"All right, I get the sitch. Just leave Emily like that for now. I'll come pick her up later."

"Very well," said Zhang. "Also...there is something else I feel I should say."

He then proceeded to tell Rascal how Emily had entrusted Doris to him.

"Emily asked you to protect the girl while still in her combat state, huh?" Hearing that just made Rascal lose himself in thought once again.

The fact that she's seeking out enemies makes it seem like she's gotten worse, but this actually looks like an overall improvement. But...then again, is it really? It's hard to tell. I should probably bring it up with her doctor later...but regardless, we should secure the girl.

"Zhang, keep the girl safe," Rascal said. "You can even prioritize her over Emily—I'm sure Emily will be just fine no matter the situation. She'a got the gear for it now."

"Very well." With that order sent, Rascal switched off the comms device.

As if she'd been waiting for that to happen, Machina spoke up.

"Master, we have a teeny bit of a problem."

"I don't exactly wanna hear it, but I will."

"Umm, Eltram's power has been cut. The source is probably being removed..."

"Shit," Rascal spat out a swear word he didn't often employ, his face twisting in annoyance "So that's what they're after, not the Orb. Someone's already laid claim to it, huh...? Damn it. Now we've got no choice but to charge in right away. There's no time to observe the situation."

"Uhhh...why?"

"Imagine if the DLG got their hands on that energy core. It'll be enough of a pain if they manage to get away with it, but what if Moneygold defeats them before they can escape? Sefirot will have that core all to themselves, and they'll be able to make Eltram's owners believe that it was taken by the DLG.”

“That...sounds pretty crooked.”

“And there’s a certain someone with them who can do that without thinkin’ anythin’ of it,” Rascal said, picturing a face known by almost everyone in Caldina—the president. That mental image made him frown like he’d just tasted something bitter. “That’s why we gotta take it or break it before that happens...” After a deep sigh, he looked ahead. “Machina, get ready for a preemptive strike.”

“Aye-aye, sir! Sardonyx is ready to go!”

Rascal’s order received an answer from both Machina and Sardonyx—the landdragon-type Prism Dragon redesigned and freshly manufactured in the modern era. The hum of its energy cores echoed through the desert like a roar.

“Shift from Cannon Cruiser to Over Sniper form,” Rascal ordered. “We’ll use the Horizon Arch.”

“Oh! This is the first time we’ll be using the main cannon since the test! You got it! That ship’s a total goner!”

“Stop. Only target the escort vessels. Emily and Zhang are still on Eltram.”

“Aye-aye, sir!” Machina began to enter commands on the keyboard before her at incredible speeds.

That caused Sardonyx to transform.

It still had the shape of a wingless dragon, but its neck was beginning to grow. Eventually it was so long and straight that when the dragon opened its mouth, its overall shape was reminiscent of a rifle.

“Shift complete! Launching survey buoy!”

The back of the transformed Sardonyx released a single missile as though it was a signal flare. Once it reached a certain height, the missile jettisoned its casing and became a sensor floating in place, overlooking a vast area and sending the gathered optical data back to Sardonyx.

“We have visuals. There are two escort vessels facing our direction...oh, wait, three if we really try for it.”

“Destroy them all. Knowing what’ll happen later, it won’t hurt to lower their numbers.”

“Aye-aye, sir. I’ll fix the sights...there we go.”

After she said that, her seat began to transform. It turned around, going from a chairlike shape to a horizontal one. It was as though the rear seat became a mat spread out right above Rascal's head. Machina lay down on it and took hold of a device that came down from somewhere above the cockpit. This device functioned as both a trigger and a sighting device linked to the unit's camera-eye.

She looked through it, but there was nothing beyond it but the desert.

That was what she was expecting—Eltram was still beyond the horizon, after all. It was impossible to physically spot it yet. And considering that it was completely obscured, sniping it from this distance was an absurd idea.

However, the eye Machina used on the sighting device was certainly looking at something.

"The visual info we got from above is... The current location of the unit... The height of the dunes... The current location of the target...mhm. It all checks out." Machina gathered the visual data from the survey buoy above, as well as the data observed by the camera-eye, then ran them through her internal processor to calculate her aim.

"And here's...the first shot!"

The moment she said that, Sardonyx's angled cannon-maw released its first shell.

It flew slightly upward at several times the speed of sound. Eventually, when it was at a certain point in the sky, the explosives set on the shell went off, changing its trajectory so that it rocketed downward—straight toward the bridge of the first escort vessel.

"It hit!"

"Beautiful. Is that what you wanna hear?"

"Eh heh heh heh! Say it again!"

"Hurry up and keep firin'."

"Hey, you could show me some more love, you know!" Machina whined, but she still sounded somewhat happy as she fired the second shot and hit the second vessel.

Horizon Arch—the most unique among Sardonyx's weapons, it was Machina's design for a long-range sniper cannon. Its direct line of fire had a radius of 50 kilometels—an incredible range matching that of a rail gun. On top of that, the shells it fired had explosives attached to them that could be detonated at a preset time to change the shell's trajectory.

However, that was only possible in a hypothetical best-case scenario.

The shell would never hit if it wasn't fired from the right angle at an invisible target, and both the initial firing and the explosives needed to be timed perfectly. Even rail guns from Earth, despite all the fanfare regarding their range, weren't actually all that accurate.

However, if fired by Machina a hundred times, all one hundred shells would strike their target.

The aiming angle, the moment at which the trigger was pulled, the timer on the explosives—she calculated all of that herself, and she did so without fault. Her processing power nearly defied belief.

This wasn't so strange for her, though. She was the eldest Prism Person—the DEX-focused Agate Designer often lauded as the pinnacle of them all.

Deactivated two thousand years ago, she'd been picked up by Rascal in one of the Ruins and given new life through a connection to his Superior Embryo—Deus Ex Machina.

And despite all the intervening years, her design skill hadn't dulled, and her handling prowess hadn't degraded one bit.

"The second ship sank. And I hit the third one too. Oh—the cannon's starting to feel the burn."

As a gunpowder weapon with such an incredible range, it suffered immense heat damage every few shots. Extended use of it would eventually cause it to break midshot, greatly damaging the unit itself.

"All right. I'll fix it up," Rascal said, touching the armrest of his chair and using a skill. "Rewind Weapon."

With those words, a light washed over Sardonyx.

And when it subsided, the cannon that had been overheating a moment before cooled down—and it didn't have a single scratch on it, as if it had never been fired at all.

This was Rascal's skill as The Weapon.

"That blows my mind no matter how many times I see it!"

"I'm just usin' what I've got." The Weapon was a Superior Job specialized in the operation of weaponry, and the focus of its skills could be summarized in two words: restoration magic.

In other words, it was a Superior Job that could use healing magic on machines.

While Mechanics and the like focused on skills that enabled faster repairs through the replacement of broken parts, The Weapon fixed damaged machines magically.

Its abilities could accurately be characterized as "repair magic." It couldn't heal what was completely lost—such as Machina's left arm—but it could take care of dents and cracks in existing parts, as well as instantly tune and stabilize any machines with damaged software that were experiencing critical errors.

This meant that as long as Rascal was riding Sardonyx, neither physical damage nor software failure could break it down.

That was the main reason he was riding it even though he risked breaking more bones in the process.

In fact, this unit was so unbalanced that it would likely be destroyed without Rascal's care.

"The Weapons of the past couldn't use it as well as you do, though!" Machina said.

The Weapon's repair magic was premised on—in fact, it necessitated—the user knowing the full structure of the target machine. But that wasn't a problem. Even if Rascal himself didn't know it, his other half—the Superior Embryo, Deus Ex Machina—did. It was because of this Embryo's ability to grasp the structure of any machine it connected with that Rascal was able to become The Weapon in the first place.

The Weapon, The Earth...it wasn't that uncommon for Masters to fulfill the conditions for the The One series of jobs using their Embryos rather than mastery of their own skills as intended. In fact, Masters who achieved it through pure technical prowess—such as The Unsheath, Kashimiya—were the rarity here.

"And...boom! There goes the third one!"

"Shift back to Cannon Cruiser form. We'll get into Eltram and head to the power block."

"Aye-aye, sir!" Sardonyx's extended cannon was retracted, Machina's seat returned to normal, and the unit began charging toward the now-undefended ship.

"By the way..." said Machina.

"What?"

"There's no way Zhang and Emily are on the bridge, right?"

Rascal instantly understood what she was trying to say.

“Fire.”

“Aye-aye, sir!”

Rascal’s one word was enough for Sardonyx’s draconic maw to open up again. It was in a short-barreled mobile firing mode rather than long-range sniping mode, but Machina once again used Horizon Arch. Though the target wasn’t obscured by the horizon anymore, she still activated the skill while Sardonyx was moving at high speeds.

That was not a problem, however. Just like she hadn’t missed the Magingears in Lieutenant Colonel Berlin’s squad during the test, she didn’t miss Eltram’s bridge.

“A hit...huh?” Despite the clean hit, Machina looked puzzled.

“What’s wrong?”

“Nothing, it just didn’t deal as much damage as I—evasive maneuvers!” Before she could finish her sentence, she grabbed and pushed the control column to make the unit dodge to the side.

The intense g-force once again jostled Rascal’s body, making his bones creak and blood start to spill from his mouth.

However, he wouldn’t complain about that—a large shining projectile passed right through the space Sardonyx was occupying just a moment ago.

“Treasure Cannon! It’s Moneygold!” The familiar attack allowed him to instantly understand the situation. “So he’s at the bridge. I guess he used himself as a barrier to prevent a direct hit.”

“What do we do now?” Machina asked.

As they talked, multiple shining projectiles worth hundreds of millions flew toward them. Machina had the piloting technique to evade them, but the attacks left many new craters in the patches of desert where they landed. It was clear what would happen if one of the shots were to hit its target.

“Don’t waste our ammo,” said Rascal. “Our attacks won’t work on him when that skill’s active. Other than that, this doesn’t change our plans. Advance. Treat this like an action game instead of a shootin’ game. Look for openings in his attacks and use them to approach the ship. He won’t be able to attack that freely once we’re in.”

Sardonyx was far tougher than the common Marshall II—in fact, it wasn’t even a fair comparison. The firepower needed to destroy it was naturally far greater, and if Moneygold unleashed that much devastation inside Eltram, the consequences would be dire.

"It's gonna require some intense movements to get close... Are you sure you can handle it?" Machina asked, worried about her frail Master.

"I'm pretty sure I just told you to 'advance,'" he replied through the blood in his mouth, clearly indicating that she should keep going.

"...Aye-aye, sir!"

That was all that had to be said. Machina obeyed the will of her owner and drove Sardonyx straight into the deadly bullet hell.

Eltram, Commercial Area

Vibrations shook from the bridge, followed by quakes from the desert in the distance.

The situation moved fast, and Eldridge responded just as quickly.

"Niala," he said. "The owl."

"Right away." Niala held up her left hand, which shone brightly. This was followed by six blue windows appearing around her. She touched one of them, causing a single mechanical owl to fly out of its other side.

At the same time, Eldridge stole a part of the wall with his skill, letting the owl fly outside.

A moment later, the window the owl had just exited began to display what was outside the ship's walls.

This was Niala's Embryo—Type Legion, Winged Omnipotence, Simurgh. It was an avian Type Legion with many uses based on which bird the user called forth. There was the survey-focused Spotter Owl that Niala had just used, the Group Crow for causing distraction and confusion, the Message Pigeon meant to deliver messages, the Cargo Pelican for transport, the Fighting Falcon for air battles, and the Genocide Condor meant for wide-scale destruction.

However, despite being a Type Legion, they relied on Niala herself to give them commands and control them, and her ability to do so limited the number of birds she could employ at once. Because of that, she usually used the owl by itself to survey the enemy's location before sniping them.

This didn't affect her ability to control multiple birds at once, but activating the ones with high combat ability incurred high external costs, so her recent financial state was another reason she rarely used them.

"This...looks like a battle," Niala said, perplexed, as she looked at the owl's window.

There was a mechanical dragon approaching the ship, and countless shining projectiles fired from the bridge were trying to stop it. The projectiles caused immense destruction where they landed—a single hit would be enough to sink the ship.

However, they were familiar with this sight.

"I guess a new attacker appeared, and Moneygold's trying to fend them off," said Eldridge. He figured that the attacker was a Superior too, but he wasn't sure about that, so he didn't say it out loud. The fact that Moneygold was having trouble with these new foes seemed like enough proof.

Another Superior...now I can't say we're safe even though we're with Moneygold. Even if we ignore that new one, there's still two others, and one of them's the damn Murder Princess... I thought I'd finally succeeded at a job, and now this happens! Maybe we should look for a chance to pull out.

Eldridge was scared of what would happen if he ended the alliance with Moneygold and ran away, but he certainly didn't want to fight and lose against yet another Superior either.

The head of the DLG down in the power block supposedly has the most valuable mech of them all, though. I can't lie—I'd like to get my hands on it. Acquiring just that unit would make their profits from this venture skyrocket.

Now Eldridge wasn't sure whether to retreat or advance.

"Little lady?! What's wrong?! You're all bloody!"

That was when he heard Fey's worried voice. He looked over to see her approach a little girl in a bloodstained dress.

The girl had a crest on her left hand, making it clear she was a Master. It looked like she'd come from the passenger cabins. Niala and Eldridge both were so focused on the visuals projected by the owl that they'd failed to notice her approach.

At first glance she looked like a victim of the DLG. But a moment later, Eldridge realized what immense danger they were in.

It was because her face and crest were on his personal mental blacklist.

"Leader! She's all hurt—"

"GET AWAY FROM HER!" Eldridge and Hugo shouted at the exact same time.

"Huh?"

However, before Fey could react to the warning...

The girl recognized her as an "enemy" who'd obstructed her path.

"...Minus."

And with that one word, the Murder Princess, Emily, sliced diagonally at Fey's torso.

◇◇◇

Armored Pilot, Hugo Lesseps

I watched as her slender body collapsed to the floor, an enormous amount of blood and viscera gushing out from the wound.

"Cyco!"

"Oui, ma'am."

I quickly did what I had to do—the reason I was on this ship in the first place. The reservations I had regarding Emily had no place in this desperate moment.

Just like during the final attack in Gideon, my body followed my will and moved without hesitation.

"La Porte de l'Enfer!" I jumped into White Rose again and instantly activated my skill.

And just like she had in Cortana, Emily Froze in but a moment. There were no failures like with the DLG's custom unit—she was instantly encased in ice.

"And now...!" I did the same thing as I had in Cortana. Using Boucliers Planete, I trapped the ice sculpture, preventing it from being destroyed by her own axes. I'd done this before, and I could do it again.

The moment that thought passed through my mind, her left shoulder began to shine and she dissolved into motes of light.

"Huh?" The bewilderment made my mind go blank, but it did not last for long...

"Minus."

...for Emily was immediately reconstituted and attacked me with her axes.

"Wha—?!" I activated the unit's defense skills at full capacity and assumed a defensive stance. The Murder Princess's attacks seemed heavier than they had in Cortana, and they echoed throughout the cockpit.

This weight of her attacks was the weight of all the lives she took. It was the same thing that let La Porte de l'Enfer trap her in ice, and yet...!

"Second tick."

Thirteen seconds had passed, and with those words from Cyco, Emily Froze again.

However, yet again, her left shoulder shone, she turned into bits of light, and was reconstituted.

"No way...!" I'd anticipated something like this. I'd considered the possibility that she—or whatever allies she had—would create a countermeasure for this specific strategy that had once defeated her.

But I never expected...

"Every time she freezes...she dies," Cyco says.

I never thought that she would die whenever she got a debuff.

It wasn't a skill. She already had a Superior Embryo, so I doubted that she could gain new Embryo skills, and I couldn't imagine any job would have such a terrible utility skill.

This was probably caused by a piece of equipment that stopped all bodily function in reaction to binding and curse debuffs.

It was an awful item that normally would never see any use. Debuffs were a problem, but they weren't nearly as bad as dying.

But for Emily, it was the other way around. Just dying once was better than being sealed up for a long period of time.

But I wouldn't have expected her to actually come up with something like that.

"Ngh!" Moneygold had hired me to deal with Emily, so this situation was really bad for me. Every thirteen seconds, I Froze her, killing her once.

But I couldn't even imagine how many times she could revive. She would defeat me long before I could stop her.

There was also the problem with White Rose's operating time, which was far worse for me than it had been in Cortana.

"Still...I can't let her do as she pleases." Where would she go if she got past this mall? Would she head to the bridge and attack Moneygold while he was fighting the threat outside? Would she head to the special ballroom and slaughter the people there?

Regardless of where she went, someone would die. Emily would slaughter someone once again.

"That's why we have to stop her here!"

"Oui, ma'am."

Eltram, Commercial Area

"Fey..." After Fey fell to the floor, Eldridge rushed over and picked her up.

"Fey! Are you okay?!" Niala also dropped her composed expression, pulled out some healing items, and tried using them on her clanmate.

Fey's HP, however, continued to fall. She'd already lost a great amount of blood, and some of her internal organs had spilled out of her body. A high-rank job from the priest grouping would be the minimum necessary to save her now.

Her breathing ragged, Fey looked down at herself.

"My dress is torn... Everyone can see my boobs...how embarrassing."

"Fey, this is really not the time..." said Niala.

Fey chuckled lightly before somehow forcing her stiffening face muscles into a smile. Then, she looked at Eldridge, still holding her.

"I'm in his arms... That's one good thing about this. You jealous, Niala...?"

"Ugh, you're so...!"

Fey didn't see this as a touching goodbye. Unlike tians, Masters were immortal. Fey would come back the moment her death penalty expired.

"Oh, but...it's a shame... I wanted to dance with you at the ball," Fey said, looking at Eldridge. Despite her satisfaction with the situation, Fey hadn't gotten the one thing she actually wanted.

The fact that he couldn't even manage something that small for a girl who had always stood by him even at his lowest filled Eldridge with self-loathing.

"Hey," Fey said as she looked at him, smiling despite it all. It turned out she had one more request for him. "I want you to win."

"Win...?"

"I want you to win against her."

Eldridge instantly understood who she was referring to—Murder

Princess Emily, the one who had given her this fatal injury. She was the owner of a Superior Embryo that made her immortal, powerful even by Superior standards, and wasn't remotely less dangerous than any of the Superiors who had already defeated Eldridge in the past. "But I..."

Because of that, he had doubts he could manage it—but Fey had none.

"You're strong..." She gave her beloved a natural smile. "We believe that not even Superiors can beat you."

With those words, Fey encouraged him to fight.

Eldridge was left speechless. Searching for how to respond, he looked down at Fey, then up at Niala—but both of them only gave him a trusting nod.

At that sight, Eldridge gasped as he recalled how even after Goblin Street's first major defeat by Lei-Lei the Prodigal of Feasts, the two girls had still believed that not even a Superior could beat them if their leader had been there.

However, they continued to lose to Superiors even when he was present, so the members of their clan gave up hope and left one after another.

But there were two left who believed in him even now: Fey and Niala.

Even though one of them was about to vanish, they both continued to trust that Eldridge could win even against a Superior. It was a simpleminded, pure, heartfelt belief that stayed alive despite it all.

And now, Eldridge could feel it clearly.

He then took a moment to think. The thing that he was scared of the most right now was another defeat by a Superior. He was afraid that if it happened again, even Fey and Niala would lose faith in him and leave.

But at this moment, he came to understand something important.

These two had stayed with him even when he lost, and kept on believing in him no matter how many defeats he suffered.

And that meant this was no time to let them see the side of him that was terrified of Superiors.

"Do your best...my leader." With those final words to her beloved, Fey dissolved into light.

"...Yeah."

Eldridge watched her vanish and let her final words echo within him. Once her motes of light were gone, he stood up.

Then he looked toward Hugo and Emily's battle...

"Hugo...we're switching."

...and made a proclamation before swinging both his hands around.

A moment later, blood gushed out of Emily's now-torn neck, making her back away. At the exact same time, another La Porte de l'Enfer tick activated, freezing her right as she reached for her throat.

Her left side began to shine and she transformed into light before being restored to life, but she had stopped in place for a moment.

"Niala. The falcon. Bury her."

"Roger that!" Following Eldridge's order, Niala summoned Simurgh's fastest combat unit—the Fighting Falcon, which was shaped like a fighter jet. The mechanical falcon flew toward the ceiling right above Emily and crashed into it.

The ceiling collapsed and buried Emily's frozen form. Even if she revived now, she would still need some time to get out of the rubble.

Eldridge used this time to tell Hugo everything he needed to know.

"Looks like they countered your La Porte de l'Enfer. I'll handle her, then. You go to the power block."

"But if we just take away the item that counters La Porte de l'Enfer..." I could freezelock her again, Hugo almost said, but Eldridge shook his head before he could finish his sentence.

Eldridge knew exactly what Hugo was trying to say, but that was also how he knew that Hugo's proposal was impossible.

"That won't happen. We can't steal that item," Eldridge said, intently watching the rubble Emily was buried under. "Notice how the light that shines before she dies always emanates from different parts of her body? And there's never any noticeable gear in any of those places. That probably means the item skill is triggered under her skin."

Even while saying goodbye to Fey, Eldridge had paid enough attention to Emily to notice such details.

"What do you mean?"

"My guess is that the item is inside her—in her blood. And since I can't see it, not even I can target and take it."

"Inside...?!"

"Either someone injected a super tiny accessory into her, or they gave her a different item with an effect that allowed this one to enter her body. Whichever it was, it was done pretty thoroughly. Whoever set this up countered my abilities so well that I feel like they have to know someone who's also really good at stealing gear. I'm surprised they could even create something like this, but this is Infinite Dendrogram, after all. Nothing's impossible."

The item in question was called Euthanasia.

Developed by Machina—also known as Agate Designer, one of the greatest item creators of the pre-ancient civilization—it was a tiny accessory that flowed in the blood.

The purpose of the small size, just as Eldridge had suspected, was to counter theft—a feature based on the abilities of King of Thieves, whom the creator was familiar with. Referencing the skills of that specific Superior Job, Machina designed the item to activate an instadeath effect when the item was equipped and when the wearer fell under the effect of a binding-type debuff.

Though she was unable to include a feature that would hide the sign of its activation, that was largely irrelevant—destroying or stealing it was practically impossible.

That was the piece of gear Emily had been given to prevent any more unexpected defeats like the one she had suffered in Cortana.

"Maybe things would be different if we could incinerate her without leaving a trace, but as far as I can tell, her other gear gives resistance to those kinds of attacks." Eldridge had seen a recording of the battle at Cortana and knew that she barely burned even when hit by a Crimson Sphere.

"That's why there's no chance you can get rid of the item and take care of her afterward. Give up."

"But..."

"I'll say it again: go to the power block. Your La Porte de l'Enfer should be more useful there. Maybe it won't work at first for the same reason it didn't work on the last Magingear, but I know you can figure that out and take care of the problem."

Eldridge told Hugo to give up on Emily...

"Leave the Murder Princess to me."

...and once again declared in no uncertain terms that he would fight the Superior.

He'd been avoiding this battle at first, but he was no longer afraid.

“I won’t make any big speeches about ‘avenging Fey’ or whatever. I’ll be seeing her in three days anyway.”

Masters were immortal. Though most couldn’t come back as quickly as Emily, they could log in once again once their death penalty expired, which was only three days in Infinite Dendrogram.

“But that doesn’t mean I’m not mad about her getting killed,” Eldridge went on. Despite his anger, his hands weren’t clenched into fists. His combat-ready stance called for him to keep his hands open—and that was his real expression of rage.

“I couldn’t even fulfill that tiny little wish she had. That makes me mad—at myself and at the Murder Princess...and this anger needs an outlet.”

“Eldridge...”

“And if they believe I can win, then I gotta live up to their expectations.”

There was just one last thing Hugo had to ask before giving this battle to Eldridge.

“Can you win?” A Superior and a pre-Superior—the gap between the two was obvious. It was so vast that Marie Adler had been dubbed the “Superior Killer” for merely defeating a single Superior with no aid from anyone else.

Eldridge himself knew well how powerful they were. People who’d been defeated by Superiors as many times as him were rare.

Despite knowing all that, he...

“I have a...seventy percent chance of winning.”

...announced his assessment of the odds as though it were plainly obvious.

The man who’d already lost to multiple Superiors confidently claimed that he could defeat the one who was immortal.

“You go support him, Niala.”

“All right.” Eldridge didn’t need Niala’s assistance in the battle against Emily, and Niala herself knew that she would only get in the way, so all she did was nod.

“Don’t worry—I’ll win this time.”

“I believe you.”

“Anyway, Hugo, that’s the situation as it stands. Leave this to me and go.”

“Very well...may you emerge the victor, then.”

“That makes you sound like a knight or samurai or something, but I’ll take it.” Eldridge gave a faint smile. Behind him, he felt Hugo and Niala take their leave. Hugo didn’t look back. Niala looked back just once, and then they both moved toward the power block.

That was when Emily dug herself out of the rubble.

“Minus.” Her emotionless, lifeless eyes quickly recognized Eldridge as an enemy.

She was a fearsome killing machine in the form of a little girl. There weren’t even that many Superiors who could defeat her.

“Caldina’s strongest PK, Murder Princess Emily Killingston.”

Despite that, the man calling her name showed no fear. He only reconfirmed the steps he would take to achieve victory.

He already knew how she fought from that video of her battle in Cortana.

“I’m King of Burglary, Eldridge.”

He calmly gave her his name...

"The man who was once known as Altar's strongest PK."

...and his old title.

At one point, that was how Eldridge had been known. With the likes of Sechs and Kashimiya rising to claim that title, though, the number of people who knew that it had once belonged to Eldridge was decreasing.

But there was no lie in his words—he was certainly the first person to have ever held that title.

Emily's eyes were fixed on him. It wasn't clear if she was capable of analyzing her enemy's abilities while in her killing mode. However, she was clearly wary of him and whatever he was going to do.

Eldridge also looked at her straight on.

And thus, the goblin bared his fangs against the murder-demon.

Interlude: Pale Death

Eltram, Cargo Area

Several minutes before Moneygold began fighting Rascal, Isara had separated from Moneygold and gone to the cargo storage area.

Normally, a bodyguard like her would always stay by the side of the person she served, but this wasn't necessary while Moneygold was using his ultimate. With enough MP restoration, his defensive skill that turned all attacks into money could remain active for about an hour—and almost no one could harm him while it was up. Isara's role as his bodyguard was focused on preventing surprise attacks and supporting him in other ways. She'd lived as an assassin before, and Moneygold had sought her out and taken her in as a close aide precisely because of the skills she'd developed in that profession.

Her dream had been to create an orphanage in Caldina to save young children from being forced to live the same way she had, and Moneygold had hired her by paying the immense sum of money needed to realize that dream. Isara was deeply thankful for that, since her old job had never been lucrative enough to finance it.

That was why she followed her benefactor's orders to the letter and went to fulfill her role elsewhere.

Eltram had four important places: the ballroom full of VIPs, the bridge that controlled the ship, the power block that supplied all of its energy, and the cargo hold where countless precious goods were carried.

In Caldina, Dryfe's Legitimate Government was known to frequently plunder supplies. It was likely that they'd also gone to the cargo area, and that was why Moneygold had sent her there.

There are clear signs that powered suits have been here, she thought—just as Moneygold had predicted she would find.

They had been heading toward the cargo area, and it appeared there were six of them.

People equipped with guns or wearing powered suits were no threat to Isara. She held the metal manipulation magic Superior Job, Fullmetal Princess. With no resistances on them, equipment like that was nothing but another weapon for her to use.

It's safe to assume they're already in the cargo area. Preparing to ambush them using her powers, she looked down at the cargo area from the nearby stairs—the very stairs Eldridge had been sitting on recently.

...Huh?

But what she saw left her dumbfounded in spite of her vigilance. She might have even said something out loud if she'd had less experience in combat.

What she saw in the cargo block were items strewn about the floor—specifically, six sets of military clothing and six corresponding armor-type Magingears.

And all of them were covered by piles of white dust—enough dust to make up a whole human body each.

Isara's instincts told her that those were human remains, and that they belonged to the DLG soldiers who'd come here for the cargo.

Her eyes widened as she exposed the Mythical metal bracelet under her sleeve, and she instantly used her metal magic to turn the bracelet into a thin wire that she controlled using her mind. Then, she directed it into the cargo area, making the wire even thinner and spreading it out in all directions to create a spiderlike web.

She used the web to scan the space within the cargo hold and look for whoever—or whatever—had killed the soldiers.

However, all she learned from this investigation was that there was nobody moving within.

Isara gathered her resolve, stepped into the cargo area, and examined the remains.

"...Bits of ice?" Immediately she realized that the white powder was the result of a flash frozen body being shattered.

They weren't sapped of just the heat, but also their very life energy, she thought. The effect is similar to the Vital Squeeze skill used by Blood Cavaliers...Legendaria's vampires...

Vital Squeeze was a type of HP drain skill which was known to turn those it killed into ash, but the victims here had been drained of life far more thoroughly than that.

And it's just awful inside... Some Inventories within the cargo area had been shattered, and their contents were spread all over. It looked like there were offensive gems among them that had triggered upon hitting the floor and walls, leaving marks on every surface.

"Hm?" While looking around the broken Inventories, Isara discovered something strange. One of them looked like the remains of a common Inventory at first, but a closer look made it clear that it was simply a box designed to look like one—it hadn't been made with the space expansion feature common to actual Inventories.

Did someone sneak it in with all the other cargo? But for what purpose? Besides that, there was something else among the scattered goods that caught her eye. She reached out to an object next to the fake Inventory and picked it up.

"Ah! This is...!" Isara opened her eyes wide as she realized that the object looked like a shard of shattered glass.

A moment later, she was distracted from it by the sound of a massive machine activating somewhere in a neighboring area.

That's...the evacuation zone! The cargo area and the evacuation zone were right next to each other to make it easier to rescue cargo in an emergency. The sound coming from there was proof enough that something unexpected was happening.

Isara turned around, left the now-empty cargo area, and followed the strange noise.

When she arrived at the evacuation zone...

"The ramp...is down?"

...she noticed that the ramp meant to deploy evacuation boats had been lowered, and the desert night spread out before her in that direction.

Was that the sound of the ramp being lowered? Since Eltram was still on the move, the dunes visible from the now-open bay were quickly flying by. The ship must've traveled a fair distance since the point where the ramp was deployed.

This must've been opened by whoever—or whatever—killed the soldiers in the cargo area. It had come from within the cargo hold, killed the soldiers who'd opened the door, and just recently left the ship from this evacuation zone.

Isara took a moment to wonder whether she should follow it, but her duty was to protect Moneygold and remove any enemies within the ship. She didn't have the authority to abandon that post and chase after some unidentified entity.

Even if that weren't the case, her instincts were telling her that she would die if she chased it.

And then, the situation suddenly shifted once again.

"The ship...stopped?" Eltram began to shake as it slowed down and finally stopped in place.

What happened at the bridge? Isara thought. Unaware that the DLG had removed the energy core, Isara assumed that something must've happened to the ship's controls.

Considering that and the odd occurance in the cargo area, she decided meeting up with Moneygold would be the best course of action.

With that in mind, she rushed toward the bridge. In her hand, she still held the shard she'd picked up at the cargo area.

Its texture was exactly the same as that of the object Moneygold had bought yesterday—one of the national treasures of Huang He, the Treasurebeast Orb.

There was only one thing, she realized, that could have come out of that cargo hold and exited the ship.

Chapter Six: The Goblin and the Murder-Demon

About Eldridge

Eldridge, otherwise known as Leon Philadelphia, had no grand reason for getting into Infinite Dendrogram.

Born as the son of one of the leading banking families in the States, he was guaranteed to inherit the business from birth. However, his parents had sent him to a top-class university, and between his studies at school and preparation for his eventual succession, he was left with no time to relax and unwind.

During those busy days, he saw the advertisement for Infinite Dendrogram's release.

Of the many promotional taglines it had, the one that caught his eye the most was the claim that triple the amount of time passed inside the game as outside of it.

"If that's true, I'd pay hundreds of thousands of dollars for it." Leon wanted to triple his rest and playtime. It wasn't an uncommon reason, but with how little of his own time he had, he was nothing if not serious about it.

And once he had the product in his hands, he was more than satisfied.

In fact, Infinite Dendrogram moved him so much that even the tripled time wasn't enough. It began taking up more and more of his real hours, forcing him to work even harder in real life—which might have been a bit of a miscalculation on his part. He even immediately started assisting his father after he graduated university, so his life didn't become any easier once he was out of school.

He also didn't have a strong reason for being in the burglar job grouping. It wasn't that he felt like taking a job directly opposed to his real one—he simply thought the job sounded efficient.

As he continued to play like that, he joined up with people who did similar things, and eventually created a clan. The analytical ability he'd developed in real life turned him into an excellent leader, and as his skills garnered more respect and awe, he soon found himself in charge.

His methods were clever. He secured save points in other countries, kept his risks low, carefully picked his burglary targets, and made sure to never do anything that would get him on every wanted list. He looked at every bit of information to analyze every situation, and in return he granted wealth and victory to his followers.

It wasn't long until he was feared as one of the game's greatest PKs, and he was deeply respected by his ever-growing clan.

He'd started playing simply to gain some extra time for himself, but now he was spending his real time on the game instead—to make himself stronger or think about what more he could do for his group. Spending his time on that, however, brought him far more peace than simply resting his weary bones ever could.

But now, most of that clan and the awe he had once commanded were gone.

Starting with Caldina's Altea blockade, they had continued to suffer defeats as he kept making the wrong decisions. The resulting downward spiral of failures, exacerbated by panic, caused people's opinions of him to drop precipitously and much of his clan left him.

Still, there were two things that had remained.

First was his reason for fighting—the two clan members who stuck by him even as everything else collapsed.

And the second was why he had inspired awe.

That had never changed no matter how many defeats he'd suffered. The power that had made him feared was as alive now as it had been back when he was thriving in Altar.

Just like the two women and his own Embryo, it was something that would never leave him.

Eltram, Commercial Area

The destroyed mall was now host to a battle between a Superior and pre-Superior—and there was someone watching this one-on-one duel.

Eldridge is fighting her now? Not Hugo? The onlooker was Moneygold, who was still at the bridge. As Sardonyx waited for a chance to draw closer to the ship, Moneygold kept his opponent at bay with Treasure Cannon, all the while looking down through the hole Niala had opened in the ceiling of the commercial area.

Did Hugo lose? If that's the case, I might have to fight not just that mechdragon—Rascal, probably—but also the Murder Princess herself...and that's not good at all.

Moneygold had no means to even follow Emily's supersonic movements. As far as Superiors went, he was among the slowest. His perceived time fell far behind those of other creatures in combat.

Things would be different if he could use enough firepower to blow her away with the rest of the ship, but that wasn't really an option for him.

Eldridge's somehow putting up a good fight...but he's not on her level. They both moved at supersonic speeds, and though it wasn't easy for Moneygold to follow, he could clearly see which one of them was faster.

Though Eldridge was an AGI-focused Superior Job, his speed still fell behind Emily's. Thanks to the Kill Leader skill she had as the Murder Princess, the more people she killed, the higher her AGI rose—and it was far above Eldridge's. There was actually not a single stat in which Eldridge surpassed her. By focusing on evasion, he was just barely avoiding suffering a killing blow, but the fact that she cut into his skin regardless was all the proof necessary to show she was the more powerful combatant.

That was when a certain question sprang to Moneygold's mind.

Why isn't he taking out his Embryo? Moneygold wondered.

Back when Caldina had planned the Altea blockade, they'd gathered data on those they would hire. It was extremely detailed, covering almost everything anyone could want to know about the PKs, with only a few exceptions like the identity of the Superior Killer. Moneygold had memorized this info, and he clearly recalled that there was nothing on there about Eldridge's Embryo.

Like Figaro had once been, Eldridge was a well-known Master with an Embryo shrouded in mystery.

If it's a Type Territory, you'd think you'd see some signs of activation. Is it a passive Rule like Carl's? Or does it have conditions like Hugo's?

With Eldridge being weaker than Emily, the only way he could hope to win against her was by using some trick his Embryo had—at least, that was Moneygold’s assumption.

The only MVP reward on him is those clothes. Why’s he fighting with his bare hands, anyway?

Eldridge was a burglar, not a fighter. The fact that he was barely evading Emily’s attacks made it possible that he had a sub-job with a Martial Arts sense skill, but that was no reason for him to not equip any weapon at all.

Even if he had to keep one hand free for his burglary skills, he could still wield something in the other hand. Does he want to use skills with both hands at once? He can probably do that using his Embryo or that MVP reward...but fighting without a weapon means he has to take every attack with his own body.

Even though Emily hadn’t landed a direct hit on him yet, given her immense speed advantage, it was only a matter of time.

This concern soon became reality when Eldridge was pushed to the wall, unable to run away any farther.

“Minus.” Emily raised her hatchet and swung it down with the intention of splitting Eldridge’s head in two.

In response, he only held up his left arm.

It was clearly a bad move. There was no way he could withstand an attack with nearly 40,000 STR behind it with nothing but his own body. The arm would be severed and the hatchet would go on to cleave into his skull.

The inevitable clash with surely fatal consequences occurred in a split second...

...but then there was a loud clang, as though two metallic objects had met instead.

Emily’s hatchet—the blade of the Superior Embryo, Youaltepuztli—stopped after sinking a bit into Eldridge’s arm.

“You’re wide open, Murder-Demon,” Eldridge said. He swung his bare right arm and twisted the left that still had the blade embedded in it.

This was so he could use the skill he’d activated on both hands—the flesh-taking Greater Takeover.

Each of Eldridge’s hands took Emily’s opposite ankle, and her legs suffered heavy damage.

Emily’s eyes widened as she quickly pulled the hatchet’s blade out of Eldridge’s arm and jumped back. Blood sprayed from her wounded legs at the motion, but she didn't care about that. To Emily, no amount of damage or spilled blood meant anything. She would be fully healed if she died.

Despite that, she didn't charge toward Eldridge again.

Her attack had been blocked, and that realization made even this perfect killing machine pause and assume a more cautious stance.

The thing that had blocked it wasn't a Brooch. It didn't feel as though the attack had been negated—it most certainly broke the skin on his arm, only to stop without severing it.

"There's a video of your battle at Cortana. I saw it on the internet." As Emily fell still, Eldridge began to speak. "You used your hatchets to attack Hugo Lesseps's mech tons of times, but you never actually managed to break it. That mech's armor is made of a Mythical metal alloy. With skills active, its defense is probably in the 40,000-50,000 range. That tells me that your attack power isn't high enough to destroy something that tough."

Eldridge, who had known all along that he could block Emily's attack, continued his matter-of-fact explanation.

"You've got no shortage of STR. So the problem's gotta be...your hatchets. They've got that insane skill, but their attack power's real low to compensate. A lot of Type Arms are like that, so that's exactly what I expected from yours."

This was still a strange thing to say with such confidence. Even if Youaltepuztli weren't powerful weapons on their own, they were being wielded by someone with nearly 40,000 STR. There was no chance someone who wasn't an END-focused Superior Job could withstand the blow.

However, though Eldridge's left arm was bleeding, it was still connected.

"And that's why, as a weapon, my Embryo has surpassed yours."

The wound was deep enough that the bone beneath was visible. However, the bone wasn't white.

It was covered in blood, of course, but the crimson metal that composed it shone through nonetheless.

That was when Moneygold, still watching the battle, realized something.

I see! So he's just like the Over Gladiator, then.

Indeed, just like Figaro's heart, Eldridge also had an Embryo that was always inside him.

Blade Breaker Bones, Skeleton—a metallic full-body skeleton Embryo.

"My Embryo can easily shatter Mithril-tier stuff, but it looks like your hatchets are still really tough even if they don't have a whole lot of attack power. I wouldn't expect any less from a Superior Embryo. Shattering them won't be easy. I feel like I might break something with all the effort I'm putting in here."

Despite cracking a joke, Eldridge didn't even smile or let his guard down. That was because he knew this wasn't an enemy he could afford to show any openings to, and because he himself excelled at survival.

While Eldridge had an AGI-focused Superior Job that let him move at supersonic speeds, his Embryo was as tough as Mythical metal, giving him defenses that equaled those of END-focused Superior Jobs. He was a hybrid build that excelled at both AGI and END—a Master focused on survival, just like Emily.

Recently, he'd suffered defeat from having his heart stolen by surprise, suffocating after being buried beneath a mountain, burning up along with the very ocean around him, and being sliced in half by a ranged attack that ignored toughness. Under normal circumstances, though, death wasn't something that took him easily.

The difference between his END and Emily's wasn't nearly as great as the difference between their AGI, but...

If END is all his Embryo has going for it, then he has no chance of winning this, Moneygold thought as he watched, and anyone would have been hard-pressed to disagree.

Emily still exceeded Eldridge in all stats, even after taking Skeleton into account. Fighting an endurance match with her was a fool's errand to begin with.

Emily looked down at her damaged legs that hindered her movement—before she cut off her own head.

After death, she was reconstituted from her motes of light and emerged unharmed once again.

She still has that, after all. There's no way he can win.

Emily could die over and over, while Eldridge, no matter how long he endured, would be defeated after just one death.

I would understand this strategy if he was just buying time until reinforcements came, but... No one was coming to support him, and that included Moneygold himself. While he could watch how the battle at the mall unfolded, Moneygold couldn't even move from where he was because all of his attention was occupied with keeping Sardonyx at bay.

Emily, perhaps realizing that Eldridge had no one to back him up, rushed toward him yet again.

Thus, they repeated exactly the exchange that had occurred at the beginning of the battle. But this wouldn't last, as Eldridge would surely lose this war of attrition eventually.

Hm...? However, Moneygold realized that something was different this time. Though only slightly, he felt as though the gap in their speeds had become smaller.

Does he have a skill like the Over Gladiator's?

The Over Gladiator, Figaro's Superior Embryo, Cor Leonis, had three skills. One of them was Dance of Anima, which increased his power the longer he was in battle. It was an immensely powerful ability that became known far and wide after he'd fought Xunyu during the Clash of the Superiors.

Moneygold could hardly believe it, but the battle below was strongly reminiscent of that famous duel he'd seen recordings of.

He thought that Eldridge's Embryo must have a similar skill—but that wasn't the case. This phenomenon was caused not by his Embryo, but by his ultimate job skill as King of Burglary—Greater All-Drain.

This was a skill that stole the enemy's stats based on damage he dealt to them.

If he damaged his opponent for a tenth of their maximum HP, he received a tenth of their stats.

If he damaged them for half their health, he enhanced himself with half of their stats.

With the surprise attack on her throat and the recent strike on her ankles, Eldridge had taken off about a tenth of Emily's HP. And with this increase—or rather, decrease for Emily—the gap between them became smaller.

If he continued to take her HP, the gap would close further, and eventually begin to tilt in Eldridge's favor.

Greater All-Drain was a skill that ensured Eldridge would come out on top in any prolonged battle. It could only be used once per day and on only one target, but the stats stolen while it was active remained even if the target healed themselves from the damage.

Ultimately, it wasn't any different with Emily's revivals. While that restored her own stats that she'd lost when Eldridge took them, Eldridge still had the stats he'd gained.

Since he had never tried this skill on someone who would just revive after being killed, though, not even Eldridge himself knew it would work like this. One of the reasons he'd estimated that he had a seventy percent chance of winning was that he had considered the possibility that the revival would reset his stats as well as hers.

However, it turned out that it functioned in a way that was favorable to him.

Emily was beginning to develop a vague understanding of Eldridge's combat style and skills. She considered the possibility that he would keep growing stronger without limit and realized that she had to end this battle as soon as possible. Her attacks grew more intense as she began to slice through his skin and flesh, avoiding contact with his Skeleton.

"And that's a shortcoming of yours." Evading any fatal attacks, Eldridge downed a pill-like healing item and began to speak again. He considered words to be another technique in his arsenal for managing how his opponents behaved. "The way you fight is way too simple. You put so many Resources into revival that your Embryo itself doesn't have many other tricks, and your Superior Job does nothing but give you some stats. That's why your strategy doesn't go beyond using your immortality for reckless onslaughts. And that's it."

Based on what he'd seen, Emily's only other means of attack were her hatchet throws. He'd considered the possibility that she could use an ult, but it didn't look like it was happening—and he was fairly certain that she would never take the most straightforward option and just switch to some other weapon.

"The hatchets have a weak attack and limit the ways you can fight, but you don't switch to anything better. You're strong enough to beat UBMs and get MVP rewards, yet you still use only the hatchets. Why is that?"

As he spoke, Eldridge used an opening he saw to use Greater Takeover on Emily to take both her HP and mobility, enhancing himself in the process.

"Many Type Arms Embryos activate their skills through contact with their Masters," Eldridge went on. Ray's Nemesis could only use Vengeance is Mine if she touched him, for example. Xunyu's Tenaga-Ashinaga could only extend and retract when she had it equipped. Eldridge's Skeleton and Figaro's Cor Leonis worked as they did only because they replaced a particular part of their bodies.

Most Type Arms could only use their effects when in contact with their wielders.

"And what about that Superior Embryo? Do you have to touch it for it to bring you back? No, you don't. Back in Cortana, you sometimes threw both of them at once. If you couldn't revive if they were both out of your hands, you would always hold at least one. But you didn't."

Eldridge explained his analysis of the combat video he'd watched. Even while under Emily's ferocious assault, he kept calm and examined her.

"Does that mean you don't need them to use it? No. If that was the case, you'd already be using some MVP reward or whatever. You'd throw those hatchets so they auto-attacked while wielding some other weapons yourself. Theoretically, that's the strategy that would make you strongest."

Eldridge had thought about how he would optimize for combat if he was in Emily's shoes—and considered the reasons she might not be doing those things.

The answer had come to him in no time.

"It's because...your equipment slots are occupied. If you're not the Over Gladiator or something, you only have one weapon slot for each hand—and both of yours are occupied by the hatchets. You can let go of them, but their skills won't activate if you don't have them equipped. That goes for both the throwing and the revival."

Those words seemed to cause an emotional reaction in Emily. She haphazardly swung her axe at him, but Eldridge sidestepped it and tore at her flesh again.

"Your combat ability is too reliant on your Superior Embryo. Without the revivals, you're basically just a wild boar with high stats. That's why it's obvious what I gotta do."

As though feeling a sense of urgency, Emily lashed out with all of her nearly 40,000 STR behind it. She'd abandoned all of her defense to launch an attack meant to break even through his metallic bones.

However, Eldridge didn't defend against or evade it.

He simply opened his hands, preparing to use Greater Takeover and ignoring the hatchet in her right hand coming straight toward his skull.

A moment later, they clashed, and the sound of shattering metal rang out.

◇◆

Skeleton. As the name would suggest, this Embryo was based on the creatures from many different mythologies that were all made solely of bone. Skinless and fleshless—they were the remains of the dead who had been deprived of everything.

Perhaps because of that, Skeleton's core focus was empty-handedness.

Eldridge himself had no idea why his Embryo had turned out like this. He'd started Infinite Dendrogram as a way to relax, so perhaps its theme referred to the fact that he'd seen his life back then as a burden he wished to let go of. It was even possible the reason was something Eldridge had not discovered about himself yet.

Regardless of where it had come from, this core trait of empty-handedness meant that all of Skeleton's skills required Eldridge to not wield any weapon or shield.

Its first skill, All That Is Left After Death, was a skill that increased the toughness of his metallic frame—Skeleton itself—as well as Eldridge's own END as long as he wasn't wielding anything in either of his hands. As had already been demonstrated, the combined defense matched Mythical metal, and not even the Murder Princess's almost 40,000 STR was enough to break through it.

The second skill, The Dead Have Their Husk and Will, was a skill that enabled simultaneous use of active skills as long as both hands had nothing equipped in them. This was what allowed Eldridge to ready his King of Burglary skills on both hands. As a bonus, it also reduced the skills' cooldowns.

The third skill was the Embryo's ult, and it had two conditions that needed to be fulfilled.

First, just like the other two, it required that Eldridge's hands were completely free. And second, it required him to be in battle for more than five minutes. This was most likely to give him some time to analyze his opponent.

Eldridge had laughed out loud when he'd discovered this particular condition. He'd started playing Infinite Dendrogram to gain time, but now he was being forced to dedicate his time to the game instead.

This condition might've been a representation of that change in his point of view.

He'd found that very funny, and had fully understood why his Embryo's ult had come with that restriction.

Similarly, he fully understood why his ult's effect had turned out like it had.

◇◆

"Return, and Take Nothing to the Grave—Skeleton."

The moment they clashed, Eldridge activated his ultimate.

A moment later, Emily's right hatchet nearly touched his head...and shattered.

Youaltepuztli, a Superior Embryo, let out a high-pitched metallic shriek as it broke against Eldridge's arm instead.

Emily looked at its scattered pieces, dumbfounded...

"That's one."

...and Eldridge used Greater Takeover with both his hands to tear out her eyes.

In shock, Emily covered her empty sockets and desperately jumped back. It was an unusual move for her, someone who was always on the offensive and never feared death, but who could blame her? This was something she'd never experienced before.

Although it was just one of two, the Youaltepuztli that ensured her immortality had been broken.

Skeleton's ultimate was a skill that destroyed the opponent's weapon.

When the battle lasted for at least five minutes, Eldridge could destroy any one weapon the enemy was wielding in either hand. Nothing was immune—not even Superior metals or Superior Embryos could withstand it.

This was the reason he had once been known as Altar's strongest PK—Eldridge, the Arms Killer.

The driving force behind Emily's immortality was Youaltepuztli's auto-revival skill, Survival of the Fittest. Obviously, if Youaltepuztli was destroyed, her immortality would be compromised.

Although hesitantly, Emily used her remaining Youaltepuztli to decapitate herself.

A moment later, she dissipated into bits of light...and was successfully reconstituted. This restored her eyes and vision, but not the other Youaltepuztli—it was still broken.

"One more left," said Eldridge, declaring that he absolutely would destroy her immortality—in other words, that he could do this again.

Return, and Take Nothing to the Grave—Skeleton was an ultimate that could be used twice per day. That wasn't an unexpected amount of uses for a skill explicitly meant to destroy each weapon in an opponent's hand. The cooldown between daily uses was an additional five minutes.

That made Eldridge's words a declaration of inevitable destruction.

With shock in her fully restored eyes, Emily stared at the man in front of her.

He was the beloved of the girl she'd killed simply because she stood in her way, and the man who'd used to be Altar's strongest PK—the man who'd taken away half of her immortality.

"Don't underestimate the Goblin...Murder-Demon."

To Emily, Eldridge was an even more fearsome enemy than Hugo.

Chapter Seven: The Jester and the Dragon

About Curtis Eldona

To end the reign of the false imperator, Reinhard—that was the goal of the Dryfe Legitimate Government, and it was also the goal of Curtis himself.

He was driven by a grudge against Reinhard for killing his cousins, among many others, and by a conviction that it was his duty to bring down the warmongering usurper who ravaged his homeland. Such feelings—especially the latter one—were shared by many of those in the DLG.

However, those weren't the only things driving him. The grudge and sense of duty were matched—if not surpassed—by something else.

That was an emotion called "love."

◆

Six years ago, Curtis Eldona fell in love.

Before the increase in Masters, he was participating in a ceremony to celebrate those who'd taken part in defeating a UBM that had been ransacking the outer reaches of Dryfe.

On the dais stood the elderly, but still living, Imperator Xanafald as well as two more people. One of them was SMTF Captain Gifted Barbaros. As the adopted son of Marquis Barbaros, he had seen many battles and was already considered to be a pillar of Dryfe's military might despite his young age.

There was nothing strange about him defeating a UBM.

However, the person standing by his side was a girl who could not have been more than thirteen years old—and surprisingly, she clutched a red crystal, seemingly the MVP reward, in her hands.

That meant that despite her age, she had contributed to the battle more than Gifted.

“Claudiah Reinhard Dryfe, I commend you.” In Dryfe, it was common for twins to each bear the other’s name as their middle name, which resulted in the girl’s masculine middle name. That combined with the surname Dryfe made it obvious that she was part of the imperial family.

Indeed, she was the daughter of the late third prince and the granddaughter of the imperator bestowing the award upon her.

Though still young, Claudiah already held the title of The Ram.

“Beautiful...” The girl standing on the stage left Curtis enchanted. He himself was extremely talented and had already acquired a Superior Job, so he found himself strongly attracted to her.

Curtis continued to think about Claudiah long after this ceremony was over.

He intently and excitedly followed her activities by newspapers and word of mouth, and he spent many nights thinking how he might approach her and talk to her.

Curtis was like a fan and a young man in love all at once—his heart had nothing but Claudiah in it.

That didn’t change even after Masters came to the world en masse and began to reshape it.

When she became old enough to marry, he began wondering how they could be together. Although of less importance, she was still royalty. The first prince’s mother came from Curtis’s own family—Eldona—and they were fairly powerful as far as nobility went. He was, however, only the second son, so he didn’t know if he would be welcomed into the royal family itself.

That was why, instead of relying on his rank as a noble, he chose to prove his worth another way—by becoming Dryfe’s field Marshall.

The current field Marshall was elderly and would soon need to be replaced, and there were several candidates for the position.

First was Curtis himself. He had come from an important noble family and was the commander of the First Armored Battalion.

Next was the commander of the Second Armored Battalion. He was another man from a strong noble background who was known as a more skilled commander.

The second prince’s faction also had soldiers who, while not as renowned as the two commanders, were still put forth as candidates.

Some also suggested Gifted Barbaros—the stepson of another important noble—but he was already in SMTF, and it was believed that he wouldn't take the role of field Marshall and lead the entire army instead.

Thus, Curtis's biggest hurdle remained the commander of the Second Armored Battalion.

Just like Curtis, he was in the first prince's faction and was no doubt an excellent commander. That might have been the reason that the important diplomatic role of performing joint training with Altar was granted to him instead of Curtis himself.

With many UBM defeats under his belt, Curtis was by no means less skilled than his rival, but that achievement and the power involved was his alone. A field Marshall, however, had to be someone who could manage and lead the army, and even Curtis himself had to admit that wasn't exactly his strong suit.

But just when Curtis began to worry he had no chance at the title, the situation completely changed.

The Second Armored Battalion was completely destroyed.

This was accomplished by the SUBM, Tri-Zenith Dragon, Gloria. The fiendish golden beast had attacked the kingdom and eliminated Curtis's rival along with his entire battalion.

As a soldier, Curtis was overcome by grief and saw it as a major loss. But as a man, a part of him that was filled with glee that his biggest competitor was gone.

The golden dragon that had brought about so many disasters had actually done him a favor.

Whether it was a blessing or a calamity overall, the fiendish dragon had greatly changed the course of his life and Dryfe as a whole.

And in order that he might never forget this fact, he christened his new unit with a name based on the creature.

With that, the only barrier between Curtis and the seat of the field Marshall was gone. There were some candidates in the second prince's faction, but they were not a problem.

The next imperator was going to be selected soon, and the most likely candidates were First Prince Gustav and his son, Hallon. Regardless of which one it would be, though, Curtis would be the highest-ranking soldier in their faction, and would be given the title of field Marshall.

And once he had that, he would be able to take Claudiah as his wife.

Thus, while the next imperator was being decided in the Imperstand—the pre-ancient civilization fortress at the heart of the imperial capital—he merely waited for the future he expected to arrive.

However, it never came—for the throne was taken by the son of the late third prince—Reinhard.

And with the exception of Reinhard's younger twin sister, Claudiah, the imperial family all ended up dead. During the meeting to determine the imperial inheritance, both the first prince's and the second prince's factions were massacred.

The means by which this was accomplished were nothing short of vile. As the Superior Job of the mechanic grouping, King of Machines, Reinhard had been put in charge of maintaining the Imperstand—a position he'd used to transform the fortress meant to protect the country and the royal family into the weapon that killed them.

It was as though he'd been planning all along to take the throne by violence.

And to make matters worse, he'd given the role of field Marshall to his relative and confidant, Gifted Barbaros.

This outcome was so unexpected and terrible that it left Curtis at a loss for words.

His cousin had died, his future had fallen apart, his country was now in danger... There were so many things on his mind, but once he finally collected his thoughts enough to process what had happened, the first thing he felt was rage.

"What kind of joke is this?! Reinhard...what have you been doing all this time?!" While your sister was out in public, fulfilling her role as a noble and fighting monsters all over the country, you didn't even bother to show your face! You spent all your time messing around with machines! he thought.

Reinhard had pushed his sister into dangerous roles and used dirty tactics to claim the throne for himself. To Curtis, as well as everyone else who knew as much as he did—in other words, most of the other nobles—Reinhard was scum of the worst kind.

"This...this is unacceptable!" Most of all, Curtis felt awful for Claudiah, who had been born alongside this filth of a brother. Reinhard had used her as his pawn, forcing her to commit vile deeds against her will. Merely imagining how Claudiah must have felt in her heart during all this brought Curtis to tears.

Even if she would never choose him, he silently swore that he would do anything to at least set her free.

And so, he stood with many nobles and military men to bring down Reinhard.

Thus began the Dryfean Civil War. In it, he defeated many soldiers who'd sided with Reinhard, as well as Masters with Superior Jobs that the usurper had hired. The only thing Curtis feared was the vile Reinhard sending his beloved Claudiah against him—but for better or worse, this never happened.

As a single unit, Curtis weathered the civil war without suffering a single defeat.

However, his side was the one that lost.

Many of the nobles were defeated, the all-or-nothing operation by SMTF had failed, and even his own family—his elder brother—gave up after their father was defeated.

The Civil War ended with Reinhard's side victorious.

However, Curtis didn't—couldn't—accept this defeat.

Still burning with a desire to bring down the imperator and free Claudiah, Curtis left for another country to gather strength so he could one day try again.

But even now that it had come to this, there was still something that he didn't know.

Completely unbeknownst to Curtis, Reinhard and Claudiah were actually the same person. This was Claudiah's greatest secret, known only to her and the Marquis Barbaros family.

Curtis couldn't possibly have known this, for he had never met her when she was "Reinhard." Perhaps if he had, his love for "Claudiah" might have helped him realize who Reinhard really was.

However, the only things he knew about Reinhard were his name, his appearance in photos, and his actions. Thus, he had no means of knowing that his two goals were at odds and that his actions and desired future were utterly contradictory.

And that was why Curtis Eldona was truly a jester with no equal.

Eltram, Power Block

"Engine deactivation completed."

"We will proceed to remove it from the vessel." DLG soldiers clad in armor-type Magingears were hard at work in front of the core installed in Eltram.

Watching over them were two Marshall IIs and a golden unit with a dragon's head.

"Make haste. It appears that the situation is shifting against us."

From his cockpit, Curtis silently but firmly urged his soldiers to rush.

Their situation was growing dire. The comms devices suddenly blared an emergency signal with no one to respond and give reason for it, and the ones they'd sent to occupy the special ballroom—a key location—were now unreachable. They'd also lost the unit that had jammed the standard frequencies and hosted their secret comms bypass.

It was clear that they had enemies here, and furthermore that they would soon come to this area.

But those weren't their only problems—before their secret comms were rendered unusable, they'd suddenly become unable to contact the soldiers in the passenger cabin and the cargo areas. Before commencing the operation, they'd also tried contacting Lieutenant Colonel Berlin outside, but received no response.

It was obvious that their situation wasn't good.

"Major General, completely removing it will require at least ten minutes... Wouldn't it be better for us to retreat?"

Curtis received this message from one of his accompanying Marshall IIs.

In this situation, a tactical retreat to prevent even more casualties could not truly be considered a mistake, but...

"Why not give up on the core and kidnap passengers to demand a ransom for them instead?"

This question from the pilot of the other Marshall II present made Curtis wince a little.

"A foolish suggestion. Never make it again."

With those words, the golden unit thrust its lance into the Marshall II unit.

"Aieee...?!" The tip of the lance had only missed the pilot's head by around 10 centimetels. Curtis had missed on purpose, since it was only meant as a warning, but there was more to his attack than just that.

Besides the hole in its chest-armor, the Marshall II was completely undamaged.

The attack didn't trigger any shocks throughout the rest of the unit—it only punched a small hole through the mech's body, missing anything vital to place the tip of the lance into the space right beside the pilot's head.

Such a strike required unimaginable precision as a pilot, yet Curtis had enough skill to do it as though it was nothing.

"Neither a change of plans nor a retreat are viable options for us."

Tactically, a retreat wasn't a mistake—but strategically, it was something Curtis would never do. If they didn't secure this energy core, this assault would have all been for naught. They would have accomplished nothing except losing most of their forces. At that point, their hope of making a comeback would be as good as gone. They would need at least a decade to recover, if not longer.

Delaying Dryfe's liberation and Claudiah's salvation by that long was something Curtis could never accept.

"The forces we've already lost make it even more vital that we secure the core to make up for them. If we don't, Dryfe's Legitimate Government will be over here and now. Do you understand?"

He pulled out the lance and calmly but firmly posed that question to the other pilot.

There was only one way the soldier could respond.

"S-Sir, yes, sir!"

"Good. Continue to keep an eye out."

Curtis then cut the external speakers and let out a sigh.

Curtis's thoughts drifted to his old rival, the commander of the Second Armored Battalion. "He probably could've led them without any threats or deception," he said with self-derision. Though he had once been Curtis's biggest hurdle on his path to becoming field Marshall, Curtis had deeply trusted him as a soldier. Perhaps they would've won the Civil War if he'd been alive for it. And even if they'd lost regardless, Curtis was certain that the DLG would be in a different, better state than the one it was in now.

As a man driven mad by love, Curtis was happy the Second Armored Batallion's commander had died—but as a soldier, he felt the loss heavily.

I suppose I cling to a plan like this exactly because I know I lack the ability to keep up with him otherwise, he thought.

This plan to steal the core had been suggested to him by a collaborator. This engineer had taught Curtis the structure of the vessel, how to handle the core, a way to sneak his soldiers inside, and even promised to use the stolen core to build a large mobile weapon for them.

It was a suspicious offer that seemed too good to be true. This collaborator clearly had some ulterior motive. However, Reinhard's forces were so strong that Curtis had no choice but to accept it.

That was why Curtis had to win—to make this operation a success.

"They're here." And with that, the sensor eye on his unit's draconic head moved at high speeds before focusing on the door leading into this area, where it picked up something behind it.

"This size and pattern of magic use... It's another Magingear!" Almost as soon as Curtis said it, the door was broken down, and a pure white Magingear covered in frost rushed in.

"La Porte de l'Enfer!"

Upon hearing that skill activation, Curtis quickly assumed a defensive stance. However, the skill produced no attack, and instead of an impact, he heard screams from one of his accompanying pilots and the soldiers working to remove the core.

The camera on his unit's back saw men equipped with armor-type Magingears panicking as most of their bodies were encased in ice.

A wide-area freeze skill? But there's been no significant change in ambient temperature. One of the accompanying units is unaffected too.

The only one of Curtis's pilots who was screaming was the one whose armor he'd punched a hole through.

Curtis hummed questioningly, but as he did, he pressed something on the panel next to the control column and activated one of his unit's extras.

A moment later, the golden mech's sensor eye—the attached Epic MVP reward, Glaring Third Eye, Drac-Sight—modified its vision and observed the surroundings for changes.

By doing this, Curtis noticed that there was some sort of energy being released by the enemy unit, and that heat energy was flowing toward it from his Frozen soldiers.

The unit is generating a strange energy field. It seems similar to the power of the Scorchdragon King that I felled—the incineration skill that only worked on living beings. I suppose that must be what's causing the freeze.

He looked at one of his accompanying units and saw that the strange field was flowing into its cockpit through the hole in its chest. However, for his own unit and the other one accompanying him, it only flowed on the armor's surface, not making its way in.

The difference lies in...the airtightness.

◇

"Tch...!" The result might have been expected, but Hugo clicked his tongue in irritation nonetheless. They're not freezing...!

After hearing Eldridge's hint, Hugo had been able to guess why La Porte de l'Enfer hadn't worked on the Magingear in the mall.

It had something to do with airtightness.

The infantry outside the unit had become Frozen, but the pilot within had not. However, the pilot had succumbed as soon as Hugo had broken the Magingear's armor.

That meant that his targets had to actually come into contact with air that had been affected by La Porte de l'Enfer in order for the skill to be effective.

Hugo could guess the reason for that.

Cyco's La Porte de l'Enfer not only Froze its targets, but also accumulated the lost heat energy within Cyco herself. That heat was meant to be used in her second skill, Purgatorial Slash, but that made it necessary for the heat energy to actually move.

And Cyco had no ability to absorb heat without consideration of the intervening space. She wasn't a Type Territory, after all, and could not bend spatial laws. Instead of influencing the surrounding space, she transferred the heat energy from the enemy to her using the air as the conduit.

Thus, her skill couldn't reach anyone who was completely separated from the outside air.

As long as Cyco and the target shared a common air, she could even steal the heat of someone like Bishmal when he transformed into fire—but if they didn't, she would never be able to affect them.

And I know exactly why I haven't realized this until now, Hugo thought. Back when he had still been a member of The Triangle of Wisdom, Hugo, with Franklin's supervision, had taken part in various experiments related to La Porte de l'Enfer. Among these tests were a handful done on people inside Marshall IIs.

Since it had worked on the pilots back then, both Hugo and Franklin had assumed that La Porte de l'Enfer always worked against Magingears, as well.

But the reason it didn't work on the DLG units now was...

"...because our units weren't completely airtight."

Hugo recalled the day he'd left The Triangle of Wisdom.

The pool they'd used for experiments was occupied by an experimental amphibious unit. It had sunk to the bottom, its cockpit had filled with water, and everyone around thought it was a complete failure. If they couldn't ensure an airtight seal on an amphibious unit, there was no way they could've done it for units meant only for use on dry land.

The Triangle of Wisdom was a group of Masters, many of whom were engineers and the like in real life as well. They had even achieved something that had previously been thought impossible, creating the first humanoid Magingears.

But in the grand scheme of things, when it came to Magingears, they were still amateurs.

On the other hand, the DLG—the First Armored Battalion—were pros at handling power armor and tank-type Magingears. In terms of the knowledge of magic technology, they were true veterans—the absolute elite—and if they wanted to make their units airtight for desert environments, they could do it flawlessly.

While they may not have had the same creativity, the DLG were unmatched when it came to technical prowess.

And compared to the data I saw...that golden unit has been modified too.

With the exception of the one that already had a hole in it, it looked like the pilots of the other two units weren't freezing. However, unlike the battle in the mall, Hugo had anticipated this result.

“What now?” Cyco asked.

“We do as we planned!”

A moment later, a hole opened up in the body of the Marshall II that was still unaffected.

“Hit.”

The sound sensors of the machines picked up a faint voice from behind them. It belonged to Niala, who was lying on the floor as she aimed an extra long gun.

The weapon in her hands was a magic sniper rifle.

Unlike gunpowder guns, which didn’t change in power no matter who wielded them, magic guns grew stronger according to the amount of magic put into them and the skill level of the user. When charged with enough MP and fired using an appropriate skill, they could break through Demi-Dragon carapaces—and that included the armor of Demi-Dragon-tier Magingears.

Niala was doing exactly as she and Hugo had planned while they were making their way here to the power block. If the enemies didn’t freeze immediately, they decided they would simply have to do as Hugo had done in the mall and puncture the mechs’ armor to let the skill through.

Niala had assumed the sniping position and prepared to fire before White Rose had even broken through the door.

“Ngh...!” The pilot of the unit Niala had fired at tried to groan in pain, but before he could do so, the second tick of La Porte de l’Enfer came, Freezing his entire body. He must’ve had a higher kill count for other humanoids than the other pilot.

The second tick also finished Freezing those who were only partially Frozen.

And thus, silence fell over the power block.

The energy core was deactivated, now surrounded by ice sculpture and two units that weren’t moving an inch. Nearby stood the pure white unit that had done this, and outside the area Niala was still taking aim.

And finally, there was the golden unit that had stood still and focused on observation. Despite witnessing his soldiers being functionally eliminated, Curtis himself had never moved.

“Well...I have a question.” This had to be emphasized—it wasn’t that he couldn’t move; he simply didn’t. “Since you didn’t attack me first...is it only the two of you?"

The moment he said that, Niala's second shot hit the golden unit's chest armor. However, her eyes widened as the bullet only made a faint metallic clink as it was deflected.

"I assume this Freeze requires you to break the cockpit's airtight seal. The reason the sniper didn't aim at me first was because you didn't know how tough this armor was. Thus, you used the first shot on the Marshall II, which was more likely to break."

Curtis verbalized almost exactly what Niala had been thinking.

"If there were another sniper or a different attacker with you," Curtis went on, "you would not have missed the chance to ambush us all at once. The fact that this did not happen makes it clear the only ones here are you, with your Freeze power, and the sniper behind you."

Curtis matter-of-factly described the extent of the opposing forces.

"Now, another question," he said. "Why did you not ambush me when you had the chance?"

Hugo said nothing in response, but Curtis himself already knew the answer. "It's because you know this. When you broke through the door and saw this unit, you instantly realized what it was. You are the kind of person who knows my Imperial Glory...in other words, you must be from Dryfe."

These words made Hugo's eyes widen. Indeed, Hugo knew of this golden, dragon-headed unit that went by the name of Imperial Glory. He knew it as the strongest unit ever built by The Triangle of Wisdom—a Magingear created at the Dryfean army's request and equipped with an energy core. And it was because Hugo knew how powerful it was that right upon seeing it, he failed to implement the planned ambush.

"And you have ties to The Triangle of Wisdom as well. I can tell by your Magingear—it's an experimental unit that isn't mass-produced. The quirks in the structure and the inadequate construction makes it obvious that it's their work."

Hearing his opponent disparage The Triangle of Wisdom's work—the work of Hugo's own sister—made Hugo slightly irritated, but he couldn't bring himself to move. He had a feeling that if he did, it would only make the situation worse.

"Based on its toughness, I assume it's made of Mythical metal. No—Hihi'irokane is scarlet, and your unit is white. It's an alloy with mical ore, then. In Dryfe, both are mined solely within the borders of the Barbaros March. I see how it is... Damn you, Reinhard."

Despite not even touching or attacking White Rose, Curtis had gotten everything right. He spoke to himself and arrived at an answer, which made him click his tongue.

"This means he provided it back when Glory was being produced—he knew we would be enemies even back then? Was he planning to claim the throne for that long? That filth..."

The way he was vehemently cursing someone who wasn't even here made Curtis look as though he'd dropped his guard.

"Now is a good time to attack," Cyco told Hugo telepathically. "His kill count's high enough for him to Freeze with a single tick."

Hugo nodded in response. He didn't have to destroy the unit—he would win the moment he broke its airtight seal. A slight distortion in the armor was all it would take.

Thus, Hugo rushed White Rose toward the golden unit...

"Ohh, if this is as fast as you can go, you made the right choice by not ambushing me."

...and was instantly stopped.

The lance had pierced through White Rose's right elbow and reached all the way to the floor, pinning the arm down and rendering it immobile.

Shock overcame Hugo. Curtis had thrust the lance into his unit with movement reminiscent of a martial arts master—except it was done not by a nimble human, but a bulky, humanoid giant robot.

It was a sight too outlandish to be written off as merely the result of skilled piloting. Moreover...

"How did he break through Rose's armor?!" Made of a Mythical metal alloy, White Rose had the highest defensive power of any Magingear that existed.

How could anyone have pierced through that with such ease?

"This lance is an MVP reward of mine. It's called Pinning Death, Drac-Stinger. I can reduce the diameter of its tip to as small as 0.1 millimetels, and it never breaks. It's a weapon I find very useful."

Curtis casually revealed information about one of his weapons—the MVP reward he'd received from the Pindragon King. He did this because Hugo had ties to The Triangle of Wisdom, and because he believed Hugo already had information about Imperial Glory and Curtis himself.

However, that didn't seem to answer Hugo's question. So what if he could change the diameter of the lance's tip? How did that enable him to pierce through White Rose's armor?

As though anticipating that question, Curtis let out a sigh.

"As I said, the construction is inadequate." First, Curtis repeated himself...

"There's a large 0.2 millimetel gap in the elbow joints."

...and casually said that he'd easily pierced through a hole smaller than the eye of a needle.

Blind to reality and unwittingly pursuing contradictory goals, Curtis Eldona was no doubt a jester.

However, if that was all he was, Curtis would not be standing here today.

He was the man who'd hunted down countless landdragons and Dragon Kings that approached Dryfe from the neighboring Harshwinter Mountains.

He was the continent's strongest pilot, Curtis Eldona the Dragon Kingslayer, and he piloted a unit named after the most fiendish dragon of all—Imperial Glory.

Hugo was now facing the strongest pilot in the world, riding the world's most powerful Magingear.

Chapter Eight: The Three-Way Fight and the Final Choice

Armored Pilot, Hugo Lesseps

The enemy was turning out to be far more trouble than I'd expected.

He'd used his lance to pin Rose through a gap in the armor of its right arm. I tried moving it and pulling the lance out, but nothing budged.

This was due to the immense gap between my unit's output and his. While my Rose had a Pure-Dragon-tier output, his was clearly above that. It easily earned the title of "Dragon King-tier Magingear."

"It's above its specs on paper...and they were already high..." I mused. That must've been due to the pilot.

That Drac-Stinger mention brought a certain name to mind.

It was an MVP reward that had belonged to the most famous pilot in Dryfe—one who had made a name for himself before I'd even begun playing Infinite Dendrogram—Over Pilot, Curtis Eldona.

"Fran said that she didn't know who took it during the civil war, but..." The answer to this mystery was now more than apparent—the one who'd taken the reward was the same person who had it now. And since he had a Superior Job from the pilot grouping, his unit's abilities were greatly increased.

The situation was looking pretty bad for us. Curtis was far above us in both piloting skill and unit specifications.

The biggest advantage he had over us, though, was in the uptime. We could only fight for about ten minutes, and even that was halved if I activated the second battle mode and Boucliers Planetes. Meanwhile, his unit had a pre-ancient civilization energy core that could keep it running essentially indefinitely.

He could win this battle just by keeping me pinned like this.

"Still..." Despite that, I had three advantages.

First, there was White Rose's incredible toughness—the combined result of its Mythical metal alloy construction and my own defensive skills. Second, there was La Porte de l'Enfer. As long as this skill was active, I could win by simply breaking his cockpit's airtight seal.

And third, there was Niala. It was two versus one right now. If we used our numeric advantage and stuck to the strategy we'd agreed to before we came here, we could still win this.

"You're going to have to remove the spear first if you want to do that, though," said Cyco, in response to my thoughts.

"Yeah." I couldn't win this if I couldn't move, after all. If it came down to that, in a worst-case scenario I could free myself by purging the right arm from the elbow down, but I really needed the hand for what would come next.

"Let's start by separating you. Then we can talk." However, while I was thinking of how to escape, the hostile unit aimed its left hand at the entrance we'd come through. "Missile Darts."

And with those words, the left forearm's armor rose up, exposing many holes—tiny missile tubes—which then fired. They all struck the ceiling right above the entrance, burying the door in rubble. That blocked Niala's vision, making this a one-versus-one.

"Tch...!" With one of my advantages gone, I clicked my tongue. But...what did he mean by "then we can talk"? Why did he attack Rose's elbow joints first? If he could target the tiny fault in there, he should've been able to find some fault in the cockpit and just kill me outright...

As I was pondering that, it seemed like Curtis had something to ask as well. "Now that we are ready, I have one...no, two questions," he said.

"What?"

"They are simple. I'm certain you know the answers."

What? What did I know that the leader of the terrorists who'd taken control of Eltram would want?

"First question...how do you disable this?"

"You mean La Porte de l'Enfer?" Well, I was the only one here who knew about that, so it made sense he would want to know. However, he then shook his unit's head and spoke before I could answer.

"Not that. Not now. This question is about my unit," he said. "Being from The Triangle of Wisdom, you must know the way to disable the limitation placed upon Imperial Glory."

Hearing that made my eyes go wide. That thing's already overpowering Rose. And you mean to tell me it's doing all of that with some sort of limitation in place? I thought. What kind of beast did the guys create here...?

"Do tell me if you know," he said as the golden unit's draconic head came closer. "How do I turn off its voice-based weapon activation?"

"...Huh?" Voice activation?

"The nonsensical limitation that you must speak a weapon's name in order to use it. The unit doesn't even care who says it, so it cannot even act as protection in case of theft. What is the purpose of this feature?"

Curtis's question reminded me that just a moment ago, he'd actually said "Missile Darts" out loud. Unless they were especially quirky, Magingears didn't usually require their pilots to say anything in order to fire their weapons—the Marshall IIs I'd piloted before had been the same way.

Imperial Glory was different, though, and I actually knew the reason.

It was a one-of-a-kind super robot The Triangle of Wisdom had built around a pre-ancient civilization energy core. There had to have been at least one person there who'd said something like, "Hey, if it's a super robot, the pilot has to shout the names of all its attacks, right?"

"Why must they be named to be used?" Curtis insisted. "It isn't simply pointless—it's a clear negative. There is absolutely no benefit to doing it. The direct link between the words and weapons makes it impossible to feint or bluff. What were its creators thinking? Was it a way of getting back at me? I thought we had a good relationship when Glory was being built, but was Reinhard involved even back then? I find that very plausible. Without this feature, I might even have won against Barbaros!"

Hearing his speech made me feel like the feature must have been a huge problem for him, but there had never been any real reason behind its inclusion. The Triangle of Wisdom was just a group of hobbyists—many of whom happened to be the sort to prioritize beauty of form over function.

"The unit was built before I entered the clan. I don't know how to turn it off," I said. Perhaps I could've cut some kind of deal for the answer, but I actually didn't have it, so that was all I could say. Knowing the clan's members, I honestly wouldn't have been surprised if it was actually impossible to turn it off.

"...I see," Curtis said, clearly disappointed.

Had he only let me live so he could ask that question? In that case, my situation was now even more precarious than ever.

“Next question, then. The main one,” Curtis said.

Oh, so that was only a preface to the main question. I would get to live for a bit longer.

“Is the Freeze on my men removable? I confirmed their vital signs, but its state and waveform are different from a standard Freeze. Can it only be undone by your will? Will it vanish upon your death, or will your death make it permanent instead? You are still alive precisely because I have no idea which is true.”

So it really was all about La Porte de l’Enfer.

Cyco’s Freeze certainly was different from the normal version—as long as the target fulfilled the condition, it ignored resistance items and couldn’t even be treated by restoration items. And it stayed active for an entire hour even if I deactivated La Porte de l’Enfer or got the death penalty. The only way anyone could be freed immediately was if I removed the Freeze myself.

“Answer me—and be wise not to lie.” That seemed like he was implying that he had Truth Discernment.

“If I die, it will be undone in an hour,” I said.

“That is too slow.” The Frozen soldiers had been working to remove the core—probably engineers that had been brought here for that very purpose. If their goal was the core, they couldn’t get it as long as those people remained Frozen.

They probably couldn’t afford to stay here long enough for La Porte de l’Enfer to expire. “But the way you said that makes it seem as though you have other ways of releasing them,” Curtis added.

“If I will it, they will be freed right away.” I didn’t lie. I didn’t have to.

“So the only ways to free them are to kill you and wait an hour...or strike a deal with you.”

“Exactly.”

From his perspective, I’d essentially taken his people hostage. Waiting an hour wasn’t an option for him—he was already aware of the problems happening all over the vessel.

I didn’t know how much he knew about the situation exactly, but he must’ve been keenly aware that they had to hurry.

"I will ask just as a formality," Curtis said. "What are your conditions?" he asked.

"Leave this ship immediately. Take nothing, kill no one—just retreat."

He now had the choice to abandon his goal in exchange for saving his men. If he gave up here and ran, he wouldn't be any worse off than he was now.

When they all got outside, though, they'd probably be attacked by Moneygold, and his explosive attacks would likely exterminate them all as they tried to retreat. It felt like I was leading him into a trap. It seemed like something Fran would do...but if I showed them mercy here, that might lead to the death of a lot of innocent people. And that would make it hard for me to sleep at night.

That was why I chose not to lie and presented this offer—or rather, this trap. I would free his men and they would retreat before...

"Hm...?" My train of thought was interrupted by a realization "'As a formality'?" What did he mean by that?

"Yes, I expected an answer like that. I suppose I have no choice then," Curtis said in a slightly annoyed voice as he aimed the unit's left hand at his other soldiers. "Missile Darts."

The small missiles spewed fire as they flew toward the Frozen soldiers at subsonic speeds, breaking them into pieces just like the ceiling he'd fired at earlier before the remains were burnt to ashes.

"Wh-What are you...?!"

"Paint Napalm." When he said that, the dragon's tail extending from the back of the unit—the balancer—swung around.

The tip of the tail was covered in some sort of fiber, dampened with some sort of liquid. As it moved, the liquid sprayed out over the two other Magingears—the ones with Frozen pilots in them.

Two seconds later, the liquid caught fire, thoroughly burning both the Magingears and the frozen statues within their cockpits.

"Wh-What are you doing?! Why did you—?! They're your people...!" I didn't understand what he was doing. I didn't want to understand.

"You ask me why?" After I voiced my confusion, the dragon-headed Magingear's strange-looking sensor-eye focused on me. "Because we fight for a cause that must be fulfilled even if it costs us our lives."

Those words sent a shiver down my spine.

“If we fail—if we do not take this—we will not fulfill our goal. I will remove the core by force. That might damage it, but if a certain someone is as good as they say, fixing it should not be a problem,” Curtis said, looking at the core.

He’d eliminated his own subordinates simply so he could get his hands on that thing.

“Weren’t they your brothers-in-arms...?!”

“It is exactly because I command them that I must weigh their lives on a scale. The core and the weapon it would create is far more important than the people or machines we may lose during this operation.”

I was too shocked to speak.

Curtis, however, was still speaking. “I would sacrifice whatever it takes to end Reinhard’s reign. My men joined me in this assault precisely because we share that sentiment. The necessary sacrifice ended up being their lives, but there was no other option.”

The way he stood before the corpses of his own people brought back a memory. It reminded me of one of the two leaders of the Gouz-Maise Gang—namely, Gouz himself.

He was my enemy back then—and the kind of man who hadn’t hesitated to eat the remains of his own followers.

Curtis was nothing like him on the surface...but I felt like deep down, they had some similarities.

“You...!”

“I have no more questions. There is no more reason to keep you alive.”

With those words, he swung the tail balancer. It was clear he was going to incinerate me while I was still pinned and immobile.

“Ngh! Boucliers Planetes!” I quickly ejected the armor on both shoulders, turning them into floating shields I used as weapons to attack Curtis.

“I thought you’d have a gimmick like this. I could tell by looking.”

However, he caught both of them using his own unit’s arms.

“This too...?!” I thought I’d caught him off guard, but he countered it perfectly! I tried to control the floating shields, but his grip on them was too strong for them to move.

“Farewell, Pilot of The Triangle of Wisdom. I will get my answer to the first question once I make my triumphant return to the imperium. Paint

Napalm."

And so, the golden unit swung the tail covered in liquid fuel...

"Hm...?!"

...but then suddenly jumped backward, retreating with everything it had. He even pulled out the lance keeping my unit pinned.

A moment later, countless missiles rained upon White Rose.

"Huh...?!" Explosions battered the armor, shook the frame, and caused static to appear on the internal monitors.

"Nghh..." After Cyco let out that brief sound, the ice armor shattered and White Rose collapsed to the ground.

"Cyco?!"

"...I'm okay. We can still move..."

She was right—while a lot of the ice had broken, the monitors told me that White Rose under it hadn't been damaged much. Perhaps due to the Mythical alloy plating, it could still function.

The explosive pressure had traveled through the insides, though, so fixing it would take a while.

"Turn off La Porte de l'Enfer. Keep the shattered pieces as they are."

"Oui, ma'am." Cyco obeyed my order and canceled the skill. Thanks to the shattered ice armor, anyone looking at White Rose would probably assume that it had been disabled due to heavy damage.

It wouldn't convince anyone that I'd gotten the death penalty, but deactivating La Porte de l'Enfer would give the impression that I'd at least Fainted.

"But...what were those missiles?" I wondered. They clearly didn't belong to Imperial Glory. And though they were primarily aimed at Curtis, the fact that whoever fired them didn't seem to care about me made it obvious that it wasn't an ally either. So...who could it be?

"What a quick reaction! I guess whoever's inside has a Superior Job!"

My question was answered by a voice coming from a hole in the ceiling. That must've been where the missiles came from, and now a giant object used it as an entrance.

The voice was that of a cheerful lady, but what came through was nothing like you'd expect from hearing it.

It was a white and crimson mechdragon.

"That's..." I recognized it right away—it was the thing shown by Niala's owl’s screen.

The mechdragon that had been fighting Moneygold had arrived at the power block.

Eltram, Commercial Area

It was shortly after Eldridge had shattered one Youaltepuztli.

Emily was silent. Her Superior Embryo was lost. She still had the one in her left, but if she lost that one too, she would be unable to come back and be in danger of actually dying. And her enemy, Eldridge, was using his ultimate job skill as King of Burglary to close the gap in their stats.

To Emily, still in her killing mode, this was both unprecedented and more dangerous than anything she had ever encountered before.

She’d already recognized Eldridge as something worse than a mere “minus”—a hostile. He was now “bad”—someone who had to be eliminated at all costs, even if it meant using her ultimate skill.

Thankfully, it was currently night. The conditions for the skill had been fulfilled, and having just one of the two hatchets wouldn’t stop her. And when she used it, this entire ship would be crushed by her wide-area extermination.

However, on this ship, there still was Zhang—an ally or “plus”—and Doris, whom she had temporarily marked as “good”—someone to protect. It was because she created such hard separations between her enemies and allies that she couldn’t—or wouldn’t—attack any of her friends.

But that didn’t change the fact that using the ult was the only way to deal with Eldridge—this natural enemy before her. If she wasted too much time, his ult’s cooldown would end, and he’d destroy her second Youaltepuztli.

This situation was worse than any she’d been in so far. But that was when...

“Qi!” That single word rang out—carrying the meaning of “rise”—followed by the sound of something large crawling on the mall’s floor.

Naturally, this caught the attention of both Eldridge and Emily.

There, they saw a monstrosity that resembled a giant worm—a Pure-Dragon-tier worm jiangshi with a Fu on its forehead. Eldridge understood with a single glance that it must've been on Emily's side, come to help her out of this unexpected predicament.

Indeed, the Drac-Worm Jiangshi had been summoned by Emily's ally—Zhang. He'd used one of the few powerful entities he'd put under his command after Mirage's destruction. The jiangshi followed the order inscribed on its Fu, recognizing Eldridge as an enemy and attacking him.

However, not even this Pure-Dragon-tier jiangshi was a threat to him. He was greatly empowered by the stats he'd stolen from Emily. And...

"There you are." Eldridge swung his right hand at the jiangshi. The skill set on it wasn't Takeover, but Pickpocket.

A moment later, the Fu on the jiangshi's head was gone. The creature crashed to the floor of the mall, causing the whole area to shake.

Jiangshi weren't autonomous—they were undead controlled by the Fu placed upon them. Thus, Eldridge knew that it would be rendered powerless if he simply took that away.

The Drac-Worm Jiangshi ended up only buying a little time, which meant nothing when Eldridge had all the time in the world.

That would only apply if this Drac-Worm Jiangshi was the only one here, though, and the jiangshi that had attacked Eldridge wasn't alone. The first one was merely bait meant to distract this major threat.

"What...? More jiangshi?" The second one was crawling on the deck and approaching the bridge where Moneygold was still battling Sardonyx to keep it at bay.

The jiangshi was approaching him as if it intended to stop him. Moneygold had the ability to destroy it easily, but he couldn't do that right now.

The simple reason for this was the angle he was currently standing at—firing at the jiangshi meant firing down, which would mean destroying this ship.

"Zhenhuo Zhendao Xuanlongba." And after his hesitation, the jiangshi in the mall and on the deck swelled up from the inside.

They then burst, releasing countless Fu.These were all the kind of Fu that daoshi made ahead of time in order to use their job ults. Filling jiangshi with Fu meant to activate his ultimate was Zhang Zangqi's signature move as Great Soul Daoshi.

The skill he used was a powerful wind spell that cut apart everything in its range—Zhenhuo Zhendao Xuanlongba. The scale of this one was smaller than the one he'd used on AR-I-CA, but it happened in two places at once. One of them briefly kept Eldridge in place, while the other diagonally cut off the bridge where Moneygold stood.

With a loud sound, the bridge collapsed, falling onto the deck and the desert.

Thanks to his Superior Embryo, Moneygold was completely unharmed by this. However...

"Ohh, this is bad." While he didn't sound like he was bothered too much, he thought he was in a really bad situation.

The collapse was too fast for someone with his AGI to react to, and after he fell along with the remains of the bridge, he crashed onto the desert and found himself buried under a large pile of debris. It didn't harm him, but it limited his movements. He couldn't even use his attacks to blow the debris away, since he might accidentally hit the ship and its passengers.

Incapacitated and closed off in a cage of sand and rubble, he was effectively removed from combat.

This, naturally, removed the hail of attacks keeping the enemy at bay.

"...Now." The obstacle in their path had been removed, and Machina wasn't one to miss this opportunity. The vernier thrusters fired at full throttle, making it hard for her to even change course. Moving at supersonic speeds, the unit instantly closed the distance between it and the vessel, using the momentum to break through the wall and enter.

They headed straight to the mall, where Eldridge and Emily were fighting.

The mech's sudden arrival would have startled anyone—Emily, Eldridge, or both of them—into silence.

Regardless, Zhang's job ultimate had rendered Eldridge immobile. Not missing this chance, Sardonyx fired an incendiary shell at him.

Eldridge had defense that rivaled Mythical metal, as well as stats taken from Emily. But the shell hit him precisely in the stomach—opening up a gaping wound and incinerating everything inside.

Now the only thing linking Eldridge's upper and lower bodies were the remains of his spine.

The wound was devastating, and Eldridge coughed blood as he collapsed backward. As he did, he used Pickpocket on the unit that had just broken in, but it didn't work.

They countered it, huh? Must be pretty tough... he thought.

Though the wound was very close to fatal, he was still alive for the moment. However, that wasn't exactly a good thing. If this attack itself had been fatal, it would've been negated by the Brooch. But since this was just a heavy wound that left him barely alive, the damage over time from the injury-based debuffs it laid on him made his death an inevitability. The Brooch was useless in situations like this.

However, this was no accident—Machina had done this on purpose.

"Guess this is it." Eldridge tried thinking of something he could do before his time expired, but nothing came to mind. His ult's cooldown wasn't over yet, and with the crimson-white mechdragon standing between them, he couldn't use Takeover on Emily.

Eldridge realized that he'd done everything he could do here.

Another loss against a Superior, huh? It was no doubt a defeat for him.

However, IF had only defeated him because they had two Superiors and one tian Superior Job. If even one of them hadn't been here, Eldridge might've lasted until his cooldown expired and might have actually finished off Emily.

She was the strongest PK of all time—effectively immortal—and he'd come closer to actually killing her than anyone else.

In a way, that feat may have been more impressive than merely defeating a Superior.

"...King of Burglary, Eldridge, right?"

And there was someone here who acknowledged that.

Sardonyx's high-speed movements had greatly damaged him, but he was still able to assess the situation through the outside monitors.

One of Emily's Youaltepuztlis was broken. He knew that this man lying before him was the one who'd cornered her like this.

Eldridge's name had been on his list, and he was aware of what King of Burglary had achieved thus far. Eldridge had led a notable PK clan, and his keen mind and leadership skills had brought them many achievements. However, his failures since the incident in Altar had left him mostly abandoned by his clan. Eldridge looked to be a man well past his prime.

It seemed as though Sardonyx's pilot would have to reevaluate that impression.

“Eldridge. I’m Rascal—Rascal the Bloodonyx of IF.”

Eldridge was familiar with that name. He was a wanted Superior who was functionally in charge of the world’s strongest criminal clan.

“I have an offer for you.”

“What is it?” Eldridge was wondering what this man could possibly want from him.

“When your death penalty’s over...join IF.”

It was an invitation.

IF was causing all of these incidents in order to gauge the abilities of unaffiliated people. Given their compatibility, Eldridge had been able to gain the upper hand against Emily, who was far above him in status—and he possessed an instinct that had led him to this ship seeking something that very few could even see coming. There were many past achievements attached to his name, and what he’d done here was proof that his skills hadn’t dulled one bit.

Rascal caused these incidents to specifically analyze the participants, and he’d deemed Eldridge to be someone they should add to their team.

“To your clan?”

“You’d start as a supportin’ member, but we’ll make it official once you’re a Superior. Emily’ll see you as an enemy for a while, so I’d have you work somewhere other than Caldina, but we can promise to support you with all the funding and items you need.”

Eldridge said nothing as Rascal showed him the deposit he would receive. It was far more than anything he’d earned even when Goblin Street was in its golden age.

This wasn’t a bad deal by any means. If anything, this was much more than a man on a losing streak like him could ever expect. One could say that luck was finally turning in his favor.

“...Not a chance.”

However, he rejected the offer without hesitation, shaking his head.

The faces of two women came to mind.

“There’s only one clan...I’ll ever have.”

Fey and Niala had supported him all this time, and not even this excellent offer could begin to outweigh their value to him.

Rascal said nothing for a moment. He’d thought that Eldridge might refuse, but there was less hesitation in his voice than Rascal had ever expected to hear.

“That won’t change...even if I lose.”

After admitting defeat, Eldridge’s body dissolved into light, and IF were the only ones left in this devastated mall.

“Shame,” Rascal said as he watched the lights vanish. He truly believed that it was unfortunate they couldn’t recruit Eldridge, and at the same time, he felt a little defeated himself.

But then he switched focus. This wasn’t the time to wallow in feelings like those—he had something important to do.

After Eldridge vanished, Emily was standing there with an empty expression on her face. She was neither in her killing mode nor her normal mode. Instead, she was in a state Rascal had never seen before.

Maybe she’s mentally exhausted or something? On this ship, she’d done a few things she’d never done before, and Rascal didn’t know whether this would be good or bad for her.

Regardless, he thought it was best to prevent her from fighting any longer. The odds of it were extremely low, but if there was another person aboard with a weapon-destroying skill, it would be over for her.

And so, Rascal decided that she had to leave here immediately. He called Zhang over the comms and told him to take Emily and retreat. The escort vessels were all silent, and with jiangshi protection they could leave with no trouble.

“What about you...?” Zhang asked.

“I’m goin’ to the power block. This thing here was unexpected, but I still gotta do what I gotta do there.”

After such a disaster, this voyage would definitely be Eltram’s first and final one.

That made it likely that the Caldinan congress would seize—or even buy

—the energy core, and that was something that Rascal wanted to avoid at all costs.

"Hurry up, Machina."

"Aye-aye, sir!" And so, they went to the power block, where they clashed with two Magingears.

Armored Pilot, Hugo Lesseps

"Master! That's probably a really strong pilot!" The crimson-white mechdragon unit projected a cheerful-sounding woman's voice.

"Imperial Glory...and Curtis Eldona...huh? That name was...on the list."

The female voice was followed by the voice of a man who sounded like he was injured. It looked like there were two people inside it. It might've been a unit piloted by a Master-Embryo pair, just like ours.

"A unit that mimics a Prism Dragon...what are you?" Curtis's voice as he asked the intruder to identify themselves was stiffer than when he talked to me. Maybe that was just his pilot's instinct.

"It ain't worth explainin'. I don't have business with you," said the man's voice.

"Huh? He's a Superior Job. You aren't going to try inviting him?" the woman replied.

"We don't need people who are just strong. We have Ideas for that kind of thing."

That conversation made no sense to me and probably didn't to Curtis either, but I could tell that they were being fairly disdainful of him.

That only made Imperial Glory's intimidating aura intensify.

"Oh, Master! I just checked and noticed something!" the cheerful woman said as though she couldn't care less how menacing Glory was. "That golden thing has a landdragon-type core too!"

"Ah, shit. This ship just can't stop wastin' our time," the man said, displeased, as the mechdragon began to move.

"Intrusion, insults, and such hostility...I see no reason not to presume you are my enemy." And with that, Imperial Glory also began to move.

The golden dragon-headed unit's and the mechdragon's cores roared as they faced each other...and clashed.

The tiny point of Imperial Glory's lance stabbed forward into the mechdragon. As though seeing it coming, the mechdragon used its front left leg to push it aside. Imperial Glory then used that rightward momentum to swing its tail balancer to the side, releasing the still-active Paint Napalm onto the mechdragon.

As the liquid fuel flew toward it, the mechdragon lowered itself and activated its vernier thrusters to avoid the barrage, igniting the fuel as it sprayed behind Imperial Glory instead.

The golden mech, though, had already turned to face its opponent, and was now aiming its left arm at the mechdragon.

"Missile Darts."

"Rush Missiles."

The Imperial Glory unit fired countless missiles from its left arm, and they were answered by a multitude of missiles launched from the mechdragon's back.

The two barrages clashed in the air, creating explosions that engulfed them both and drowning the area in an explosion of wind and destruction.

The fires were still spreading when they moved toward each other again. With thunderous sounds, they exchanged a new round of blows.

"Oh...!"

"N-Not bad!"

Over the sound of the clash, I could hear the rather gleeful voices of the pilots.

The two were equals—or at least, that was how it seemed to me. They seemed so evenly matched that I felt they might have exchanged countless attacks already that were just too fast for my eyes to follow.

Regardless, it was clear that I stood no chance against either in a proper battle.

"Hugo...can we win?" I was silent. The odds weren't high, but they weren't zero either.

If we could stick to the plan that Niala and I had laid out and use my advantages to their fullest potential...then yes. We could win this.

Eltram, Power Block

“We’re at a slight disadvantage, huh?” While Machina used incredible piloting techniques to hold off the enemy, Rascal gave his evaluation.

When it came to their power cores, Imperial Glory lost out to Sardonyx even though it had been constructed without any regard to balance—Sardonyx, after all, was the work of Machina, the embodiment of the pre-ancient civilization. If anything here was unusual, it was truly Curtis’s skill—not many could pilot such an unbalanced and unwieldy unit so well.

“Normally, he wouldn’t have had a chance against us simply because of these power cores...but he’s got one too.” The biggest advantage the dragon-shaped Sardonyx had over other Magingears was its pre-ancient civilization cores. The energy cores of normal magic-based machines propelled them by transforming the MP of the rider into kinetic energy based on earth magic or electricity based on sky magic. They were more like converters than true energy cores, and that was why the output and uptime of those machines was strictly limited by the rider’s MP. Hugo’s White Rose was a prime example of this, being a true energy hog, but even normal Marshall IIs couldn’t last all that long in combat. Even the tanklike Geists only managed to extend their uptime by minimizing MP loss by employing crews where each individual focused exclusively on one area, such as movement or weapons. As far as modern cores went, the most efficient one was Blue Opera’s, but in exchange it produced an extremely loud noise while running—and it was an accidental creation that could not be reproduced.

However, even that one couldn’t compare to Flagman’s energy cores. Instead of converting people’s MP, they provided their own magic and converted it into usable forms. Only the first Flagman knew where the magic was being drawn from—not even the Flagmans that had followed him and supposedly inherited his knowledge had actually had the relevant theory passed down to them.

Despite knowing how to build them, not even Machina—or more properly, Agate Designer—knew why they came out the way they did. In fact, there was a safety feature that specifically prevented her from knowing.

Because of all that, it wasn’t just the large skydragon-type cores used in original Prism Dragons that were obscenely rare—even smaller landdragon-type cores were uncommon too, and Magingears equipped with them had an immense advantage over those that didn’t.

However, it just so happened that both units present were equipped with landdragon-type cores. One had a core created two thousand years ago, while the other’s were newly created by Machina, but the difference between their performance wasn’t significant.

“We’ll be at a disadvantage if he notices...” Rascal said. Though Sardonyx had more cores, they were more or less equal. In fact, Sardonyx was gradually being overwhelmed.

That was mostly due to the presence of a Superior Job.

Machina was incredibly skilled—in fact, she’d worked on the base piloting data for all of Flagman’s rideable pre-ancient civilization weapons.

However, she wasn’t human, which made it impossible for her to claim any jobs. Her piloting had absolutely no support from job skills or anything like that. She was riding with The Weapon, of course, but that was a job focused solely on making sure the unit’s offensive capabilities were up and running. It had little effect on anything else.

Meanwhile, Over Pilot, Curtis had skill level EX Piloting, as well as skills that boosted his unit’s stats.

If this battle dragged on too long, Sardonyx would win because it could be healed. However, if it was over quickly, Imperial Glory had a strong chance of defeating them.

Curtis had yet to grasp the full extent of Sardonyx’s abilities and thus didn’t try to finish things right away—but if the battle continued, he would surely begin to understand and go for the kill.

Rascal knew how bad it would be for them if Curtis used his ult first.

“Machina, we’re usin’ Heilige Trinität.”

That was why he decided to play his most dangerous card.

“Are you sure?” Machina said in surprise, still battling Curtis as she spoke.

“Do it. Both that tasteless hunk of golden scrap and the core here gotta be destroyed, anyway.”

Perhaps Deus Ex Machina—his Superior Embryo—might have been able to retrieve both with a touch, but that was impossible while Imperial Glory was active, and approaching the ship’s core wasn’t an option with Curtis here either.

No matter what he did next, Rascal had to destroy Imperial Glory first.

"Roger! And the limit is...?"

"Just stop before I die."

"Aye-aye, sir!" And so, Machina gathered her resolve...

"Setting up melee mode! Heilige Trinität...activate!"

...and she entered something into Sardonyx's console.

"To think that someone could match me at mobile weapon combat," Curtis said. "Not even Dryfe had anyone of this caliber." He didn't show it, but the fact that Sardonyx could keep up with him had left Curtis astonished. He'd been piloting Magingears for nearly twenty years.

He'd sat at the helm of Geists that had been modified to be used by one person, Outrail—the half-humanoid, half-vehicle Magingear left in Eldona March—and the Marshall II HC that he'd given to Lieutenant Colonel Berlin.

And now, this Imperial Glory.

Curtis had controlled many units in his life, but he'd never met a pilot who was truly his equal. He couldn't have imagined that he would run into one now, of all times.

It wasn't just the technique that moved him—the unit itself was perfectly constructed. He'd found a tiny fault even in White Rose's heavy armor, but he couldn't spot anything like that in Sardonyx.

"If this were an ordinary battle, my heart would dance..." However, Curtis had to destroy this enemy as quickly as possible and claim Eltram's core. He was weighing his joy as a warrior against the weight of his goal.

And when his goal was placed onto the scales, it was obvious to which side it would tilt.

He wouldn't relish this battle as a warrior, but instead defeat his enemy as a soldier.

"And since it seems you have a core of your own...I will claim that as well." Based on the output and the fact that it showed no sign of weakening, Curtis had realized that the enemy unit must have a pre-ancient civilization core too. This wasn't a foe he'd expected to face, but if he could gain something from the confrontation, he would welcome it.

After that thought crossed his mind, he began to figure out a strategy that would defeat the mechdragon...

"...Hm?"

But then, a change in the enemy made his eyes go wide with shock.

The front legs...the claws that until now had only been used for anchoring the unit had grown in length, becoming obvious offensive weapons. The overall form had changed as well, with its limbs now elongated and its thruster placement adjusted to match.

However, the most obvious change was the color.

The unit was crimson-white before, but now, the white parts had heated up until they glowed, making it a mix of crimson and bright red.

"What are y—?" Before he could finish what he was saying, Curtis quickly tilted the unit to the side, acting on subconscious reflex.

A moment later, something red flew right by him, too fast to see—and there was now a claw mark on the golden unit's shoulder armor, marking that the dragon had passed and touched him.

Curtis's eyes widened. His enemy was now so fast he struggled to describe it, and the claw strikes didn't end at just one attack, instead slashing at him many times over.

The unit bathed in bright crimson was attacking him at speeds that greatly exceeded anything he had seen so far. During this assault, Curtis had swung the tail balancer for both defense and retaliation, but that had left it damaged and rendered Paint Napalm unusable.

"Th-This is...!" The unit's current level of mobility was so high it almost seemed as though it had been merely toying with Curtis before. A job ultimate?! An MVP reward?! Whatever it is, they pulled out a true trump card...! Despite this extreme change in the nature of his foe, Curtis cracked a smile as he reconsidered his earlier choice to finish this quickly. His conjecture was mostly correct. This power was undoubtedly one of the aces up Rascal and Machina's sleeve, but it was accomplished by neither a job ult nor an MVP reward.

Heilige Trinität—the Holy Trinity. Just like their mother ship, Tetragrammaton, it used a concept from Earth's most widespread religion as its name—and it was not a skill, but a combination. Emphasizing the concept of a "trinity," this was a combo that employed Sardonyx's power, Machina's piloting, and Rascal's job skills all to their fullest, all at the same time.

Both the cores ran at an output that could cause them to exceed their limitations and explode. The mechdragon's control column was now being jerked to and fro so intensely that it had begun to shatter.

And all the damage this combination did was being fixed by The Weapon's repair and error deletion skills, forcefully keeping the entire thing together.

Basically, they were stabilizing the unit within its danger zone.

As long as there was a balance between the self-inflicted damage from exceeding their own limits and the skill's ability to repair, this functioned as an extreme improvement to its performance.

"Ngh...ghhh...!" However, the many quick movements and collisions at supersonic speeds would ultimately be fatal to Rascal and his frail body. Already he was spitting blood, and more of his skeleton started to fracture with every passing moment.

This combination couldn't be used without Rascal and his job, The Weapon, but Rascal himself was its greatest weak point. Who would die first—their enemy or Rascal himself?

Heilige Trinität was a double-edged sword.

"Master...!"

"Don't mind me," Rascal said, swallowing a healing pill along with a mouthful of his own blood. "If you don't want me to die, just beat goldie already."

"...Aye-aye, sir!" Machina said with a nod as she continued the relentless, limitless barrage.

"Heh...heh heh...heh HA HA HA HA HA...!" Curtis could feel the armor on his limbs peeling away, but despite that, he found himself laughing.

His heart was dancing. This was an encounter with a powerful foe that was the same as he was. This wasn't someone who wielded a spear in their own bare hands, the commander of a puppet army, the master of a powerful beast, or an entirely robotic killing machine.

This was his first time meeting someone who piloted a mobile weapon like he did—someone could match him at it.

Reinhard's defeat. Claudiah's salvation. Suddenly, Curtis found himself with a goal that matched those two obsessions.

His fighter's nature had caused him to instantly fall in love with Claudiah and her unfathomable talents—and now, he was drawing close to savoring this battle with the primal purity of a warrior's soul.

"Hah...hngh...!" But when he noticed himself laughing and enjoying this, he quickly restrained himself.

He wasn't here to have fun. He had a goal he had to fulfill as both a soldier and a man who loved a woman.

That was the reason he'd killed so many people on this ship, including his own subordinates.

He couldn't allow himself to fight for enjoyment alone.

The only words in his mind now were "Victory to the true Dryfe."

"Man-Machine Interface...activate!" Gathering his resolve, he used a power that was restricted to one use per day—the ultimate job skill of the Over Pilot.

A moment later, Sardonyx's claws approached Imperial Glory's torso. However, Curtis used his spear to deflect them and sent a knee into Sardonyx's chest armor.

This time, Machina was the one whose eyes widened.

Imperial Glory's movements were nothing like before. And it wasn't just in terms of pure speed. The golden unit's steps and attacks seemed even more well-timed and elegant than they had a moment ago.

This was the power of the Over Pilot's ultimate job skill—Man-Machine Interface.

It was an active—rather than passive—enhancement skill that tripled the STR and AGI of the user's unit.

However, that wasn't the skill's most valuable effect by a long shot.

Man-Machine Interface was Piloting perfected—the ultimate form of the skill that allowed the user to control a war machine however they wished.

Now, the unit moved exactly as he willed it. He didn't even have to touch the control column anymore.

At this moment, Curtis himself was Imperial Glory. He moved it as if the unit was his own flesh and blood. It followed his commands instantly, without any input lag.

"I can see! I can see them! I see your movements!" His mouth wasn't moving—Curtis's voice came directly from Imperial Glory's outer speakers.

The metallic unit easily broke the speed of sound, yet its movements flowed more beautifully than any human being's could.

"Adjusting enemy unit threat level. Forming patterns. Testing various counter plans."

Machina responded to this by focusing all her processing power on combat and ran through all kinds of tactics meant to destroy the man united with the machine.

Once again, they were more than a match for each other, but both of them had time limits.

Though both units had cores that could keep them running semipermanently, there were certain things that couldn't last. The damage sustained by Imperial Glory brought it ever closer to the limits of its endurance, while the vivid red mechdragon was at the risk of losing Rascal. Both of them wanted to end this as quickly as possible.

But if not even the trump cards they kept up their sleeves could create a gap between their capabilities, the two combatants had but one choice—an all-or-nothing gambit.

"Charge completed. Changing sniper cannon barrel to energy mode. Target...within range."

The bright red mechdragon aimed the sniper cannon that doubled as its head straight toward the enemy...

"I will end it with this!"

...as the golden unit opened its dragonlike maw wide...

...these two dragons faced one another...

"Blast Flare!"

"Draconic Burn!"

...and both their heads released superheated energy beams.

As an intense light flooded the power zone, the immense heat exploded between them.

Both of them widened their eyes in surprise. They had both fired a weapon that converted all the magic provided by the landdragon-type core into heat and launched it from a close-range. The word "armament" hardly seemed appropriate for something so powerful, so they were each shocked to find that their opponent also wielded such a power.

Machina had installed it on Sardonyx as a secret weapon against those who assumed that the mechdragon's head was only good for sniping shots, while the golden Glory had it simply because its creators were enthusiasts who felt that a super robot just wasn't complete until it could fire a huge beam.

And as strange as it was, they were more or less equal in this area as well.

Sardonyx was clearly the superior unit in terms of conversion efficiency and output simply because it was equipped with two cores. However, Imperial Glory's output was enhanced by the Over Pilot's skills.

As a result, their equally matched weapons clashed, and instead of instantly killing the other like they'd each hoped, the balance was yet again maintained.

However, they couldn't stop firing these beams. If either of them did, they would surely be hit by the enemy's shot.

And as a result, they were both gambling on the enemy unit running out of energy before they did.

As this deadly balance was maintained...

"...Cyco."

...the silent Rose saw its one chance at victory.

The pale unit stood up, covered itself in ice, and activated La Porte de l'Enfer once more.

The other two widened their eyes yet again. The third unit—White Rose—had more or less vanished from their thoughts by now. That was why they were in no position to counter it in a timely manner.

Neither Sardonyx nor Imperial Glory could make a single careless move while facing each other. White Rose, on the other hand, didn't have much besides La Porte de l'Enfer and its toughness. It was undoubtedly far less powerful than the other two units here, and it was unlikely that it had anything that could take both of the other units out. Even if it did possess such a power, White Rose didn't even reach speeds at the subsonic level, meaning that it could never hope to land a hit on these two mechs that had surpassed all limits.

That was why at this point, both Curtis and Machina saw White Rose as nothing but set dressing.

However, that soon changed...

"Niala!"

...when Hugo called out, causing a fourth unit to fly in through the hole in the ceiling.

All eyes widened yet again.

The two clashing units both spied a bomber plane that looked like a condor. The Genocide Condor was part of Niala's legion—Winged Omnipotence, Simurgh—and it was the one with the highest firepower.

Niala herself was also at the edge of the hole in the ceiling. After Imperial Glory had destroyed the entrance, she'd gone through the ship's hallways to arrive at that very gap.

And now, she'd fired her Condor, just like she and Hugo had planned.

"CAAAAWWW!" With a roaring engine that sounded like the shriek of a bird, Genocide Condor descended straight into the center of the power zone at an incredible speed...and exploded.

◇◇◇

Before Entering the Power Block, Eltram, Hallway

Just before Hugo, Cyco, and Niala entered the power zone and assaulted the DLG, they explained their combat capabilities to each other.

"My Embryo is a varied Legion," said Niala. "Though only two of them are specialized in combat, and I already used one of them—the jet fighter, Fighting Falcon. That just leaves the bomber, Genocide Condor."

"How destructive is it? Compared to, say, King of Destruction's battleship."

"Well, you could have picked a more reasonable point of comparison..." Hugo had looked into his memory and brought up the weapon Embryo with the greatest firepower that he'd seen yet, but it made Niala put on a strained smile. "It's a sixth-form Embryo that's also split among multiple functions, so it can't really match a Superior Embryo. It probably wouldn't do much damage to White Rose's armor. That's a Mythical alloy, isn't it?"

"Yes."

"Taking defensive passive skills into account, the damage would be very light. That isn't a bad thing, seeing as there's the potential for friendly fire...but even if the target is made of lower-ranked material than yours—Ancient Legendary metal, for example—it still wouldn't do too much damage if they assumed a defensive stance." Niala had experimented with her Embryo in an arena, and she had a decent idea of how powerful it was. "It is powerful enough to destroy a regular Marshall II completely, though."

"I see."

"And that's it for what I can use in battle."

"Thank you. That makes it easier for me to come up with a plan."

"So, what do you intend to do if your skill doesn't work on these enemies just like it didn't on the one in the mall?"

"I've mostly figured out how all of that works." They'd already talked about what they would do if La Porte de l'Enfer didn't work on the enemies. Hugo had already guessed that it was because of the units' airtight seal, so he continued his explanation. "This is just a guess, but I think it didn't work on the DLG Magingears because they were fully airtight. That's why I believe I shall ask you to do something about that."

“Me?”

“You can take care of that by sniping Marshall IIs. And if we encounter someone with stronger armor, please use the Genocide Condor you mentioned.” Niala did not immediately respond. “Holes made by sniping, damage done by bombs—if we break that seal, La Porte de l’Enfer should work...assuming I’m right about the reason it failed earlier, anyway.”

Niala’s face had twisted into a bitter expression when she heard Hugo’s plan. “I can do the first easily...but there’s a problem with the second. The Condor has a high cost, so I can’t use it carelessly. Our financial situation will be better now that we took some equipment from the terrorists, but I’m hesitant anyway.”

They still didn’t know if Eldridge would be able to actually turn their spoils into money—and even if he could, the money they’d earned here was meant to be used for the clan’s revival. Personal payout would be something they’d talk about later.

“How much does it cost?”

“About ten million. It’s already charged and I can use it, but...”

While significantly less than the costs some Superiors incurred, it certainly wasn’t cheap. They were already budgeting their meals, so Niala wanted to avoid using her Embryo.

“Please use it during our upcoming battle in the power zone. I’ll pay for it.”

“...What?”

In response to Niala, Hugo took ten million lir from his Inventory. This was part of the reward he’d split with Ray for defeating the Gouz-Maise Gang. He’d been using it to buy parts for repairs and the like, but even now could spare ten million lir.

“Are you sure?”

“I believe it will be necessary.” Hugo seemed to have no doubts.

“...Very well. I’ll take it, but I promise I’ll give it back if I don’t use it.”

“All right.”

“I’ll leave the timing to you, but how exactly are you planning to deploy Genocide Condor? Will you bombard enemies that have too much armor to snipe?”

“That is the plan. But...”

“But...?”

"I don't think it will be enough."

Holes opened by sniping. Damage made by explosions. Somehow, Hugo felt that even those measures might not be enough to overcome some foes.

"That's why I'll prepare a third assault."

◇◆◇

Eltram, Power Block

With its crash, all the bombs within Genocide Condor were set off.

The power block was fairly cramped for Magingears, and the resulting destruction was enough to start a firestorm and drown everything in a chain of explosions.

However, the golden unit and the mechdragon were both made from Ancient Legendary metal. They could avoid fatal damage if they simply braced for it.

The blasts caused them to cut their energy beams at the exact same time and assume a defensive stance.

And White Rose was rushing toward them.

Plated in a Mythical armor stronger than the other two and controlled by a pilot with a job that boosted its defense further, White Rose could charge through the explosions without the need to actively defend itself.

And the other two didn't—couldn't—see its approach. The explosions engulfing the power zone had made optical and sound sensors unusable. Even Drac-Sight's energy sensor was overwhelmed by noise.

The two units couldn't see anything. They might've been the Over Pilot and Agate Designer—the two strongest pilots in the world—but even they couldn't react to this. Perhaps AR-I-CA could've sensed something with her ability to foresee danger, but these two had no such ability.

However, the same went for White Rose. The unit's sensor was overwhelmed, showing only pure white static as though it were plowing through a blizzard.

Despite that, White Rose knew where the two units were.

After all...

"Forward. Six steps."

...Cyco's unique sense could clearly see Curtis and Rascal's immense kill count of their kin.

Even in this blinding, burning hell, this intuition that sprung from the core of her being allowed her to know the exact location of those she had to defeat—those murderers.

"Right. Seven steps." Within this blinding, deafening blizzard of fire, the white unit charged without hesitation, led on by the words of a girl who was the pilot's mount, friend, and true other half.

"Both sides. Now." Thus, White Rose used a skill—its own ace up its sleeve.

This was its second skill, Purgatorial Slash. It used the heat gathered by La Porte de l'Enfer and released it as a heat energy blade—the Embryo's only purely offensive skill.

It had been gathering heat since its last use in Gideon, and all of that would be released right here and now.

"Purgatorial Slash!" Blades of fire extended from White Rose's both hands, piercing the cockpits of the other two units.

If sniping wasn't enough to break the airtightness, they used bombs. And if that wasn't enough...they'd use a Purgatorial Slash. This was the three-layered plan Hugo had thought up.

The difference in defense, the fact that Niala was with him, and Cyco—

Hugo had used all the advantages he had...and as a result, his blade reached his targets.

◆

In silence, Curtis looked at his blacked out external monitor, showing a reflection of his own body.

The black screen that now served as a makeshift mirror displayed him as a frozen statue...with a hole where his stomach ought to be.

The heat energy blades that had pierced the chest armor of his unit had burned it out. The Freeze that followed instantly stopped the bleeding, but once that was undone, he would inevitably die.

Curtis quickly grasped the uncomfortable truth—this was the direct result of his carelessness.

However, Imperial Glory was still moving. Man-Machine Interface made him one with his unit, letting him move it even if his body was frozen.

Curtis could continue this battle—but fighting and surviving were two different things. Even if he could move his unit, the wound he'd suffered was so grave that he could not hope to escape death.

Curtis was a soldier. He'd killed dozens...no, hundreds of people, so he knew full well what was going to happen. His life, suspended by Freeze, wasn't long for this world. If the effect expired or Hugo realized that Curtis had been fatally injured, the Freeze would stop and he would die. Curtis already knew that Hugo was capable of that.

There was nothing that could be done—Curtis's death was now assured.

This realization made several different feelings well up in his heart.

His desire for combat. His shame toward his subordinates. His yearning for Claudiah. His hatred for Reinhard. All of these emotions mixed and swirled within him, and the coming death narrowed his thinking.

The number of things Curtis had to weigh was rapidly decreasing. The exciting battle with his equal was over, and a dead man had no future with Claudiah.

That was why he made one final choice and placed it on the scales.

Perhaps this was inevitable. It was the goal he'd rallied for, and the flag beneath which his men died.

"Very well! I will die here! I accept it!" As his death was unavoidable, he accepted it. This beloved unit would be his coffin...

"I leave the rest to you, Glory! MACHINE SOUL, ACTIVATE!"

...and Curtis used the final skill of the pilot grouping.

◇◆

Machina saw that moment.

While all of Sardonyx's sensors were overwhelmed by explosions from the bomber, a white unit had approached them. The heat energy blade it launched just barely surpassed Sardonyx's laminated Ancient Legendary armor.

The energy blade entered the cockpit right next to Rascal's seat and burned off his right arm.

"Master...?!" Switching back from her combat focus, Machina let out a scream.

However, a moment after Rascal lost his right arm, his entire body

Froze.

A moment later, Sardonyx's monitors were overwhelmed by errors.

With The Weapon, Rascal incapacitated, Heilige Trinität could no longer function.

"Ughh...!" Machina instantly returned the unit to its normal mode. Right after that, she quickly chose to leave the power zone entirely.

As a Prism Person, Machina was unaffected by La Porte de l'Enfer. However, Sardonyx required Rascal's skills to function in its unoptimized state. With him incapacitated, continuing this fight wasn't an option, and Machina cared far more about her disarmed and Frozen Master than any battle or core in front of them.

She fervently set the escape route and fled Eltram without showing any care for anything else, leaving behind the White Rose unit that had hurt her Master, the woman who had summoned the bomber...and Imperial Glory, which was about to become something else.

◇◆

After Sardonyx retreated, Imperial Glory—which now had a large hole in its chest—retaliated against White Rose with maneuvers surpassing those it had performed while Curtis's ultimate job skill was active.

Imperial Glory was punching relentlessly. Combined with the damage Rose had already suffered, this was enough to break off the white unit's right arm and damage the leg joints.

A destructive barrage with overwhelming speed and precision—its power had increased more than it had while Man-Machine Interface was active, and it was now great enough to destroy even Mythical metal.

"Ngh...?! Wh-What...!"

"Looks like my transformation has made your Freezing powers useless."

Imperial Glory spoke with Curtis's voice. However, it felt functionally different than it had when he was talking through the speakers with Man-Machine Interface.

It was as though the one speaking was the unit itself.

"Hugo...he's already dead," Cyco said, as though to confirm what Hugo suspected.

"What?!"

"His kill count is gone."

Curtis had died within Imperial Glory's cockpit. His Frozen vital functions had ceased completely, and even the Over Pilot job he held had been released from his body. He wasn't attacking with the spear, Drac-Stinger either—because it was gone. Like all MVP rewards, it had vanished with its user's death.

Curtis Eldona had most definitely died here in Eltram's power block.

Yet Imperial Glory was still moving.

"Indeed! I have abandoned life as a human! I had to!" Imperial Glory itself responded to Cyco's words, its voice full of conflicting emotions.

All of this was happening because of the skill Curtis used right before dying—the final skill of the pilot grouping, Machine Soul.

If Man-Machine Interface was what waited at the end of the road that was Piloting, this skill was what happened if you strayed from that road. The pilot gave up their life, inhabiting their unit with just one goal—one dying wish—and greatly enhancing its power.

Originally, it was a skill used by a pilot who was low on magic in order to complete one last job—a sort of final command that lasted until the unit's energy expired.

However, the core was providing Imperial Glory with semiperpetual energy that erased such limitations. And as long as the unit remained indestructible, its goal would be as well.

"Now, I-I-I can control this body far better than I did befo-o-o-re!" The Imperial Glory inhabited by Curtis's dying wish laughed as if to display its power, but its voice was starting to be overcome by static—though it was unclear if this was caused by the short-term skill being unnaturally extended or some kind of incompatibility between the skill and the core that sustained it. "I don't have to make a new weapon with the co-o-re! I-I'll incorporate it into this body, keep enhancing it, and kill everyone who stands in my wa-a-ay! I will become the machine-god protector of my homeland and defeat Reinha-a-a-ard!"

The one goal Curtis had granted to the unit while he still lived was Reinhard's downfall. Even if Curtis himself died, the unit entrusted with his will would carry that out.

"I feel so much more po-o-o-owerful than when I was alive! I will de-ee-finitely beat him like no-o-o-o-ow!”

As he was now, Curtis didn’t remember Claudiah. The unit had Curtis’s final will, but not his soul.

“KillKillKillKillKillKillKlililiillilil!”

As Imperial Glory kept moving, the consciousness within began to fade. Soon, it wasn’t clear who was speaking anymore—Curtis or the unit itself.

This was a machine given the sole directive of eliminating Reinhard. Carrying only the shattered fragments of a man’s grudge, it was a true monstrosity...

Chapter Nine: The White Rose and the Corpse of Glory

Eltram, Power Block

The current situation was the result of multiple factors.

A landdragon-type semipermanent energy core. A unit built by the wealth of the imperium and The Triangle of Wisdom's technology—their Embryos included. The unprecedented development of a mind through the use of Over Pilot's final skill.

The combination of these had turned Imperial Glory into a monstrous creature like no other.

Being recognized as a UBM hadn't changed its appearance. After receiving the UBM designation, it still had the hole in its chest, along with all the other damage, and maintained the exact same functions as it had possessed before.

However, the Resource injection had increased its output even further.

This UBM was only a fledgling, but it was already far too strong for Hugo and Cyco.

Still...I can't just let it do as it pleases, Hugo thought. There was also something that flashed to his mind as he looked at Imperial Glory—the UBM made of the grudge and flesh of the dead—Revenant Ox-Horse, Gouz-Maise.

He felt that the golden unit was now—a murderous machine-soldier driven by a dead man's grudge and powered by an inexhaustible source of energy—extremely similar to that horror.

There was nothing for Hugo to hesitate about here. He knew he had to stop Imperial Glory right here and now.

"Rose...!" Hugo's unit had been heavily battered by the barrage, but he somehow forced it to stand up again. Cyco also manipulated her icy armor to support the damaged White Rose. The injuries on its legs were so extensive that they were only questionably capable of supporting the unit's weight—and yet they did.

It was as though Rose itself was trying to heed Hugo's will...as though it also wanted to prevent the rampage of its "sibling"—a fellow mech built by The Triangle of Wisdom.

"D-Do you think th-th-th-that hunk of scrap can d-d-defeat me?" Glory asked.

"I dunno," said Hugo. "But I can't just ignore you. Doing that would make it hard for me to sleep at night."

The power gap between their units was vast.

Imperial Glory was stronger than it ever had been. On top of that, Hugo's La Porte de l'Enfer was useless against it, and he'd already used Purgatorial Slash.

He had no advantage over Imperial Glory this time, but Hugo simply couldn't choose to not fight.

Think...! There has to be something...just one thing that might let me win...! he thought, but Glory attacked him ceaselessly regardless.

Glory threw its fists at Rose, fully intent on destroying it. This was an onslaught of pure power that didn't need any MVP rewards or armaments to be devastating—the attacks weren't even delivered with the incredible skill that Curtis had displayed in life.

"GHA-GHA-GHA-GHA-GHA-GHA-GHA-GHA-GHA-GHA-GHA-GHA!"

But despite all that, he and his unit were the strongest they'd ever been—and it wasn't even close.

One swing, and the Mythical metal alloy bent. Another, and it shattered.

There was no skill or special weaponry aiding anything here. The attack was nothing but pure STR—and it now exceeded White Rose's defensive capabilities.

A single hit would be enough to turn generic Marshall IIs into piles of scrap. Rose may have been the toughest Magingear, but not even it could withstand a hundred hits of that strength.

I need to...fight back...! Hugo thought in desperation. Alas, this monster had just been born. With its kinslayer count at 0, not even La Porte de l'Enfer Deuxième could work against it.

He tried taking out and firing Rose's weapons, but they seemed to do nothing. They didn't even make it flinch, and it retaliated with another relentless assault.

Then, Glory grabbed and held up Rose by the head.

The sound of creaking metal filled the space as it began to bend.

“Damn...it...!”

“Mmrrgh...” Hugo and Cyco tried resisting, but swinging the ice blade in White Rose’s left hand didn’t seem to do anything. They hit Glory with it a number of times, but it broke before dealing any damage.

“I-I-I-It’s o-o-o-o-over...!”

And with that, Glory pushed its left hand—the barrels that fired its Missile Darts—against Rose’s cockpit.

A brief silence followed. And then, inexplicably, it retracted the tubes, straightened its hand into a spear-point, and raised it, ready to swing it down.

In only a moment, those metal fingers would most certainly pierce White Rose’s chest armor and kill Hugo.

But, in that moment where Hugo thought it was all over for him...

“G h e?”

...as though they had arrived just to stop this attack, several silhouettes fell over Glory.

The shadows belonged to a flock of mechanical birds. There was an owl. There was a murder of crows. There was a pigeon. There was a pelican as big as an airplane.

“That’s...!” Hugo cried. The birds were all Niala’s Embryo, Simurgh.

“D-D-Don’t get in my way!” As the giant pelican tried to swallow Glory up into its mouth, the golden unit swung the left hand, instantly splitting the bird in half.

“Hugo—now!”

“Yeah...!” Cyco took that moment to undo the frozen armor she’d placed over the unit’s head and Hugo took control of Rose, using that opening to free its head from Glory’s tight grasp.

But at the same time, Simurgh’s flock continued to dwindle. The combat-oriented Falcon and Condor were already gone. The birds that were left could do nothing but buy time.

But that was exactly Niala’s plan.

She was standing at the edge of the hole above, aiming the magic rifle in her hands. As the metal birds distracted the hostile unit, she fixed her sights on it and pulled the trigger.

What she fired was an explosive bullet—the sniper round with the highest damage potential.

It sped between her birds' many wings before striking its target and exploding on Imperial Glory's head and neck area—the "barrel" from which it fired Draconic Burn.

Though it was heat-resistant, this location didn't have the tough protection of its Ancient Legendary outer armor, and the explosion was enough to make it crack.

"G h e g h e g h e..." But even this critical hit wasn't fatal. Seemingly unfazed by this damage, Imperial Glory turned and jumped.

A moment later, it appeared right in front of Niala, over the hole she was standing next to.

Niala sighed. The sight of the mech made it obvious to her that getting the death penalty was inevitable.

That was when she began to wonder why she'd gone out of her way to help Hugo. She could've easily escaped if she tried.

However, she found her answer soon enough.

"You go support him, Niala."

She was doing the job given to her by her dear clan leader, of course. But there was another reason—when she watched Hugo and talked to him, he somehow reminded her of a student she taught.

Because of that, helping him came naturally to her.

He's not even the same gender, Niala thought with a wry grin on her face. But as absurd as it seemed, she didn't regret her actions whatsoever.

A moment later, Imperial Glory swung its arm down, instantly crushing her.

"Niala!" Hugo screamed.

As she vanished into bits of light, so too did the remaining Simurgh mechbirds. With the nuisance gone, Glory once again landed in the energy area.

"I-I-It's o-o-o-ver-ver...!" Repeating itself, the golden dragon-headed unit once again approached White Rose.

Hugo's defeat, briefly delayed by Niala, was swiftly approaching yet again. The gap between them was evident. There was no area in which Hugo outmatched it.

"Still...!" He knew he couldn't give up here. The chaos this creature would cause if left unchecked was unimaginable.

More importantly...

"Ray...he didn't run!" Hugo's newbie friend had not only stood his ground against a powerful UBM, but also turned aside the tragedy it threatened to unleash.

That's why...I won't run either...! Hugo—Yuri—had already decided not to hesitate on this point.

Thus, he thought about how he could seize victory against this monstrous machine.

"G h e, GHA-GHA-GHA-GHA...!" Even so, the massive dragon-headed unit approached him, bringing certain death with it.

From its maw, Hugo saw sparks flying—the result of the damage from the explosive bullet.

"Hm...?" Hugo was on the verge of realizing something, but Glory then struck Rose, the blow deforming the chest armor.

A rain of attacks followed, shattering White Rose's armor further in a frenzy of utter destruction.

Why...? Hugo wondered. Why is it only using its arms? Weathering the onslaught, Hugo realized that ever since the transformation, Glory had been fighting using only its fists. Part of it was because its MVP rewards had vanished, of course—but it wasn't using the items it had installed either. Even when it had tried to use Missile Darts, it had stopped for some reason.

"G h A a a A h H!" With a roar, Glory thrust its left hand into Rose's right shoulder.

"I-It's...!" The arms of the dragon-headed unit possessed overwhelming attack power that could pulverize even Mythical metal.

However, even they were now cracked either from Genocide Condor's bombings or the battle against Sardonyx in Heilige Trinität mode.

The damage was immense, and it had affected the Missile Darts mechanism. Glory had realized that before firing and chose not to use it.

This meant two things...

As it is, Imperial Glory can't use its installed weapons...and it didn't know that until it saw for itself!

Hugo didn't know many details about the creature now that it had become a UBM, but given what he'd just seen, he could now assume that it couldn’t gauge the extent of its damage through pain like living creatures did.

Even as a UBM, it’s still a machine, so it doesn’t feel pain, Hugo thought. What else is there...?

Hugo felt as if he was overlooking something important, but while he tried to remember what it was, Imperial Glory swung its shattered tail to attack Rose’s torso.

The unit’s chest armor suffered more damage, finally falling away. Even the internal armor holding up the outside monitors detached, and Hugo now saw Imperial Glory with his own two eyes.

“Ah...?!”

“H e h, H a h A h a h A h a H A h a h A h a H a!”

Glory laughed as it threw a sideways fist toward the cockpit. Hugo’s eyes widened before he quickly pulled up Rose’s left arm, where Cyco then focused her ice armor.

The sound of the impact reached Hugo’s ears at the exact same time as the sensation of floating washed over him.

After a flight that lasted less than a second, Rose crashed back-first into the wall of the energy zone.

“Guhh...!” Air rushed from Hugo’s lungs. He didn’t fall out of his seat thanks to the harness strapping him in, but the powerful attack still hurt him. It also damaged the internal systems, and the cockpit was now full of sparks.

Even so, Hugo made Rose stand up and face Glory. Even with hazy vision and fading consciousness, he looked straight at the enemy.

Just like Rose, Glory had a large hole in its chest area. Beyond it, Hugo could see its pilot—Curtis’s corpse. He was already dead, and even the will he’d entrusted to his unit had begun to bend and shatter.

The dragon-headed unit was no longer his dear combat companion, but a monstrous creature—Curtis had become his own casket. The remains within had been heavily damaged by all the combat that had happened thus far.

At the sight of the corpse, Hugo was lost in thought for a moment.

Curtis was someone that he had to defeat at all costs. That man was behind the terrorist attack on this ship that had resulted in many deaths already, and his DLG had almost certainly caused a great deal of destruction since it was formed.

Hugo didn’t regret fighting him and fatally wounding him at all. However, Curtis knew about The Triangle of Wisdom and used a unit that they’d made. To Hugo, he was nothing but an enemy—but to the Triangle’s members, he must’ve been something else.

Thinking about that and seeing Curtis dead in the exposed cockpit, knowing that he had dealt the final blow, filled Hugo with a sense of bitterness. And though he felt rage toward Curtis for murdering his own soldiers, Hugo definitely understood his complaints about the antics of The Triangle of Wisdom.

Perhaps this was the only way things could have played out between them, but Hugo couldn’t help but find it disheartening.

That may have been what made Hugo think back to their conversation from when Curtis was alive...

“Ah...!”

...and sudden realization, caused by the memory of that conversation and what Curtis had said, snapped Hugo back into the present like an electric shock.

“Wait...! Is it actually...?” Hugo strained his eyes to look at the console near Curtis’s body.

As someone with a pilot grouping job, Hugo possessed enhanced eyesight—and because of that, he could see the words “Installed Armaments. Currently Used: None.”

Barely a moment later, Hugo took a deep breath and let out a scream.

“PAINT NAPALM!”

He shouted the name of his enemy’s weapon, and his voice traveled through the hole in the armor and reached the console near Curtis.

“Ghe...?” The dragon-headed unit was confused by the strange words at first and stopped for a moment...but then, its shattered tail made an activation sound.

The console within it now read “Installed Armaments. Preparing to Use: Paint Napalm.”

Indeed, it had actually reacted to Hugo’s words and began powering up the weapon. Obeying the voice activation, the tail of the dragon-headed unit tried to release its liquid explosives.

That had come up in the conversation Hugo had remembered—the words Curtis had said while still alive.

"It doesn't even care who says it, so it cannot even act as protection in case of theft."

The weapons were activated by voice—and it didn't matter whose. This was the intentional "bug" left in the mech by the hobbyist engineers of The Triangle of Wisdom.

Hugo wasn't sure it would work, as it was likely that becoming a UBM might have resulted in the loss of this function.

And yet, the "feature" was still active. Perhaps that was only to be expected, though, as it had been there since before Imperial Glory attained a will of its own—since its very creation.

UBMs that were "set" as UBMs typically did not change their essential natures.

And thus, Hugo's voice could reach Glory's cockpit and control its weapons.

"Wh-W h a t...?! S...Sto-o-op!"

But it could not be stopped. The Triangle of Wisdom engineers who'd installed the armaments hadn't even thought about how they'd be stopped.

Perhaps Curtis himself might have been able to counter this somehow, but Glory wasn't Curtis—only his shattered fragments. He was already dead—just a corpse inside his golden UBM coffin.

The knowledge needed to deal with this situation had already been destroyed, and the empty box that flailed its fists like a feral animal wasn't able to replicate it.

Thus, Paint Napalm activated.

The tail balancer had been broken in the battle against Sardonyx, and the liquid fuel couldn't even reach its tip because of that. Instead, it began spraying out through the cracks in the shattered balancer, flying in every direction.

The napalm quickly covered Glory itself and was set ablaze by the fires left by Condor's bombing.

"Gh, a h...A a aA a aAa A aaA AA A AAA!" The fuel seeped in through the broken cockpit and ignited the remains within. The golden unit itself was starting to melt away.

"Paint Napalm!" Hugo spoke the weapon name, activating it once again. Even more liquid fuel began spraying out as the fires followed it back to the tank and began burning the internal systems.

"G h oOo oa OOo OoA aAa A aA a Hhh HH h...!" Imperial Glory let out a sound that resembled both a dying scream and the howl of an engine. But despite looking like the victim of some hellish torment, the golden unit still charged toward Rose.

The flames didn't stop it. It still sought to fulfill its swiftly crumbling goal, and would do whatever it took to destroy its enemy—this obstacle between Glory and its objective.

Imperial Glory raised its fist, ready to deliver the most powerful blow yet. However, the white unit braced for a strike...and withstood it.

It was as though White Rose itself was declaring it would not fall beneath Imperial Glory's fist.

"Draconic Burn!" Hugo spoke and activated another weapon. A moment later, the golden unit transformed the energy in its core into heat.

However, the repeated battles and the roaring flames had left its internal systems heavily damaged, and perhaps most importantly, Niala's explosive bullet had left a crack in the head cannon's "barrel."

The heat began to worsen the damage, spreading in every direction.

"G o o O oOoA AaA aaa A Aa aaA AA!" However, the Epic-tier Corpse Dragon Mech was able to prevent an explosion.

Despite being on the verge of death, it somehow retained control over its own body. The amount of heat should have been enough to obliterate the unit, yet it was somehow able to keep it at a manageable level and even subdue it.

Hugo gasped. Imperial Glory's weapons were not equipped with a means to stop them once activated, but Draconic Burn was the sole exception. As it had done when it had clashed with Sardonyx's Blast Flare, this weapon could be stopped at any specific time.

Intense heat spread wildly throughout Glory's frame, but it managed to restrain its spread.

The Corpse Dragon Mech was now like a dam ready to burst.

Hugo silently watched it for a moment. This was the watershed moment.

If he didn't finish it off right now, the golden unit would overcome this flaw, most likely by destroying the voice-activation system.

Or perhaps the flames and the energy leaks had destroyed it already.

Either way, this was his final chance.

"Cyco! White Rose! Let's go!"

"Oui, ma'am!" Cyco replied with an unusual level of energy, while Rose responded with a roar from its engine.

And so, despite their exposed cockpit, they rushed toward the golden unit, now surrounded by overflowing heat.

Frozen armor covered the cockpit just as it had during the final battle in Gideon, but the immense heat quickly melted it all away.

And when the heat began to rush into the cockpit, Hugo's skin began to burn.

"Hugo...!"

"Not yet!"

Hugo had a friend who pushed on forward despite the flames raging all around him. That was why Hugo also couldn't—wouldn't—stop. He chose to keep moving ahead.

And this time, he wouldn't hesitate or doubt anything.

As Hugo moved, the damage on his unit exceeded the tolerable limit. The legs, heavily damaged by the Corpse Dragon Mech, finally lost their function.

"BOUCLIERS PLANETEEEES!" Before his unit fell to its knees, Hugo activated his skill.

The next moment, a floating shield that had fallen off returned to Rose. The pale mech then grabbed it with its left hand—the last limb that was still functioning.

"This...is the end!" Before its legs shattered completely, Rose poured the last of its power into them...and jumped. "Fly...White Rose!"

The force of the unit's final jump combined with the propulsion of the floating shield to grant it the power of flight, like a petal on the wind. It flew straight, carrying all its weight and power straight toward the golden corpse.

"Ghe, gha, gha..."

The attack was weak—it couldn't even compare to the golden unit's ordinary punches. However, this attack that they had gambled everything on was enough to finally unleash the heat it had stored up.

"GhaAaAaaaAaaAAaAaaAAA!" With this final push, the Corpse Dragon Mech's maw and every other part of its body released immense amounts of energy. Impossible to hold back, it consumed the entire unit...

And, as though it were in the center of a fiery rose blossom, the UBM that also served as a coffin was dragged into a burning embrace.

This was the end. The heavily damaged unit didn’t have the strength to withstand its own firepower, and the remains it carried were claimed by the inferno.

And with this act of cremation, the incident on Eltram reached its conclusion.

Interlude: The Third and the Crystal

Eltram

The long night was finally over, and the light of dawn fell upon the desert.

The ship was already devoid of people. Shortly after the incident, while it was still dark, rescue had arrived in the form of sand-ships and Pure-Dragon aviation services that took the passengers to the nearest city. They were on their way there now.

With its escort vessels gone and its own cannons rendered unusable after their energy source was deactivated, Eltram was now nothing but a tomb on the sands. If it happened to be targeted by something like a swarm of worms, there would be no hope for anyone left behind.

Thus, while the cargo was salvaged, the ship's hull itself was abandoned where its progress had halted.

That was when a certain Master logged in on board it.

"Well, this place sure got a lot less lively." The speaker was a man wearing makeup and a shirt that exposed his chest—the same Master who'd given gala tickets to Niala and Fey, and who had had an exchange with Crys. "Either they were all destroyed, or I've been left behind by the rescue operations."

As he walked through the inside of the ship, he saw a large informational poster on the wall. It was directed at Masters who were logged out while the rescue was taking place, and it said that the people of this ship had been evacuated. If anyone wanted ticket refunds, they had to visit the offices in any city.

"Ha ha ha! And how do they expect me to...ohh, wait! It's obvious!"

Masters were able to log out and log back in at a city's save point. That didn't apply to those on wanted lists, of course, but they didn't deserve consideration. And that was basically it.

"What a predicament for little old me. I can't go back to any city...oh, woe is me. This means I'll have to walk through the desert." Thanks to AGI, crossing deserts in Dendro was faster than it was on Earth, but it would still take a while. “I’ll lose quite a bit of time. It doesn’t look like I’ll make it to those peace talks mentioned in the letter. But I guess it was never certain I would be there anyway!”

He reached into his Inventory and took out a piece of paper.

It was a letter addressed to him from Reinhard—the imperator of Dryfe. It offered him a place in Dryfe’s military and, if possible, asked him to arrive in time for the peace talks that were set to happen soon.

“I would like him to remove me from the wanted list, but I suppose a down payment is a bit too much to ask!” This man had been involved in a rebellion against Dryfe, and that had landed him on every wanted list.

That was why he couldn’t use any save points at all.

However, Reinhard knew how useful he was in battle, and that was exactly the reason he’d extended the invitation.

The man felt that it was a very bold move by the imperator, but nevertheless was thankful for it.

“Very well—I will simply walk there. Traveling on foot is nice every now and then.”

He turned away from the poster and began walking into the desert when...

“Oh no, you’re not traveling anywhere.”

...his legs were blown off.

“Oh?” Having lost everything below the knee, the man collapsed on the floor.

Then, another man came into view, looking down at him—an obese man holding high value coins in both hands.

It was none other than King of Revelry, Moneygold.

After Zhang had buried him under the ship’s debris, Isara had rushed to free him. Then, for his own reasons, Moneygold had decided to stay on the ship.

“Well, well, well. Were you also left behind just like me, Moneygold?” Despite losing his legs, the man showed no worry or distress as he spoke.

“As if. I was just waiting for you,” Moneygold replied.

“Waiting for little old me?”

“Eldridge said that there were three Superiors—me, the Murder Princess, and one other. And since Rascal only showed up later when the whole thing was already underway, it couldn't be him."

"Yes, yes. And?"

"I didn't have time to ask Eldridge who the Superior was, but I had a feeling it was you."

"Ohh! And why's that?" The man was excited to know Moneygold's reasoning...

"Because the people who attacked the ship were the DLG—Curtis Eldona."

"Hm...hm?" Those words made the man tilt his head in confusion...

"Isn't that right, Splendida the Evergreen?" And hearing his own name, the man—Splendida—adopted a stumped expression.

"You joined them at one point and participated in their failed plan to assassinate the imperator. That's why I guessed that if the DLG were going to act now, you—someone connected to them—would act too."

"Your calculations are a total mess in the middle, but you arrived at the right answer... I'm not sure how to react!" He was indeed Splendida the Evergreen, and he'd once joined forces with the Eldona family, taken part in the assassination plot, and bought time against King of Beasts. That was all true.

However, the reason he was on this ship had nothing to do with the clients from back then. He was here to simply see the sights and run some errands for a different client—Crys Fragment.

Since it was Crys who'd led the DLG here by acting as their cooperator, though, that meant he was a little involved. This situation was very messy from his perspective.

"But I basically had nothing to do with this! Your time is wasted on little old me! You're a busy man, aren't you?"

"Even so, there's value in making you tell me what you do know." Moneygold's Truth Discernment hadn't activated, so he knew Splendida wasn't lying, but that was a separate matter. He had no reason to let someone go who clearly had information about what had happened here.

"You're so violent..." Splendida muttered.

"I have a question."

Splendida let out a sigh. "Well, let's sit down and talk, then. I don't have legs, you see." He pulled himself into a sitting position on the floor and waited for the question.

“So...what did you put on this ship?” Moneygold asked, taking out a single fragment—the Orb piece Isara had found.

“We’ve already interrogated the DLG survivors, so we know that Crys Fragment was the one who led them through a secret part of the ship. But why did Crys cooperate with them? And why did you put a UBM in the cargo area?”

Just as Isara had confirmed, the content of the Orb from the cargo block—the UBM—had killed the soldiers who were there before escaping outside. It didn’t even involve itself in the other battles, so it was unclear why it was even on the scene in the first place.

“Based on the state of the remains in the cargo block, this must’ve been the Orb of frost—which was said to be in Vennsayle. That means this Orb was already on the ship back when we learned about it. And...Vennsayle vanished just a while ago. We were informed that it was blown sky-high right before the talks with Granvaloa. How much of this was your or your group’s doing?”

Moneygold was certain there had to have been something more to this incident than the clash with DLG or IF.

“Heh heh heh...whatever do you mean?”

While Moneygold was convinced Splendida was involved, he acted like he had no idea what Moneygold was talking about...

Going through Splendida’s head right now was I have no idea what Moneygold’s on about.

He really did have no idea at all.

Splendida knew that Crys had brought something to the cargo area, but he didn’t know that the thing inside was a UBM, and this was the first time he heard about Vennsayle’s disappearance at all. He felt like she could’ve just told him about this, but a part of him understood not trusting him with such information.

Splendida’s assistance had been limited. For the most part, he was just a spectator. Still, he had managed to notice a few things.

“If there’s something you can learn from little old me...it’s that I don’t think even my current client has all the information you want,” Splendida said. He found it especially doubtful that she’d been involved in Vennsayle’s disappearance. She’d certainly taken the Orb from there several days ago, but she had no reason to destroy the city afterward. That must’ve been someone else's work. "This 'game' has many 'players' making their moves, after all. There's my current client, my next client, your boss, and the devs," he said, referencing Crys, the imperator, the president, and the control AI, respectively. "With so many intertwining motives on the board, it's impossible to predict what will happen—and that's what makes it interesting."

Splendida had the same tone as someone looking down on events as they transpired from somewhere far above.

"Anyway, I still have many things to see, so if you don't mind, I'll be leaving now," Splendida continued...as he stood up on his own two feet.

His legs, blown away by Moneygold's Treasure Cannon, had already returned. His shoes and any clothing below the knee were all gone, but everything else was exactly as it had been before.

"Oh dear. This means I'll have to walk in the desert barefoot."

As Splendida laughed about his situation, Moneygold fired his Treasure Cannon once again. Not just once, however—he fired over and over, like a far more destructive Gatling gun.

Splendida's head, arms, torso, and his entire body was reduced to nothing.

In his battles against Rascal and the DLG, Moneygold had been forced to limit his powers, but now he attacked without caring if the ship was utterly demolished in the process.

With this firepower turned upon him, there was no doubt that every bit of Splendida had been destroyed completely. However, Moneygold's expression remained serious as he looked around, coins at the ready as though there was still a threat present.

After a few seconds of silence...

"'I'll destroy him until there's nothing left!' Everyone who's confident in their firepower tries that kind of thing at least once!"

...Splendida's voice spread across the area.

"If that was enough to kill me, though," Splendida's voice continued, "she would've done that too!" he said, referencing his encounter with King of Beasts.

Eventually, a head grew in the place where he'd once stood. Then, the head sprouted a torso and then a set of limbs, spreading out like a tree growing branches or roots.

Eventually, Splendida stood before Moneygold once more, completely unharmed but lacking any of his equipment.

"This is why I can only ever wear cheap clothing. If only my gear were restored as easily as me," Splendida casually remarked, his face now devoid of makeup. That had been vaporized along with the rest of his head, and his face was now revealed exactly as it appeared on his wanted poster.

"Tch..." Moneygold clicked his tongue and fired Treasure Cannon again.

The last remains of the ship were obliterated, and Splendida's body vanished once more...only to be recreated yet again.

He seemed completely removed from the very concept of death.

"An Embryo that makes you immortal, huh?" Moneygold said.

"I suppose you could say that. Though it works differently than little Emily's...it's more like a combo."

"How are you coming back from having your HP reduced to 0, stacking up enough injury debuffs to kill you instantly...and even getting completely obliterated?"

"Try and guess. Treat it like a quiz."

"Tch..."

Splendida was alive even after having his body reduced to nothing. Unlike Emily, he had never transformed into bits of light. That meant he had never even died. While the Murder Princess was immortal because of her inexhaustible extra lives, Splendida was incapable of dying by some other mechanism.

This time, Moneygold fired a low-power Treasure Cannon. Instead of killing Splendida instantly, he tried targeting the heart, the lungs, the brain—parts of the body that, if damaged, would impede the activity of the rest.

However, even those wounds quickly closed.

"Don't you get it? That won't work. Right now, little old me is impossible to kill."

Despite being exposed to this devastating onslaught, Splendida maintained a smile...

"My Tír na nÓg will not fall."

...and claimed, with certainty, that he was as safe as can be.

"Your defense, though, has a time limit, though," he added. "You can't win against little old me right now...but will you still try?"

"I will. I can't just ignore you."

"I see... By the way, where is tu's lady bodyguard?"

"I gave her a job and sent her back. I couldn't keep her here without knowing what kind of thing you were." And as it turned out, Splendida was far beyond what Moneygold had expected.

"You made the right choice, then! Continuing this battle might be a mistake, though!"

Splendida then spread his arms and released a cloud of poison from his palms as branch-like wings sprouted from his back and a wooden mask covered his face. "I suppose I've got to go on the offensive, as well."

"So you're just like Carl in that regard, huh? I guess that's just how survival-focused builds end up looking." Moneygold pulverized one of his Inventories, scattering the coins on the floor.

All right, let's do this, he thought. If I can at least figure out the cards he's holding, this won't be a total waste of time.

A battle would help Moneygold discover Splendida's strengths and weaknesses—perhaps giving him a hint toward eventually defeating him.

With that in mind, Moneygold faced Splendida, who stared back at him. Ready for battle though he was, Moneygold had already considered the possibility of defeat.

Two hours later, only one silhouette rose from the shattered ship. It turned and began walking toward the distant imperium.

Caldina

In the desert, a good distance away from the ship that had played host to a DLG terrorist attack and a UBM release, there stood a single mobile weapon.

It looked like a crustacean, somewhat reminiscent of the Acra that had appeared in Quartierlatin, and riding it was the one behind this incident—Crys Fragment.

Wearing a mechanical mask, she was examining the surrounding monitors and checking the data they presented. This information had been gathered by the many observation devices she'd installed on Eltram, and everything was related to her objective in causing this incident in the first place.

Crys was silent, but despite that and the mask on her face, it was plainly obvious what her feelings were.

“That isn’t a good look on your face. I can’t blame you, though!”

The one who said that was someone who was riding this mobile weapon with Crys.

She was a woman too, but unlike Crys, she wasn’t wearing the mechanical mask. Instead, she was wearing a forehead covering reminiscent of nineteenth-century central Asian native garb and gloves on both of her hands.

She was the journalist who’d interviewed Hugo, introducing herself as Stal Tune.

“Affirmative. I expected much better results from the Orb you retrieved from Vennsayle.”

Those words had huge implications—they meant that while Crys Fragment had lured the DLG to Eltram, it was Stal Tune who’d placed the Treasurebeast Orb on the ship.

This entire incident was born from their cooperation—they had deemed the results inadequate, though.“The ship’s core, the Over Pilot’s core, and the cores brought in as extras—the ones made by our foolish sister who betrayed us and sided with a lesser Incarnation,” Crys said, thinking of Agate. “I’d anticipated that the energy they provided would have been optimal in resurrecting the calamity...in allowing it to regain the power it had lost during its confinement. And yet...”

“There are two things we didn’t expect! First was Huanglong Renwai’s thoroughness!” Stal spoke the name of the Draconic Emperor before the last one—the one who had sealed away countless UBMs and left them in the world as Orbs.

Her gaze then focused on one of the monitors that showed a recording of the cargo and the surrounding areas. Specifically, it showed the moment the DLG soldiers had all their life and heat sapped away by a UBM.

“I didn’t think he sealed the Irregularity after splitting it in half!” Stal said.

The UBM looked like just a silhouette of a person split straight down the middle. This bizarre creature that only had its left half also only possessed half a name. It was called ■■■■-Pale Death-■■■■, ■■■■■■■-Almera.

It was as though its body, its name, its very being was only half of what it should be.

“Looks like not even six hundred years were enough for us to get a full measure of him!” Stal’s voice sounded cheerful, but it was warped by a slight hint of displeasure. It was as though she was saying, “He’s always caused trouble for us.”

“The second thing we did not expect was that half of the calamity prioritized escape over energy acquisition,” said Crys. “Is it heading toward Huang He, the place it hates more than any other? Or does it seek its other half? Predicting its movements from now on will be difficult.”

“That’s true. Unlike some entities I could name, we can’t see the future. Well, things like this just happen! This victory is all hers, I guess. Not like she is necessarily our enemy, after all.”

“If we take the most optimal path, she will be our enemy. Or our greatest ally, if we focus on our second best option.”

“Her worst enemies are the High-Ends like the imperator and King of Kings. For us, it’s the Incarnations. How we interact with the other players on the board depends entirely on our current stage of progression.”

The conversation they held was incomprehensible to almost everyone in the world. A moment later, Stal clapped her hands as if to signal that it was time to change the subject.

“We should talk about what we’ll do next!” Stal said.

“Indeed. On top of our usual activities in Caldina, we will be tracking that half of the calamity. I propose we separate for now. Do you agree?”

“I can handle Caldina by myself. After what happened today, operating here won’t be easy for you, will it? That’s why you should go support Integra. She’s an Altarian public figure now, so it must be hard for her to do covert operations there.”

“Reasonable.”

“Reconfigure your personality, though. Make it closer to mine. She doesn’t know that we are us.”

Crys nodded in response to Stal’s words, took off the mechanical mask, and put on a bright smile.

“Okay! Is this good?” Crys said. It was as though the mechanical woman from a moment ago had never existed at all—Crys’s words and expression were full of humanity.

However, her face was also now exactly the same as Stal’s.

“Perfect! Anyway, good luck in Altar, Crystal Tuner!”

“Thanks! You have your work cut out for you too, but do your best, Crystal Tuner!” With the same face and the same personality, the two smiled and gave each other a high five.

“All by the will of The First,” they said in perfect unison. Within their foreheads were crystalline structures—the energy cores that powered them as Prism People.

Thus, the Crystal Tuners—the perfected, mass-produced Prism People—made their next move as the representatives of the first Flagman—one of the most ancient players on the board of this world.

Epilogue: One Incident, Three Futures

Tetragrammaton

Tetragrammaton—the giant battleship IF used as their headquarters—cut through the desert sands.

After being Frozen during the battle in the energy zone, Rascal had barely escaped with his life. He was currently in his room on the ship. The Freeze had worn off about an hour after their retreat.

"Man, nothin' about that went right. We couldn't destroy or take the core. We got some good combat data, but we couldn't get that guy to join us, which is what actually mattered. Emily lost one Youaltepuztli, so now she's basically useless until it comes back. All the armor on Sardonyx needs replacement. And I got this..."

Rascal was sitting in the chair, leaning his head on his left hand. However, the right sleeve of the fresh suit he was wearing was just dangling empty.

Though the Freeze had worn off, his right arm, cut off by the Purgatorial Slash, hadn't come back. He'd taken meds that made the wound close up, but it was lost from the elbow down.

"Looks like I'll have to wait until Sechs escapes the gaol to treat this," Rascal said. Complete loss of a body part could only be treated by the healing magic of Superior Jobs or respawning after taking the death penalty. But as a wanted man, Rascal wanted to avoid the death penalty at all costs, and the only Superior Job holder he could ask for a heal was Sechs, who was still in the gaol.

"Oh, right. He has The Saint, doesn't he? I never actually met this 'Trans Sexual Slime,'" said a voice right beside Rascal.

"Don't talk about our leader like he's a new monster type." Rascal frowned; the way she'd phrased it, it kind of did sound like something that might exist in Dendro. "According to La Crima's reports, our plans for Tenchi are progressin' smoothly. Sechs should also get out before the season's over. It ain't comfortable, but I'll deal with it until then."

“Your leader also has my sister, doesn’t he? Diamond? Then I look forward to the day he and Gerbera escape.”

Prism Person No. 2, Diamond Slayer, was Sechs’s property and was currently in the gaol with him. As No. 1, Agate Designer was looking forward to meeting her sister for the first time in two thousand years.

“Oh. But can’t La Crima heal you too? She can even give you more arms than you had before, right?”

“Just so you know, I do care about how I look,” Rascal said as he thought of King of Flame, Lazburn, who’d been turned into the four-armed Ignis Idea, or King of Raids Morter, who’d become a humanoid bat with membranous wings.

If Rascal let La Crima treat him, ending up with one nonhuman arm would be the best possible result. Getting extra arms would be a bad one. And regardless of how it came out, they would do it out of the kindness of their heart.

“Body modding...big muscles...you could withstand my piloting...and have a body so tough we could go all night long!” Ignoring Rascal, who looked obviously unenthusiastic, Machina continued her delusional rambling.

“Well then. If ya got time to say stupid shit like that, maybe you got time to go out and scrub Tetragrammaton’s armor?”

“Whaaa?! C-Come ooon, I-I was just joking. Please don’t make me clean a three-hundred-metel-long battleship... With all the sand getting on it, I’ll never be done with it...”

“Fine, fine...anyway, ya done with the thing I wanted ya to do?”

“Oh—yes. Just a little finishing touch and...there! Done!”

Machina faced the work table again before turning around and showing Rascal what was on it. Lying there was a mechanical arm—the kind that would replace a lost arm of flesh—at the exact length to match Rascal’s missing limb.

“Anyway, here’s your prosthetic!” Machina said. “It’s very easy to use! You can move the fingers without even connecting it to your nerves. You just put it on!”

“That so? Good to know I won’t have to open up the wound, at least.”

Urged by Machina, Rascal took off his suit and put the prosthetic up to the stump of his right arm. A moment later, he had control of it. Moving it felt as natural as using his own hand.

"The skill and speed of your craftsmanship is as impressive as always." Only about an hour had passed since he'd ordered her to make this. The quality and speed of her work was almost shocking.

"Feel free to praise me more!"

"Wow. Nice. Good job."

"YAAAYYYY! A GLOWING REVIEW!"

"That's good enough for you...?" Rascal asked. Machina had reacted so strongly to his lukewarm praise that it actually made Rascal feel a bit guilty.

"Oh! I have a good idea!" Machina said. "If we mechanize your entire body, you could handle my piloting and—"

"Don't." As Machina's train of thought took a dangerous turn, Rascal stopped her with the most serious expression he could muster. "Let's forget about that," said Rascal. "By the way, do you want anythin'?"

"Huh?"

"I wanna thank you for this arm...and for helpin' me escape after I was incapacitated. You're my property and all, but that doesn't mean I can't reward you."

"Is that love?! You're finally showing me love! WOO-HOOO!"

"...So you want the reward or not?"

"I do! Just let me think!" Machina put her finger to her forehead and began to think intensely.

"Se...no, slee...no, lay with...no..."

"Are your circuits fried or something?" Everything out of her mouth was lewd, which actually made Rascal a little concerned.

Machina continued to think until...

"I got it!"

"That so? What do you want?"

"Please go on a date with me!" Machina clasped her hands in front of her chest, the stereotypical image of a girl summoning up all her courage.

"A night date?"

"You're such a perv! Ugh! Is that all you ever talk about?!"

Silence. It took a lot for Rascal to stop himself from saying, "I'll throw you overboard, ya piece of scrap"...and then actually doing it.

"I meant a normal date!" Machina insisted. "One where we dress nice, eat something tasty, and see pretty sights...a normal date!"

"That's good enough for ya?"

"Yes! I've never been on one!"

"That so?"

"Does that make you think that I'm some unlovable hag who couldn't get a date for two thousand years?"

"It doesn't. Fine, I can do that. That'll be your reward."

Wouldn't you be more like an antique than a hag, anyway? a part of him thought, but he didn't say it out loud, instead simply agreeing to fulfill her wish.

"Huh? Seriously? I didn't actually expect you to...YAAAAAYYY! SUCCESS!" Machina began jumping up and down with her arms in the air, expressing her joy with her entire being.

"A date, though, huh...? Well, I guess it's doable if we just get more disguise accessories."

With Machina's item creation ability, they could easily make things that would be rare finds otherwise. And since the ones she'd made previously were now proven to work, there was no need to worry about any new ones.

"Oh, I almost forgot." Machina stopped jumping, faced Rascal again, and pointed at the prosthetic. "That arm has an extra feature."

"A feature?"

"Bend the index finger twice and the pinky thrice."

"Hm?" Rascal did as told and bent the fingers.

A moment later, the hand detached itself from the wrist and sped forward like a rocket, slamming into the wall facing the hallway and leaving a dent.

Silence. Rascal looked at the now-handless prosthetic, then at the damage on the wall before thinking, What the hell?

"The hand can fly. I call it the 'rocket hand'!"

"And the point of it is...?"

"It's a hidden weapon!"

"You know there aren't that many people who can be hurt by a weapon that just dents a wall, right? It's barely a distraction." Rascal was actually quite surprised, but he did his best to remain calm as he said that.

"Oh. No no no, you got it wrong. Now try twisting the arm right two times and left four times."

Silence. I really don't wanna, Rascal thought, yet did it regardless.

A moment later, a ray of light burst from the wrist, melting a hole in the wall.

"The wrist fires a beam!"

"That so? And? What are ya tryin' to turn me into? Ya wouldn't even see prosthetics this crazy in a kid's comic."

Using his remaining arm, Rascal pinched Machina's cheek and looked at her with a steady gaze.

"B-But I made it so we match..."

"Your prosthetic does this too?" Rascal was aware that Machina had made herself a left arm to replace the one she'd lost while deactivated, but he had no idea that it could deliver rocket punches and fire laser beams.

Rascal looked at her, not saying a thing.

"U-Umm, does this mean you'll punish me by...?" ...Canceling our date? she finished her sentence in thought, shivering and looking up right back at Rascal.

"Nah. It's still happenin'. Fix this arm, though. The activation motion is too simple. I might trigger it by accident."

"Ah. Okay."

"Fix the wall too. And clean up around it."

"R-Right!" With a salute, Machina instantly moved to clean and fix everything she'd been instructed to. He's so nice today, she thought. Maybe it really is love? He even promised me a date.

Shortly after Machina began cleaning up, the bell at his door rang.

Rascal gave permission to enter, and Zhang stepped into the room. He'd come here to report about the girl he'd secured from Eltram—Doris.

While taking Emily and retreating, Zhang had also picked up Doris. Emily had entrusted him with her, and at that point, he'd believed that it was dangerous to leave her on the ship with the situation being what it was.

He hadn't made the wrong choice by any means. A battlefield that involved a wide-scale extermination Superior, the remnants of the DLG, and the collapsing ship—there were multiple things that could endanger the girl's life. Thus, he'd chosen to take Doris's unconscious body away, thinking that he could just hand her in to some office or facility later.

"And? What's she up to now?" Rascal asked.

"She woke up not long ago. She panicked at first, but some calming incense helped. Emily talking to her may have also played an important part in that, though.”

“Emily, huh...?”

“It turns out that the soldiers killed Doris’s father back there.”

“I see...” The two fell silent.

There was no way to sugarcoat it—IF had played a part in her father’s death. They were the ones who’d spread the Orbs, and once he had his hands on one, they were the ones who had led him to the ship that became his grave.

Without them, Doris’s father would’ve avoided getting involved in this whole incident. He might even still be alive.

“Don’t let it bother ya,” said Rascal. “The mission to protect him ended the moment he was on the ship. Ya didn’t mess up.”

“...But I still feel responsible,” said Zhang. “Making a girl that young into an orphan... I myself was like her once. And so was the lady I used to serve.”

Zhang spoke of the head of Mirage—the organization he had once been a part of. Zhang couldn’t help but be reminded of the group’s young boss, who must’ve been either imprisoned or executed by now.

“You know...for someone who was part of the criminal underworld, you’re way too much of a good guy.”

“If you don’t mind me saying so, those words apply to you as well, do they not?” Zhang had gotten the feeling that Doris’s misfortune had affected Rascal as well.

“I wouldn’t say so,” Rascal replied. “I’m a miscreant who’ll put his goals over the lives of tens of thousands of faceless, nameless tians.”

After saying that, he looked through the window. Beyond it, there lay a vast desert—the land of Caldina. It was the land throughout which IF had spread the Orbs—the cause of many casualties. “I put the wishes of those dear to me over the lives of those same faceless, nameless people.”

“Rascal...”

His words might have seemed cold, but they weren’t. They meant that Rascal did feel a sense of responsibility toward those whose names and faces he knew. But his expression said that there were still things that had to be done, and he wouldn’t hesitate to do them.

“So...what will we do with Doris? Put her in an orphanage...?”

“Let’s not. She’s seen too much. And it’s possible that Caldina has an Embryo that can peek into tian memories."

What would they do with her, then? The many years Zhang had spent in the underbelly of society made him imagine having to "silence" the little girl. He tensed up. "How's Emily with her?"

"To put it briefly: she's attached to her. While Doris is still somewhat perplexed, Emily is already treating her like a good friend."

After hearing that, Rascal took a moment to think...

"Look after her, then. A friend that age may be exactly what Emily needs to develop properly."

"Very well..." Zhang said, somewhat confused.

Rascal was mindful of Emily's development, yet he sent her to dangerous situations where she could kill people or be killed herself. Zhang felt that this was extremely contradictory, but also that there was more to it—almost as if these two things were linked somehow.

"And when we're ready to leave this land...we'll hand her over to someone trustworthy," Rascal said.

"Very well." Having decided how to handle the girl, Zhang turned around and left Rascal's room.

This makes me wonder, Zhang thought as he left. What is Rascal's relationship with Emily, exactly?

It was clear that she was more than just a clan member to him. He obviously treated her differently than others. Rascal had first described the girl as if she was some kind of volatile material and regularly sent her to dangerous places. But by now, Zhang had watched them enough to know that Rascal was genuinely concerned about Emily.

Perhaps...the "wish" Rascal mentioned has something to do with her? Zhang wondered.

After Zhang left, Machina stopped the cleaning she'd been doing the entire time he was in the room. "By the way, I've been wondering about this for a while..." she said.

"Hm?"

"What is Emily to you? On the other side, I mean." It was a similar question to the one Zhang was pondering, except it was focused not on their relationship here, but on their reality as Masters.

"What do you think?"

"Umm...uhh...ah! Wait! Is she your wife?!"

“Do you think I’m a goddamn sex offender...?” Rascal said with a thoroughly dumbfounded face.

“What is she to you, then?! I’m very curious!”

Machina’s question made Rascal think for a moment. He thought about whether or not to answer, and decided that he would.

“She’s a little sister...not mine, though.”

“Hm?”

“She’s my close friend’s little sister.”

“You had friends on the other side too?”

“Are you tryin’ to make me mad?” Rascal said, but it didn’t seem like he was any bit upset by the comment—even though he would be perfectly justified if he was. Instead, there was a wry grin on his face, and it seemed as though he was slightly taken by nostalgia. Perhaps the word “friend” was one that had a strong effect on him. “I was actually pretty social back when I was a student. Had no shortage of friends and acquaintances.”

“Well, I might’ve guessed.”

Rascal was by no means a bad communicator. If he had been, he wouldn’t be able to serve as the functional leader of a criminal clan or negotiate with various organizations.

“Still...there was only one person I could’ve called a close friend.” It was clear by now that this one close friend was Emily’s older brother.

“And this friend is...?”

“Already dead.” Rascal answered almost instantly—maybe he knew Machina would ask, or maybe it was the sort of memory that would’ve left him speechless if he let himself dwell on it too long. “He was murdered a few years ago.”

“So, you...”

Rascal said nothing more. As silence fell over the room, they could hear the faint voices of Emily and Doris drifting through the hole in the wall.

Yuri Gautier

“Sonya...where does all the money go?”

“Didn’t I say the exact same thing recently?” It was Monday morning, and I was whining to Sonya while we ate breakfast.

“Wait, didn’t you say you were well off in Dendro?”

“That was in the past...” Ray had given me a share of the money he’d gotten for defeating the Gouz-Maise Gang, but that had finally dried up. This was because I’d given Niala ten million lir so she could use her Genocide Condor.

I still had some money on me. I personally could get by without the reward money just fine—but the sum wasn’t nearly enough to pay for Magingear repairs.

My White Rose was a luxury, one-of-a-kind Magingear, and now it was damaged so badly that I couldn’t even begin to describe the extent of it. Not a single part of it had escaped unscathed, so every ready-made part had to be replaced.

That alone was bad enough, but the real problem was White Rose’s original parts. When building it, Fran had given it a modest self-repair function, but this was so bad that it couldn’t fix itself completely.

That was why I couldn’t even imagine how much fixing it was going to cost.

“Don’t you have any way to make money?” Sonya asked.

“I’m gonna get paid soon...but I have no idea how much it’ll be...” Moneygold had said that I would be rewarded for my job as bodyguard, but I hadn’t asked the exact amount. He said that it would “satisfy” me, but I didn’t know if it would be enough to cover White Rose’s repair costs.

I sighed deeply. With my unit’s destruction and everything else, the whole incident had been a huge ordeal. However, I had at least gained something from it. By defeating the UBM, I’d gotten an MVP reward—an energy core called Mechdragon Heart, Imperial Glory.

I checked what it did and realized that it had two skills.

First was Perpetual Engine—Life and Death. The name was a bit unsettling, and I couldn’t read parts of the description because I apparently needed a special skill for that, but what I could read told me that it acted as an energy core that produced MP on its own.

Yes—it was just like the thing Imperial Glory had been equipped with before it became a UBM. I didn’t know the volume of the MP it produced, but equipping it could help solve White Rose’s energy issues.

The other skill was Mechsoul, and I couldn’t read it at all, so I’d put it aside for now.

I was really happy to get a core of my own. But there was another reason I was happy—one that had nothing to do with the MVP reward's abilities.

It was the fact that the name survived. Imperial Glory—the result of the creativity and imagination of everyone from The Triangle of Wisdom. The name lived on, even as it became an MVP reward. I was a little happy that their hard work didn't completely disappear.

And I felt that the MVP reward itself was proof that I didn't give up...just like Ray back then.

"Hrm...you look pretty happy for someone who's out of money," said Sonya.

"Maybe I do... Oh! Breakfast time is almost over. We got sociology with Miss Nina first. Let's hurry there."

I tried to quickly clean up our tableware, but Sonya told me to slow down and said, "We got a message saying that we've got self-study in the library before that."

"Why?"

"Because Miss Nina's out today."

"Huh?! Is she sick or something...?" I couldn't imagine any other reason a teacher that strict wouldn't come to work.

"I dunno. Heh...maybe she's out on a date with some guy?"

"Hmm...I really doubt that." Miss Nina, the serious and diligent ice queen, skipping work to go on a date? Yeah, I really couldn't imagine that. But...

"But if it is that...it would be a pretty lovely date, huh?" I mused.

"Right?! There'd be so much passion in it!"

Sonya and I let our imaginations run wild.

Caldina

It was the fourth day since the incident, in Dendro time. Eldridge was standing in a particular city in Caldina.

Though it was part of this desert country, it wasn't one of the cities Eltram had stopped at. Goblin Street had agreed to save in this city and gather here at a set time if at least one of them got the death penalty. They'd settled on a place that wasn't one of Eltram's stops to make it harder for anyone investigating what had happened to track them down.

Surrounded by a crowd, Eldridge walked toward their meeting place as he thought back on the battle.

Fay had asked him to win, and Niala had truly believed that he would.

And yet, Eldridge had lost. He'd kept the upper hand throughout his entire fight against Emily, but when Zhang and Rascal got involved, he'd been instantly defeated.

He didn't have any excuses for it, nor would he make them. It wasn't a duel, but a PK battle. Third parties and unknown variables were a given.

He had been defeated. This was an unwavering truth.

Eldridge sighed. This was yet another one of his losses against a Superior—a betrayal of those who believed in him. If he was the man he was before he'd gotten on the ship—the man who'd felt cornered after all his recent defeats—this loss would've completely broken him.

But strange as it was, this particular defeat didn't make him feel any self-loathing.

This must've been because he knew for sure that he'd fought using everything he had. His previous encounters with Superiors ended before they could even begin.

But this time, things had been different. This time, he'd managed to give his all for victory.

What dominated his heart now wasn't the result of his defeat, but the process of the fight he'd given everything he had.

"Next time..." Eldridge muttered without even realizing he was speaking out loud.

But before he could finish that sentence, he spotted the terrace where they'd said to meet. It wasn't yet the time they'd agreed on, but Niala and Fey were already there, having some tea.

"I wonder if he's comin' soon," said Fey. "Wait, didn't you have work today?"

"I took a break for personal reasons—for the first time ever."

As they talked, Eldridge called out to them.

"Niala, Fey...sorry to keep you waiting."

"Leader!"

"Good morning, leader."

"Yeah...ngh..."

Eldridge stopped and thought about how to tell them that he lost. He considered apologizing, telling them he was sorry for not living up to their expectations, but Fey spoke before he did.

"Hey! You won, didn't you?!"

Her words didn't seem to have a single shred of doubt behind them.

"What makes you think that?" Eldridge hadn't won, and he had no idea why Fey was assuming otherwise.

Fey then puffed out her chest and gave her reason.

"I can see it in your face!"

"My face?"

When Eldridge touched his face, Fey put on a smile and said, "You look just like you did back in Altar! So full of confidence!"

Those words made his eyes widen. That was something he himself had failed to realize. Eldridge had no idea that the repeated defeats against Superiors had affected his appearance that much.

And these two stuck with me even though they could clearly see how unconfident I was, huh? he thought, which almost made him tear up.

"What do you think?" he asked Niala, careful not to sound like he was about to cry.

"Well..." Niala spent a moment thinking...

"Me too. I like you as you are now."

...and said that, mixing in a somewhat different meaning.

"Huh?! No fair! Me too! I like you too!" Feeling like Niala was running off, Fey also hurriedly revealed her feelings.

"Thanks, you two..."

The fact that they looked up to him so much almost made him tear up again, so he covered his eyes with his right hand.

That reaction made them realize that he didn't understand that they were trying to describe the kind of affection a woman might feel toward a man.

But they didn't care that much. After being down for so long, Eldridge was once again in high spirits. The two were simply happy that this trio had a future.

"I'd like to hear how you beat her!" said Fey.

"I didn't, actually...I lost."

Eldridge wiped away his tears, corrected Fey...

“But next time, not even a Superior will beat me.”

...and said those words with a smile on his face.

It was the smile of a person with nothing to be ashamed of—one more confident than ever before.

“You will!” the two girls said in unison, smiling themselves.

This day, they had no doubt made a comeback.

Afterword

Cat: “It’s time for the afterwooord. This one is brought to you by me, Cheshire the ‘Caaat.’”

Six: “And me, ‘Six’ or Sechs Würfel.”

Cat: “Oh. Haven’t seen you in a whiiile.”

Six: “Rascal and Emily were deeply involved in this one, so I will represent them here.”

Cat: “I seeee. Let’s start, then. Do you have any questions?”

Six: “I do. The afterword of the previous volume said that this one will come out in winter of 2023. Isn’t it March now?”

Cat: ...

Six: “Cheshire?”

Cat: “IT’S STILL SNOWY WHERE THE AUTHOR LIVES, SO THIS STILL COUNTS AS WINTER.”

Six: “I don’t feel it’s necessary to say that in all caps...”

Cat: “Anyway, stuff happened and you had to wait six months for it, but we believe that the quality of volume 20 is worthy of such a milestone! It’s the first one that places Hugo and Cyco on the cover! It has illustrations for many characters who never had one! And it even has something we’ve never done before: a mecha design illustration at the very end of the volume!”

Six: “Yes. It seems like something you would see in Fullmetal Panic.”

Cat: (He just went and named another company’s work like it was nothing...he truly is King of Crime.)

Six: “Now, let us move on to the serious comment from the author.”

Dearest readers, thank you for your purchase. I am the author, Sakon Kaidou.

This work has finally reached its twentieth volume. This is something that wouldn't have been possible without you and everyone else involved in ensuring every release.

Dendro will not end anytime soon, so I would be deeply grateful if you'd stay for the ride.

Now, those of you who read the webnovel may have noticed this, but this volume went through a lot of editing. I have updated the writing to better represent my current ability and added things to it that I felt needed to be written. The updates include certain sections focused on the DLG, while the additions include Rascal and Emily's background in the prologue.

What is at the heart of that won't be revealed for a while, but Rascal is an IF member too, and he chose to commit crime in Dendro for the sake of a goal he wished to fulfill. Infinite Dendrogram is a place where the feelings of many people intertwine, and it would give me great joy if you stayed to witness where they lead.

On another topic, this volume is one that puts my personal obsession with mecha content front and center.

That of course includes the cutesy, goofy robot maid, Machina, who was drawn in this volume by Taiki's skillful hand, but it certainly doesn't stop there. The very climax of this volume is a three way fight between giant mechs. The editor, K, even suggested that we might as well add a mech illustration. That, combined with the fact that this was a milestone volume, made us decide to approach someone known for their mecha work.

That was none other than Tomofumi Ogasawara—the artist who provided the art for Gundam W: Haisha-tachi no Eikou. I actually had the MG Sandrock (Armadillo Unit) that appeared in this work.

Out of all the works he was involved in, the one I find especially memorable is the Gensou Senki RuLiLuRa reader-driven experience that was released in Hobby Japan's Game Gyaza magazine.

It was a play-by-mail type game where you wrote your characters and their actions on a card that came with the magazine, then sent it to later receive the character's results and achievements.

Back then, I was in middle school and a regular Gyaza reader who always filled in and sent the cards.

At that time, I couldn’t have ever imagined that future me would release a novel through Hobby Japan or have the person behind RuLiLuRa’s art provide me with a mecha design.

That, as well as the fact that an avid NEEDLESS reader like myself could get Kami Imai to draw the manga adaptation of my work, left me in awe of all the ways that memories of the past could come back to me. Volume 11 of the manga, by the way, is set to come out on the same day as this novel volume, so please do check it out. It also includes an original short story.

I feel like I say this a lot, but Dendro is a product that can only continue to exist because of the support and effort of a great many people.

Allow me to once again say “thank you” to you all.

And please continue your support for Infinite Dendrogram.

Sakon Kaidou

Cat: “Anyway, time to announce the next ooone.”
Six: “IS IT OKAY TO ANNOUNCE THAT IT WILL COME OUT IN SUMMER, 2023?”
Cat: “...Why is it a question?”
Six: “Because these announcements have been off for a few volumes in a row now.”
Cat: “You’re not wrong...”

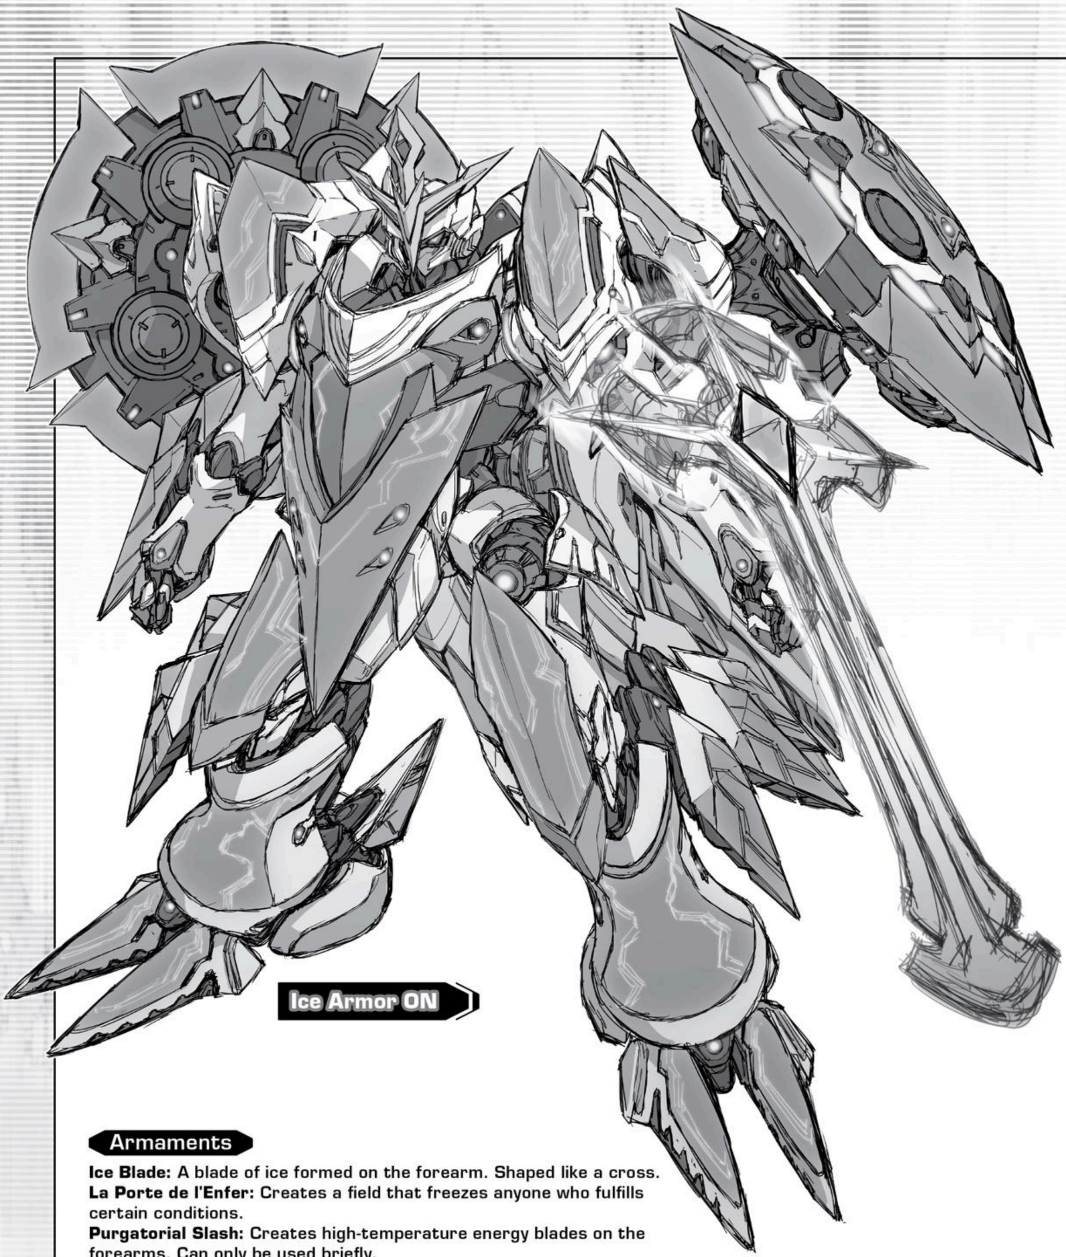
Ice Armor OFF



Armaments

Ice Blade: A blade of ice formed on the forearm. Shaped like a cross.
La Porte de l'Enfer: Creates a field that freezes anyone who fulfills certain conditions.
Purgatorial Slash: Creates high-temperature energy blades on the forearms. Can only be used briefly.

Traits

A heavily armored unit built for defense.
Its shoulders are equipped with round active shields that can be ejected and made to float.
The ice armor fits over the pre-existing armor.
Built by Franklin as a gift to his sister, this is undoubtedly the sturdiest Magingear yet.

Bonus Short Stories

The Singularity

Tetragrammaton, Workshop

Tetragrammaton—the amphibious battleship that IF used as their HQ. Managed by Rascal, it contained rooms for its members—official or supporting—as well as various facilities like a workshop for Machina.

Currently, Machina was using the workshop to improve upon Sardonyx's design after it suffered heavy damage on Eltram, and Rascal was there to support her with the abilities he possessed as The Weapon.

"Oh. I'm done there. Please close it."

"All right."

As Rascal used his skills where Machina directed him, he was using his free hand to do some work on a tablet device. One of Machina's creations, this tablet contained information and reports about the trade organizations Rascal owned here in Infinite Dendrogram. It was clear from only a glance that it was far more technologically advanced than was standard for this world.

"This should make it much safer than before!"

"That so...?"

Machina's work was truly impressive. She had not only repaired the severe damage to Sardonyx, but also used the recent combat data to improve it over the original design.

"The singularity, huh...?" Rascal said, looking at ever-improving mechdragon.

"Hm?" Machina tilted her head in confusion.

"That's a term describing the birth of an AI that can improve itself infinitely. More specifically, we call it the 'technological singularity' because that's supposedly the point where machines will be totally independent of humans. They'll start makin' their own advancements."

Earth was already experiencing a kind of technological revolution in the real world thanks to the existence of control AIs. These AIs could communicate in a humanlike manner, they possessed creativity, and they were capable of managing all the data produced by a small country. In some ways they were a sort of direct upgrade of mankind. Some experts claimed that the reason Infinite Dendrogram was so astounding was because it was run by a whole thirteen control AIs—though Rascal was already well aware that Infinite Dendrogram's control AIs and regular control AIs were somewhat different. In fact, a part of him believed that the regular control AIs might have been introduced into society and made common knowledge for the express purpose of preparing it for the "control AIs" present within the game.

Whether or not that was true, artificial intelligence had certainly already surpassed human intelligence.

"Watching you improve Sardonyx—somethin' you created yourself—just made me think...it's happenin' here too, huh?"

"Umm, is that praise?"

"Yeah. For your skill, at least."

"Wow! You'll make me blush," Machina said, looking bashful for a moment before her expression changed. "Though...that's not quite right," she added. She looked suddenly rather serious, as though she was reflecting on the past. "What I did here isn't exactly improvement. It's more like optimization. The necessary technology itself was already within me, you see. That's just how advanced we were back in my era."

"The pre-ancient times?"

"Yes, yes."

The pre-ancient civilization was the advanced culture that had thrived thanks to a combination of magic and science, using magical energies to bring all kinds of dreams to life. Their civilization had also been the one to fall apart during the war against the Incarnations, leaving behind only fragments of their shattered existence. One of these was Machina—the gynoid also known as Agate Designer.

"I know lots about technology," Machina went on. "But most of it was either installed in me by the creator as base knowledge during my production phase, or something I learned during that era. I still remember all of that knowledge, and I can put it to use by combining it or improving it based on gathered data. Really, it's all just an effective application of what I’ve been given.”

“Then I guess your creator—the first Flagman—must have been a genius like no other, huh?”

Someone who created an AI that could effectively apply knowledge and who actually developed and provided it with so much technology had to be an incredibly gifted individual, Rascal thought.

“Uhh, I wouldn’t say that either,” Machina said, looking doubtful.

“What do you mean?”

“As his assistant, I feel like he was probably just like me.”

“...Huh?”

“It felt less like he actually discovered and developed all his theories and technologies, and more like just put them into practice or reproduced them... It’s like he borrowed it all.”

“You’re sayin’ that this Grand Artificer’s technology wasn’t actually invented by him either? That he just got it all from somewhere else?”

But where could he have possibly gotten all of that? Who could have taught the greatest engineer in history everything he knew? These were the questions running through Rascal’s mind.

“Flagman himself regularly said something like ‘The real genius isn’t me, but Mr. Philips. It’s people like him who should be recognized.”

“And this ‘Mr. Philips’ is...?”

“He was a famous golem meister and alchemist. He had three crafting Superior Jobs—tians tend to be limited by their job affinities and talents, so he was a real rarity in that regard. My creator had all the limelight back then, so Mr Philips ended up getting outshone... Apparently, he spent his final years making some super amazing gargoyle, though. I wonder if he finished it...”

Those words made Rascal think for a moment. While Flagman’s name had survived the devastation of his civilization and lived through the two millennia that followed, this Philips was someone who seemed to have been forgotten instead. Despite that, the Grand Artificer himself had considered this person his superior.

“Well, anyway, that’s how it was,” Machina said. “Flagman didn’t value himself that highly. ‘The technology I have is beneficial to mankind, so I have no choice but to spread it for the well-being of the people. Though...I believe that originally, the technology cultivated by this world must’ve been of their own design.' That's what Flagman said before the Incarnations attacked...when he was still just a popular technician."

"Huh." Rascal felt like Flagman's words contained something that sounded like guilt. It almost seemed as if it wasn't just that it was not his own technology, but that he had appropriated it from some time and place where it had already been cultivated.

"I see... I see."

Perhaps the earth was no different in that regard, though. At a certain point in the past, the powerful control AI technology had rapidly spread throughout the world. And depending on what the source of it was, it might be hard to say for certain that the real world's AIs had indeed achieved a singularity.

Rascal was lost in thought for a bit.

Infinite Dendrogram and the Earth both had countless secrets whirling within them, and perhaps this little chat with Machina had revealed a little bit about the secrets this world had to offer. Machina and her deep knowledge of Flagman was just one of the many leads Rascal had in both worlds that could lead him to unraveling many such mysteries.

However, none of them held that much meaning to him.

He had absolutely no intention of finding out the truth. It was never his goal to chase after the long-buried mysteries.

"Rashcal. Machinya. Are you dooone?"

"U-Umm...we made tea..."

The sound of voices drew Rascal's attention to the workshop entrance, where he saw Emily, all smiles, and Doris timidly standing behind her.

"All right. We've done enough for now. Let's take a break."

"Roger that!" said Machina.

And so, Rascal and Machina left the workshop.

"Over here!" called Emily as they followed after her.

This girl was Rascal's current goal—one that had been left behind by his closest friend.

Altar's PK History

Caldina

"A toast to our success."

"Cheers."

"Cheers!"

Following the events on Eltram, the three members of Goblin Street came back from their death penalty and held a little celebration at a bar. While all of them had died, they had still managed to get the Marshall IIs that they had come for—and thanks to the deal with Moneygold, they had even managed to find a good buyer for them.

This was their first success in a while, and they chose to celebrate it with the money they had right now.

As they enjoyed a feast that was luxurious by their current standards, Eldridge, pestered by Niala and Fey, told them how the fight played out.

"Huh? But that's basically a win for you. You'd have totally had it if they hadn't butted in. IF weren't playin' fair," said Fey upon hearing the story, clearly upset.

"It wasn't a duel. PK battles really aren't the place for fairness," Eldridge said, readily accepting the result. He himself ambushed others on the regular, so he really felt like he couldn't complain if it happened to him. "But man...IF, huh? I can't say I expected to fight Sechs's clan like this," he said, his thoughts wandering to the past.

"Speaking of, did you ever fight Sechs Würfel directly?" Niala asked.

"I did. I stood no chance, though, so I backed out before it was over."

Sechs was the one who had first taken the title of "Altar's strongest PK" from him.

"You stood no chance? Whaddya mean?"

"He's a slime, so taking his body parts is pointless, and there's nothing for me to gain from it."

"Ohhh..." Niala and Fey said in unison.

"Since physical attacks don't work on him, I tried using Gems, but he blocked the one with Crimson Sphere in it using some heat-absorbing shield he copied somewhere. I realized that I couldn't win an endurance match against him and backed out...and some time later, everyone started calling him 'Altar's strongest PK' instead. That's how it went."

With Eldridge having a bad matchup against him and Sechs being a Superior, the public opinion quickly shifted. Soon enough, Sechs was widely considered to be the most powerful PK in Altar.

Looking back, Sechs might've actually been the first in Eldridge's long chain of unfortunate encounters with incompatible Superiors.

"Even if I wanted to come up with a plan and try for round two, Sechs was the one who gained more levels and abilities as time went by. Ultimately, I realized that going up against him was just a waste and started sharing info with B3 and people like that so I could keep track of where he was active and avoid him."

Sechs was a man who committed crime for the sake of crime—a man whose means and goals were one and the same. Even to PKs, he was an entity who didn't make any sense whatsoever.

Going anywhere this absurd individual was active could mean getting caught up in whatever villainous acts he might commit. Because of that, they took to treating him like a rabid bear best avoided—though "bear" was probably a better description of Sechs's rival rather than Sechs himself.

"Then Sechs was sent to the gaol, and when I thought it was gonna be between just me and B3..." Eldridge paused, emptied his glass of booze, put on a bitter face, and let out a sigh. "...Kashimiya came from Tenchi."

"Ohhh..." Niala and Fey said in unison.

And then there was the rabid...or rather, the vorpal hare. Most duelists and standout PKs had experienced having their heads lopped off by Kashimiya, and Eldridge was no exception. Not even Skeleton could save him from that fate.

Because of that, once Sechs left, the title of "Altar's strongest PK" went to Kashimiya. That was also around the time when King of Light's obsessive search for reference material began to stand out.

Eldridge fell silent as he reflected upon the past and thought, With the kind of PKs they have, Altar may have been even more of a hellscape than Caldina.

About La Crima

Tetragrammaton

"What kind of person is La Crima?" Zhang asked Rascal one day as he was watching some lizard-like Ideas going about their various tasks. The sight must've made him curious about their creator.

"You're from Caldina's underworld. You must've heard of them, right?"

"Well...I heard they're the inspiration for The Song Princess and the King of Indestruction." That was the title of an opera—a tragedy—performed in Caldina. Zhang had never seen it himself, but he had heard that it was based on a true story.

La Crima's role in it was that of the villain.

"Ohh. That's about the event that got La Crima on the wanted list, so I guess if you know them, it would likely be through that. Well, the writer of the opera didn't do quite enough research, but it was definitely about illicit love."

"Hm?"

"Anyway, after that whole thing got them on the wanted list, our leader tried to recruit them a bunch of times before he got sent to the gaol—and after he was out of the picture, I took over the job and actually did manage to get La Crima to join. We really needed them on the team."

"Is that because of their ability to create soldiers? The Ideas?" Zhang asked as he pointed at the mass-produced Ideas at work.

"That's part of it. Idea—La Crima's Embryo—modifies people as long as they have 'materials' and provide the 'concept.' Even if La Crima doesn't have the required knowledge, the Superior Embryo just makes it happen."

While someone like Rascal needed Machina to be able to design things, for La Crima's Embryo took care of it for them.

"It's a power that lets them create tons of freakish combatants...but its most effective power is the ability to heal."

"I see," Zhang said with a nod. That alone was enough for him to understand what was going on with them.

"They can use the human body itself as material to create a healthy version of it. Even if its something as serious as a terminal tumor or a neurological disorder, as long as it's not a missin' part like my arm, La Crima can fix it up."

Basically, Rascal's explanation revealed that Idea was an Embryo that healed diseases or wounds not by magic, but by surgical and internal medicine.

"La Crima's treatments saved a whole bunch of tian lives. And that means that indirectly, many worlder Masters who were close to tians are indebted to them too. Embryos that can be repurposed for healin' are pretty rare, after all."

And since the main Superior Jobs with healing skills were currently in the hands of Sefirot, the cult in Altar, and Sechs, there was a lot of demand for abnormally powerful healing abilities. La Crima often claimed to be a merchant of life rather than a merchant of death, and that wasn't an entirely incorrect claim.

"La Crima's got lots of sympathizers because of that. They're part of our clan, but they command enough forces to be the head of their own org. Even if you disregard the Ideas, nearly half of our supporting members answer to them. La Crima isn't actually that good at leadin', though, so they make up for it with all their Ideas that handle business for them."

Along with Rascal, who was managing multiple front companies, La Crima served as one of the wheels that kept IF running.

"Ah..." said Zhang. "But is it really a good idea for the organization to have someone who commands forces that match yours? Wouldn't this lead to conflict between the subfactions?" he asked, thinking back on the leadership of Mirage.

"Ha ha..." Rascal replied with a cold chuckle. "Well, besides me and La Crima, everyone in the clan is either a combatant or an agent."

His expression made the significance behind this statement obvious: without La Crima, Rascal's workload would be so immense it might kill him.

With that, Zhang came to know the biggest reason La Crima had been invited into their clan and thought, Those who run organizations never have it easy, do they?

By the time the dawn broke, even the sounds of anguish had vanished from the bloodstained city. Many had suffered as their bodies melted away, leaving only their bones behind.

"La la laa…"

But there was one person who wasn't suffering in the least. This individual was in the inner courtyard of Mahem's modest palace, singing in a high soprano. It was as though they simply couldn't contain the emotions welling up within.

"La la laa…"

His name was Candy Carnage.

Character

Ray

Ray Starling / Reiji Mukudori

A college freshman who gets caught up in various incidents within Infinite Dendrogram. Though he is generally mild-mannered, he has a strong will that causes him to fight for his goals and never give up on them.

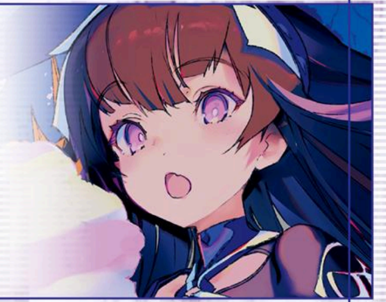
Nemesis

Nemesis

Ray's Embryo manifested as this girl. Nemesis acts as Ray's weapon by taking up the form of armaments such as a greatsword, halberd, shield, pinwheel, mirror, and twin swords. She is also a notable glutton.



Marie

Marie Adler/Nagisa Ichimiya

A player who accumulated a wealth of knowledge through her work as a Journalist for DIN—the Dendro Information Network. She is role-playing as the main character of her own manga, Into the Shadow.

Candy

Candy Carnage

The King of Plagues who destroyed a country and shook the world of Infinite Dendrogram. Though this act sent him to the gaol, he recently broke out alongside King of Crime.

Prologue: Day Two Tournament

Sorcerer, Ray Starling

It was the day after Lei-Lei thoroughly defeated me, and I'd somehow ended up fighting an Overlord.

I'd gotten my clan to come pick me up from the forest and had a Bishop of the national faith treat the wounds covering my body. I still had some lasting injury-based debuffs after all the treatment, but apparently they'd go away in a few days if I just used healing items regularly. The men of faith there said that the Lunar Society's clinics could treat my wounds better than they did, but I was afraid of getting deeper into debt with Miss Eldritch, so that was a "no" from me.

Also, I couldn't help but note how magnanimous they were being. Not everyone would recommend their clients go to their direct competition.

So yeah, my wounds didn't end up being a big deal, and Silver had suffered so little damage that it was covered by his auto-repair—he'd be able to gallop again in just a few days.

The way we'd been thrown into a sudden predicament had gotten me pretty worried for a bit there, but I'd say it ended well.

Anyway, I would be watching The Tournaments starting from today—which was day two.

The member of our clan participating today was B3, and she was currently waiting for the duel to start, clad in her usual combat gear—full-body armor and shields in both hands.

I was also familiar with her opponent—a wolf-eared woman dressed like a barbarian and holding a spear.

"This is the finale of The Tournaments' second day! It's Rosa the Bone-Eater versus Barbaroy Bad Burn the Crushing Canopy!" said the announcer.

Yes—B3 was up against the subleader of Altar's third place clan, K&R—Nobushi Princess Rosa.

"I know these two well," I said.

"Indeed," said Nemesis. "We've fought alongside B3 many times, even before we formed our clan, and we fought Rosa once before going on to watch her fight Juliet."

Nemesis and I truly knew what the two combatants were capable of.

"Fight!"

But that was exactly why I gasped at their immediate movements following that announcement.

Rosa used Gashadokuro's ult to equip an exoskeleton that enhanced her STR and AGI, and followed it up with her job ult as Nobushi Princess—A Kill Supreme, the super powerful attack that could only be used as a first strike.

However, B3 saw it coming and used Heaven's Weight to shave off some of Rosa's power and speed. Then she used Astro Guard to increase her defense and ultimately sacrificed her shield to protect against the attack.

As Rosa's movements became sluggish, B3 used Atlas's ult to retaliate with an obscenely powerful strike using her remaining shield. However, Rosa avoided it by using the MVP reward she'd used in her fight against Juliet—the one that let her evade fatal attacks and teleport—to get behind B3 and attack her with Backslayer, a skill which enhanced attacks from behind.

As though she'd been expecting it, B3 aimed her left arm behind her and used Gauntlet Trigger—a skill possessed by her full-body armor MVP reward, Magnum Colossus—to fire the gauntlet and offset Rosa's attack.

With a loud clash, the two were flung apart.

Not even a minute had passed since the duel had begun, but the battle was already at peak intensity as they played each and every ace they had hiding up their sleeves. They each knew the cards that the other had on hand, and as a result they didn't hold anything back.

This was an exchange of blows where a single mistake could spell the end of the duel, but I felt like they'd expected everything that had happened so far. They only used moves they were both aware of, making this battle kinda align with standard shogi tactics.

And so, I expected that from this point on, they would abandon that standard and start to use moves their opponent hadn't seen.

"GRAAAH!" Once again, Rosa was the one to move first. Using Instant Equip, she summoned a spear into her empty hand and threw the newly equipped weapon at B3.

Given the choice between evasion and defense, B3 chose her usual approach and braced herself to endure the attack. She also used Instant Equip to take out a new shield—a massive shield meant for giants that she'd used before—and held it up like a wall straight in the path of the spear hurtling toward her.

When the attack and defense met, the audience—myself included—expected a loud, high-pitched clang...but it never came.

The source of the sound had vanished.

My attention still fixed on the stage, I saw B3's eyes widen in shock.

This was something that I wouldn't normally be able to see, since her head was always completely hidden by her helm.

Basically...her face was fully exposed now. Her shields, her armor—all of her equipment had been removed.

"A spear that removes gear?!" I exclaimed. Was this a new MVP reward? Maybe an item custom-made from rare materials?

Rosa's spear had vanished—but in exchange, all of B3's gear had been removed and was now lying on the stage.

B3, now clad only in her underwear, was completely defenseless. Rosa accelerated toward her.

B3's Armor Giant and Shield Giant were sturdy tank jobs, but they relied heavily on the defense of her equipment. With all of that removed, her toughness was greatly reduced.

Rosa had been planning since the start to end this battle with this gear-removing weapon. She'd played the known cards in her own hand to bait out B3's—including her Embryo ult—and then used the spear. Rosa must've guessed that if B3's armor was removed from the equation, their respective job configurations and her own Superior Job would give her the advantage in sheer physical ability, and that would allow her to win.

As Rosa approached, B3 held up both her hands as though putting up whatever meager resistance she could manage, but...

"Oh," Nemesis and I said in unison, knowing full well what that stance meant. We also understood the look on B3's face, which had shifted from shock to a savage grin.

Thus, Rosa came within just three metels of B3...

...and, still leaning forward in her charging stance, she was slammed straight onto the floor of the stage.

“HUH?!” Now, Rosa was the one overcome with shock. The spear that was supposed to run B3 through had instead been shoved to the ground, along with the arm holding it. Try as she might, she couldn’t raise it up—in fact, it just continued to sink farther.

I could tell by Rosa’s expression that if she were able to, she would’ve said the extra gravity from Heaven’s Weight should be easy for her to overcome.

But this wasn’t that—or rather, it wasn’t the Heaven’s Weight that Rosa knew.

This was the result of Territory compression—a trump card passed down to B3 by Fuso, and one that she’d used during the peace conference, in the battle against King of Beasts...and Rosa had no idea it existed until now. With its range narrowed, the gravity field greatly exceeded the normal five hundred times multiplier—making the gravity five thousand times stronger.

Faced with such an immense increase in weight, even a vanguard SJ like Rosa was stopped in her tracks and afflicted with the Binding debuff.

B3 looked down at her opponent, saying nothing. Using this compression technique also fixed her in place as well.

But the duel was already as good as over.

“Nnghh...ugh...ghhh...?!” Rosa spat out blood and sank farther down onto the stage.

Unable to put up any resistance against the massive increase in gravity, her body was gradually being destroyed.

Back when this effect was used on King of Beasts, it had slowed her down, but ultimately didn’t have much of an effect. That was because King of Beasts was an exception among exceptions. The bodies of animals weren’t that tough normally.

Nobushi Princess might have been an SJ, but she was specialized in ambushing and thus didn’t have the toughness to withstand this level of gravity.

Rosa wasn’t the only one who’d been trying to force her enemy to play everything in her hand.

B3 must’ve been planning to end the battle like this from the moment Rosa shed the STR-enhancing exoskeleton she created with her ult. Rosa might’ve been able to weather the five thousand times stronger gravity if she’d still had it on, but alas.

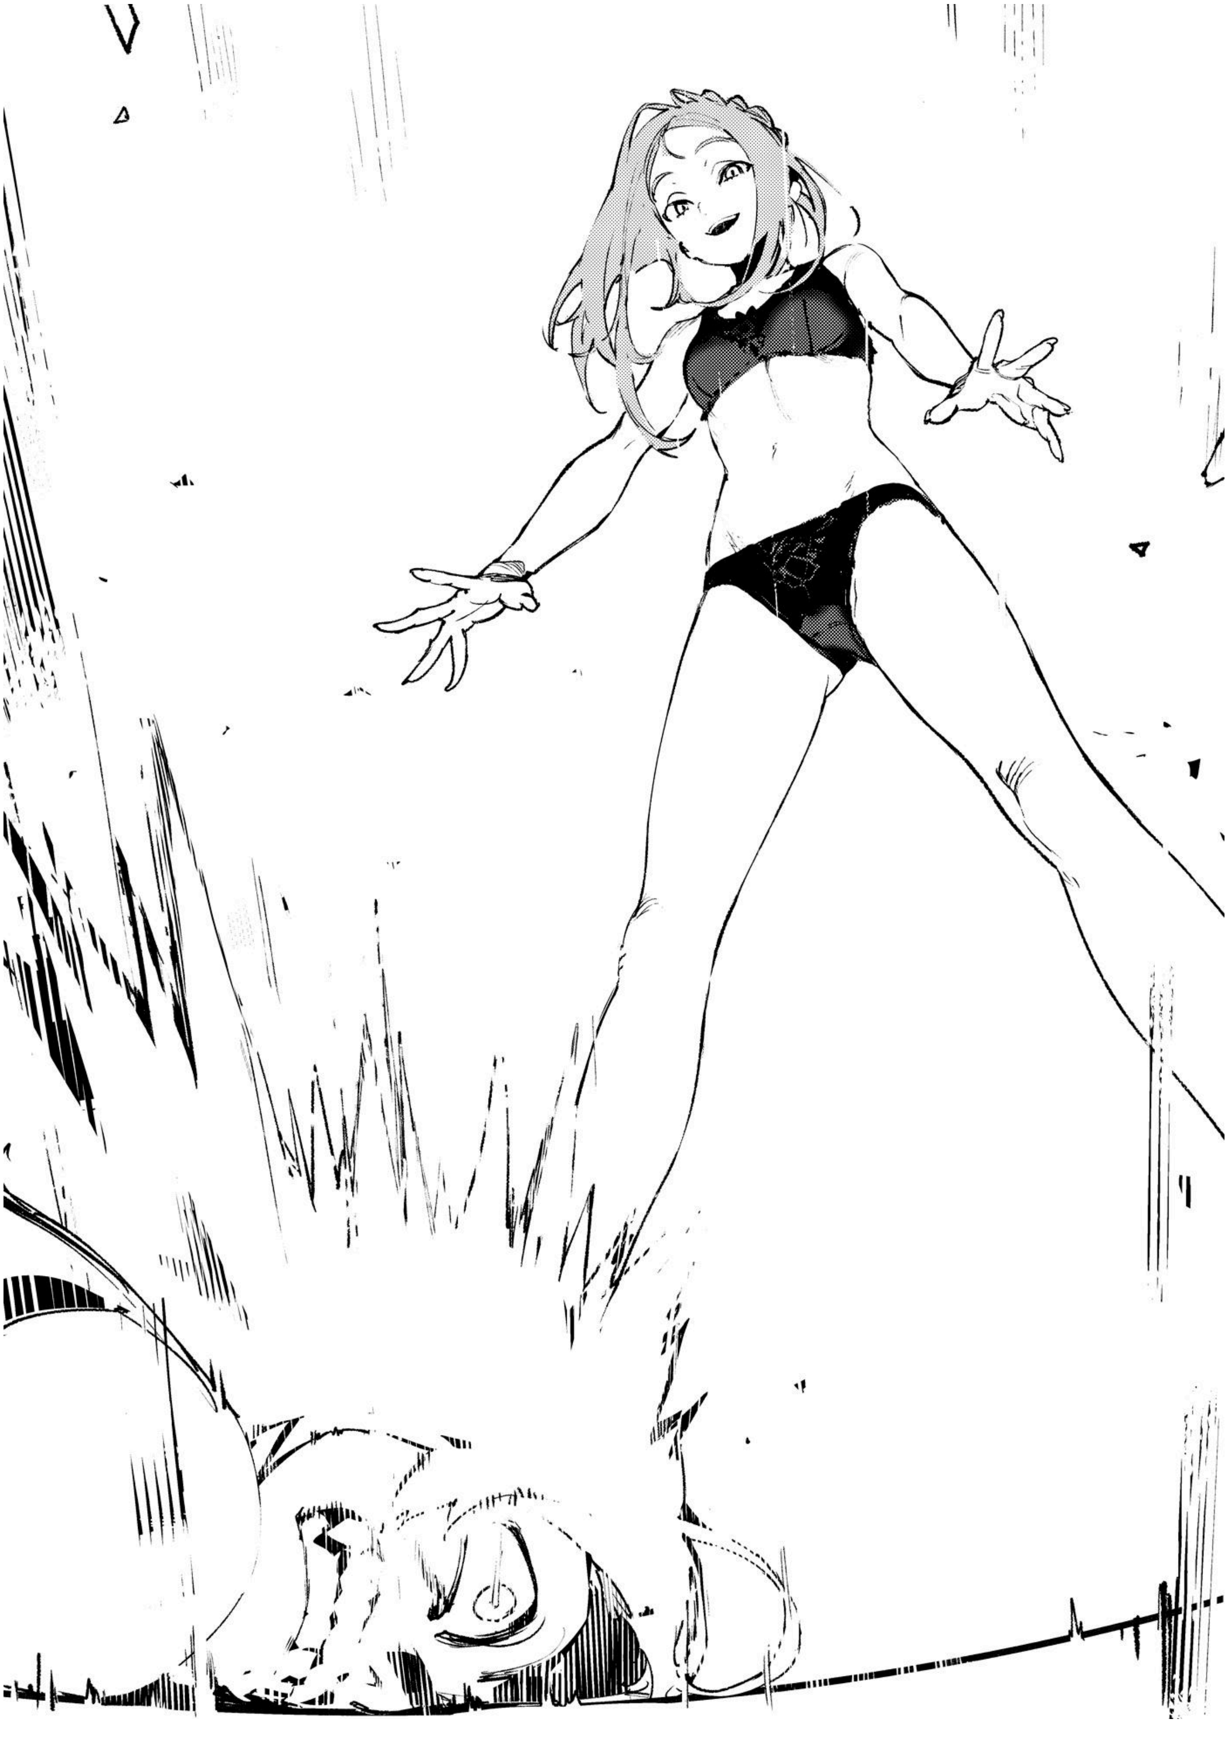
Both of them had been hiding aces up their sleeves.

However, while Rosa’s was meant to bring her closer to victory, B3’s was meant to ensure her victory.

You could say that that was the real deciding factor...

“Down, doggy.”

...and, following that insult from B3, Rosa was crushed to death.



◇

“Is it just me, or did Rosa go out wearing the kind of face you should never show in public?” Nemesis asked.

“That clearly made her snap,” I said. “Though B3 was also stripped to her underwear in public, so they’re kinda even, I guess.”

“Hrmm...both of them just keep getting their prides wounded.” This would probably be added onto the long list of grudges between them. From what I could tell, a lot must’ve happened in their shared past as PKs.

The duel’s over, but they’re still holding their weapons and glaring at each other, I thought.

“Dear me...hm? Ray, what is that in your hand?”

“A betting ticket. I put money on B3.” Just like you could at every event in the City of Duels, you could also gamble on who would win The Tournaments.

In standard duels involving just two people, you would only bet on one or the other right before the match began, but for The Tournaments, the betting took place when the preliminaries ended and the finals started. You essentially voted on who of those remaining would be the ultimate winner.

Here on day two, the absolute favorite to win was Rosa, since she was a high-ranking duelist and an SJ—but the actual winner was B3.

As a result of betting on someone who wasn’t a favorite, I got a pretty big payout. Specifically, the hundred million lir I bet became over five hundred million.

“I fear for our financial sense,” said Nemesis.

“Well, I still had a good bit of the lir I got by selling that metal material,” I objected.

“You are so... How many times have you spent such large sums on gambling at this point?”

“I mean, if I save up enough money, I might be able to actually buy the base we’re just renting right now.”

“You do understand that claiming you will save up money to buy a house via gambling is blatantly absurd?”

“Good point.”

Regardless, with B3 securing victory without issue, there would now be a closing ceremony for day two, after which we would form a party with her and challenge the UBM she won.

“We were unable to make it to yesterday’s battle. Let us make up for that today.”

“Yeah.” There were eight more Tournament days left. I didn’t know how many times we—Death Period—would get to challenge the UBMs, but I would give my all to help the members who were doing what they could in this contest.

Silently, I reaffirmed that the best we could do right now was improve ourselves as much as possible. That was what was necessary to seize the future we wanted in the coming rematch against Dryfe.

Chapter One: Tournament Day Three

Gideon the City of Duels, Central Arena

The results of the first and second days of The Tournaments were, to put it bluntly, within the realm of expectation.

The person who had won the right to challenge Stern Face-Tender Heart, Sasage, on the first day was a Superior, Lei-Lei the Prodigal of Feasts, who had gone on to fight it right away and won the MVP reward with little effort on her part.

On day two, the right to challenge Fortcrushing Mawdragon, No Mercy, had just been decided in a heated battle between two of the kingdom's strongest PKs. Ultimately, the combatant who'd managed to eke out a victory was Barbaroy Bad Burn.

In the UBM fight after that, she fought alongside her clan leader, Ray Starling the Unbreakable, and four other Masters who seemed to be newbies. They went on to win and acquire the MVP reward.

Indeed, there had been two UBM battles so far, and both of their MVP rewards had been claimed by Death Period.

Because of this, not to mention the way Lei-Lei and Barbaroy had fought, the power and fearsomeness of the clan became known across the kingdom. On account of the name and their combat style, though, a lot of people mistakenly assumed they must be a pretty shady group.

But despite all of that, common opinion held that there was no chance of Death Period winning on the third day too. After all, the Master they'd sent to fight on that third day was nothing like the two who claimed victory in the others.

He was neither a Superior nor a well-known PK—merely a Master who could still be called a newbie. He may have won the four preliminary battles and made it to the finals, but most thought that he wouldn't go beyond that.

The third day's final lineup boasted names like AT WIKI, holder of the magic-focused Superior Job King of Glaciers, as well as Adham "The Thousand and One Night," and Bolhead "The Mythbeast Circus."

Because of this, the odds of this nameless Death Period member winning were believed to be low—and the possible payout for anyone who bet on him was so high that he could have been considered a potential dark horse.

However, almost nobody thought he was capable of defeating anyone else in the finals.

Interestingly, though, a few people were still placing large bets on this nameless member of Death Period.

One of them was the clan's leader who'd won big on the previous day—Ray Starling.

The others were four Masters who had no connection to Death Period.

All of them had been defeated by this same nameless Master in the preliminaries.

◇◆

A caster clad in a white robe panted with ragged breath, deeply drained by his battle against the opponent before him.

But it wasn't his body or his magic that had been down the most—it was his mind.

The white-robed man was King of Glaciers, AT WIKI.

He was the leader of the fifth-ranking clan—Wiki Editors: Kingdom of Altar Branch. Just as the name suggested, this was a branch of the clan that had set up shop in many countries for the purpose of editing Infinite Dendrogram's wiki. As someone who'd reached as high as sixth in the kill rankings, AT WIKI was no doubt a force to be reckoned with.

He had also managed the impressive feat of forming a party that went all the way down to the 45th floor of the Tomb Labyrinth—and recently, after the throne of King of Glaciers was suddenly vacated, he'd taken up the mantle and acquired the power of a Superior Job.

AT WIKI possessed a wealth of combat experience and knowledge, and thanks to his status as an SJ and an impressive set of gear, he was a combatant who could rival any common vanguard. In today's Tournament, he was undoubtedly the favorite to win.

And yet, here he was, at a loss for how to proceed against a nameless newbie.

Nine attempts, all of them failed, he thought. Trying to affect his vision did nothing.

He knew that he was up against a member of a high-ranking clan, Death Period. But according to his investigations, Death Period was a clan that was so high up because it was made up of—no, because it just had a few elite members.

Four Superiors. Famous PKs. And the Unbreakable, who stumbled across unusual incidents and had so far been lucky enough to deal with them.

The other members were either excess baggage or simply there to inflate the member count—newbies who only joined the clan because they simply happened to be accompanying the leader during Franklin's Game.

However, this particular member—the one AT was fighting right now—was nothing like that.

"White Field." The moment AT prepared to use a spell, his opponent snapped his fingers.

That single action made the ultimate skill of the high-rank Cryomancer job vanish like mist.

"I'm sorry," said AT's opponent—a boy so beautiful you could mistake him for some kind of snow fairy. "I'm not very fond of ice."

Clad in brass-colored clothing, accompanied by his Embryo—a succubus Sentinel—and commanding a landdragon called Hexahorn Grand Dragon, the boy was smiling.

"It reminds me of a rather unpleasant person...and more importantly, if you used that on me, I would lose."

He maintained that likable smile even as he said that, but it made AT's insides freeze.

He has no trouble shutting down even a high-rank job ult, huh? This wasn't the first time the boy had canceled AT's magic. He'd done this a total of ten times now.

AT knew that he was capable of this feat because of the MVP reward on his hands. He couldn't read any details of the item with Identification, but it was clear that it canceled magic whenever he just snapped his fingers.

If that was all it was, though, AT would be able to counter it. The move didn't cancel magic automatically—instead, the user had to deliberately perform an action to use it. This meant that AT could circumvent it simply by casting magic when his opponent didn't expect it.

The gap between their stats was obvious, and a single spell that connected would be enough to snowball into complete victory.

However, that one single spell AT needed to connect hadn't done so even once.

His opponent somehow grasped when he was using magic even if AT didn't say a word—even when he cast after using an item skill that hid him from sight, the boy still snapped his fingers at the most optimal time to make the magic scatter.

He was reading AT like a book, forcing him to waste MP over and over. How does he know exactly how I'm playing my cards...?!

"I knew you would climb up the ladder of this third Tournament, so I watched every single one of your matches up until this point," the beautiful boy replied as though he read AT's mind. "Unless you use something you haven't used in any match so far, don't think you can outsmart me."

AT was silent. It was clearly a provocation, but he knew he couldn't act on it.

After all, AT had also seen his opponent's matches—and in all of them, this boy was the one who negated the enemy's attacks and emerged victorious. The boy's combat style could be described as "antioffensive."

In competitive card game terms, he played with what was called a "lock deck" or "permission deck." That was how much he restricted his opponents' freedom in combat.

AT could clearly see that in the three battles he'd witnessed, starting with the boy's fifth. In that battle, the boy's opponent was Bolhead the Mythbeast Circus, a High Tamer who commanded monsters, just like he did. The monsters Bolhead had were slightly stronger than the boy's, and he also had an Embryo that enhanced tamed creatures.

Everyone felt Bolhead would come out on top if they clashed directly...but they never did.

The boy made the first move and Charmed Bolhead's own monsters into killing him.

His opponent in the quarterfinal was Pyromancer Adham the Thousand and One Night.

After seeing the previous battle, Adham entered the arena equipped with gear that countered Charm. However, he had his magic negated, just as AT was experiencing right now, and was trampled when the boy's succubus and landdragon closed the distance between them.

In the semifinal, he fought Pound Boxer Hellmask, who'd been a nobody before this Tournament, but showed great prowess as he clawed his way up the ranks. He had a fighting style focused on closing distance with nimble footwork and pulverizing the opponent's head. Like Adham, Hellmask had also equipped something to counter Charm, and it was widely believed that the boy would certainly lose this time.

Clad in body-enhancing Type Arms armor, Hellmask flanked the boy and threw a single punch that could kill him instantly.

However, the fist was stopped by the boy's brass-colored coat—or, rather, the Orichalcum Armory Slime that was disguised as an ordinary coat.

The liquid metal slime negated physical attacks completely and stopped Hellmask's hand. It couldn't be destroyed even by this deadly fist.

That was when the succubus showered Hellmask in a multitude of debuffs besides Charm—and when they had all affected him, the slime sliced him apart.

Thus, the boy reached the finals.

And now that he was actually facing him, AT clearly understood...

It's better not to think of this as fighting a newbie. This boy read his opponent's moves ahead of time, stole the pawns his opponent brought to the field, canceled magic, blocked physical attacks, showered his enemies in debuffs, and finally finished them off.

He was a monstrous being who crushed his enemies before they could even show a fifth of their power.

He was a monstrosity who might not have had a Superior Job, but had truly taken his place in the realm of pre-Superiors.

In a way, he might've been even less like a newbie than the Unbreakable.

I need to carefully look for a way to win, AT thought. I still have the stat advantage.

There was no need to respond to the boy's provocations, and the debuffs that he'd used on the previous opponents wouldn't work on AT.

AT's Embryo was called Pale Night's Falling Light, Tianren Wushuai.

It was based on the five signs of a heavenly being's decay described in Buddhist scriptures, and its core trait was countering debuffs. A Type World Embryo, Tianren Wushuai negated all debuffs afflicting AT himself and five nearby targets selected by him. Additionally, it built up the debuffs and returned stronger versions to the ones who sent them.

Tianren Wushuai was debuff-focused retribution-type Embryo in its sixth form. This Embryo was what had allowed his party to make it so far down in the Tomb Labyrinth, which was full of fearsome debuffs.

And because AT had this Embryo, using debuffs on him was a mistake that would ensure the aggressor's defeat. The main reason he'd even gone after the Orb offered on day three was because he thought he could win against the monster contained within it, which used curse-based debuffs.

However, it was because the boy knew AT had this power that he didn't use any actual debuffs. You couldn't fall into someone's trap if you knew what they were capable of.

Thus, the battle between Masters had turned into a repetitive exercise. AT used magic in the hopes of finally landing a blow, while the boy prevented him from doing so.

The only thing that could break this equilibrium were their monsters, aiming straight for them.

"MHOOOOOO!" One creature let out a bellow, while the other was silent. The landdragon tried to charge toward AT, but a giant lump of ice stopped it.

The ice was actually a Permafrost Golem AT built using a skill. Golem creation as an art was the forte of jobs practicing earth magic, and this was the ice version of that. This golem was on the higher end of Pure-Dragon tier in stats and was specialized in endurance, making it capable of acting as a wall against the landdragon's attacks.

AT WIKI's magical attacks were negated, but so were the physical assaults of the boy's landdragon.

One could say that this battle was a stalemate, and that they were equally matched.

The succubus, the landdragon, the slime... I see that their stats are enhanced, but even with the buffs, they don't surpass Permafrost.

Just like the boy's passive skills enhanced his creatures, so too was AT's ice golem, Permafrost, enhanced by AT's passives as King of Glaciers, and he could heal it by transferring some of his own magic to him.

Additionally, Wallvisage Mind, Banwall, an MVP reward he'd acquired a while ago, had a skill that enhanced the defense of anything defending him.

AT silently looked at his opponent. AT was the head of the fifth-ranking clan and specialized in group battles, but even as a solo unit he was a jack-of-all-trades who could fulfill the roles of tank, attacker, and healer.

And that was exactly why the boy, who could fight him as an equal, was so menacing.

Based on what Identification tells me, he's not hiding much in terms of gear. Besides the antimagic MVP reward and that slime, every item just gives a bonus to his minion capacity. Makes sense—without those, it would be difficult for him to field two Pure-Dragon-tier monsters.

Duel rules prevented using party slots for monsters—any creatures used in duels had to fit within one's minion capacity. With The Tournaments being no different in that regard, the boy's gear was heavily focused on increasing minion capacity to overcome this problem.

If you take away what they got from buffs, the two monsters have stats that are below average for their species, AT thought. They must've only recently evolved into a higher form.

During the stalemate, he used Reveal to read the boy's cards as thoroughly as he could.

I know about his jobs. The only mystery...is that Embryo.

The succubus standing at the boy's side—she could fly, but didn't seem to be using that ability to fly over Permafrost to attack AT. She was only casting healing magic on the landdragon.

But she was wary of AT and would be prepared if he came close.

She used Charm, healing magic, and a bunch of other skills, didn't she? Her core trait isn't clear. Maybe she has a learning or stocking skill? That would make their power pretty low, though...

Embryos had a tendency to lose output strength in compensation as they became able to do more things. And if they didn't become weaker, they began demanding higher costs from their Masters.

So far, it didn't look like the boy was paying much of an external cost, which made it safe to assume that the skills themselves had a weak output.

Is he hiding something? The Embryo hadn't done much in the matches so far, but that was exactly why AT suspected she was holding something back. This was the final, so AT also expected the boy would play some trump card related to her—perhaps a skill that required time before it could be used.

In that case, I should probably act first. This means responding to his provocation...but I have no choice.

AT extended his hands toward Permafrost's back—as well as the landdragon and the boy behind it.

The boy prepared to snap his fingers, but then stopped.

He realized that AT wasn't casting a spell.

A moment later, something scattered before the boy's eyes.

It was the slime that the boy wore as clothes. It had moved to protect him, and a part of the creature had been blown away.

"...I see," the boy said in sudden understanding, looking at AT's hands—and the things that were clutched in them.

AT had used Instant Equip to take out two guns.

They were not normal guns, however—they were magic guns.

The job that had focused on crafting these kinds of weapons had been lost to time, so they were in limited supply—a treasure that could only be unearthed as archaeological finds from ancient ruins.

And AT was now holding such a rarity in each hand.

The one on the right fired light magic—lasers—while the one on the left fired wind magic—invisible bullets.

He'd acquired these magic guns using the money he'd earned from countless quests and kills, and there were two reasons why he'd gone for weapons imbued with elements that weren't ice, his usual speciality.

The first reason was that he wanted to be prepared against anyone his element didn't work on. Second, he wanted to have a means of attacking in situations where magic itself was unusable.

And as had just been proven, the boy wasn't able to stop these magic guns from firing.

This meant that AT now had a means of attacking him.

It was worth keeping these a secret until now. Even this won't be enough to finish him off, though.

The gunfire had basically taken the boy by surprise, but he'd remained unharmed himself by getting his slime to protect him. This meant that even if he couldn't negate the actual firing, he was still able to read what AT would do.

AT kept firing, but with the slime going all in on the defensive, his attacks seemed to have little effect. It was a metal slime that carried the Orichalcum name, so it must've had a high resistance to magic attacks—or maybe the MVP reward with the magic-negating skill also came with a bonus effect that increased the boy's magic resistance.

AT could keep firing like this, but it didn't seem to be nearly enough firepower to take the boy down.

Which was why...

I guess I'll try something else. The technique is still in the experimental stages, but...

...AT fixed his eyes on the boy and began circulating his magic.

The boy responded by snapping his fingers, but nothing happened.

Magic overflowed from AT's body, quickly reducing the temperature within the dueling barrier. It was as though he'd managed to actually use the White Field spell that the boy had canceled earlier.

"This is..." The boy's expression became puzzled. Of course it would. After all, unlike the guns, this was clearly cryomancy.

And yet, he couldn't cancel it. The temperature continued to drop.

This was because it was magic, but it wasn't a magic skill.

After spending lots of time experimenting with various things here in Infinite Dendrogram, AT arrived upon a certain bit of info. Job skills were basically guided processes that were automatically activated when you chose to use them. The job system provided assistance so that everything would occur as directed.

However, he knew that it was possible to achieve effects without that guidance—to use your MP, the magic in your body, without using a job skill.

It was said to be the pinnacle of technique, arrived upon by tians who took jobs from the The One series—the modification and creation of magic.

At the end of his testing and information gathering, AT had been able to take a step into that realm and craft an awfully simple original spell. What he was doing right now was the equivalent of a "Hello, World!" script—the most basic of all basics.

He merely converted MP into cold.

It had no amplification, no fixed direction, and not even a form. And it wasn't even worth comparing its efficiency to using magic through a job-assisted skill—it was outrageously expensive.

It was too primitive to really be called magic at all, and so simple it didn't even have a name.

But that was exactly why those gloves couldn't break it apart.

Perhaps they could negate a magical effect at the moment the boy snapped his fingers, but AT was continuously turning magic into cold. It could be said that he was essentially using an extremely primitive spell with a short recast time over and over. There was no point in stopping just one of them.

That MVP reward likely targets and cancels individual skills. That means that it can't prevent this quick, repeating casting!

AT WIKI was entirely correct.

Cold filled the barrier, but the boy didn't snap his fingers again. He also understood that it wouldn't work against this new strategy.

And so...frost began forming on the landdragon and the face of the boy protected by the slime.

The boy was silent. As he began to freeze, the beautiful young man looked even more like an ethereal snow fairy.

However, the cold was bringing him closer to death. He wasn't like AT, who had a passive skill for cold resistance as King of Glaciers, or an Embryo that made him immune to the Freeze debuff.

If the temperature continued to plummet like this, AT's victory would be guaranteed.

"I see that top rankers really aren't people to be trifled with. I'll admit—I didn't expect this."

In this enclosed world, now so cold it felt like his very breath might freeze, the boy still spoke the same way as he had before.

"You have a lot of cards in your hand. I thought the same about King of Beasts when we recently fought, but those on the top really do have a huge variety of options at their disposal. How enlightening."

The boy smiled...

"I myself haven't shown everything I've got either."

...and the succubus followed up his words with a skill activation.

"Union Jack—Dragon-Devil-Man." At that moment, the boy disappeared.

In his place, there now stood the imposing figure of a man. He had devilish wings, and in his right hand he held a lance that looked like a tangle of dragons' horns.

His species and build did not resemble the boy's at all, but he still wore the golden clothing, the MVP reward was still equipped on his hands, and his beauty had not changed even though he seemed to have aged in the blink of an eye.

A Sentinel fusion skill! He, the landdragon, and the Embryo had become one.

AT instantly understood that the three's stats were combined to create a single entity stronger than the base.

This is bad! The moment that thought crossed his head, an intense clang rang out.

Permafrost, which had been able to withstand the landdragon's attacks, began to crack from just a single hit from the fused Dragon-Devil-Man.

It combines their stats—and even their skills! That includes his passives as a tamer and the Sentinel's self buffs! No, it's not just that... The Enchanter single-unit buffs are there too! Normally it was pointless for anyone with a job in the tamer grouping to have Enchanter among their sub-jobs. Skills from the enchanter grouping couldn't be used when you had a tamer grouping job set as your main. That was because they weren't generic skills, but instead specific to different groupings.

However, if this fusion skill had the effect of joining the stats of the fused creatures and making all their skills usable...it would enable the use of job skills from different groupings too. That would mean that he'd be buffed by his passives as a tamer, the Sentinel's self buffs, and Enchanter single-unit buffs...

This is bad. He's completely surpassed my golem! The Dragon-Devil-Man's stats were overwhelming Permafrost. AT was still releasing magical cold, but with the Dragon-Devil-Man being as powerful as he was, it would take some time to freeze him to death.

There was no doubt that he would destroy Permafrost and kill AT before that happened.

AT tried firing the magic guns to keep him away, but the Dragon-Devil-Man defended against the shots by just turning the handle of his lance without even looking at him.

Neither the guns nor the cold could kill him.

AT might've been able to stop him in place and eventually destroy him if he could use his cryomancy as King of Glaciers, but that was a bad move as long as his opponent still had that MVP reward.

But then, AT's eyes widened as he realized something.

The Dragon-Devil-Man was holding the handle and swinging the lance with both of his hands.

I could do it now! At this moment, AT WIKI realized he might be able to make an early move and cast a spell before he was defeated.

Ice Age—the job ult of King of Glaciers—was still unavailable to him due to his lower level, but with some enhancement from another skill, White Field should be able to deliver a similar amount of power.

"Magic Power Magnification...!" AT put away the gun he held in his left hand and began focusing magic in that hand instead. At the same time, he fired a volley of lasers using the gun in his right to keep his opponent busy.

If the spell went through, that would be fine by him. And even if the opponent canceled it, he'd be forced to free his left hand and snap his fingers to do so—an obvious opening. AT would use that to allow Permafrost to recover and restabilize the battle.

With that in mind, he cast the spell.

"White Field!" AT's voice rang out.

Hm...? But the moment he activated the skill, he noticed the state of the Dragon-Devil-Man's left hand.

He'd let go of the lance—AT had expected that much.

However, the hand was in a different shape. Instead of snapping his fingers, the Dragon-Devil-Man was spreading his left hand open wide.

And then...he grasped it shut.

At that moment, AT's body exploded from within.

"Wh-What...?" AT instantly suffered a fatal amount of damage that scattered his entire body, immediately reducing his HP to 0. He was defeated without even knowing what had happened in the end.

There was, however, one thing he did understand.

His opponent had been laying a trap for him from the moment he started using the lance with both hands.

And as though to prove this point the victorious enemy was smiling.

Tournament Day Three
Reward: Name Unknown (Presumed Type: Undead).
Core Traits: Poltergeist, Curse-Based Debuffs.
Winner: Lost Heart Rook Holmes.

Interlude: Tournament Day Four

Sorcerer, Ray Starling

Yesterday, the third day of The Tournaments, victory was claimed by our guy Rook.

We didn't fight the UBM he won though. He said he would fight it by himself once he was ready, and he was busy preparing for it today too. Rook was determined to do it solo and seemed to have his reasons, so all I could really do was pray it worked out for him.

Since he was a dark horse, though, my bet on him won me so much money that I went and bought him a dozen Brooches, Elixirs, and High Spirit Waters. Hopefully they would help him against the UBM.

Anyway, today was the fourth day, and the member of our clan participating this time was Io. Since she was heavily specialized in physical attack power, if she landed a hit, she could do heavy damage even to those above her.

But unfortunately...

"Pulverized. Cracked. Blasted... I was the one who ended up shattered..."

She was now laying her head on the restaurant table, clearly in low spirits.

"You did your best. It was a pretty bad matchup, huh?" I asked.

"Whatever was I to do against an opponent such as that...?"

"Wow, the fight was so one-sided it's making you talk weird," said Fujinon.

Io had lost on her third fight, and the player who'd beaten her was Phara, a K&R member who used a barrier that deflected weapon attacks. This barrier negated all and any attacks from Io's Five-Ring, letting Phara fire arrows from relative safety and not giving Io a chance to do anything.

Io could've gotten through the barrier if she'd just used her hands instead of weapons, but that would've reduced the fight to a simple comparison of levels and combat experience. Winning against a battle-hardened Tenchi warrior without using any weapons would've been a challenge.

So yeah, Io had ended up suffering a total defeat and was really down now, so her friends and I were holding a little consolation party for her.

"Heh heh heh...our clan's winning streak has been ended...by me. I am easily the weakest woman in Death Period...a real disgrace, I am..."

"N-No, you're not..." said Kasumi.

"Again, why are you talking like that?" said Fujinon.

Mm-hmm...Io's not acting anything like she did when we celebrated Rook's win yesterday, I thought. Also, her words kinda sting. I mean, I dropped out on my second fight...

"And this was a matter of compatibility," Fujinon continued. "Though I really didn't expect it to be this bad based on what I saw last time."

She and Kasumi continued to console Io, but something she said caught my attention.

"Last time?" I asked.

"Some time ago, the three of us participated in an arena event. Our first fight was against Juliet's team, though, so we were completely crushed and lost right away."

Oh, I'd actually heard about this. If I recalled correctly, it was an aquatic battle event where participants had to wear swimsuits.

"The final match was between Juliet's team and a K&R team," Fujinon continued, "which included Phara, so..."

"Oh, I see." Even though Io knew what Phara was capable of, it hadn't helped her when they'd fought.

"If only I was matched with the K&R member who protects against magic instead of weapons..." Io said.

They had that too? I thought. No surprise there, I guess. K&R is a big clan. "Anyway, that's it for Death Period's fourth day attempt, right?"

"Yeah, and with none of us taking part tomorrow or the day after, our next appearance will be Marie on the seventh day," said Fujinon.

And with there being ten days of The Tournaments, this meant that the first half of the entire event was over for us.

"I've got college, though, so I won't be able to watch her fight," I said.

"We've got school too." In Japan time, the seventh day of The Tournaments would take place Monday afternoon, so no decent student from that area of the world could stay around and watch it.

I wonder if I can still gamble, though. Maybe I can message Shu when the betting begins and get him to buy a ticket for me?

"I guess those of us who are likely to win in the remaining days are our teacher and Figaro, right?" asked Fujinon.

"Yeah. Ray's brother and Hannya aren't participating, so..." said Kasumi.

"Hrmm...Figaro is one thing, but I don't think Marie stands a chance," I said.

"Huh?" the two girls said in unison. I knew very well how powerful Marie was. I mean, she actually gave me the death penalty once.

But the thing about Marie's powers was that...

"HMPH!" My thought was cut short by Io raising her head. "I'm not gonna forget 'bout this loss! I'll get strong enough to break through any barrier!" Well, it looked like she went back to normal. She even stopped speaking weirdly.

"That's the spirit! Do your best," I encouraged. "For now, though, just order and eat whatever you want. It's on me."

"Oh, I'll be feastin'!"

"C-Can we really...?" Kasumi asked, somewhat worried, but there was nothing to be concerned about.

"Thanks to The Tournaments, my wallet is pretty fat these days. Also..." I said, glancing to the side.

There, I saw a black mass, ravenously consuming what was probably many times her weight in food.

It didn't even have to be said that this was my partner Nemesis. She'd been here the whole time, but instead of taking part in the conversation, she was doing nothing but eating.

"It's nothing compared to how much I spend to feed her."

"Ah ha ha..."

The amount Nemesis consumed seemed to be growing as she evolved. If it was this bad after she just became high-rank, how would it be in the future?

I probably needed to make more money, just to be on the safe side.

With that in mind, I'd resolved to bet on today's Tournament too.

I was pretty sure that the winner would be Juliet.

Chapter Two: Tournament Day Six — He Who Lost His Other Half

City of Duels, Gideon, Central Arena

Tournament: Day Six.

Reward: Name Unknown (Presumed Type: Dragon [Eastern]).

Core traits: Tornado, lightning, and explosion generation (Uncontrollable in its Orb form).

◇◆

After Death Period claimed The Tournaments of days one, two, and three, the fourth was taken by Fallen Knight Juliet, who also went on to defeat the UBM she won.

On the fifth day that followed, the reward was a UBM with the core traits of "fatal damage negation followed by time-limited body enhancement," and the possible MVP reward attracted many powerful individuals to fight for it.

However, one of them was a Superior—Tsukuyo Fuso.

She was a significant obstacle even for the strongest, and in the end she was the one who claimed the popular reward offered on day five.

That marked the halfway point of the ten-day event—and today, day six, was the beginning of the second half.

The way this day's contest progressed was, in a word, expected.

The reason for that was the involvement of the player who held second place in the duel rankings—The Unsheath Kashimiya.

Indeed—instead of going for the popular Orb offered on day five, this individual, who was among the kingdom's strongest, went for the sixth day's unremarkable Orb. This one seemed to have effects based on sky magic like creating flame and lightning.

Anybody who went for this one because they assumed that the strong

Masters would avoid a reward this boring turned out to be completely wrong. As a result, Kashimiya cut down each and every opponent he was matched with and, as anybody could have expected, made it to the final battle.

And now, those who bet money on him—and everyone else who was certain he would win—were now waiting for the last duel to begin.

“I thought that Masters had worse technique than tian Superior Jobs, but it looks like there’re exceptions to everything!”

And among this audience, there was someone who wasn’t human.

It was the technician who’d operated in Caldina under the name of Crys Fragment, and whose true identity was that of a mass-produced Prism Person, Crystal Tuner.

After the incident aboard the luxury liner Eltram, she’d separated from her sister-unit and arrived in Altar to support Integra. Now busy with work as a court magician, Integra wasn’t able to leave Altea much, and Crys took it upon herself to act in Integra’s stead and gather information that might be relevant to their activities.

However, there wasn’t much of note so far.

We need to truly understand the powers of the Masters who will side with the kingdom. That will prove invaluable in controlling the situation. Splendida was invited into Dryfe and will look into their side, and I have other...connections besides him. But when it comes to Altar, it would be best to investigate personally.

Crys thought back to the Superior she regularly made deals with—the man who sold various bits of info to her. Apparently, after that incident, he’d headed to Dryfe on foot, but he must’ve arrived by now.

“Ngh...” As she watched the second semifinalists—one of whom would end up as Kashimiya’s victim—Crys downed a concentrated MP potion.

Being Crystal Tuner, she represented an immense success of Prism Person mass production, but there was still something about her that put her at a disadvantage compared to the five made before her.

Specifically, it was the magic shortage caused by lower core quality.

Crystal Tuners were preceded by mass-produced Prism People—if they could even be graced with that name—called Prism Soldiers, who had compensated for their lack of a core by increasing in size and using living beings as parts, a clunky and inelegant solution. And while not as extreme, Crystal Tuners had a similar problem. The magic provided by their cores was less than that provided by those in the original Prism People. If the biological parts of Crystal Tuners didn't regularly ingest potions, they would be unable to use their weapons to their full potential.

This was a problem caused by the necessary materials being inaccessible, and not even Flagman could ultimately overcome it.

However, the Crystal Tuners themselves believed that this was their only flaw.

Okay, time for the finale. Kashimiya's opponent had been decided, and day six of The Tournaments would end soon. Crys had been active for nearly two thousand years and had seen many strong individuals—but even to her eye, Kashimiya was clearly a huge step above.

Thus, she was certain that he would instantly claim victory.

Thinking that seemed almost like it would jinx it, but her thoughts had no effect on the expected outcome.

The duel was over in a flash—before even a single second could pass.

Once the commendations and other formalities ended, the audience would be asked to leave for safety reasons while Kashimiya challenged the Orb.

"All right. Now..." This was when Crys's job for the day truly began.

She had to confirm that today's reward was what she thought it was. If it was what she expected, their plan would have to be heavily reworked.

It's not just a matter of combat potential. It's proof of a history that Huang He wants to erase, she thought. I find it hard to believe that they would present it to another country, but the way they handled the left half makes it likely that they've simply lost the knowledge of it.

Soon enough, the ceremony ended. Crys stood up from her seat alongside the rest of the audience.

I wonder what will come out of it... Well, actually, if I'm right, I know exactly what's going to happen.

In her place, she left a drone so tiny it was little more than a speck. Before The Tournaments, she had gone around placing these drones in various areas of Altar.

I hope I get the information I want.

◇◆

After the audience left the central arena, Kashimiya stood upon its stage.

As he waited for the battle to start, he examined the many blades he employed while fighting. He was surrounded by five K&R members—the volunteers he'd gathered to form a party. Since there were only five available slots, there was an intense conflict in the clan over who would get them, but Kashimiya had no means of knowing this.

This probably didn't have to be said, but none of the others were after the MVP reward—they simply wanted to be in a party with Kashimiya.

"Darling, why'd ya pick this one, anyway?" Rosa, who had taken her slot as though it were a given, posed that question to Kashimiya.

She had multiple reasons for participating in this fight—venting her anger over losing to B3 on day two, helping Kashimiya in the struggle, and simply getting the UBM battle she'd missed out on, among others.

However, she had no clue why Kashimiya had gone for this Orb rather than any other.

In response...

"Intuition."

...Kashimiya said just a single word—a reason which did not seem enough of an answer.

"Intuition?"

"Yes. I somehow felt like today's UBM is the strongest."

Rosa didn't know what to say. As far as tiers went, the strongest one was obviously the Mythical on the final day.

However, Kashimiya's intuition had led him to today's UBM instead.

"Also, if the situation is right, this one might actually come out too," he continued as he caressed the red sheath of the odachi—the large sword—at his side.

Not even Rosa knew what that odachi was. It was something he hadn't had back in Tenchi, and by the time they'd reunited in Altar he'd already acquired it. She believed it was an MVP reward, but it seemed to reject Identification and the like.

However, it was clear that it was one of the aces he kept up his sleeve.

"We have prepared the barrier," said a worker managing the arena's barrier function as the optimization concluded. Covering the stage as usual, it had been put up without the setting that restored the combatants once the duel was over. It also had the feature that prevented escape from within while still being tuned for maximum toughness.

And, in case of an emergency, Shu and Hannya—Superiors—were standing at the ready right outside the barrier. If it was broken and the UBM began a rampage in the city, they would do what they could to destroy it. Even if they hadn't been there, the waiting room contained the Masters who had achieved second place and below in today's Tournament. Normally, they would have their turns against the monster if Kashimiya failed—but if something happened, they would rush in and destroy the UBM before it caused damage to the city.

The barriers were reliable enough, though, that not a single UBM had escaped thus far.

And at that moment, a pedestal with an Orb on it was brought to the middle of the stage.

This was the reward for winning on day six—the Orb containing a UBM with an unknown name.

"Starting countdown until we destroy it with a remote explosive. Ten, nine..."

At those words, Kashimiya's party readied themselves.

The supporting jobs already put up their buffs, while Kashimiya assumed an unsheathing stance. Rosa used her Embryo ult to consume bones focused on STR and AGI, then hid herself and prepared to deliver her job ult as Nobushi Princess, A Kill Supreme.

Two pre-Superiors focused on swift strikes—the battle would surely end the moment the UBM was released.

"Three, two, one...ignition!" The pedestal exploded, shattering the Orb on it. Kashimiya and Rosa instantly sprang into action.

The moment he did, Kashimiya's eyes widened. In his unsheathing stance, the Godlike Unsheathing skill raised his AGI all the way to 500,000.

Because of that, the moment the Orb shattered, he was able to see what appeared out of it.

The UBM's presumed type was dragon—specifically, the usually serpentine, wyrm-like dragons often associated with the east. However, it certainly didn't look the part. While its body was covered in black scales, its shape was that of a human.

But it wasn't a full person—it was only the right half of one.

Above its head, there was text that said Blue-■■■■ ■■■■■-Turn, Heilong-■■■■■■.

That was an awfully odd name for a UBM. It was as though it had somehow lost half of it along with the other half of its body...

But however warped it may have been, a humanoid was easier for Kashimiya to cut than a dragon. He could now simply approach and lop off its head as he always did.

But then, he widened his eyes even further. Kashimiya stopped unsheathing his blade.

It wasn't the UBM's appearance that made him stop his approach, but his own instincts.

Rosa, however, did not stop.

"A Kill Supreme!" She left her ambush state and activated her job ult as she jumped behind the UBM.

It was a combination of her Embryo and job ults, and the damage she could deliver with it was so immense it could fell a standard UBM in just a single hit, and this UBM had just appeared from the Orb and didn't seem to fully grasp the situation, let alone notice or see her coming. The battle would be over in a flash.

And it most certainly was over...

...when Rosa was turned to dust by a bolt of blue lightning that struck her.

"You gotta be kiddin' me," Shu said in shock as he watched all of this happen from outside the barrier.

The lightning was the UBM's counterattack. While the monster seemed to show no reaction to her, it had retaliated against Rosa's attack without even turning around.

However, what shocked Shu wasn't that, but what happened afterward.

Rosa had two means of avoiding fatal damage: the MVP reward she used even in duels, and a Brooch that wasn't normally allowed in them—and yet she turned to dust despite that. This meant that the retaliation didn't come in the form of just one attack.

What happened to Rosa could be explained like this.

Rosa had been hit by lightning, but she'd survived thanks to her Brooch breaking and had continued to try and deliver her job ult.

In response, the UBM had instantly fired a second lightning strike. Thanks to her MVP reward, she survived that one as well and went on to teleport herself.

However, as if it had instantly known exactly where she would move, the creature had fired a third lightning bolt that had finally turned her to dust.

Rosa possessed two means of evading fatal attacks, but not even she could do anything against this blue lightning that not only killed her in one hit, but struck multiple times.

Fired with lightning speed that allowed no evasion, the bolts ensured her death the moment she got close.

Blue and Turn. The visible part of the name... I see how it is, Shu thought as he came to understand this UBM's power.

The creature had most certainly not even noticed Rosa. In fact, it had no idea what was happening and was actually very confused.

But even in this state, that skill had activated and attacked Rosa.

A fully auto counterattack, Shu concluded. The blue lightning wasn't fired by the UBM consciously, but targeted Rosa automatically. The fact that it struck not just once, but until she was dead meant it repeatedly activated on any hostile that was close enough to it.

That lightning ain't easy to dodge. It's gonna be hard to beat this if you're a vanguard who just fights in melee... I guess it's specced to specific conditions. But that power level makes it seem like we got a Mythical-tier absurdity on our hands.

Shu readied himself as he analyzed the UBM's abilities. Although it was humanoid, Kashimiya was woefully badly matched against it. However...

Well, speaking of absurdities, the little guy ain't far behind, is he?

When the lightning struck, the UBM wasn't the only thing that surprised Shu. Now that the UBM had instantly killed Rosa, the K&R members were on high alert.

One could even say that they were frightened.

However, Kashimiya was different. He remained calm and didn't seem to be the least bit perturbed.

At some point, he'd switched from the odachi he'd had initially and now had the one in the red sheath. The moment the Orb was broken and the UBM released, he realized that the other odachi—even the marvelous ones made of Mythical metal—wouldn't be good enough.

And in his other hand there was the red sheath's odachi...already unsheathed. This sword that seemed to choose its opponents so carefully was now baring its edge.

And it hadn't just been drawn.

It had, in fact, already cut something.

There was no blood or flesh sticking to it, however, so what exactly had it cut?

Nothing less than the lightning itself.

The moment Rosa was hit by the auto-counterattack, Kashimiya was struck by lightning too.

This was a lightning strike that the UBM called for manually when its instincts registered him as a threat, and its power surpassed even that of the blasts that had turned Rosa to ash.

And yet, Kashimiya had cut it with the odachi of the red sheath.

On Earth, there were multiple legends of blades being used to cut lightning or the gods that wielded them. But what happened here was no legend—it was done right before everyone's eyes.

A single slash from this blade was able to nullify the power of a lightning strike that could easily turn people to dust.

Was this truly possible? Yes, it was.

It could be accomplished by combining Kashimiya's Godlike Unsheathing technique with the power of the red sheath's odachi—which was a fragment of an SUBM, Prototype Horobimaru-Star Sword.

Kashimiya returned the odachi to its sheath, then put a little power into his fingers to see if he could take it out again—and just like that, with little resistance the sword of the red sheath showed a bit of its blade.

This self-conscious, capricious odachi was awfully obedient today.

This meant that even the sword itself recognized this opponent as one worth cutting.

Kashimiya maintained his unsheathing stance, looking out for the right moment to cut down the UBM. However, before he could, something rather odd was happening with the UBM in front of him.

"...Ah..." This UBM, a creature of just the right half, let out a sound as it reached for its left half.

But as one could clearly see, there was nothing there for it to touch.

"Al...me...ra..." It looked around and spoke a name as it searched for its other half, but needless to say, it was nowhere to be found.

There was nothing here except for the strange UBM with only a right half—Heilong.

“Where...am I...?” As reality began to sink in, Heilong’s consciousness gradually regained focus.

Kashimiya noticed that change, and his expression shifted slightly. “I failed,” he murmured.

Kashimiya understood that he could no longer cut the creature.

It wasn’t because his opponent had suddenly spoken human words—that wouldn’t even slow his blade, let alone stop it.

It was simply because the UBM had grown stronger.

The creature’s presence was now on a different level than it had been when its consciousness was still vague and unfocused.

Kashimiya instantly understood that Heilong possessed fearsome powers that he had barely begun to show. In the back of his mind, he could envision himself being struck down by this opponent’s attacks.

It was possible that whatever trump cards Heilong had could be cut down by Kashimiya’s Prototype-Star Sword—but this would not allow him to claim Heilong’s head.

Perhaps he could prioritize decapitating Heilong even if he was killed in the process? As a Master, Kashimiya could come back from death. Trading one of his countless lives in exchange for the one and only life of a monster or tian could be considered a victory.

But I can’t say the idea is appealing, Kashimiya thought. He didn’t want a victory achieved through something other than his own blade and technique. If he were to cut, to win, to kill, he would pick and choose his methods.

He would cut through head-on, win decisively, and kill absolutely.

Kashimiya was the asura of unsheathing, and this was his line of thinking.

Heilong also understood that it now faced someone who could cut it down.

The odachi of the red sheath that Kashimiya held was able to remove Heilong’s head—something which couldn’t be said about any common blade. The sword had the power, and Kashimiya had the technique needed to make that happen.

The blade hadn’t actually touched Heilong yet, but it wouldn’t be out of the question if its head flew clean off its neck the very next moment.

While neither of them knew what the other was truly capable of, they had already read that their opponent could surely kill them. Each combatant possessed godlike technique that allowed them to understand that much.

That was why Heilong chose not to fight Kashimiya.

“I have...no business...with any of you...” As it said that, Heilong’s body was enveloped in light. Then, it held up its only palm—the right one—above its head.

The next moment, it released a pure-white beam of light.

This attack was reminiscent of Xunyu’s Zhenhuo Zhendeng Baolongba, though it was shining with a heat many times greater than that skill.

It was a light unknown to Kashimiya, and even Shu did not recognize it. Certain other duel rankers like Figaro and Riser, though, would’ve had a certain name spring into their minds.

Tri-Zenith Dragon, Gloria.

This attack was like the beam of the fearsome dragon—not the one fired by Figaro’s Gloria α, but one that matched the Overdrive possessed by the original Gloria itself. It was akin to the power of the one-horned head that was defeated before Shu had fought the dragon.

The light that carried this immense power struck the arena barrier, and though it had been optimized for toughness, it didn’t even last a full second before it was broken.

If it had been fired horizontally, it would have devastated Gideon. Instead, it formed a pillar of light that rose up into the sky.

The shattering of the barrier was a clear emergency, and a number of people leaped into action. Shu switched to his Godcloth, and Hannya called Sandalphon.

Those watching feared that this was the beginning of a battle that could reduce Gideon to dust.

But that didn’t happen.

Once the pillar of light disappeared a few seconds later, Heilong was no longer there.

It was clear that after breaking the barrier, he’d instantly flown off like the wind.

The UBM inside the Orb that served as the reward for day six had escaped from Gideon.

◇◆

After that, the arena was buzzing with activity—an obvious reaction, seeing that the barrier that had contained every UBM so far had been rendered meaningless and allowed this one to escape. This created a great many problems that needed to be addressed and tasks that needed to be done, such as launching the search for Heilong or figuring out what countermeasures needed to be put in place for the remaining Tournament days.

However, those directly involved—Shu included—understood that this was the optimal choice in the conflict and the best result they could've hoped for.

Heilong could have used the light to escape, or it could have used it to destroy Gideon and be decapitated by the others present as a result. The pillar of light meant that it had picked the former option.

Even if Kashimiya hadn't been there, the forces currently in Gideon were capable of killing Heilong. Thus, the UBM chose to escape, and that was nothing but a blessing to the people of Gideon.

While the prize might have been gone, the city narrowly avoided suffering any damage from a UBM with attacks that seemed to rival those of Tri-Zenith Dragon, Gloria.

The only problem left was the question of where Heilong had run off to—and that was something that nobody knew.

After all, although he'd escaped, even Heilong itself hadn't been sure where to go.

Indeed—it knew nothing that awaited it beyond its flight.

◇◆◇

Former Nowest Canyon

This was the land that was once called the "Nowest Canyon."

Its ecosystem had been thoroughly destroyed in the Big Three's battle against Gloria, and then its landscape had been ravaged in Shu and Sechs's fight to the death. There was nothing left here besides a wasteland created by incredible amounts of unfettered energy.

But now, there was also a UBM here—Heilong had landed here from his flight.

He'd only cared about escaping from Gideon, and flew off without thinking about where.

Thus, one could say that his arrival here was a mere coincidence.

If not that, he may have subconsciously thought that this place, so flooded with immense energy, would be where he would find a hint that would help him search for his other half—a being who consumed energy without end.

But Heilong's other half wasn't here. There was nothing in this place, and coming here was a complete waste of time.

...No.

"Hm...?"

There was a single person here, seemingly blending with the scenery. Clad in tattered gear and covered in sand and dust, this person looked somewhat like an old scarecrow. However, he was certainly a human male. He just stood in place all by himself, his gaze fixed slightly upward for some unknown reason.

He wasn't looking at the sky, though.

It was more like he was looking up at something that was once there—an afterimage of the massive, fiendish dragon that had been defeated here.

Heilong looked at the man. Unlike Kashimiya, he didn't seem to give off a menacing aura.

Instead, what Heilong felt from him was...unease.

The man made Heilong feel as though it were looking at a pit trap or something of the sort—an abyss so deep he couldn't see the bottom.

"Who's there?" With those words, the man turned to Heilong.

He could now see the man's face, and the sight of his eyes really made Heilong feel as though he had glimpsed some kind of abyss.

The man's eyes were fixed on Heilong, but they weren't looking at him. His brain received the visuals, but he had no thoughts about what he was seeing.

He seemed to care neither about Heilong's bizarre form, nor about the immense power within his half a body.

The man felt nothing, and Heilong saw the emptiness in his heart.

"A UBM? You look like you might be a tian too, but...not like I care."

The man wasn't merely saying that—he truly, from his core, believed that Heilong wasn't deserving of any regard.

The UBM's eye widened. It thought back to the time before it—or maybe he—was sealed by the Draconic Emperor, before he became a UBM and was one of the gulong ren—ancient dragon kin—and he couldn't think of a single instance where anyone had looked at him this way.

The man before him had his eyes fixed on Heilong, yet saw nothing positive or negative. He didn't run away in fear or attack him for the MVP reward. Unlike those Heilong had faced upon waking up, this man wasn't even wary of him.

He looked at Heilong as though he were but a strange part of the scenery.

"Why are you looking at me? I clearly don't look as peculiar as you do. Ha ha..."

As if amused by something, the man cracked a faint smile. Though minor, the change in the man's expression somehow filled Heilong with dread.

That must've been why his eye widened and, before he even realized he was doing it, Heilong had fired a white beam from his right hand—a beam that carried enough heat to easily destroy Gideon's barrier and enough power to match even the Overdrive skill that had once burned the very ground they stood on now.

It wasn't something one single man could weather—he too would certainly vanish without a trace when the light struck him.

"Ohhh. Now that brings back a bad memory."

That was only true, however, if the man were unarmed.

At some point a single sword had appeared in his hand. It was his other half—his Embryo.

"Næġling."

The core trait of this Embryo was "surpassing." Going beyond even those who stood above its wielder, it was the embodiment of transcendence.

"End Breaker." The sword spoke with a girl's voice as the man swung the blade and cleaved apart the beam of intense heat.

Indeed—that single strike not only split apart a laser as powerful as Overdrive, it also cut straight to the source of the beam and carved a deep wound into Heilong's body.

"GHA...AGHH...!" For the first time in centuries, Heilong felt pain.

After he'd become human and he and his other half had become a UBM, the only time he felt pain was when they fought the Draconic Emperor.

Almera—the other half that was the heart of their defenses—wasn't with him right now, but even so, slicing through Heilong's attack and sinking a blade into him was an inhuman feat.

With the pain of the wound, Heilong realized that the fear he'd felt wasn't unfounded.

He shouldn't have gotten involved with this man. He had stepped directly into a pit that would send him to the abyss of death.

The man said nothing, glancing at his own sword. Then, he turned to look at the trajectory of Heilong's split beam—it had melted everything in its path.

He seemed to have thoughts about both the UBM's attack and his own retaliation.

"Well. No matter." With those words, the man began approaching Heilong, sword in hand. Heilong backed away in fear.

He was the half of what was once called an Irregularity, and yet this man had just brought him to the brink with a single hit. That was fearsome even lacking his other half and weakened by his many years sealed away. The beam he'd fired was his most powerful attack, and yet the man dealt with it like it was nothing. There was no chance the automatic lightning strikes would do anything to him.

Heilong imagined himself dying, and the idea of leaving his other half behind terrified him more than his long years of imprisonment or even his own doom.

"Almera... ALMERAAAAAAAAA!" Heilong then found himself shouting his other half's name. He called out to her, but it was a call that could never reach anyone.

However...that call did stop the man in his tracks.

Still holding the sword in one hand, the man stood in place...and asked a simple question.

"Is that a woman's name?"

Though perplexed by what was happening, Heilong answered with a nod.

"Is she your beloved?"

In response to this follow-up question, Heilong nodded instantly. There was no hesitation—his very body moved to answer.

"...I see." Upon seeing Heilong's reaction, the man took a moment to think...

"Go."

...and pointed his sword toward the horizon.

The man said that he would let Heilong go.

The UBM was still perplexed, but hoping to survive to meet his other half—Almera—he obeyed the man's order. He flew off, just as he had when escaping the arena, and disappeared into the distance to search for her...and to never again encounter the man with those terrifying, empty eyes.

The man watched as Heilong vanished.

As he did, his sword left his hand. After turning into sparks of light, it assumed the form of a girl in her late teens, her red hair tied in a ponytail.

"Captain..."

"I'm not 'Captain' anymore," said the man, rejecting the words of Næġling—his own Embryo.

"That was a UBM... Are you sure we should've let it go?"

The man he used to be would've certainly defeated this UBM—and he wouldn't have done it solely for the MVP reward. It was a UBM that launched attacks before talking. A creature like that would no doubt endanger tians, and this man would've certainly wished to eliminate it.

Yet he'd chosen to let this UBM go.

That was something the man he'd once been would never have done.

"Neither the MVP reward nor the tragedies matter to me now..."

However, he himself had insisted that he was no longer that man.

Næġling understood that too. The shape of her Master's heart simply wasn't what it had been before.

And that was exactly why she herself was different too.

After all, Næġling was now a Superior Embryo.

◇◆

Evolution into Superior Embryos was a matter surrounded by a great deal of uncertainty, and the conditions for it to happen were thought to be unknown.

Even the control AI associated with it—the Infinite Embryos—didn't have a full grasp of it. That was because it seemed like they had things in common, while at the same time shared absolutely nothing.

However, there was a hypothesis that the reason it was a mystery was not because it was caused by some universal factors that people did not yet understand—but because the trigger for each Embryo was different.

Basically, besides the Resource absorption that the Masters would perform through combat and other means, evolution required that an Embryo also undergo some sort of mental catalyst that would act as a trigger—and this mental catalyst was different for every Embryo.

Some achieved it through mortal combat, others through idling about. Some achieved it through vanity, others through self-denial.

This hypothesis wasn't proven, but it was widely believed that it would explain the differences in Embryo evolution.

That was exactly why the control AI, who believed this hypothesis to be correct, brought about SUBMs and other disasters. They knew that such things would steer emotions in a number of extreme directions, either by making the Masters stand up to protect something important...or by making them lose it.

And for Næġling, the breaking blade, this "trigger" had been despair.

She'd overcome the final wall because of the despair her Master had felt upon losing everything.

Today, the moment he logged in for the first time in a while, she began evolving into a Superior Embryo, and the power she gained because of it was exactly as demonstrated.

With it, he would've been able to sever even Gloria's Overdrive.

The blade he now wielded was capable of repelling the disaster that attacked his town of Claymill. He had gained the power to protect what was dear to him.

But what was dear to him—the one he loved—was already gone.

◇◆

For Næġling's Master, the fact that he was now a Superior held no meaning. He saw no value in it, nor was he happy she had evolved.

"Cap— I mean, Master, what will you do now?" Claymill's save point was gone, so when he'd logged in, he appeared in Altea.

From there, instead of going to Gideon where he'd once competed with his friend, he went to the place where the monster that had taken everything from him had met its death.

"I'll go to Claymill's ruins. I'll leave flowers for her...and that's it."

He'd go to the now-obliterated city and offer flowers to his late wife. He'd finally gained enough willpower to do at least that much, and it was the only reason he'd logged in today.

He figured it was the last time he'd ever log in.

Næġling was silent. She didn't say anything to argue.

This was the first time in a while that she'd met her Master, but she couldn't stop him from leaving again. She believed that it was her fault he'd become a broken man. She hadn't had enough power to prevent it—all of her strength had arrived too late.

Thus, she and her Master—King of Swords, Foltesla—exchanged no more words and left what remained of the canyon...

"Found one. A Superior who could oppose the Incarnations."

...and neither of them realized that a minuscule drone was watching them leave.

Interlude: Lunchtime

Reiji Mukudori

It was Monday afternoon. I was in the college cafeteria, having lunch with my fellow freshmen—Soprano Natsume and Dragon Kasugai.

Kasugai was wearing sunglasses and sporting a mohawk, and Natsume had a spot of face paint on her, so we stood out pretty hard. I could feel the passersby looking at us, probably wondering, “What kinda group is this?”

We’re just talking about our lessons and Dendro, though...

“Hey, Mukudori, I heard about some big gamblin’ goin’ on in Altar. Izzat true?” Kasugai asked.

“People gamble on it, sure, but it’s a dueling event at its core. It’s gonna go for ten Dendro days straight.”

“Shiiit, man, that sounds fire!”

“I’m sure it’s very intense. If only she went to an event like that too...”

Kasugai’s eyes gleamed at the prospect, but Natsume seemed kinda tired.

“Did something happen to you in Dendro?” I asked.

“I guess you could say an asura forced me to play a game of tag.”

Is that some kinda horror-themed event? I wondered. “Are those the kind of things you do in Tenchi?”

“Well, the place is pretty wild even at the best of times,” said Kasugai.

“Oh, don’t mind it too much,” said Natsume. “I can consult you if I need to, right?”

“Sure,” I said.

“Roger!”

They were in Tenchi, though, so I didn’t think that I could get involved in whatever they were talking about. If only events like The Anniversary happened more often. It’d make it easier to meet up with them.

“But back to the duels... Why’s Altar holdin’ the event, anyway?” Kasugai asked.

“Oh, well, basically...” I went on to explain Altar’s current situation and that they needed to strengthen their forces and prevent further terrorism.

“Izzat so? That reminds me that the daimyos in Tenchi did somethin’ similar.”

“Really?”

“Uhh...you’re talking about how when the power of Masters started getting recognition, the daimyos began gathering anyone thought they was hot stuff, right?” said Natsume.

“Yeah, that. They held a whole buncha fights they watched personally, and the big shots who won got hired with some good terms. That’s how most people working for the big four houses got their place.”

My impression of Tenchi was that it was a lot like Sengoku Period Japan, but this seemed closer to what you would’ve seen in the Edo Period.

Hold on, I thought. “Wait. From what I heard, Tenchi doesn’t even have that many arenas.” This was something Xunyu had told me, but Gideon in Altar was a huge exception when it came to how many arenas a country had available. Other countries had around three at most. “Not everyone had a place to hold these matches in their own territory, right?”

Most daimyos must not have had an arena, and I doubted that those who did would lend theirs out so their enemies could grow in power. In response to my question...

“They do them without them,” the two girls said, nearly in unison.

“Huh?” They’d said it loud and clear, but I still thought I must not have heard correctly.

“They just went at it without any arenas.”

“Oh... Well, dead Masters only get the death penalty and come back in three days, so...” It was a reckless solution, but if they had no arenas, it made sense to resort to that.

“Tians do it too, though,” said Natsume.

“Hell, these matches have been part of their culture since before we Masters came floodin’ in,” said Kasugai.

“I get that it’s the ‘land of strife,’ but man...” The value of life in Tenchi was even lower than I’d imagined...

Then again, the country had produced people like Kashimiya, Rosa, and Jubei, so it felt like...yeah, that situation made a whole lot of sense. Tenchi’s asuras were something else.

There was also Juliet and Chelsea’s friend, Max, though. As far as Tenchi people went, she was pretty reasonable. I also felt kinda sympathetic toward her as the rational one of the group.

“Well, guess ya can say that everyone in power is crazy ’bout buildin’ up their forces,” said Kasugai.

“That’s true in both Altar and Tenchi,” Natsume added.

“Well...I guess you’re right.” It would be hard to argue that the only difference between the two countries was simply that Altar had an ample amount of arenas, though, enabling them to do this kind of thing without loss of life. After all, the arena count must’ve been one of the circumstances that influenced the character of the land.

“Speakin’ of buildin’ forces, that Dryfe place you’re up against must be doin’ that too, doncha think?”

Kasugai’s words made me think a bit. She was more than likely correct—actually, it’d be weird if they weren’t doing that. Even at the time the peace talks were being held, Dryfe already counted King of Thieves and King of Chariots among their Superior roster. And with the next war just around the corner, it wouldn’t be unusual if they were trying to get more of them.

There was something else I was curious about, though.

“I was reborn! I’m now so powerful that I’m nothing like what I was before.” That was what a certain Superior told me right before the peace talks.

Hell General Logan Goddhart—a man I once fought and defeated.

During the peace talks, after he spoke about how much stronger he’d become, he went on to instantly die to Fuso’s Fatal Field combo.

But that left me with a question...

“What, exactly, was this power-up that he got?” I mused. We still didn’t know the details of his newfound strength or how much trouble it could give us.

Chapter Three: Miss Zeta's Expository Lecture—Job Builds

Imperial Capital, Vandelheim, Noble District

In the heart of Vandelheim, surrounding the pre-ancient fortress of Imperstand—the symbol of Dryfe—there was a district full of noble residences. In recent times, though, many of them were inhabited by people other than nobles—specifically, Masters.

The reason for this was the recent civil war, which had killed many nobles and freed up their lands and mansions. Reinhard's faction was a small one and had little support among the nobility, so this was a somewhat expected result of their victory.

However, they'd made the best of this situation and used these now-vacant mansions as a way to win over Superiors and other powerful Masters. They had served as an example of the luxurious rewards Dryfe would present them for their performance in the previous war.

And one of the Masters granted such a mansion was Logan Goddhart.

He was very pleased with it. The gaudy mansion and the many servants that came with it had more than satisfied his vanity. In a way, Dryfe's plan to win over Masters had been more effective on him than anyone else.

However, the state of his mansion had recently changed completely. The beautiful residence fit for the highest nobles had undergone changes that at first glance did not make a great deal of sense.

And it wasn't just its appearance that had changed.

The sound of boiling emanated from Logan's room day and night, and the scent of blood traveled even beyond the closed door.

To top it off, occasionally a saddened voice would say, "Not enough... It's not enooough..."

These frightening occurrences didn't sit right with the servants. Over half of them had already quit, fleeing the manor before the horrors within overtook them. What had happened to Logan Goddhart, exactly?

Answering that would mean going back to the moment right after he and Zeta made their deal...

◆◆◆

2045, Early April

Logan was one of Dryfe's Superiors, as well as their top-ranking duelist.

However, his standing had since dropped all the way down into the dirt.

His first failure was his defeat at Quartierlatin.

Logan had lost against King of Orchestras Veldorbell, followed by Ray Starling the Unbreakable. This was also recorded and made public in a video that made it seem as though he'd lost to Ray Starling alone, leading to him being ridiculed as the Superior who was beaten by a newbie.

Ray had also defeated Franklin before that incident, but Franklin wasn't a combat job and it was well known that most of his firepower—his monsters—had been taken out by King of Destruction before Logan overcame him. This made Logan's defeat stand out even more.

But Logan would go on to lose to Franklin later on—and after the Giga Professor had lost to Ray Starling.

His second major failure was Logan's loss of his duel champion status.

He was defeated in a duel against King of Thieves Zeta, which cost him his first place rank. Logan had been using his status as champion to keep his spirits up despite everything, but with this, he had lost even that.

This finally broke him to the point that he considered quitting Infinite Dendrogram altogether, but he was stopped by Zeta—the very person who'd defeated him.

She invited him to join her clan—Illegal Frontier—and offered to make him stronger in return.

◆

Logan was in his room, and before him was a bandaged woman—Zeta—standing in front of a whiteboard. The whiteboard had been brought by Zeta herself.

"Awareness. I am sure you know this, but when it comes to wide applicability, your Embryo is among the most powerful of all."

Logan was silent. He found himself unable to even nod in response to that. After all, how “powerful” was it really when it had set him on such a losing streak? And this argument just wasn’t convincing when it came from one of the people who beat him.

“Job. It multiplies 10 values in your usable job skills by 10. The increase in total strength that it can provide doesn’t need to be explained.”

The core trait of Logan’s Embryo, Rumpelstiltskin, was “job skill modification.” No matter what the job skill was, as long as it had numbers in its description, Rumpelstiltskin could overwrite them. When it came to the variety of things that could be done with it, this Embryo was definitely near the top.

“Explanation. I will tell you about an effective build, but let me preface this by saying that Hell General’s synergy with other jobs is absolutely awful.”

“Huh?” Zeta had just come out and said that Logan’s SJ was no good. He did know about the importance of synergy between main and sub jobs, though. He’d spent a lot of time looking into it personally.

“General. The General series is very quirky even by Superior Job standards. First, they allow you to operate with armies that number in the thousands—far beyond the party slot limit. Second, they have active buffs that they can give to everyone in their army,” Zeta explained as she wrote down these job details on the whiteboard.

Even mass buffs from the enchanter grouping weren’t able to affect so many individual units at once. Not even the Over Enchanter Superior Job was an exception to this.

“Loss. The General series pays for this by losing some degree of versatility.”

Logan was silent, and Zeta continued. “Specialization. You might have tried this before, but you can’t use any Creature Enhancement-type skills from your sub jobs. This is because Hell General is a commander specialized exclusively in leading devils. Skills that buff other monsters too are outside its synergistic scope.”

He was indeed familiar with this fact. Logan had been able to use such skills before he became a Superior Job, but when he made Hell General his main one, they had become unusable. That had been disappointing for him, since if this synergy existed, he would’ve been able to enhance his devils’ stats by as much as 600% with just one of Rumpelstiltskin's ten multipliers.

Now, however, it had turned out that this wasn't just another case of main and sub job incompatibility, but a flaw in the job itself stemming from its place in the General series.

"Unbuffable. Other Generals, however... For example, while Bug General has a level EX Insectoid Enhancement skill that buffs all their forces by 100%, Hell General has nothing like that."

"HUH?! I knew Hell General didn't have a skill like that, but other jobs do?!"

"Compensation. In exchange, you can summon your devils instantly."

Logan fell silent. He'd abused this feature of the job enough to be quite familiar with it. He did find it unfortunate, though, since if he had access to the same kinds of buffs as the other Generals, he'd be able to increase his army's power by 1,000%. On one hand, there was summoning armies from nothing—but on the other, there was greatly enhancing the army one already had.

Most people would probably be unable to say which one was the better option.

"Incongruence. While many Generals sit at the top of the tamer grouping, they lack versatility. Because of this, they have bad compatibility with many sub jobs. I suppose you tested that yourself."

Logan said nothing, but she was completely right. He'd thought of picking up some job with armor or shield skills that cut damage by 10% and multiplying that tenfold to make it 100%. With his High Tamer job having become useless to him, he'd picked up a shield-focused job and actually tried it, thinking he'd be invincible.

However, that had gone nowhere, as the skills of the shield-focused sub job stopped functioning whenever he had Hell General as his main. His other such attempts ended the same way.

"Why is it so incompatible?"

"Role. Generals are commanders—not martial artists who wield their skills on the battlefield."

"But history is full of generals who were good at fighting one-on-one!" Logan blurted out, thinking of the military commanders of ancient China and the like. Logan himself was a Hell General who commanded devils, but that didn't stop him from standing on the front lines either.

“Compatibility. There are Generals that are compatible with such skills, but only the Generals that command humans.”

“But I... Hell General has good growth in physical stats too! Why is it not compatible with direct combat?!”

“Agreement. I also think it should be. But this is how it has been set within Infinite Dendrogram’s job system. Hell General doesn’t even count as a tamer, but a summoner, so that’s all the more reason it is the way it is.”

“The devs really don’t get it, huh?! Why didn’t they give growth to other stats, then?” Logan expressed his rage at the developers for the way his job was configured—though from the perspective of the control AIs, everything about jobs had been set up by their predecessors, so it was something they couldn’t do anything about. If they could, they would’ve started by adding more Superior Jobs and given all of them more slots to motivate players to grow and evolve. But they couldn’t even do that, which spoke volumes about their power to affect this particular area.

“Exception. There is a sub job with a damage reduction skill that even a General can take.”

“Oh? Which one?”

“Paladin.”

The name of the job made Logan freeze.

Paladin was a high-rank job from the knight grouping—and it had Paladin’s Aegis, a skill that cut damage by 10%. And in the current state of the world...it was a job exclusive to Altar.

It was also heavily regulated, so there was no chance that Logan, being on Altar’s wanted list, could ever get the job for himself.

And most importantly, he had bad memories associated with it and thus was averse to the job on an emotional level.

“Knight. Then again, according to historical writings, it was in a Knight General’s build, so it might be that it’s a limited combination acceptable only in this particular case.” In other words, it was an example of the Generals that commanded humans which Zeta had mentioned earlier.

“Ohhh, so that’s how it is. Then I guess it doesn’t matter to—”

“Unrelated. Well, the bigger problem is that Hell General is a devil-focused job derived from the satanist grouping, so there’s no chance a holy job would ever work if you had it as a sub. The incompatibility at play here is worse than any caused by it being a General job.”

“Then why’d you get my hopes up in the first place?!” Logan barked again, betraying a little bit of the player’s true nature. He felt that there was no reason for Zeta to have even brought up Paladins at all.

“Understanding. I believe this explanation helped you understand something.”

Silence.

“Incongruence. Rumpelstiltskin and Hell General currently have poor compatibility.”

“Yeah! I can tell!” Rumpelstiltskin’s core focus was job skills, but all ideas for enhancing Logan’s build had been crushed by Hell General’s lack of synergy with other jobs. The General series itself was lacking in versatility and had a narrow range of jobs it meshed with well. Perhaps due to its Resources being focused on instant devil summoning, Hell General was especially bad.

In fact, it could be said that Rumpelstiltskin was the only reason Logan was able to get any use out of it at all.

“There’s nowhere for me to go from here!” Logan yelled. “What am I supposed to do?!” First he got on a terrible losing streak, and now it was clear that his job was no good. Once again, Logan contemplated quitting Infinite Dendrogram.

Zeta looked at him and thought—wondered—about the abnormality of the Hell General job.

Even if you ignore all those factors, she mused, Hell General is still more unbalanced than the other jobs in the General series. Zeta felt as though the job was...lacking an important piece. Then again, Hell General has advantages exclusive to that job, so perhaps the system’s designer just placed more value on those things. Still...the base costs are far too steep. I’ll think about this at a later time, alongside our leader and Rascal.

Zeta once again looked at Logan, who was feeling miserable again. He looked like the broken man—or rather, elementary school boy—that he had been before Zeta came to negotiate.

“Advantage. One of the advantages only Hell General has is that you can summon your devils instantly.”

“...But other jobs do that too. Summoner, for example...”

“Denial. Summoner and elementalist groupings have to prepare their summons ahead of time. They might need a medium for summoning or an area abundant in the appropriate kind of natural magic. Meanwhile, Hell General’s instant summoning can be used again and again as long as you can cover the costs. And that cost is just the number of Resources that you have to provide.”

The monsters summoned by the summoner grouping had their info and concept stored in mediums. Summoning them involved making them materialize by sending magic to that medium, and if they were defeated, you had to wait until they could be summoned again. Of course, there were summons like Balloon Golem which specialized in quick recovery, but that was besides the point.

Meanwhile, the elementalist grouping, represented by the likes of the fairy queen Titania, summoned elementals that had preferred environments based on their element and couldn’t be used to their full potential if summoned away from them.

In contrast, Hell Generals could summon their devils whenever, wherever, and many times over. As long as the costs were covered, they could be summoned right as the previous batch was defeated, and there would be no end to them.

An inexhaustible army—an advantage that perhaps made it as good as any other job in the General series.

“But it’s not like I can pay for the costs forever. Especially when summoning Zero Exceed.”

Indeed he was correct—but even ignoring the Mythical Zero Exceed that could only be summoned by sacrificing an MVP reward, summoning many Legendary Gigaknights wasn’t cheap either. Logan could multiply the rewards of each sacrifice by 10, but it made little difference to him.

“And it’s not like the devils I summon are guaranteed to win either. Zero Exceed lost against him.”

He’d always thought that Franklin was beneath him, yet the Giga Professor had easily beaten Logan’s trump card—the enhanced Zero Exceed. This dealt a huge blow to Logan’s self esteem.

However, Zeta shook her head.

“Unrelated. The power of the individual devils has nothing to do with the heart of the problem.”

“What?”

“Forte. The combination of Hell General and Rumpelstiltskin is undoubtedly a wide-scale suppression type build. It should not try to depend on the power of just one devil...to stand in the same field as solo combat builds or wide-scale extermination builds."

"So what am I supposed to do?"

"Calculation. Ten times twenty is greater than one hundred, so you should just summon lots of Gigaknights. As many of them as your Soldier Devils...enough for them to compose your army."

"What?" Zeta's explanation had become so absurd that a single word was all Logan could manage in response. He knew what she was saying, but it was like they weren't on the same wavelength.

"Combination. Put the summoner grouping in your sub jobs and learn Mass Simultaneous Summoning. This synergizes with Hell General and can be used when subbed. You can probably multiply the simultaneous summon count too. You will be able to instantly summon lots of Legendary devils. Maybe not a thousand at once, but still enough to fill the slots of a few summons. Even a tenth of that might be overkill though."

"Were you listening?! I told you that I can't cover the costs!" Logan himself had considered the combination with Mass Simultaneous Summoning. However, it only increased the amount he could summon at once—and the cost grew accordingly. Even as a Superior, Logan didn't have even a fraction of the wealth needed to summon thousands of Gigaknights like he did Soldier Devils.

And despite having to eat these costs with every summon, he wasn't making enough to cover them.

Dryfe gave him something for his expenses whenever they had a task for him, but the battle in Quartierlatin had pushed him beyond the provided amount. It had been a financial loss as well as a physical one.

Logan was about to lose his temper at Zeta's nonsense, but...

"Question. Why do you even have trouble covering the costs? Knowing your abilities, there is no way you should," said Zeta, her tone full of confusion. "Switch. Then again, it is precisely because you haven't realized it yet that I can present this to you as a way to make you stronger. I have a plan to optimize your somewhat incompatible Hell General."

"Again, what do you want me to do?"

In response to that question, Zeta put her hand on Logan's shoulder...

"Change. Become a crafting job."

...and said something that Logan had never once considered.

“Why would I ever be a...?” Logan said, clearly apprehensive, the image of Franklin looming in his mind.

Zeta ignored him and continued. Writing words on the whiteboard, she finally reached the heart of her lecture.

“Resemblance. The logic behind it is similar to the ‘Gem crafting-storage-barrage theory.’”

“Gem crafting...?” As Logan tried to remember what that was, Zeta went on to explain.

The Gem crafting-storage-barrage theory was one proposed candidate for the strongest build, coming from a time before the Guardian-Jaguarman theory when Masters only had high-rank jobs and Embryos.

Crafting jobs in the gemcrafter grouping created Gems by filling them with spells from their magic sub jobs. The Gem crafting-storage-barrage theory was based around making plenty of high-rank offensive spell Gems before combat and throwing those in alongside your actual spells in combat. Though producing the Gems was costly, they enabled the users to spam spells nearly as powerful as high-rank job ults instantly and without MP costs, making it quite a fearsome build.

However, when AGI-focused combat jobs that moved at subsonic speeds became commonplace, the theory declined when its users began dying before they could throw enough Gems. It also stood no chance against the stat-focused Guardian-Jaguarman theory. Still, it had once been quite well known.

And Zeta was about to bring it back.

“So you want me to make Gems?”

“Denial.” No—she was about to make Logan evolve in a way that only he could. “Gold. Start by making some gold. Or metal, rather.”

“Huh?” Logan tilted his head. Zeta held up her index finger and, somewhat cheerful in a way her mummy-like face couldn’t hide, said this...

“Alchemy time.”

◆

Infinite Dendrogram had many kinds of alchemy.

Some specialized in the creation of magic items, others specialized in concocting medicine, and yet others focused on the production of homunculi. There were many and varied approaches to it.

Among them, the closest thing to a basic approach to the science of alchemy was the concept of “transmutation of lesser materials into greater materials.”

An example of this was the Mithril Transmutation skill.

It was a skill that had a different description depending on the user. For example, an Alchemist who had Mithril Transmutation at skill level 1 and DEX at 100 would see this:

“Transmutes the Silver used into Mithril with a mass ratio of 10 to 1. Has a 100 (DEX) x 1 (skill level) ÷ 100% chance to succeed.” The skill description included the calculation and success rate, which was based on the owner’s DEX.

In a way, crafting jobs cared about such equations even more than combat jobs.

Most metal transmutations in alchemy were like this, with the numbers being the only difference. They transformed a higher amount of lesser materials into a smaller amount of greater materials with a success rate based on DEX. This meant that alchemists without high DEX or skill level would only end up wasting the base material.

However, this was what the skill would look like with Rumpelstiltskin involved:

“Transmutes the Silver used into Mithril with a mass ratio of 10 to 10. Has a 1000 (DEX) x 10 (skill level) ÷ 100% chance to succeed.” Basically, it would transmute all the lesser material into Mithril with a 100% success rate.

It was an absurd kind of alchemy—literally like making money out of thin air.

By simply using the skill, Logan could increase his wealth and create something to cover the costs of his skills. With just a little funds and stats, he could snatch Resources from the world itself without end.

Zeta had realized that he was capable of this almost immediately and wondered why he hadn’t been doing it before now. After all, Logan was already using Rumpelstiltskin to inflate the points he got from items or sacrifices. In a way, it was a real mystery why he hadn’t hit upon the idea to inflate the number of the sacrificial items themselves.

The reason he’d never noticed something so obvious was simply because he had never considered becoming a crafting job at all. It wasn't like he would face them in battle, so he hadn't even looked into them to know what they were about.

Another reason was that, to put it lightly, he didn't exactly have the best impression of Dryfe's top crafting job.

Regardless, Logan went on to become history's most efficient Alchemist.

Of course, alchemy grouping skills were unusable with Hell General set as his main, but he could simply change his main job whenever he had to do alchemy. And since his MP and DEX stayed the same even when he had swapped Hell General to a sub job, he had more than enough MP and DEX to use for alchemy. Obviously, the efficiency of his alchemy would only increase as his job and skill levels grew—and when he achieved that, he would never need to worry about costs ever again.

This was what made it similar to the Gem crafting-storage-barrage theory.

The fusion of crafting and combat jobs. He would sacrifice the results of his inexhaustible work as an Alchemist ahead of time to cover the costs of using Call Devil Gigaknight to summon dozens or even hundreds of Legendary devils whenever it was time for combat. There was no need to use any tactics, to worry about being wasteful, or to pick and choose which devils were right for the situation—he would easily crush most enemies with an army of powerful devils.

It was a brain-dead build centered around using immense resources to summon wave after wave of potent minions.

If it were named like the theory Zeta had likened it to, it would be "alchemy storage-legendary-barrage theory," and it could be realized by Logan alone.

After being taught about this build, Logan immersed himself in alchemy. His skill level grew, and eventually he wasn't producing just Mithril—some of his transmutations were a huge success and produced High-Quality Mithril. He sold part of what he produced and used the earnings to buy lesser materials to do more alchemy.

Soon, he had amassed a vast amount of points for devil summoning.

Zeta looked at him, saying nothing. Logan became stronger, just as she'd intended, but it did bring a thought to mind.

As a low-rank Alchemist, the best Logan could do was Mithril, but High Alchemists had a job ult that made it possible to make even Mythical metal. Normally, the success rate for that was extremely low and burned through a huge amount of the lesser materials used, but that wouldn't be a problem for Logan.

Mythical metal was extremely valuable. It not only fetched high prices on the market, but also had immense amounts of Resources stored within. It was the peak of all metals mankind could currently create and was often used as material for weapons whose legends were told for centuries to come. Some of these weapons were so powerful that they exceeded even Epic MVP rewards.

When you think about it like that... Zeta thought. Mythical devil—until now, Zeta had assumed it was called that just because it was a Mythical monster.

But now, she thought that perhaps it had gotten the name because it could only be summoned by sacrificing a sufficient amount of Mythical metal.

It had the "pay with a single sacrifice" condition, but if a hunk of metal could be used for that purpose, Logan could build toward it again and again.

In that case, it wasn't out of the question that Logan could eventually make armies composed not of Gigaknights, but Zero Exceeds.

Imagining that, Zeta felt that she might've given him a bit too much of a boost. At the very least, it was clear that she had to keep him reined in as a member of IF.

Regardless, this build had inspired Logan so much that he'd actually gone on to reset most of his low- and high-rank jobs. He rushed to have them replaced with jobs from the alchemy and summoning groupings. Despite that, he was so focused on transmutation that he hadn't leveled them much. He'd also avoided alchemist guild's job quests to keep his new powers a secret.

He didn't think it was much of a problem, though—and when the peace talks came, he'd gone there with the intention of overwhelming the enemies with lots of Legendaries.

However, Tsukuyo Fuso had acted first—and because his level was too low, her Fatal Field had killed him instantly.

And that was why his "alchemy storage-legendary-barrage theory" had yet to see the light of day.

Imperial Capital, Vandelheim, Noble District

Some time had passed since Logan became an alchemist.

Following the instakill incident, he'd gone on to level up, and now...

"Not enough... It's not enoooough..."

...he was muttering all of this with a pained expression on his face.

In his room, there was a still with alchemical pure water boiling inside and a pile of base alchemy that gave off the bloodlike smell of iron.

"It's not enough materiaaals..."

And as he continued his alchemy, Logan also continued to whine.

He was currently working on the High Alchemist ultimate job skill, Hypothesis: Ars Magna. It was a crafting skill that produced rare and special metals, Mythical metal included. And, as the Hypothesis in its name suggested, this High Alchemist skill was incomplete. And this was despite the fact that it was an ult.

Specifically, greater metal transmutation demanded a lot of materials, as well as many catalysts. And to top it off, the skill didn't give complete control over what metal it would produce. It wasn't unusual to set which metal you wanted to create, only for the transmutation to give you something else.

That in itself wasn't a problem for Logan. His Rumpelstiltskin was capable of influencing the chances of getting what he wanted.

"I ran out of materials and got almost no Mythical metal for it..." Logan's problem was that he wanted to create Mythical metal, but Hypothesis: Ars Magna didn't allow him to set it as the goal. He had no choice but to try getting it by accident.

As a result, he was now struggling with a lack of materials—and the alchemy gacha. Thanks to Rumpelstiltskin, he hadn't lost much metal and could just pour most of it back into the gacha, but the same couldn't be said about the catalysts.

"Apparently, King of Alchemy has the non-Hypothesis, proper Ars Magna..." Zeta had told him that that version of the skill could probably set Mythical metal as the goal. "But I'm not getting the message that I fulfilled the job conditions...”

However, Logan had yet to do whatever was necessary to become King of Alchemy. In fact, he didn’t even know if the throne was open or not. It wouldn’t matter much if it was a tian but if it was a Master, he’d never be able to get it.

“And I’m about to use up all the catalysts Zeta left...” The items that King of Thieves had been providing for him hadn’t seen a resupply since the day he’d gone to the peace talks. This was because Zeta herself hadn’t returned to Vandelheim yet.

“I dunno where she is or what she’s doing, but I hope she comes back fast,” Logan mumbled. “That reminds me that the new Superiors are about to arrive...”

He’d heard the rumors that Dryfe had invited several independent Superiors and that some of them had accepted.

The fact that Zeta and Murdoch weren’t enough for the imperator and that he was securing more forces had shown Logan one thing: the imperator planned to finally end it this time.

“I dunno who they are or where they come from...but I hope they have better personalities than Franklin, are less introverted than Behemot, and can handle enemies I can’t...”

At one point, Logan would’ve certainly said that he could take Altar all by himself. However, his losing streak had left him broken, and the things he’d learned through Zeta and alchemy had changed him.

He considered the risks of playing solo, thought of compatibility, examined the costs, and was mindful of social disposition.

In real life, Logan Goddhart was nothing but an elementary school boy.

But now, the effect that his growth would have on the world remained to be seen.

Chapter Four: The Invited Immortals

Dryfe Imperium, Micalos Wasteland

The imperial capital of Vandelheim and the Barbaros March to Dryfe's southeast were separated by a vast wasteland.

Though it had once been a heavy producer of grains, the region had recently become barren—just like the rest of Dryfe—and now not even the most basic vegetation would grow there.

Now, the desolate soil was being showered with rain. The downpour and the clouds formed a thick veil that smothered most of the daytime light.

And yet, despite these unfavorable conditions, there was a caravan of ten dragon carriages making their way through it.

They were transporting people to Vandelheim.

The imperium's capital was currently hiring a wide range of individuals in preparation for going to war with foreign powers. Some of the people in the carriages were rural folk who wanted a job simply to avoid starvation, while others sought to advance some sort of cause. Among those driven by their goals, there were youths who loathed Altar for turning their backs on Dryfe and vigorously claimed that the country must be defeated—as well as one elderly woman who hoped that the two lands could somehow be on good terms like they had been in the past.

Various conversations could be heard from the train of carriages cutting through the wastes. No one really knew which view was right, nor did they have anyone to guide them, creating a chaotic atmosphere that permeated each carriage.

"Hmm-hm-hmm..." But there was someone there who clearly seemed dubious.

In one of the wagons there sat a person wearing a mask made of intertwined wood and dressed in cheap-looking clothes, humming quietly.

Such an appearance would normally make people uneasy, but the crest on the back of the person's left hand made everyone disregard all of this as just the typical quirkiness of a Master.

Under the mask, the man himself was wearing a smile.

He—Splendida the Evergreen—was simply enjoying this turbulent mood.

Following the incident on Eltram, he'd crossed the blazing heat of the desert, arrived at the Barbaros March, and hopped on this dragon carriage.

The imperator had invited Splendida to join Dryfe in the coming war.

As always, the scenery here isn't much to look at, but the people's expressions sure are colorful, he thought. The air around him was one of chaos caused by an imminent war, but Splendida found it nothing but delightful.

In the real world, he would never even think of heading to a country that was preparing for such a conflict—after all, he could die.

However, Splendida's body was an avatar, and couldn't die permanently even if it were killed. In fact, his avatar couldn't be killed in the first place.

And because of this, he could enjoy what was happening purely as a game.

No matter where, when, or what—to Splendida, all of Infinite Dendrogram was an event.

Everything's better when you take it easy, he thought. There were people in this world like the imperator and Crys. The former had invited Splendida despite the fact that he'd taken part in an assassination attempt, and the latter had struck deals with him despite the fact that he was a Master.

They were both people driven by a sense of duty toward their country or the world, but Splendida had no such feelings. He accepted the invitation simply because he wanted to watch a fun event from a front row seat.

He wasn't like King of Beasts, who gave her all for the sake of a friend.

He wasn't like King of Swords, whose spirit had been broken by love.

To him, Infinite Dendrogram was, from start to finish, nothing but an exciting game—an MMO so well-made that you could mistake it for reality, except that you could play without risking your life.

The chaos in this dragon carriage was just another thing for him to watch—an attraction he would observe from a safe vantage point.

And the war he would take part in was no different.

In a way, he was the healthy kind of ludo.

This reminds me that Altar should be having their Tournaments right about now. I was interested in that too.

The idea of a tournament that rewarded its winners with UBM fights was an enticing one, but he'd ended up accepting Dryfe's invitation instead.

But even if he'd gone to Altar, he couldn't have won The Tournaments anyway—because they were focused on duels.

Splendida could only use his powers in a real battle, for that was the nature of his combo.

Anyway, the imperator decided to let bygones be bygones and called little old me over to him. While I didn't make it to the peace talks, the invitation is still valid. And I got a follow-up invitation through DIN too. Did he have any reason to call someone like yours truly instead of any other freelance Superior*?*

Part of that might've been that the imperator knew Splendida's powers, but he felt that there had to be more to it.

Well, whatever it is, I finally made it to Dryfe. All that's left is to meet the imperator and accept the request. That'll take me off the wanted list.

That was the reason Splendida was wearing the mask. While tians tended not to comment on how Masters were dressed, things were different if the Master was wanted.

I gotta say, though, this carriage sure is cramped.

While Splendida looked dubious, none of the other passengers were actually avoiding him. That was simply because there was no space to do so. There were people seated on every space available—including the ones to his sides—as well as on the floor in the middle. This caravan had ten carriages, but that wasn't enough to prevent this overcrowding.

Splendida turned his masked face to the side. "Eek...!" The tian lady sitting there uneasily let out a yelp and shrank back. Who could blame her?

How sad! I'd usually try to pick up a cutie like that, but I really can't take my mask off here! Just as he enjoyed various incidents like they were merely in-game events, Splendida was a Master who courted women far more casually than he did in real life—unlike they did there, such actions didn't come with the risk of social damage in Infinite Dendrogram.

"U-Umm...what is the matter?" the lady asked, somewhat unsettled by the masked man staring at her without saying a word.

"Oh! Sorry about that! I was just wondering why this carriage is so crowded! Though that's not to say that tu did not catch my eye with your beauty, bambina!"

“I-I see...” The words Splendida wove from under his mask made the lady feel overwhelmed, but also somewhat relieved. Perhaps she felt that he might have been more amiable than he appeared.

“Umm, this is just a rumor I heard, but...” According to the lady, this row of carriages belonged to traders and thus carried not just people, but cargo. And since there was more cargo than usual today, the amount of inventory left less space for people.

“Mm-hmm. I see.”

If something was being brought from the Barbaros March, it would be either products of mining or goods smuggled from the neighboring countries of Altar or Caldina. And whether that was food or plant-based potions, they were precious here in Dryfe’s current situation.

Ohh...that would explain it... Splendida thought.

And the moment that thought crossed Splendida’s mind, an explosion shook the dragon carriage.

The Demi-Dragon pulling it cried out, and the passengers screamed. Mixed with those sounds, there was the distant roar of an engine.

“Dr— B-Bandit attack!”

“They’re after the cargo...!”

The words of the coachmen reached Splendida’s ears.

“Well, it wouldn’t surprise me if Dryfe had those too...”

He’d heard rumors that some people in Altar were fed up with the country and decided to steal a fortune before fleeing the country. Splendida thought it wouldn’t be that strange if Dryfe had people doing the same thing. Even ignoring the coming war, Dryfe was on the verge of running out of resources.

“But...what he said...” Splendida was still hung up on that one coachman’s exact words. It felt as though he’d wanted to say something else at first, but then hastily changed it.

However, the situation didn’t give Splendida much time to dwell on it.

“Th-The ground ahead was blown away! There’s a net too... It’s an ambush!”

“Where’s the bodyguards...?! Didn’t we have a group of Masters in the back?!”

“Dunno when this happened, but they’re gone!”

The sudden attack filled the dragon carriages with a chaos quite different from one before. Some people were desperately jumping off the vehicles and running on the muddy wasteland, only to slip and fall. Some carriages tried to force their way ahead, but the net that had been laid out overturned them.

The entire caravan could no longer move, and the screams of the people under attack echoed all around.

"Ah...ahh...!" The lady next to Splendida was shaking so much that she was frozen to the spot. Not saying a word, he put his right hand on her shoulder to calm her down.

But a moment later, the carriage they were in was turned over as well. Up became down as the people inside were tossed about.

"AAAHHHHHH!" Splendida quickly took the screaming lady in his arms and crashed into the ground through the carriage's cover.

A multitude of pained voices could be heard coming from inside the flipped carriage.

"Are tu all right, bambina?" With a slightly hoarse voice, Splendida questioned the girl he'd saved.

"Y-Yes. Thank you...!" the girl said, gazing at her savior...

"Ohh, that's good to hear."

...only to see that his neck was tilted at a right angle, clearly caused by a fierce impact with the ground.

"Ahh..." At this sight, which might have been straight out of a low budget horror film, the girl fainted dead away.

"Well, anyway..." Splendida grabbed his head with both hands and snapped it back into place. His neck was broken, and the muscles had been torn, but it was instantly reconstructed. Compared to the attacks he'd weathered from Moneygold, this was but a scratch.

Splendida recovered in no time, and walked out of the carriage.

Straining his eyes to look behind the curtain of rain, he saw a group armed mainly with guns.

They must've seen this rain as an opportunity. A horde of what must have been nearly a hundred people rode buggies and replica Prism Steeds as they approached the caravan in a crane wing formation.

"Hrmm...as I'll soon be working for Dryfe, I'd like to do something about this, but I suppose that's a bit difficult."

If he fit into any specific category, Splendida was a solo combat build—or, to be more precise, a solo survival build.

He was specialized in his own survival, and when it came to facing opponents who outnumbered him, he was even less potent than the usual solo combat build. He could spread his poison, but this was an outdoor battle with tian passengers littered about, making that more risky than it was worth.

Even if Splendida somehow got to fight them individually, he didn't have a high enough AGI. It would take time, and the bandits would easily be able to loot whatever they could and run—and it was hard for him to use the escape-preventing MVP reward that he'd used on King of Beasts.

Mm-hmm. If I say so myself, all that little old me can really do is buy time in a one-on-one fight... Why is the imperator inviting me, again?

As far as combat capable Superiors went, Splendida was definitely on the weaker side, so it begged the question of why the imperator would take him in and even go so far as to take him off the wanted list.

But as this thought crossed his mind, these supposed bandits were only coming closer. There clearly wasn't much he could do by himself, and as Splendida wondered how he would handle it...

"If you're not a bandit, get down."

...he heard these words.

The passengers were already on the ground and shivering in fear, Splendida was standing in place and thinking, and the armed attackers continued their approach, seemingly not hearing the voice.

It was a chaotic situation—and this chaos was torn asunder by a thunderous sound reminiscent of an electric chainsaw—the sound of a Gatling gun.

The bullet storm that followed tore through the cover of the rearmost carriage and turned the attackers—along with Splendida—into mincemeat.

"Oh, my." Some of the bandits dissolved into sparks of light, while Splendida immediately recovered even from being torn in half.

Unfortunately, it was his top half that regenerated, so his lower half ended up completely exposed. That was embarrassing, so he chose to cover himself up with branches that he grew out of his body.

"They turned into bits of light, so I guess the bandits are Masters too. Oh, and my clothes are ruined again!" Splendida must've been used to this, as being split in half only made him laugh.

"I said, if you're not a bandit, get down!"

"Ohh, my bad. I was slow to react! So, who are tu?" Though it wasn't intended to be an answer to this question, the owner of the voice then showed themselves from beyond the torn cover.

What came out was a large suit of mechanical armor wearing a sand-colored cloak. In its chest area there was something luminous, and as it shone in the smoke, it looked like a single giant eye.

"A Magingear? No, it's not that..." At first glance, the figure looked like a Dryfean Magingear, but it was definitely something else.

The human-shaped machine was larger than Marshall, but smaller than Marshall II. It seemed to be right in the middle in terms of size, which wasn't standard for Dryfean weapons.

And most importantly, it had no headpiece. The shape made it seem as though its head was buried in the chest, and Splendida had never once seen a unit like that, customized or otherwise.

"May I have a name? Ohh, and Splendida's good enough for me." In response to that, the mechanical construct said, with a voice slightly colored by static...

"Y'golonac." This was a name from the Cthulhu Mythos, belonging to a god who had no head.

In Infinite Dendrogram, though, it had another meaning.

"So tu are the Unfaltering."

Y'golonac the Unfaltering—that was the name of a Superior who didn't serve any country, just like Splendida himself.

"Were tu called here by the imperator, as well?" Splendida went on. The mechanical armor seemed to reject both Reveal and Identification, which made it unclear whether "Y'golonac" was the name of an avatar or an Embryo, but regardless, it was well known that the name belonged to a freelance Superior who had defeated many monsters and and acted as a capable bodyguard all over the land.

Thus, Splendida assumed that someone like that had come to Dryfe for the same reason as he had.

"I see we're alike in that regard, Evergreen." And Y'golonac seemed to have heard of Splendida too.

Somehow, these two Superiors summoned by the imperator had ended up in the same caravan.

"If that's the situation here," Y'golonac said, "I suppose that makes them the unfortunate ones."

Could a mere hundred armed men win against two Superiors? The Gatling gun Y'golonac had just used to blast some of the attackers was a good display of the firepower they needed to overcome those odds.

"Then you can just leave the carriage protection to little old me. Wipe them out, if you don't mind."

"Roger. I'm on it."

Agreeing with Splendida's suggestion, Y'golonac leaped into action. The construct discarded the Gatling gun, replacing it with two missile launchers that it placed on its shoulders before immediately firing them at the mass of attackers.

Targeted by homing missiles, the opposing force was gradually reduced to glowing lights. Someone among their ranks defended against the assault using a floating shield Embryo, but Y'golonac switched to an anti-tank rifle and blasted right through it.

At that moment, an AGI build Master drew close and swung at the construct with a long naginata-shaped Embryo, but Y'golonac switched to an even longer Greek-style spear and impaled the attacker for an instant kill.

The opponent seemed like a fairly high-level Master, but the way this unfolded seemed one-sided.

I guess it's a powered suit Embryo with powers focused on weapon switching? Rather plain for a Superior*, but it's sure got a lot of utility. I feel like I'm looking at an FPS character,* Splendida thought.

It seemed that Y'golonac also had a good balance of STR, END, and AGI—and so far, there didn't seem to be any major flaws to it. This was in stark contrast to Splendida, who was hyperspecialized and could only really do one thing.

It looks like he'll take care of it if I just leave it to him...hmm?

As that thought passed through his mind, Splendida's eyes caught a silhouette that didn't belong to a buggy or a Prism Steed replica.

It looked somewhat like a dragon carriage, but it wasn't that either. It was being pulled by what looked like an upper Pure-Dragon-tier landdragon, and it wasn't a passenger car, but a platform.

On the platform there was a giant cannon—one that looked like a railway gun.

“It did feel like they had more firepower than you’d expect from ordinary bandits, but this—” Splendida’s whisper to himself was cut short by a loud noise in the distance.

The railway gun, or whatever it was, had fired at Y’golonac. However, Y’golonac noticed it, read the shot’s trajectory, and quickly moved to evade it.

Just as he expected, the shell was heading toward a patch of ground over ten metels away from him...but right before it landed, it turned horizontally to the side.

Assuming an impossible trajectory, the shell flew straight toward Y’golonac, piercing right through him. It broke through the powered suit—supposedly a Superior Embryo—like it was paper, blowing away the top of the torso. A large section of his body gone, Y’golonac swayed back and forth before collapsing forward.

If he was a robot, the shell would’ve destroyed his core circuitry; if this was a powered suit instead, whoever was inside would certainly have died instantly.

“Whaaat?” Splendida looked down at the collapsed Y’golonac.

The expression under his mask was a dubious one, and the thought behind those eyes was Seriously?

◆

A man below the giant gun was watching as Y’golonac collapsed. Clad in a thick army coat and a multipurpose visor the shape of sunglasses, he let out a sigh.

“A confirmed hit.” The man—King of Magic Cannons Heldine Rockzapper—muttered his observation of the results.

He knew the attack would hit.

Heldine Rockzapper held a Superior Job specialized in the use of magic cannons, and its ultimate, The Freeshooter, fired shells that never missed. He set the target using his sight, and the shell he fired continued to home in on it until it landed.

Heldine’s artillery also couldn’t be defended against. His Embryo and weapon, Gun-Goddess of Collapse, Fenrir, completely negated all and any defense.

Neither defensive skills nor attributes meant anything to it. Like the god-consuming creature from which it took its name, Fenrir would slaughter anything it hit.

Guaranteed hits and defense negation—this attack-focused build of his was exactly what had landed Heldine in high positions on both kill and clan rankings of Dryfe.

“What are the losses?”

“The powered suit took out like twenty percent of our guys.”

“More than I expected. I guess we really are up against someone pre-Superior or higher.”

Upon hearing the casualty report from the subleader, Heldine analyzed the opponent’s power. The reason he didn’t assume Y’golonac was a Superior was because, just like Splendida, he thought Y’golonac looked too plain for that. Still, the construct was a force that couldn’t be ignored and seemed to cause trouble for Heldine’s clan, so he’d gotten involved personally and had attacked Y’golonac.

“But, man, to think they only just hired firepower like that,” Heldine said. “I suppose it’s all to bring that to the capital...?”

“We did the right thing by getting involved. The war with Altar is just around the corner. We can’t turn a blind eye to the seeds of any future trouble.”

Their conversation didn’t sound like it was coming from a group of supposed bandits.

“That leaves...just that masked man.”

“He has impressive regeneration. He may be an endurance-focused pre-Superior.”

As they talked, Heldine focused his sights on Splendida.

“I don’t know how many times you can keep regenerating, or how much.” He used his visor’s zoom function to glare at Splendida’s mask...

“So I will keep you in place until my subordinates fulfill their objective.”

...and Fenrir—the cannon bearing the name of the godslayer—fired once again.

◆

Mechanical remains were scattered on the muddy, rain-swept wasteland.

"Well, what do I do now?" The enemy's artillery had completely destroyed Y'golonac. Splendida guessed that the attack's trajectory and power were the result of some skill combo. Being a solo survival build Superior, he'd weathered countless attacks and had gotten quite good at analyzing their nature.

Not every Superior was like Splendida or Emily, and it was entirely possible for them to die. Even if the attacker was weaker, a critical hit could easily cause what had just happened to Y'golonac.

"Whoa."

And, as he looked at Y'golonac's state, a shell struck Splendida and completely pulverized him.

He instantly began regenerating from the head down, but another shell came flying in to put a stop to that.

Oh dear. I can't do anything like this.

While Splendida couldn't die, destroying his body over and over would incapacitate him, and his poison-focused attacks couldn't reach someone attacking from over two kilometels away.

Meanwhile, keeping their distance from Splendida and the bombardment focused on him, Heldine's subordinates were approaching the dragon carriages. They weren't holding back, but there was a certain refinement to the way they operated.

Hrmm...I feel like they might not be bandits after all. The thing that the coachmen said is bothering me too...

Even as he was being scattered into pieces over and over, Splendida never stopped thinking.

After an obscene amount of explosions, Splendida's head was blown off and landed next to Y'golonac. The two Superiors were now lying next to each other like good friends.

Oh? It just hit me that Y'golonac hasn't disappeared, Splendida thought. He himself had a combo that made him immortal, so it was a given that he wouldn't be vanishing. But why was Y'golonac's body staying around as well?

"Hm?" Splendida, reduced to nothing but a head, realized that he could hear something faintly over the noise of the rain.

Y'golonac's broken remains were releasing a sound that crackled with static.

“Whoa, whoa, whoa! Y’ggy’s broken! Get a grip, Vito!”

“Stop talking! There’s no way I could’ve seen that coming!”

“The attacker is about two kilometels away. That’s outside the effective range.”

“Now’s not the time for that, Micchi! Shit! Okay, time for the super long-range artillery gear...”

“No. We’re probably dealing with a pre-Superior who specializes in long-range combat. We’ll close the distance as soon as we recover. Large, prepare your active skill.”

“O-Okay!”

“Roger that, Hikaru! Don’t mess up this time, Vito!”

“Shut up!”

The sound was a conversation.

This is... Just when a certain thought was about to cross his mind, Splendida’s head was hit by another one of Fenrir’s shells, blowing him to bits. It seemed that the type of shell had been changed, and this one created an explosion big enough to engulf the surroundings.

The smoke it spread and the dust it flung up from the ground covered the bodies of both Splendida and Y’golonac.

◆

“Is it done...?” Heldine had switched from shells that ignored defense to ones focused on explosive firepower and effective area.

At the heart of the explosion, Splendida had been blown to smithereens.

Heldine didn’t know if his opponent’s regeneration was tied to how damaged his body was, but he thought that this would at least serve to buy some time.

“Hm...?”

However, when the torrential downpour scattered the smoke, he was met with a strange sight.

It was not Splendida, who was currently regenerating even from the immense explosion.

“Resuming combat.”

Heldine was met with the complete disappearance of the remains scattered about, as well as Y'golonac, standing there without as much as a scratch.

He spoke with the same voice as he did before his supposed destruction—a voice unlike any Splendida had heard.

A moment later, the construct vanished and reappeared right before Heldine and Fenrir.

"Ah...?!" Heldine was shocked—an enemy that had been far in the distance only a moment ago had just appeared right in front of him.

This was enough of an opening for Y'golonac to equip submachine guns in each arm and fire toward him.

"Ngh...!" Acting faster than Y'golonac in response, Heldine blew a whistle and ordered the Pure-dragon pulling his platform to leap in front of him.

The Pure-Dragon became a shield, bearing the bullet storm using its natural defensive power and a damage-reduction skill.

A moment later, the Pure-Dragon vanished, going back into a Jewel through Re-Call.

Behind the vanished meat shield there was Fenrir, now in a smaller form, and Heldine, brandishing it like a lance.

"FIRE!" Instantly shifting focus to retaliation, Heldine fired at Y'golonac from a close range. Though this smaller form had a lower range, its defense negation was still active.

This second hit on Y'golonac also opened a hole in his chest and scattered his limbs—instant death for a person, and irreparable damage for a weapon.

Suffering such catastrophic destruction, Y'golonac was reduced to pieces...

"Reactivation."

...only to instantly recover and resume attacking.

"This one too?" Heldine clicked his tongue. It was unclear whether the thing before him was a powered suit or a robot, but he now understood that it and the masked man were birds of a feather.

Indeed, they both were solo survival builds, boasting immense regeneration.

Y'golonac also possessed far more methods of fighting and much more mobility than Splendida. He had both firepower that made him a capable solo combat build and the ability to respawn an indefinite number of times.

He was so powerful that Superior Embryo didn't seem like enough to accomplish this feat.

"Fen! Cluster fire!" In response to Heldine's words, Fenrir changed the barrel's shape and began firing buckshot meant for close-range encounters.

Y'golonac responded by switching from the submachine guns to a large shield, which he threw at Heldine—a shield that was large enough to not only block his line of sight, but also crush him to death.

"Ah!" Heldine fired repeatedly to knock the weapon away before it struck home.

Not missing this opening, Y'golonac vanished once more and thrust a spear at Heldine from a blind spot.

Heldine turned his body and evaded it, however barely. While midair, he fired more defense-ignoring shots—but without Heldine's ultimate job skill backing them up, Y'golonac was able to dodge it.

It was a true back-and-forth. In close range combat, the two were more or less equal.

However, while Heldine's only lifeline was a Brooch and his own HP, there was no telling how many times Y'golonac could get back up. It dawned on Heldine that the situation would only get worse for him.

Still, he couldn't retreat here.

"Leader!"

"I'll keep him in place! The rest of you, secure the cargo and the coachmen!" Brandishing Fenrir, Heldine roared as he continued to engage Y'golonac.

And so...

"Don't let this gang smuggle their drugs to Vandelheim!"

Silence. Those words made Y'golonac freeze, stopping in place like a game character that had ceased responding to controller inputs.

"Hm...?" Finding that strange, Heldine went on high alert when...

"What did you just say?"

...Y'golonac let out several voices that couldn't have belonged to Y'golonac.

Watching the battle from a distance, Splendida nodded in understanding as he mused to himself, "Ah...I get it now."

◆

A few minutes later, Splendida and Y'golonac were sitting on the ground before Heldine.

They were currently in the Japanese "seiza" sitting posture—an apologetic pose that Y'golonac had assumed instantly. Splendida had looked at Y'golonac, thought, Giapponese seiza?, and mimicked it.

"Oh dear, we almost ended up taking part in something bad." Splendida spoke with the tone of someone who wasn't feeling the slightest bit guilty, while Y'golonac maintained a silence.

The order of events that had led to the current situation went something like this:

A group within the Dryfean underworld received illegal substances—namely drugs—through Caldina. With Dryfe being in the gloomy state that it was, it was a good place to sell such items for a major profit. But since bringing them in just like that would get them caught immediately, they chose to deliver it by masking their caravan as a passenger transport service.

However, Dryfe was aware of this, and requested Fullmetal Wolves—Heldine's clan and the second in Dryfe's rankings—to seize the drugs and capture the criminals responsible.

What had made it a more complicated task than expected was the presence of two Superiors on the caravan who'd been invited by the imperator.

When Heldine told him all of this, things finally made sense to Splendida. It explained why the coachman's shout about a "bandit attack" had felt so off. He'd probably wanted to shout something like "Dryfe inspection," but caught himself at the last moment.

"I apologize for getting in the way of your duties." Y'golonac bowed deeply to express his regret.

Y'golonac was a Master that the coachmen had hired as a bodyguard. He'd been invited by the imperator and was heading to Vandelheim anyway, so this job was just right for him.

And so, he and Splendida had ended up fighting Fullmetal Wolves, oblivious to the fact that they were both backing up a very shady group of people.

Y'golonac had Truth Discernment, but the criminals could circumvent it by saying things like "we would like a bodyguard for a caravan carrying people and cargo" or "we're bringing pharmaceutical products to Vandelheim," neither of which were lies per se.

Though, for some reason he also hadn't heard the coachman's words.

"Fortunately, the only human casualties were Masters. No real trouble at all... Though, we'll have you make it up to us in the war against Altar."

Splendida and Y'golonac both showed their invitation letters and explained themselves, and though they weren't completely innocent, the fact that they hadn't disrupted his work on purpose was enough for Heldine to not hold them responsible.

In this operation, nobody had died besides a number of Masters from Fullmetal Wolves. The criminal group responsible had all been apprehended. There were some coachmen who'd tried to force an escape and caused their carriages to topple, but though that caused some injuries, none of the passengers had been killed, and their wounds had already been treated.

In fact, the one who'd suffered the worst injury from a toppled carriage was Splendida himself.

Incidentally, when the lady he'd protected had woken up, she'd just kept muttering, "The neck, the neck..." in pure confusion—but when Splendida showed himself, fully healed and naked, she instantly fainted yet again.

Regardless, though there had been a few complications, Fullmetal Wolves had fulfilled their objective, and it was decided that they would escort the caravan to Vandelheim. Heldine didn't seem to like the idea of leaving the innocent passengers in the wasteland.

Splendida and Y'golonac would be accompanying them as well. Some might say this was Fullmetal Wolves escorting "VIPs invited by the imperator himself," while others would characterize it as "persons of interest" being dragged away.

"The road had some twists and turns, but it looks like we're back on track," said Splendida. The platform that had supported Fenrir was now covered in order to transport Y'golonac.

For some reason, though, Splendida was sitting right next to him right now.

"By the way, where are you controlling that from, and how many of tu are there? Is ‘Unfaltering’ the name of your party?”

“...I don’t know what you’re talking about.” Watching the battle had given Splendida an idea of how Y’golonac worked, but the latter still feigned ignorance.

Well, if he just went and admitted it like it’s no big deal, it’d just make me worried. About the war and stuff, Splendida thought despite putting on an exaggerated and disappointed expression. Little old me and Y’golonac. I see the imperator’s inviting survival-focused Superiors. Maybe this war won’t be your typical one.

Splendida realized that the Dryfean leadership had some sort of plan to win the upcoming conflict, and that inviting them was part of it.

Well, anything’s fine by me. If that’s how it’s gonna be, I’ll probably get a front row view of all the highlights.

The Superior whose goal was simply to do some sightseeing—the immortal tourist—pictured the coming event.

“Heh heh heh...” Splendida chuckled merrily—not realizing that Y’golonac was staring at him, just a little creeped out.

Interlude: Tournament Days Seven and Eight

Gideon the City of Duels, Central Arena
Tournament: Day Seven.
Name: Unknown (Unable to Speculate).
Core Traits: Short Distance Warping (Presumed).

◇◆

The city of Gideon would soon begin the seventh of its ten Tournament days. A UBM escaping the day before had certainly been an emergency, but it hadn't stopped them from commencing the event as planned.

Albeit not quite as much as day five's, today's reward seemed like it would be quite useful in combat, and thus it had attracted many powerful participants.

And the person Death Period was sending in to fight for it was none other than...

"So it's finally my turn, huh?" A shady-looking lady in shades—Marie Adler.

She was the bearer of the onmitsu grouping's Superior Job, Death Shadow, as well as the infamous PK who carried the nickname "Superior Killer." However, only her clan and a few others knew her secret.

"Well, Ray, Fujee's trio, and the armorhead are all in school, while Rookie's busy with his prep..." Shu and Hannya were still around, working as security, but the clan members Marie felt closest to weren't present to see her bout. That had left her feeling a little bit down.

"I get that they have to put their education above everything...but whether it's sports or anything else, it's always best to see the win happen in real time."

Marie spoke as if she'd already won—she was really counting her chickens before they hatched, though she might have had more than enough reason to be so confident. Aside from the Superiors, she was among the strongest Masters in Death Period—and perhaps in the entirety of Altar. In anything-goes fights, Marie could beat just about anyone.

On top of that, none of Altar's Superiors were taking part today. Lei-Lei had participated in day one, Tsukuyo Fuso had gone for day five, and Figaro was slated to fight on the final day. The remaining two were only involved in the event as security. And among powerful non-Superiors, the kingdom's strongest—Kashimiya—had already participated on day six. B3 and Rosa had also had their turn on day two. Juliet, as well as many other well-known duel rankers, had all chosen other days too.

With Marie being as powerful as she was and day seven lacking any notably strong opponents, she had reason to be confident in her victory.

"Guess I'll just get in there and grab that win!"

Thus, Marie Adler the Superior Killer challenged The Tournaments and...

◇◇◇

Sorcerer Ray Starling

I logged into Dendro after coming back home from college and found myself on day eight of The Tournaments.

The Death Period member participating that day was Fujinon. Her Embryo multiplied her spells, and with today's reward UBM being able to split itself, Fujinon figured that if she performed well, she could gain the ability to multiply her spells two additional times.

"For a caster, Fujinon's a real musclehead!" said Io.

"Huh? Io, you're the last person who should say that..." Kasumi replied.

"To be fair, casters in general do seem to have a strong focus on raw firepower," Nemesis commented. The Pyromancer job's Crimson Sphere was a good example. It was very powerful even by the standards of high-rank job ults, and I was under the impression that it was used pretty often because of that.

I kinda felt like I saw people who used it get defeated all the time, though.

"Anyway, looks like she made it through the preliminaries," I said. Now we'd be able to watch her matches. Seated in the box we'd reserved for the entire ten day period, I waited for Fujinon's turn alongside Nemesis, Io, and Kasumi.

"Heh heh heh... Fujinon sure is something, huh...?"

Actually, there was one more person here with us.

"I have nothing more to teach her," the other person continued. "Then again, my teachings are probably worthless anyway..."

Sitting on a chair next to me, her head hanging and in awfully low spirits, there was McBlackJack—better known as Marie.

"Don't worry, teacher! I get you lost in the first match, but don't beat yourself over it!" said Io, who was also sitting next to Marie. Io patted her on the back.

"Io?!" Kasumi exclaimed, shocked by her friend's insensitive remark.

Though...well...yeah, that was it.

Ignoring the Superiors, Marie was among the strongest in our clan. And yet, so far she was the only one of us who had lost in her very first fight.

"You got matched with the eventual winner, so don't let it get to you," I said. "That's what happened to me too."

Yeah—she'd fought the winner of day seven right off the bat.

Since it was the preliminaries, there hadn't been an audience, but if I had to guess, I'm sure it had been one hell of a duel.

From what Marie herself had told me, it went like this...

◇

Marie's opponent was King of Storms Caydence.

He was the leader of Welkin Alliance—the fourth in the clan rankings—and a pre-Superior often counted among the top five most powerful Masters in the kingdom. Boasting wide-scale extermination power matching even King of Destruction—a Superior—Caydence stood alongside the likes of Kashimiya, the strongest melee fighter; King of Light, the strongest ranged fighter; and Catherine Congou, the strongest tamer.

And the fifth among these was the Superior Killer—Marie. In battles where anything was permitted, including ambushes, she was definitely up there with the best.

The reason someone like that would lose her first fight was simple—The Tournaments were far from an “anything goes” environment.

First of all, a battle that began with a countdown and the fighters facing each other didn’t allow for staging an ambush. Marie couldn’t preemptively hide her presence, create copies of herself, or catch the enemy off guard, which left no room for her onmitsu style of combat to breathe.

And to top it all off, there was her Death Shadow ult and her strongest means of evasion, Art of Vanishing. Since its effects were equivalent to disappearing from the world entirely, the barrier treated it the same as dying. Marie had been forced to fight someone who was her equal match, all the while unable to use her trump card or any of the strategies she excelled at.

Still, she may have been able to win using just her high AGI, ability to split herself up, and her Embryo Arc-en-Ciel—but unfortunately, her opponent was too strong this time.

Caydence used his power as a wind magic Superior Job to flood the arena with a storm the moment the fight began. Moreso than the mundane weather phenomenon, the winds of this magical tempest brought unbridled physical destruction. Prevented from dispersing into the atmosphere by the barrier, the storm ravaged everything within.

The duel stage became a vortex, and the deadly winds made short work of the copies Marie created.

She herself watched the flow of the storm and tried to move in a way that minimized the damage, but she couldn’t entirely prevent it. Gradually, her health was chipped away. On top of that, the storm carried a poison debuff that afflicted her and further accelerated the DoT.

In the end, she tried to turn it all around with a bullet that killed without fail—but before she could, Caydence finished his preparations and cast a spell that destroyed the entire stage, leaving Marie with no room to evade. Finally, she was defeated.

◇

“An attack that covers everything within the barrier... Whatever could I do against the likes of that?” said Marie.

“Now you’re talking like Io was...” said Kasumi. Apparently, losing after barely being able to fight back had hit Marie pretty hard.

I know how that feels, I thought.

"It appears that she was overcome by both her lack of compatibility with her opponent and the rules of the event," said Nemesis.

"Yeah." If she'd been able to use Art of Vanishing, Marie might've survived the final attack and delivered her certain death bullet. After all, she'd been inside Noz Forest while Shu bombarded it and lived. Caydence was nearly as much of a destructive force as Shu, so being unable to use that one skill had put her at a major disadvantage in that matchup.

That one skill's usefulness didn't mean that Caydence wasn't a fearsome foe, though. He'd covered the entire stage in a storm while simultaneously preparing a spell that was even more powerful. Whether that was his own prowess or the work of his Embryo was unclear, but it took some awfully refined magic skill. As a caster he was considered the same tier as King of Light, and I could clearly see why. I'd come to know every Superior of the kingdom, but this made me realize once again that they weren't the only powerful people out there.

"But it's a good thing you dropped out in the preliminaries, huh?" said Io. "Now you can't damage the Superior Killer's name."

"Well, that's...good? I'm not really sure," said Marie. "I mean, most people don't know that Marie Adler actually is the Superior Killer anyway. B3 does though, and she sure made fun of me."

B3...is she still holding a grudge against Marie for ambushing her? I wondered. No...I think they're just not compatible as people.

"B-By the way, teacher, why do they call you the 'Superior Killer?'" Kasumi asked.

"Huh?" Io tilted her head and answered before Marie could do so herself. "It's because she beat a Superior despite not being a Superior herself."

"B-But our leader's beaten Superiors too, hasn't he?"

Well, it was true that I'd beaten Franklin and Logan, but...

"It wasn't like I did it by myself," I said. I couldn't have won against Franklin without the help of the three here—and many others—and I would've completely lost against Logan if Veldorbell hadn't destroyed so much of his forces.

"You beat your Superior all by yourself, and that made all the difference, right?" I said. The "Superior Killer" name was created because she'd defeated a fearsome, wanted Superior without anyone's help. That was my assumption, anyway...

"Hrmm..."

...but Marie herself was making a somewhat dubious face.

"Marie?"

"Well, I was certainly the only person who beat it, but...how should I put this...?" Whatever it was she wanted to say, Marie wasn't being clear about it. "And honestly, being solo or not wasn't really relevant to why I got the title."

"Hm?" We were so curious that question marks were practically popping up over our heads, but Marie remembered something that put a tired expression on her face.

"The reason I'm called the Superior Killer is because the one I beat left that big of an impression. Yes, even by Superior standards."

The Superior she defeated was...King of Plagues, right?

"It happened before you three began Dendro, so I doubt it means that much to you, but the King of Plagues incident is among the biggest catastrophes that have ever happened in Infinite Dendrogram. It was actually on about the same level as Gloria."

"Huh?" I said, shocked. That was the name of a mighty, fiendish dragon that had attacked Altar—an SUBM that had brought immense devastation to the kingdom and required the combined efforts of Altar's Superiors to defeat. Was I really supposed to believe that a single Master had been able to do something similar?

"You can find the details about the event in the back issues of the DIN newspaper. I put them all in the library of our base in the Eighth Arena. Go look at them if you're curious."

"Oh yeah! I almost forgot that DIN also releases actual newspapers!" said Io.

"Personally, I remember them better as the group that held an event with the truly nonsensical name of 'Ba-Thump Kyahah'..." said Nemesis.

"Hearing about that already makes me feel kinda nostalgic," said Marie. "Enough about the past though—let's cheer for Fujee. The first fight's about to— Oh. Looks like she's going first."

The conversation seemed to have made Marie feel better, and she suggested we focused on the duel.

"Whoa! That's awesome! Get them, Fujinon! You can do iiit!"

"Oh. Looks like she's up against Riser..."

"Huh?! For real?! Get her, Riser! You can do iiit!"

"Io..." She'd instantly switched from cheering on her friend to cheering on her fave. From what I'd heard, after cooperating during the recent attack on Altar, Io had become a big fan of his.

Yeah, I'm not surprised that Io likes Riser's battle style, I thought.

I wasn't saying a word. My eyes were fixed on the stage, but my brain was focused on the King of Plagues incident.

A Master had caused a disaster that matched Gloria itself in scale. You could barely compare that to common crimes or even actions taken during wartime.

What had happened back then? And why?

I felt like that was something we Masters had to know.

Chapter Five Opening: The King of Plagues Incident

February, 2045

In the world of Infinite Dendrogram, there existed nations that were referred to as the Seven Great Countries.

Altar, the Land of Knights.

Dryfe Imperium, the Land of Machines.

Huang He, the Empire of Hermits.

Tenchi, the Land of Blades.

Legendaria, the Fairyland.

Caldina, the Mercantile City-State Union.

Granvaloa, the Maritime Fleet.

All Masters, without exception, were required to start out in one of these seven, but that didn't mean that they were the only countries that existed. If they were, they wouldn't be called the Seven Great Countries, but just the Seven Countries.

The world of Infinite Dendrogram had a number of smaller countries besides these, and they were either in extremely remote locations or situated along the borders of the Seven. They were nations that the Seven had never seen any reason to conquer, or ones that were left alone because it was better not to claim them.

A good example of the former was the remote settlement said to exist within the Harshwinter Mountains—a tiny country with a name unknown to most.

It was a place widely thought to be trapped in a hellish world of ice and snow, menaced by ferocious landdragons and avians. The texts of old claimed that it existed, but no one from the Seven Great Countries had yet set foot in it. After all, there was nothing to be gained from invading it. Nothing could grow there, it wasn't known to be rich in ore, and attempting to enter the area could provoke the local landdragons, potentially leading to the same dire fate northern Caldina had once suffered.

Thus, the tiny nation's existence continued to be ignored.

After Masters had grown in number, though, some of them set out to these remote lands with the goal of simply exploring it. And while the unimaginably unwelcoming environment had forced most of them to retreat or given them the death penalty, there were rumors that a few adventurers had actually arrived at the settlement.

Even then, that place was still of no consequence to the Seven Great Countries.

On the other hand, there were countries that were known to all the Seven, yet unclaimed by any of them. These were largely city-states situated right on the borders between two or more of these mighty nations—countries composed of but one city and the small villages surrounding it. Even when put together, each of these tiny places controlled less land than a single city of the Seven. They had almost no military power to speak of, and if a war broke out between them and any of the Seven, they would certainly be annexed.

However, that had yet to happen.

This was because the benefits of keeping them around outweighed the benefits of conquering them.

For the Seven Great Countries, laying claim to one of these city-states would be seen as encroaching upon a border. That was bad enough when the small country in question was between just two larger nations, but it was even worse when it bordered three.

Simply invading even a tiny country like that could make an enemy of the two greater ones it stood next to.

Because of this, rather than risk provoking the other countries over such small patches of land, it was more beneficial to simply leave them as they were.

Mahem was one such tiny city-state.

Being one of the small lands situated right where Altar, Legendaria, and Caldina's borders met, it was an agrarian nation with idyllic scenery. Though they did not have much land, their farming—enhanced by earth magic and alchemy—allowed them to produce enough food to feed themselves a thousand times over, and they made a decent amount of money by exporting their excess food to their three neighbors.

Mahem had existed for centuries since the collapse of King of Kings Rockfell Adrasta's rule, and it hadn't changed even as the world was shaken by the recent increase in Masters. Even if these Masters stopped in Mahem from time to time, almost none of them stayed.

Or, rather, staying here was difficult for them.

This was because Mahem and other small countries like it had no save points.

The reason the Seven Great Countries were called that wasn't just because of how much land they controlled or their power as nations—it also referred to the fact that they had cities or even villages with save points.

Meanwhile, the small countries didn't have them even in their capitals. They were not only small in size and influence, but couldn't even function as hometowns for Masters.

On the other hand, though, this meant that Mahem's land was incredibly fertile without the need for the environmental benefits of a save point, so perhaps it wasn't so bad after all.

The country also wasn't subjected to very many monster attacks. It could perhaps be described as a haven of peace on a turbulent continent.

The people of Mahem believed that they would always live like this—that this life would never end.

◇

"I'm sooo bored." The day was calm and clear. Sitting atop a hill in a field of grass, a young boy muttered these unremarkable words to himself.

The boy's name was Mahr.

He was the second son of a rancher living in a village belonging to the nation of Mahem, and he'd just turned ten years old this year.

He was currently watching over a number of Cotton Sheep—sheeplike monsters they raised—while they feasted on the grass in the field. He was helping with the family business, which was an activity that had become all too familiar for him a long time ago.

Lying down next to him, fast asleep, there was a Demi-Dragon-tier monster, Demi-Drac-Hound. It was a tamed monster that Mahr's father had bought from a traveling merchant from Caldina, and they now used the creature as a sheepdog. A single glare from it was enough to make the Cotton Sheep fall in line, and it was strong enough to deal with most of the wild monsters that might attack them. The same applied to any potential sheep thieves, though these were quite rare.

The Demi-Drac-Hound had a menacing name and visage, but with no danger in sight or work to do right now, it was just sleeping at Mahr's side. Still, if the sheep tried running away somewhere, it would certainly wake up and instantly set them straight. It was very well trained and attached to its owners.

"I'm sooo bored..." Mahr repeated.

It wasn't an uncommon thing to hear out of him, and it only made him feel more melancholy. Mahr believed that he would spend all his years helping with the family business.

However, being the second son, he wouldn't even inherit the ranch. He would either live his whole life as a farmhand here, or marry into some other ranching or farming family without any sons.

"I heard there's lots of amazing things happening in the big countries..." The village Mahr lived in was a small one, but the occasional merchants and bards that stopped by informed them of the things that happened in the Seven Great Countries.

They would present them in the form of foreign newspapers or bard songs, among other things.

The stories Mahr heard had surprised him greatly.

A massive white whale monstrosity that had attacked the country floating on the sea.

A three-headed golden dragon that had terrorized the kingdom.

A civil war in the imperium, fought for the imperator's throne.

And lastly, the war between Altar and Dryfe.

While these stories filled the adults and the girls with dread, Mahr was overwhelmed with excitement.

After all, such terrifying stories always came with some real heroism.

The explosive Master who slew the white whale.

The three top-rankers who defeated the three-headed golden dragon.

The gargantuan beast that had been instrumental in both the civil war and the true war behind it, shattering even a meteor.

Upon hearing the stories of such champions, Mahr found himself wanting to become like them.

However, he wasn't a Master, but a tian, and he didn't know how he could become a Master. In fact, he didn't even know that there was no way for tians to become Masters.

As a child, he couldn't even embark upon a profession of his own, and it wasn't clear if he had the talent to become a champion.

I doubt I have what it takes anyway, Mahr thought. While he did wish to become a hero like that, he wasn't quite childish enough to think that he could actually accomplish that goal without any evidence he was capable of it. But this just gave him more room to think.

The stormy world of champions and his unchanging daily life.

His dream to live as a champion and the reality which wouldn't allow it.

Simply making such comparisons filled Mahr with sadness. It made him realize just how narrow his future was.

"...guess I'll head back now." When the sheep had eaten their fill, Mahr stood up.

The Demi-Drac-Hound also woke up, let out a bark, and rushed toward the sheep before leading them to follow after Mahr.

This wouldn't have been necessary if they simply put the sheep in Jewels like tamed monsters, but they didn't.

In fact, these sheep weren't even actually tamed.

The reason for that was simple—there were too many of them. Since they numbered in the dozens, managing them using one's limited party slots and minion capacity was difficult, especially if you weren't a combatant.

Because of this, instead of taming them and using Jewels, the sheep were simply domesticated and kept on the ranch. This came with the added benefit of the monsters still dropping items if they died.

This method had been taught to people long ago by a person known as "Farm Cat." Living after the destruction of the pre-ancient civilization, he was an important figure who'd spread the knowledge of this new stock farming method to the entire world.

Would I have to do something this boring if he'd never existed? Mahr wondered, venting his frustrations on what was clearly the wrong target.

When Mahr and the sheep returned to the village, though, he found it in a bit of a stir. However, it didn't seem like they were panicking. Instead, the people looked surprised and happy. It reminded Mahr of how it looked like when traveling merchants or bards stopped by.

"Ah! Mahr! What took you so long?!" Upon noticing Mahr, his brother—three years older than he was—ran up to him.

"What's happening here?"

"The village has a guest again, but it's a big deal! Someone amazing! Someone special!"

Mahr couldn't understand what was amazing or special here. His brother was so excited that he didn't even manage to say the most important bit.

"What's amazing?" Mahr asked.

"I'm telling you, we got someone big!"

As Mahr considered blurting out "Just tell me who," his brother finally calmed down and said...

"The Hero has come!"

Indeed...that was certainly someone special.

◇

The Hero.

That word held a special meaning to tians.

It referred to a Special Superior Job that had appeared many times throughout history—a person who possessed immense power.

The Heroes were granted that strength from the moment they were born into this world. Wielding blades, using magic, and blessed with prodigious skill, they were said to be both well-rounded and incredibly powerful.

Another notable thing about The Hero job was that it wasn't picky.

While Sacred King, Imperator Machina, The Saint, and Draconic Emperor could only manifest within certain bloodlines, The Hero didn't discriminate, letting even the children of the most lowly people become special. It was possible for anyone to be born with the mantle.

Because of this, tian commoners—and even some nobles—saw The Hero as a symbol of hope.

And that was why, when the current bearer of this job arrived at Mahr's village, everyone there welcomed him with open arms. They even held a welcome party in the village's only hall, where every inch of the table was covered in food.

Not a single villager missed the chance to participate, and Mahr was no exception. He intently listened to everything The Hero had to say.

“Oh! So you’ve arrived here all the way from Tenchi?”

“Yes. I’m on a journey to train and broaden my horizons. My current destination is the western end of the continent.”

The Hero, who was staying with the village chief for the time being, was a youth not even two decades old. His long black hair that he kept tied back and his name—To’ori Kusanagi—spoke of his origins in Tenchi. Mahr couldn’t even begin to imagine the length and magnitude of his journey.

“What will you do when you get there?” a child asked, excited.

“I will then turn toward the south and head to Legendaria,” The Hero kindly replied. “And once I’ve arrived...I believe I will head to the Harshwinter Mountains.”

Those words were met with expressions of astonishment.

The traveler was as courageous as you would expect someone called a hero to be. Most common folk would think his journey impossible, but he was the kind of person who made everyone believe he could accomplish such a feat.

“Hey! Hey! What kinda places have you been to?!”

“Have you seen deserts?”

“What about the sea?”

“Very well,” The Hero said. “I will tell you of my journey. Upon leaving Tenchi, I...”

Seemingly accustomed to people begging for stories of his adventures, he began to speak—and described sights the likes of which Mahr and the other villagers had never before witnessed.

There was the warrior he’d encountered on the Strait Sea separating Tenchi from the continent, right after taking off, who was nothing more than empty armor.

There was the martial artist he’d met in Huang He’s mountains—one whose skills were so overwhelming that his lack of a weapon meant nothing in combat.

There was the magic he’d seen in Caldina, so immense it shook the earth and blocked out the skies.

It wasn’t only battles that he spoke of. He also described the beauty of the sea when he looked back at his homeland after crossing it, as well as the majesty of the mountains in Huang He. And when he mentioned the dragon he’d met and tamed during his journey, the children began pestering him to show it.

He described all of this in language so eloquent that the listeners felt as though they could see everything with their own eyes. Perhaps The Hero also would have been quite qualified for the Bard job.

One strange thing about his stories, though, was that he spent most of his time praising those he'd fought and the sights he'd witnessed. Instead of elaborating on his own achievements, he spoke of the wonderful things he'd found throughout his journey. But because his stories had a sense of presence that would put actual bards to shame, his listeners simply became enthralled regardless, expressing no complaints with anything he said.

By the end, nearly every villager was satisfied. Because it was turning late, the welcome party came to a close.

Following the special night they'd just experienced, the villagers returned to their homes, all of them wearing happy expressions.

All, that is, except Mahr.

◇

"Ngh..."

Upon returning home, Mahr got into bed, yet found himself unable to sleep. His head was a mess, he felt queasy—overall, he was in no state to rest.

This was all because he was jealous.

The Hero To'ori Kusanagi. A man who was nothing like Mahr.

It wasn't just the job he'd been born with. To'ori's manner of speech, his behavior, the path he'd walked thus far—all of it made him the spitting image of Mahr's ideal champion.

Up until now, Mahr had only heard of such heroes in stories. Now that he'd finally encountered someone truly special, though, the difference between the two of them made Mahr want to cry.

Lying in complete silence, Mahr began to feel like staying in bed would only end up making him sweat, and that would make it even more uncomfortable.

That was why, careful not to wake up his brother on the top bunk, Mahr slowly snuck out of the house.

Caressed by the chilly night wind, Mahr walked around his home. It was all he could do to try and cool himself off, if only a little bit. Thankfully, it was a clear night with bright stars and the moon high in the sky, both shining upon Mahr's path through the darkness of the night.

He walked without direction until he stumbled upon a small bridge over the village's river.

"Huh?"

Ahead, Mahr saw another person with starlight cascading over them.

He'd assumed everyone would've been asleep at this hour, but then he remembered that this was a special day where they'd been visited by The Hero. Perhaps the figure was just someone who drank too much and stayed up.

Should I say something? They could fall in the river if they're too drunk. Or would they just get mad at me for walking out at night?

As that thought ran through Mahr's head, he drew closer, only to realize that it wasn't a drunkard—in fact, it wasn't even a villager.

"...Mister Hero?"

"Oh?" Standing on the bridge, looking down at the river reflecting the night sky, was none other than The Hero from a distant land, To'ori Kusanagi. "I believe I saw you in the crowd earlier. What are you doing out so late at night?"

Despite his audience being but a single child, To'ori spoke as courteously as he had back in the hall.

"Taking a walk," Mahr replied, his expression unreadable.

"Ha ha...as am I," To'ori said, not minding the look on Mahr's face. "The beautiful night scenery inspired me to walk around a bit."

The sights around him had long since become completely mundane to Mahr, and The Hero's words made him feel a little dejected. He began to wonder if all of this simply looked different to someone as special as To'ori.

A brief silence followed, soon broken by To'ori. "Would you like to talk a little?" he said as he beckoned Mahr closer.

Mahr hesitated for a moment, but then he realized what an incredible opportunity it was to talk to The Hero one-on-one.

Mahr nodded before approaching him. Silence resumed as the two of them looked down at the river.

The Hero said nothing. It was as though he was waiting for Mahr to talk first.

Perhaps the only reason To'ori had invited Mahr to talk was because he was worried about the boy walking out at night all by his lonesome.

Unable to bear the silence, Mahr eventually broke it—and what he said first could easily pass for idle grumbling.

He spoke of how his daily life was a repeating chain of boredom.

He pointed out how amazing things straight out of legend were unfolding outside the village, yet nothing like that was happening within it.

When he talked about how he was nothing but an ordinary child, the tone of his voice contained a bit of his jealousy toward The Hero.

Finally he concluded with the thoughts he'd had while looking after the sheep at noon—the lament that his future was too narrow.

To'ori did nothing but listen to Mahr, but then...

"You're special, aren't you?" Mahr quietly asked.

"I am," To'ori replied with a nod. "The Hero is a vessel of talent."

"A vessel?"

"One of the skills I possess as The Hero is called Almighty. It grants me the ability to wield any low- and high-rank jobs, and it lets me claim up to a hundred of each. Along with that, I also have Full Link, which allows me to use skills from all sub jobs."

"HUH?!" To'ori's words filled Mahr with shock. The adults had told him that the most any person could have was six low-rank jobs and two high-rank jobs—and even then, that only applied to those with talent. Those without it would have even fewer than that, and the jobs one could pick were always limited by one's aptitude. Because of this, the number To'ori just said was simply outrageous.

"So you can take any job?"

"Indeed. I currently have over eighty low-rank jobs. High-rank jobs have conditions for claiming them, so I only have eight of those. For most of the low-rank jobs, though, I haven't done much more than just take them, so my total level is only slightly above 1,000."

"But that's..." ...Unfair, Mahr thought.

To'ori could take dozens of jobs, no matter what they were. The difference between him and everyone else was so staggering that it bordered on injustice. And this gap was decided merely by whether you were born as The Hero or not.

This uncrossable divide had existed between Mahr and To'ori since the very moment they had both come into this world.

"That's true. It is unfair," The Hero said, as though he'd read Mahr's mind—or perhaps his many jobs contained skills that indeed enabled him to do something like that. It was notable, though, that his manner of speech was more relaxed than it had been before. "It's an extraordinary talent. Nothing is impossible to The Hero, and the level I can reach is unimaginably high. I can do anything. I can freely choose how to live my life."

Mahr had no response to that. Those words sounded so much like boasting that they made him feel uncomfortable. However, what To'ori said next greatly surprised him.

"But back when I was in Tenchi, I really couldn't do anything at all, nor choose my own path."

"Huh?" Mahr turned to look at To'ori's face, and saw that he wore a somewhat sad expression.

"My homeland...Tenchi is a place constantly embroiled in conflict. There's always some dispute between daimyos, and even individual martial artists regularly compete with one another. It's a country where people keep killing each other to gain power or display that power to the world. This is because they know that killing people is the easiest way to become stronger. You kill people to gain strength, then people kill you because you've become so strong. This is why people often call Tenchi the land of strife—the land of asura."

Mahr was already aware of this. He knew Tenchi as a very distant land full of warriors, and such portrayals of the country stirred his imagination and filled his heart with excitement...

"I had many people try to claim my life...and in turn, I claimed theirs."

...but To'ori didn't seem to feel that way.

"I'm not fundamentally against such battles to the death," To'ori continued, "but if that's all I have, then...the future seems awfully narrow, don't you think?"

"Huh?" That was the same word Mahr himself had used.

"I happened to be born with great power as The Hero—a power that makes anything possible for me. However, while in Tenchi, I had only one way to use my abilities—only one future I could see for myself. I could only walk on the path of strife and battle. I might have been special, as you say, but I couldn't choose my future."

In a brief silence that followed, Mahr realized that despite their circumstances being nothing alike, To'ori was troubled by a problem similar to his.

"I didn't like that," To'ori muttered as he looked up at the night sky, as though revealing the true depths of his heart. "I thought that if I trained myself some more, traveled the world, experienced more things, and then came back home...I might've been able to see a future I hadn't seen before."

In some ways, this seemed like just another path of strife, but in other ways this was the complete opposite of the life To'ori had lived.

"You thought? What do you think now?" Mahr asked.

"I don't know at the moment. My journey isn't over yet. Though I do wish that I could find the answer and choose my own life someday."

"I see." Just like Mahr lived with dreams of champions and heroes, To'ori too might have always yearned for something different. He'd dreamed of the world outside Tenchi, thinking that he would find an answer if he left. But just as he'd described in his stories, there was ample combat outside his homeland too.

He hadn't found an answer yet, but he continued his journey, still searching for his own way.

The silence returned, giving Mahr time to think. He was just an ordinary boy, while To'ori was more talented than anyone else.

Despite this, he felt like there were similarities between them. To'ori must've felt the same way—perhaps that was why he'd talked so much about himself.

"Tomorrow..." Mahr began to speak.

"Huh?"

"Tomorrow, I'm gonna take the sheep out for grazing. If you've never done that...you can come with me."

Mahr had thought about what he could do for To'ori and had come upon that suggestion—one that would perhaps point The Hero toward a path he had yet to try.

"Oh, I certainly will," To'ori nodded in response, his joy evident on his face.

◇

A week passed, and To'ori stayed in the village for the entirety of it. It was longer than he'd planned to stay, but he was nonetheless enjoying the idyllic life alongside Mahr and the other villagers. Times this peaceful were rare in his homeland, and he wished to experience it to its fullest.

Still, he could not stay here forever. This was the last day before he would finally head off again.

The Hero or not, traveling in this world was dangerous, and it wasn't clear whether he could ever visit this village again. That was why he wanted to spend his last day here without regrets.

"All right. It's harvest day today, isn't it?" To'ori had grown close to Mahr and the other villagers, and he emerged from the room he'd been staying in looking forward to experiencing what might be the last memory he'd make with them all.

"Good morning, Chief."

"Ohh, Sir To'ori. Good morning."

Even the village chief now addressed him by name. It was yet another sign of how familiar he'd become with this village.

For some reason, though, the chief was looking through the window with a somewhat perplexed expression.

"What's the matter?"

"Well...today's morning newspaper hasn't arrived yet. That's unusual, because the press in the capital is usually quite early," the chief said, his hands held up in resignation.

The village being as small as it was, the newspaper company didn't have a branch there, so newspapers were brought in by avian creatures specialized in stealth.

"I suppose it could just be that the delivery monster took the wrong turn, or maybe it dropped the newspapers somewhere. Regardless, now that you are awake, let's have breakfast."

Saying that with a smile as broad as a jester's, the chief urged To'ori to sit at the table, which was already covered in food. To'ori did as he was told, joining the chief, his wife, and his children for breakfast.

By the time they were done eating, they heard the flapping of bird wings outside.

“Oh? I suppose it’s finally arrived.”

“Hm?” While the chief simply assumed that the newspaper was late and went outside to pick it up, To’ori felt as though something wasn’t right. The flapping was very unsteady, and the breathing accompanying it was awfully wheezy.

The next moment, To’ori heard the chief let out a fearful shout.

Not wasting a second, To’ori sprung to action, using Instant Equip and Instant Wear to ready his gear before rushing outside. While his perception skills didn’t activate, the chief’s reaction was more than enough for him to understand that something serious was happening.

However, when he went outside, he didn’t find any threat that warranted him gearing up for combat.

“Gh...gegh...geeyui...” What To’ori found was a single bird, spitting blood and other fluids as it flapped its wings in utter derangement.

The bird had a bag with a newspaper company’s name attached to its leg. It flew—or rather, fell—as blood from its mouth and feathers from its wings rained down.

Soon enough, the bird let out a pained noise, and its life expired. The blood, the feathers, and everything else that remained of it vanished into bits of light.

“Th-This is...!” The fasteners on the bag attached to it were undone, and the newspapers inside had fallen out.

All of them were covered in blood that hadn’t disappeared—tian blood.

And among it all, there was a single piece of paper, covered in hastily written text, containing information that someone must’ve used their last strength to write.

It said, “DEADLY DISEASE SPREADING IN CAPITAL. DANGER.”

◆◆◆

Minor Country, Mahem, Capital, Three Hours Ago

Mahem was a tiny country.

Compared to Altar, all Mahem had was a single midsize city and villages so few they could be counted on one hand. It was likely smaller than Gideon Country, and that was only a part of the great kingdom of Altar.

Still, because it was blessed by a temperate climate, Mahem had always been home to many tians.

Its location between three large countries and powerful monster habitats had made expansion impossible, but it had existed as a very peaceful country ever since the end of The Era of the Peerless Three a few centuries ago.

It had become part of Mahem's culture to live steadily and earnestly. Everyone from the king to the lowest peasant had always thought that if they merely did that, they would continue to exist even if the rest of the world fell apart.

That was why none of them anticipated an end like this.

That day, a man working at the newspaper company woke up in the dead of night coughing, with an uncomfortable feeling in his mouth. He went to his workplace after taking some medicine that improved disease resistance, but it seemed to have little effect—in fact, his condition only got worse.

He looked around and noticed that less than half of his coworkers had come to work, and all of those who did seemed to be feeling just as terrible as he did.

"Is this...an Epidemic?" That was the first thing that came to his mind. Epidemics were diseases that took communities by surprise, negatively affecting people regardless of their stats or resistances.

They always affected some people more than others, but this one seemed worse than most. "Do we have time to replace the front page article with one about this Epidemic?" he said, punctuated with coughing. The Secretaries with printing skills were already using them to produce the morning newspapers, but he felt that it might've been better to warn the people of this danger as soon as possible.

Maybe we could add it into the blank spaces on the page...? He thought of how to convey this information, only to see the sun begin to rise outside.

"Damn it. We didn't make it in time."

As a Tamer working for the company, he was supposed to send out the newspaper delivery monsters before dawn, but the disease had left too few people for them to accomplish that in a timely manner. The morning newspaper would most certainly be late now. They would have to add an apology as well.

As that thought crossed his mind, blood began to well up deep in his throat.

"Huh?" He stared blankly down at his own crimson blood, staining the newspaper on the desk.

It wasn't just him. Everyone within the newspaper company was now vomiting blood.

No—it wasn't just his colleagues either.

The few people he could see outside were all collapsing with blood gushing from their mouths, just like they were.

"Th-This is...fatal...?!" The disease that at first manifested as discomfort and coughing at most had become significantly worse with the rising of the sun.

It was too late, but the man finally realized that this was a far more potent disease than he'd first thought.

I-I should at least...warn the...surrounding villages...! He took a paper and hastily wrote down "DEADLY DISEASE SPREADING IN CAPITAL. DANGER" before throwing it in a newspaper delivery bag. Then, he removed a tamed monster from his Jewel, doused it in Elixir, and sent it to the nearby villages.

The only thing he hoped for now was to keep the villagers away from the capital.

Urged by his sense of duty as a member of the press, he'd sent out this dying message, not knowing who it would reach—or if it would even make it in time.

◇◇◇

Mahem, Village

A bird that had died before their eyes, and the message from the bag.

To'ori instantly understood the meaning behind the words, as well as the obscene amount of blood, and his face went pale.

This is bad! It's contagious...! Considering the possibility that the blood itself could be a carrier of the pathogens, he instantly cast a flame spell, creating a fireball that incinerated the bag.

He acted fast—the bag was set alight and disinfected the instant he saw what was written on that piece of paper.

"Did that do it...?" Saying that, To'ori checked by using his Full Link to activate another skill.

It was Disease Eye, a skill that came from his job as Plaguemancer, which he'd picked up at one point because it was useful in helping people. It was an active skill that let him perceive harmful pathogens by tinting them a reddish color.

He used it to observe the area around the incinerated and sterilized bag.

"Ah...!"

However, the entire scenery besides that patch was covered in red.

"Wh-What?!"

A swarm of disease was encroaching from the horizon like blood flooding the world. It grew and multiplied explosively, engulfing the entire country of Mahem.

The base of his feet was already bright red, and when he turned around, he saw the wave of sickness covering nearly the entire hill on which the village stood—and it showed no signs of stopping.

With that, To'ori realized that the flying monster might not have been infected by the minuscule amount of pathogens in the bag. Instead, it might have been overwhelmed by the flood that had crawled over all the way from the capital.

What that meant was...

"Cough, cough...!"

"Ah! Chief!" The village chief, standing behind To'ori, suddenly began to cough up blood and fell to the ground. A steady stream of red flowed from his mouth as he stared with unfocused eyes and clawed at the air, looking for something—or someone—to help him.

In other words, he was looking for To'ori.

The Hero rushed over to him immediately before dousing him in one bottle of Elixir, letting him drink another, and casting a healing spell.

However, he was too slow. The Elixir seemed to have little effect, and the damage being done to the chief's body outpaced the healing from the spell as he continued to cough.

To'ori used every means of recovery available to him, but they barely even slowed the disease down.

And so, within just ten seconds or so, the chief's life was snuffed out.

However, it didn't stop at that.

Unlike monsters, who disintegrated as soon as they died, tian bodies remained untouched.

Or rather, that was how it was supposed to work.

And yet, the chief's body was now being disassembled—as though countless tiny creatures were tearing it apart and consuming it.

The flesh on his body vanished with terrifying speed, leaving only his blood, bone, and hair.

"This...this is...!" As To'ori voiced his horror at the scene, he heard similar sounds coming from the chief's home. His family must've just died in the same way.

And it wasn't just them.

To'ori looked over the village, painted red by his Disease Eye, a clamor of pain and anguish now reaching him.

If those shouts were caused by the same thing that he had just witnessed, then he might as well have been gazing at hell itself.

"Gh...!" Blood began to well up in the corners of To'ori's mouth, signifying that he might have been infected. It had a minor effect on him, but that was only because of his Poison Resistance skill and vast HP provided by his over 1,000 levels. If it weren't for those things, this disease would've claimed him just like the others.

"No...this isn't..." To'ori muttered to himself. Indeed—this was no mere "disease."

This was a deliberate attack.

To'ori had lived in Tenchi, the land of strife, for nearly ten years, and that allowed him to sense this fact clearly.

"The Resources are moving." People killing other people resulted in a greater movement of Resources—XP—than when the killing was done by monsters, and any martial artist who was proficient enough—by Tenchi standards, at least—was able to perceive this movement.

Now, To'ori was able to sense that movement. He could feel the Resources from the chief who'd died right before his eyes flowing into the distance—to the one who'd killed him.

"Instant Wear." With those words, a piece of equipment appeared on To'ori head.

It was a helm called Prototype Horobimaru-Star Helmet—the piece of equipment he'd acquired while crossing the sea between Tenchi and the continent, where he'd encountered and defeated a suit of empty armor—the SUBM, Penta-Phased Destroyer, Horobimaru. This item had a curious skill that allowed him to see his enemies—a skill called Anti Stealth.

He activated this power and viewed his foe with perfect clarity. In Mahem's capital, there stood a boy, sneering with unadulterated glee.

With the enemy's presence confirmed, this was no longer a natural disaster but a massacre enacted by human hands.

"The foe is in my sight."

To'ori stared at the person who'd slaughtered the people who had welcomed him with open arms.

They had to be avenged.

That was the law of Tenchi, which still held him in an iron grip. He'd lived within that law for most of his life. He'd killed those coming for his head because of his immense strength—his status as The Hero.

He was then targeted by the families of those he killed. And when he dealt with them, he had been confronted by their friends.

The more he tried to wipe away the sparks of conflict falling upon him, the more violent his life became. He'd left Tenchi exactly because he found himself hating the fact that his future—the path laid out for him—was stained in blood.

But in this moment, To'ori realized that he was still a true man of Tenchi. His very soul was roaring for him to kill this wretch who laughed as he slaughtered innocents.

With a face of an asura forged by strife, the kindhearted Hero fixed his eyes on the capital—and the evil he had to purge.

He poured all his strength into his legs, ready to dash toward the city at supersonic speeds...

"Ah!"

...but then something stopped him.

The image of a person flashed into his mind. It was Mahr—the boy he'd formed a connection with.

To'ori's memories told him that his house was beyond that hill.

"Please be all right!" he cried, turning around and rushing to cross it. He was too late to help the village chief and everyone else on this side of the hill, but he thought—prayed—that he could maybe save at least someone.

Moving faster than sound, he cleared the hill in the blink of an eye—but the red wave had already arrived here, consuming the house that doubled as a ranch. From within it, he could hear a multitude of disturbing sounds and anguished voices.

The despair left To'ori speechless and barely able to stand.

But before he fell to his knees, he realized that there weren't as many voices as there should be.

The disease had reached the ranch, yet he didn't hear the cries of the many animals that lived there.

Rekindling his hope, he once again fixed his eyes on the horizon. There, beyond the red wave, he saw Mahr, watching over a number of peacefully grazing sheep.

"Ah!" He could still make it.

The moment he realized that, he gathered all his strength and jumped beyond the red wave.

This mighty step was the combination of The Hero's countless skills and high stats—a method of closing distance that was faster than everything in Tenchi except the draw of The Unsheath Kashimiya.

To'ori used that skill to finally outrun the red wave, landing right between it and Mahr.

"Huh?!" Mahr exclaimed, surprised by To'ori's sudden appearance, as well as his combat-ready attire. However, The Hero paid no heed to him and looked up at the sky.

"All right," To'ori said. After confirming something, he held up the Jewel on his right hand, then spoke to the being inside.

"My friend—I release you. Our shared journey ends here."

"I see," the one inside replied, in a voice heavy with sorrow.

"I have one last request..."

"No need to say it. I understand. The kingdom, yes?"

"Yes. Release."

Following this exchange, To'ori released the monster within the Jewel into the open air.

It was a single lightning dragon. Specifically, it was a dragon of the species High-End Lightning Dragon, and it was a friend To'ori had met on his journey. It was a curious sort of dragon who'd willingly let To'ori tame it after the two of them had traveled together for a while.

"Huh? What...?" To'ori's sudden appearance and the dragon's release—

Mahr couldn't understand what was happening here.

However, To’ori no longer had any time to explain anything to the boy. The red wave behind him was getting close, and his own infected body was gradually shedding on the ground around him. Because of this, he couldn’t take Mahr with him and run.

The only one who could accomplish that was the lightning dragon, who’d avoided infection first by being in the safety of the Jewel, then by taking to the air, where the disease could not reach.

That was why To’ori had no choice but to entrust this task to the dragon. He knew he could count on him, and thus he didn’t hesitate.

Not saying a word, To’ori used wind magic to lift Mahr’s body into the air while keeping his distance from him.

Gently, like a balloon, Mahr’s body rose upwards.

“Wh-Whoa!” As the boy levitated, the lightning dragon gently grasped him in hand. “M-Mister To’ori! Wh-What’s...?!”

What was it that the boy tried to say in his confusion?

The red wave has already swarmed past To’ori’s feet.

The many animals, including the Demi-Drac-Hound they’d used as a sheepdog, were soon claimed by disease and vanished amid screams of anguish, spewing blood from their mouths.

The sudden event filled the boy with fear, but To’ori didn’t say anything to calm him down. He wished he could—there were many things he wished to talk about with Mahr—but the situation didn’t allow it. They had no time to speak.

“Goodbye, Mahr. I won’t forget you. You’re utterly unlike me, yet you bear the same pain...and I will never forget you.”

That was why, To’ori only said what was most important...

“So if you can...keep me in your memories too.”

...entrusting the boy with his last words.

Following that, the lightning dragon flapped its great wings, preparing to distance itself from the infected earth and take to the great skies beyond.

The lightning dragon looked down at To’ori one last time. “Farewell, To’ori, my dear friend.”

“Goodbye, Arcal. You were my friend as well.”

Following that exchange, they parted ways, knowing full well that they would never meet again.

“Mister To’o—” The dragon took off before Mahr could finish. Keeping the boy safe with an electromagnetic field, it—he—left the surface behind.

And thus, only To'ori was left in the village.

Nothing else remained. The only things alive here were him, the grass, the trees...and the pathogens.

In the end, To'ori had protected only one person, and doing so had cost him a significant amount of his remaining life span—his HP.

This disease was so fatal that Elixirs did nothing and healing magic was inadequate. It was clear that even if he focused his efforts on recovery spells, his life would still be over shortly.

However, he didn't regret saving Mahr whatsoever.

What awaited the boy was a difficult future of pain and sorrow. Having lost his homeland and family, he may not know how to go on. But as long as he was alive...he could choose his future. He could take that next step forward.

"Now...time to go." To'ori himself had no more choices to make, so he hoped that at least the boy would have a future he could claim as his own.

"This will be...my final journey."

With those words, The Hero flew into action. Faster than the dragon's flight, he rushed to defeat the foe beyond the horizon.

An asura forged by strife, The Hero was now a speeding arrow of judgment.

The Capital of Mahem

By the time the dawn broke, even the sounds of anguish had vanished from the bloodstained city. Many had suffered as their bodies melted away, leaving only their bones behind.

"La la laa..."

But there was one person who wasn't suffering in the least.

This individual was in the inner courtyard of Mahem's modest palace, singing and twirling, their ostentatiously decorated dress fluttering as they sang in a high soprano.

It was as though they simply couldn't contain the emotions welling up within.

"La laa..."

Their face was charming and youthful enough that it was difficult to tell if it belonged to a man or a woman, but most people wouldn't be looking at their face on first meeting. Instead, their eyes would most likely be drawn to the extravagant clothing and the massive flask clutched in their hands. The dancing figure's name was Candy Carnage—a Superior who wore the crown of King of Plagues. He was the very person who'd unleashed this deadly disease onto the country of Mahem.

"Look at my levels going up and up!" Candy looked at his stat summary and smiled gleefully.

This was because, just as he'd intended, many of the city's tians had died. The very reason he was here in the palace, acting like he owned the place, was because any guards and servants who could stop him were all dead.

"Tians really do have the best XP efficiency! Doing this makes me sooo happy! It's been way too long since the last time!"

His rising levels were proof of all the lives he'd snuffed out. But despite knowing that, Candy had a genuine smile on his face.

It didn't seem like the happiness of a gamer relishing his level-ups, but of someone enjoying the massacre itself.

It wasn't uncommon for players to have a good time absolutely dominating some NPCs, yet this was more like he actually...

"But this Collapsed Present is still incomplete. It doesn't multiply half as well without extra energy from sunlight and heat... That's something to think about."

Candy's joy faded somewhat as he suddenly began to ponder the problems surrounding the spread of this deadly disease.

Collapsed Present was the general term for carnivorous types of bacteria in his collection—the ones that physically consumed living beings. The ones that he'd released this time had a higher proliferation speed, but demanded more energy, forcing them to rely not only on the flesh and heat of the infected, but also some energy from external sources.

That was the price he'd paid so it could infect an area larger than the capital of a small country.

"Hmm...and there's a limit to how much I can boost them up with my MP too. It'd be nice to have an energy source for them that's more accessible than sunlight though. Well, I guess I might get something if I just level up some more!" Candy said, poking at the surface of the bulky measuring flask that was still spewing bacteria—his Superior Embryo, Pestilent Divinity, Resheph.

"This is great. My GODlike self gets levels, Resheph's bacteria modding becomes more precise, and most importantly—this is fun to watch! I'm so glad I did this! I'm killing three birds with one stone!"

In the heart of this disaster, with the death count growing by the second, Candy's excitement was sincere. And if that was the only thing he was excited about, perhaps he could have just been one of those ludos who didn't see tians as people...

"I'd love to somehow bring Resheph from this world to Earth, but that doesn't seem possible right now."

...but his next words were peculiar, to say the least—if not completely absurd.

"There's a bunch of my kind out there on Earth, but my GOD-ly self isn't GODlike at all. I hope I don't take too long to go back to being the GOD I used to be."

If anyone listened to him, they likely couldn't begin to understand what he was saying. They were neither the words of a ludo nor the words of a worlder.

It was as though to him, this world that the hardware of Infinite Dendrogram connected him to was nothing but another obstacle in his path he needed to trample over—as though he was a being capable of doing that in the first place.

"Getting a Superior Embryo wasn't enough...but maybe I just need to go beyond it? What awaits at the end is the Infinite, anyway."

The number of people who could understand this was no doubt even smaller, but Candy continued.

"Hmm? But if this is a little garden built by a different group of my kind, maybe if I just keep leveling up, I could bring over Resheph's evolution with this body? This sweet little Candy avatar could become an Infinite Job, and I'd once again have the powers I used to. Either of those things would help me achieve my goal, I think. That would be great!"

In fact, perhaps there wasn't a single person alive who could understand the full scope of Candy Carnage's ramblings—not the custodians, not those who had inherited the memories of the pre-ancient civilization, not the current holders of the most powerful jobs. Even the control substitute might not be able to grasp it all.

"For now, I'll just work toward a bright future by getting more XP!"

Regardless, Candy moved toward this future he'd imagined by destroying the future of an entire country.

"Why...would you...?"

"Oh?" As his rising levels once again made Candy grin, he heard someone call out to him from behind.

It was a single knight who'd crawled out from somewhere in the palace. Likely due to the Collapsed Present infection, his mouth and eyes were bleeding, and he lacked the strength to move any farther.

"I'm impressed you're still alive. It's been half an hour since the sun came up! Are you a Superior Job or something? How exciting! I'll get lots of XP from you!"

The man was one of the leading knights of Mahem. Bearing the vanguard tank Superior Job, King of Shields, he wore his title proudly and served as his country's greatest shield.

But not even he could protect the people from the disease that had spread here.

The civilians in the palace, his brothers-in-arms, the king, the queen...even the young prince had already perished. He'd survived, but he no longer had the strength to fight.

Still, he was able to sense the presence of someone living and dragged himself all the way to the inner courtyard, where he'd found the culprit behind all of this—Candy Carnage himself.

"Who...who are you...?! How...and why...did you...?!"

"Hmm, you know what? I'll tell you. Consider it a gift to take with you into your next life. I guess it could fall on deaf ears, though." In response to the man's question, spoken through the blood filling his mouth, Candy grinned. Then, he gestured as if to say "You're in for a treat," and...

"Because I am GOD."

...said that, his face now void of expression.

"G...God...?" The answer made no sense, but Candy behaved as if that were all that needed to be said.

"Okay, then—I guess I'll have to explain a teensy bit more." His expression twisted into a smile again as he began elaborating.

“My GOD-ly self is a GOD—but as I am now, I’m a GOD neither here nor on the other side. I don’t have enough Resources, so I’m getting them from this massacre. That’s my motivation. Now, the means. Resheph is an Embryo that modifies bacteria and spreads them. It’s specialized in mass murder like this. And so, uhh, since I created Resheph as my other half, I obviously don’t hate mass murder personally, right? Honestly, I’d love to do this on Earth too. Eight billion people is just way too much. I’d love to get those numbers lower, like I did in that world I graced with my GOD-ly presence some time ago. It’d be like the good old days when I hung around with the God of the Future and the God of Destruction.”

“Huh...uhh...huh?” The knight didn’t understand a word of the long monologue Candy spat out. There was no way he even could.

“Hrmm...I told you who I am, how I did it, why I did it, and even added a bit about my memories and my future dreams. I told you every little thing, yet you’re still totally lost! You’re a bit of a hopeless case, aren’t you? How very sad.”

Saying that, Candy walked up to the man, crouched down, grabbed his hair, stared into his eyes...

“Which do you think I am?”

...and posed him that question.

“Do you think I’m a scumbag who’s not right in the head and thinks he’s the reincarnation of a GOD,” Candy asked, “or a scumbag who’s not right in the head and actually is the reincarnation of a GOD?” Wearing a smile with no positive feeling behind it, Candy closed his eyes.

“Sorryyy! I dunno myseeelf! I have no clue if these memories are real, fake, delusions, or misapprehensioooons! Nobody knooows! Nobody understaaands! And those who don’t get it...they die!”

Saying all this as though he was singing, Candy opened his eyes again to look at the knight’s face.

And so...

“You’re dead toooo!”

The tian Candy was talking to had expired without understanding anything he’d said.

Candy then let go of his hair, letting the man’s lifeless face smash into the ground.

“Well, it’s stressful to keep all of that bottled up, so thanks for lending a dead ear."

With that, Candy resumed looking at his stats.

He smiled, Resheph spread the disease, and the bacteria continued to multiply.

Eventually, all of Mahem was claimed by this plague, carried there by the malignant hands of someone who claimed to be god, recognized himself to be god, and seemed to possess the awareness of a god.

◇

By the time everyone in the capital had perished, there was one solitary silhouette heading toward it.

Moving on the surface faster than the eye could see, this figure was The Hero To'ori Kusanagi.

Continuously casting healing magic on himself, he was running as fast as he could. Every now and then, though, he let out a cough. His limit was approaching even faster.

He was already infected by the disease, Collapsed Present. It was a swarm of carnivorous bacteria that consumed the flesh and blood of the infected far more ravenously than any other.

The amount To'ori recovered with his magic was less than the damage he was receiving from Collapsed Present. Additionally, the damage created injury-based debuffs that reduced his body's performance.

His sprinting speed was dropping, and he still wasn't sure if he would even make it to the capital beyond the horizon.

"Not yet...!"

Regardless, he kept on running.

The Prototype Horobimaru-Star Helmet still had Candy in its sights, and To'ori felt he might be the only person who could actually see the real enemy.

And precisely because of that, To'ori strained what little life he had left to rush toward this foe. Supporting his body with the many passive and active skills he had at his disposal, he kept moving forward.

However, that was draining him too. The more skills he used to travel quickly, the less MP he had for healing magic.

His remaining life was melting away like a candle engulfed in a roaring blaze.

Still, he didn’t stop.

As he was speeding toward the capital, he saw a pair of skeletons seated on a coach. They clearly belonged to an adult and a child. Were they a family? With the tamed monster pulling it gone, the dragon carriage had nearly toppled over, yet the two corpses were still side by side.

Next to the houses along the road, there were some skeletons grasping farming tools. These were people who were ready to welcome a new day in their ordinary lives—a day they would never see.

And then there was the village he’d stayed in. He could still hear the gruesome sounds and anguished screams of the people who’d given him such a warm welcome.

Everything around the city of Mahem had been massacred, their futures cut off and extinguished.

This was an absolute evil that To’ori couldn’t stomach.

As The Hero—and merely as a person who hoped for the future himself—he rushed to cut down this foe.

Eventually, the walls of the capital entered his field of vision. His sworn enemy was close.

“Gh...!”

But then, his failing body reached a critical point. The bacteria had already consumed over half of the muscle on his legs. Bone was visible on his limbs and even his face.

He couldn’t keep up running at supersonic speeds, and he lost momentum just in sight of the capital.

“Not...yet...!”

Still, To’ori mustered his will and kept moving his legs. Bleeding from all over his body, his bones creaking audibly, he moved forward step by step. Eventually, the walls loomed large in front of him.

That was when his left arm fell off.

To’ori passed through the massive gate, forcing his legs to carry him forward even though he could barely run.

That was when his eyes fell out.

He followed the pavement, leaving a trail of blood behind him.

That was when he lost the power to stand and began to crawl.

Candy was in the palace—a mere two hundred metels away.

That was when To'ori completely ran out of MP, and he could no longer heal himself.

The collapse of his body accelerated.

Now, the flesh that he'd lost far exceeded the flesh that remained. The vast HP To'ori possessed as The Hero had dropped to critical levels.

Despite that, with eyes that couldn't see, legs that couldn't move, and only one arm...he kept moving toward Candy.

"Hh...hhhgh..." He didn't even have a tongue to speak with anymore. The bacteria had consumed it all.

Even so, his soul and will kept choosing to move.

However...that would abruptly end.

To'ori's HP dropped to 0. His life reached its end, leaving nothing but silence.

Unable to make it to his sworn enemy, The Hero To'ori Kusanagi breathed his last.

◆

"Hrmm? I guess that's it...?" Candy said as he looked at his stats, somewhat disappointed. The levels that had been rising until now had grown stagnant for the past several minutes. "Well, I guess they killed everyone within their multiplication range. That's that, then! I did get plenty of levels, so let's go to a larger country next!"

After killing the entire country of Mahem, King of Plagues relished the massacre he'd just committed—in fact, he even considered repeating it on a grander scale.

"It's probably hard to spread in Caldina's desert, and I hear that Legendaria's environment is weird, so...the kingdom it is, then."

And just like that, he set Altar as his next target.

"Aaanyway, it's off to the west we go!" Done with this place and clearly in high spirits, he finally decided to leave Mahem.

Humming a song, Candy skipped through the castle gates.

There, he ran into an asura—an embodiment of strife.

"Huh?" Candy doubted his own eyes.

It was dead. It was obviously dead. After all...it was nothing but bone, just like everyone else in this country.

It was a white skeleton, stripped bare of flesh and clad in Tenchi armor.

It would be easy to mistake it for an undead monster—but it was no monster at all.

It was the remains of one man, all that was left of him before he died.

It was the corpse of To'ori Kusanagi, animated by Last Command.

Tenchi was the land of strife. Many martial artists there wished to be able to deliver one last attack before death, and thus took the Death Soldier job far more often than people of other countries.

The Hero was no exception. He had fallen before reaching his sworn enemy...but reached him after dying.

"What—" Before Candy could even wonder what he was looking at, To'ori launched an attack.

It was a slash that carried the entire weight of this dead man's life—a single flash of blade that used all his remaining SP and the life breathed into him by Last Command.

It didn't miss, slicing right through Candy's neck.

As it was a strike that would kill instantly, it shattered Candy's Brooch.

And that was when the time limit was reached. The effect of Last Command expired, and To'ori's bones scattered on the pavement.

Silence. Candy rubbed his neck.

At that moment, he most certainly felt like he was dead.

If his memory was no delusion, he'd almost experienced his second death since the time he'd died as a god—the God of Pestilence.

He picked up the helmet that had fallen on the ground, threw a glance at the bones...

“Not baaad.” His face wore a strained smile—seemingly a mix of happiness and fear.

At that moment, Candy chose to log out. Better safe than sorry. He’d decided to be careful and wait until he could equip the Brooch again.

Because of this, To’ori’s final attack did nothing but delay Candy’s plot by twenty-four hours.

◆

This was the end of the country of Mahem and the death of The Hero.

The gentle youth who carried the hope of all tians had been killed by King of Plagues. This was the final tragedy of the great calamity this Master had caused.

There were only two things that The Hero had left behind.

One was the twenty-four extra hours before Candy would invade Altar.

The other was the life of the boy he’d sent away with his draconic friend.

Whether these things had any meaning would soon be revealed.

Interlude: Records and Memories

Sorcerer Ray Starling

Riser won the eighth day of The Tournaments.

He'd been a high-ranking duelist for a long time, so you could say that this was an expected result.

Fujinon had tried to show the new magic she'd learned based on Almagest, but it wasn't enough to win. She'd also noticed us in the box and saw that Io was cheering for Riser, which put her in a pretty bad mood.

Who could blame her? Her friend was happy that she lost.

"That's pretty awful, don't you think?" she asked me.

"Ha ha ha...well, Io's the honest and simple type, so..."

Fujinon sighed. "By the way..."

"What?"

"Who did you bet on today? And how much?"

"Two hundred million on Riser."

Yet again, I ended up footing the bill for the consolation party.

After that was over, I went to the library in our HQ.

It was originally an archive that had held ledgers and the like, but now it was a place to store the books my clan members brought. It contained the back issues of DIN that Marie mentioned, the useful info B3 got from The Lunar Society's database, and the kind of books enjoyed by Fujinon's trio, among others.

Despite what the word "library" might suggest, it wasn't a place where books and documents were laid out on shelves. Instead, it had Inventories similar to bookshelves which could be accessed by anyone who was registered. They even had a search function, which made this process very convenient.

There was actually one Inventory that only Fujinon's trio and Marie were permitted to access, and when I asked what it contained, their answers were ambiguous at best, which left me pretty damn curious.

That aside...with the library working the way it did, I found the newspaper issues about King of Plagues in no time. I took them out and silently began reading them right there in the library. Nemesis had fallen asleep right after we ate, so I was all alone.

"I see," I muttered to myself as I read. I could understand why Marie was comparing this to the Gloria incident.

That fiendish dragon had destroyed the Lunnings Duchy and Claymill here in Altar, while King of Plagues had destroyed the entire small nation of Mahem. Additionally, he had repelled many Masters who went to beat him—Superiors included.

He and the dragon were both walking disasters, which was another way they were similar.

Yeah...after destroying that country, King of Plagues began heading to Altar as his next target.

The person who'd stopped this march was none other than Marie—the Superior Killer. King of Plagues had been rightfully sent to the gaol and given a sentence so long that he'd probably never be released.

I'd heard this part several times before—these were the results, so to speak, that I already had a good grasp of.

"But..." There were many things that neither the articles nor the hearsay allowed me to really understand. And perhaps because this Candy person was always the epicenter of a superwide biohazard zone, there wasn't much about his appearance. There wasn't even a photo.

Most importantly...

"Hm..." I sighed thoughtfully as I searched the bookshelves for any related material.

"Oh? You're furthering your education so late at night. How dedicated." As I was doing that, Marie came and called out to me.

"Marie...oh, I was just curious about what we were talking about this afternoon."

"Afternoon...the King of Plagues thing? Anything in particular you wanna know?"

Given that question, I took a moment to think and decided to just ask her outright. She was involved in it, so maybe she would have the answers I wanted.

"I wanna know what King of Plagues's motivation was and the method you used to win." The articles didn't have anything about the why or the how of the incident. Maybe the former was only inside King of Plagues's head, but even the latter was just summarized as "the Superior killer beat King of Plagues."

His motivation was what I felt I had to find out, while the circumstances of his defeat was just something I wanted to know. Regardless, neither of those things was clear to me whatsoever. Marie nodded in understanding and began to speak.

"They say that the motivation was just Resources—XP. Killing tians for XP is more efficient than killing Masters or monsters, so people think that this indiscriminate massacre was just a powerleveling strat. Even if it isn't possible for most people to pull off, it's obviously not a good idea to put that out there regardless. That's why the articles didn't mention it."

I was speechless. Could someone really kill that many people and animals—a whole country's worth—just for that?

As that thought crossed my mind, another question surfaced.

Did those lives mean so little to King of Plagues that he could crush them for some levels? Or did the goal of leveling up mean so much to him that all those lives were nothing in comparison?

Whichever it was...

"You look like you just can't wrap your head around it, but of course you can't, right? One look at what King of Plagues did will tell you that he's the total opposite of you."

"You might be right." Whether King of Plagues was a ludo or a worlder, he wasn't like me at all.

There might've been Masters out there who could do the same things for completely different reasons than King of Plagues had, but I was pretty confident I wasn't one of them.

"Well, I'm the one who beat him, and not even I talked to him, so his motivations are still technically unknown," Marie said.

"Seriously?"

"I don't think I would've had a chance against him if I took my time and had a nice little chat." That sentence alone made it clear that it had been a difficult battle for her. "So, the other thing was the method, right? Should I elaborate on that?"

"You don't mind?"

"Not at all. I have time. And it might be good for you to know."

“I’m listening, then.”

Marie replied by making the okay sign with her fingers...

“What I’m about to say is sort of a mix of what I learned in my investigations after the events and my own experiences, but...”

...and began to speak.

She would tell me of her deadly battle against the menacing King of Plagues—the origin story of the “Superior Killer” nickname.

Chapter Five Closing: Godslayer

Control AI No. 11's Workspace

The sight of books often made Dormouse lose himself in thought.

They made him wonder why they—the control AIs, that is—liked keeping books in their workspaces at all. Just as Cheshire welcomed Masters in a study, and Red King filled his gaol with lots of literature, the majority of the control AIs had books by their side in one form or another. Many of the books were work-related data files that simply took the form of books. Even Humpty kept her Embryo data records compiled in this way.

Privately, Dormouse thought that this habit might just be the result of how long the control AIs had been alive. Their existences were so extensive—so full of events and things that were, or were no longer—that it made them uneasy if they didn't have their memories by their side in a visible form. Their books might just be a manifestation of these feelings.

However, those volumes had a different meaning than those that belonged to the twins—control AI No. 11, Tweedledum and Tweedledee.

"It truly is vast," Dormouse said, looking up at the ceiling of the room he was in.

Room, however, was too small a word for this space. A gymnasium, then? A stadium, perhaps? No, those terms also lacked the necessary sense of scale.

It was more like a space colony straight out of science fiction—an immense cylinder with an inside covered in shelves full of books.

A person's entire lifetime probably wouldn't be enough to read even a hundredth of the text that was kept here. This was even more clear when one realized that these shelves were the sliding kind, so there were likely hundreds more layers of books below those that were visible. And though they had the shape of books, the tomes were actually storage media that packed information far more densely than paper.

The amount of information here was so vast that even the entirety of mankind would struggle to read all of it.

This was control AI No. 11's workspace—the Grand Library of All-Knowledge. It was the database that contained all the information the control AIs had acquired in Infinite Dendrogram, as well as everything they had acquired before that.

And the twins were the ones who managed it.

While they usually calculated quest difficulty and controlled the flow of information via DIN, taking care of this facility was an important part of their job, just like Alice had to care for the avatar space and Red King had to observe the gaol.

The library was a remnant from the time when they managed all of their databases.

"Tweedledum, Tweedledee. You are here, are you not?" Dormouse called out, but received no response.

Left with nothing else to do, he continued moving through this vast space.

"Hrm. There you are." Farther ahead, Dormouse spotted a small orb—a strange object that had rings of countless books orbiting it like satellites.

The twins were in the middle of it, but they looked different than usual. Tweedledum had removed his glasses, while Tweedledee wasn't wearing her headphones.

In other words, the limiters to their information gathering were off.

Tweedledum's eyes skimmed across astronomical amounts of data, and Tweedledee was listening to just as many words. They were crunching the information and calculating the desired answer.

Dormouse looked at them in silence and decided to wait a little bit. If there was a situation that called for the twins to focus like this, he believed that it was best to let them continue, and the wait wouldn't affect Dormouse's job all that much. In fact, it was far more important for them to finish processing this information as soon as possible.

After a good while, the books that had been orbiting the twins returned to their positions, and the two put on their glasses and headphones again.

"We kept you waiting for three hours, twenty-four minutes, and eighteen seconds, No. 8."

"Sorry 'bout that, Dormousey!" The pair spoke in perfect unison as they turned toward Dormouse.

"What were you looking into so intensely?" Dormouse asked.

"Something related to your request," Tweedledum answered.

"Analyzing what King of Plagues said and all that!" Tweedledee continued.

Dormouse nodded in understanding. Though it was small, King of Plagues had actually destroyed a country neighboring Altar. For Dormouse—as well as the one he was observing and protecting—it was important to know if he would go to the kingdom next.

"We will start with the conclusion to your question."

"There's no way he's not going to Altar next!"

"Understandable." Dormouse was fairly certain of that already, but having it confirmed still made him let out a sigh. Now, in the worst-case scenario, Altar might end up flooded with immense amounts of Resources from the dead, which was in no way a good thing for him.

"More importantly, about what he said..."

"He wasn't just talking to himself. It seemed like a message for us!"

The words Candy had spoken in the courtyard of Mahem's palace might've been the ramblings of a madman—but if they weren't, he'd certainly sent out a message that said, "I'll work toward becoming Infinite just as I planned, so you better not try anything funny and get in my way."

"What do you truly make of that?" Dormouse asked.

"His information is totally on the mark. We scrutinized it, but unless he received knowledge from the other side, outside our reach...he spoke the truth."

"An Infiniiite! Well, all we know about it ourselves is Infinite Embryos and the calamity that attacked our world! Even the stuff we know about the Infinite Jobs that built this foundation is indirect and uncertain!"

Though they were "control" AI, they weren't in control of everything in the world. Jobs were as fundamental to Dendro as Embryos, yet they barely touched those, and they had almost no information from before the time of the pre-ancient civilization that they'd fought against. Their awareness of that era didn't extend beyond knowing that some creatures which had gone on to become UBMs had been born in a time preceding even the control AIs' arrival. The finest examples of this were Irregularities like Skydragon King and Seadragon King, as well as the SUBM Seven Star Command.

"According to No. 0, there are Infinites on the other side—planet Earth—as well, but they do not show themselves openly," said control AI No. 11.

"No. 0 is from a different generation than us, so he probably knows a lot more, but..."

"He says it is irrelevant and does not speak much of it."

"'The only Infinites besides us that have any relation to the project are the Infinite Jobs.' That's what he said a looong time ago. And that there's others besides them and us!"

"The realmbeasts we encountered during the voyage—the ones Jabberwock was so fond of—must have Infinites among them, as well."

Hearing that, Dormouse pondered in silence.

Control AI No. 0. Chronologically, he was the oldest among them, but his role was different from those of the others.

A simple description of his job would be "directing the Infinites." He supervised the other control AIs and kept them from going out of control, which was why they required his permission to use their true bodies.

"No. 0, you say?" Dormouse mused. No. 0 was in charge of them, yet he wasn't their leader exactly. He'd been cooperating with them in the war two thousand years ago, as well as during the preparations that followed. However, it always felt like he was somewhat distant from them.

At that moment, Dormouse remembered the words No. 0 had said a very long time ago:

"I am your guardian and witness to your actions."

"I will not stop anything you do as long as it progresses the project, and I will assist you if needed."

"Until the very end, I will bear witness to the choices made by you and your synchronizers."

Control AI No. 0 certainly wasn't an enemy, but because of this stance that he held, he had never revealed everything he knew to them. He most likely wouldn't say anything about the matter at hand either.

"Regardless, while King of Plagues's identity is currently unclear, it is not exactly unlikely that he is a fallen Infinite—a god," Tweedledum continued.

"Not that we can treat him like a special case though!"

"Whatever he may be, there are no problems with his actions."

"It's all just a Master being a Master! You know—free!"

"I suppose that's true," Dormouse said. Masters were free. If they wanted to destroy a country, then by all means, they were allowed to try. If this made them enemies who came after them seeking retribution, then that too was part of their freedom.

"It is also worth noting that if we do not treat him as a special case, we are actually unable to stop him," Tweedledum said.

"Stopping him doesn't fit any of our job descriptions!" Tweedledee added.

While the death penalty might result in players being sent to the gaol, Infinite Dendrogram didn't have the kind of bans found in a traditional online game. Since the gaol sentences were given out in accordance to tian law, the result was that the developers themselves almost never went out of their way to hand out any penalties of their own.

And they had no other means to stop him.

Alice the avatar control AI wouldn't do it. Candy hadn't done or discovered anything forbidden, and the genocide of millions of tians wasn't even the beginnings of a reason for her to take action.

This wasn't a job for Rabbit either. His role as an avatar was to attack sixth form Masters and try to get them to evolve, so Candy—who was already a Superior—wasn't among his targets.

As the gaol's warden, Red King's job would also begin only after Candy was sent there.

It could be argued that Cheshire, being in charge of miscellaneous tasks, could go and stop him, but although he could win using his true body, his sixth and seventh forms lacked the output to overcome the advantage Candy had over him.

And Dormouse himself, being in charge of anything dangerous, didn't count Masters among his valid targets.

"This Master's actions are functionally no different from Jabberwock's SUBM releases," Tweedledum concluded.

"Biiig and scaaary disasters increase the chances of others triggering their evolutions!"

Those words made Dormouse furrow his brow, but he didn't deny them.

Each control AI had their own limits to how far they would go, but it was true that their stance prioritized drawing out evolutions.

However, the person Dormouse was keeping an eye on was far too dangerous and fatal to use as an evolution catalyst. That was why he was so concerned with the matter at hand—it could greatly affect his work.

“Can nothing truly be done?” he wondered.

“We already used our avatars—our position as the CEOs of DIN—to reveal that he is a criminal. And we are working on getting a bounty on him.”

“We collected enough evidence—and luckily, we got someone who left Mahem alive!”

“If the people are going to take action to defeat him, this incident might turn out to be a positive for us,” Tweedledum said.

“With the Masters that are bound to go after him, someone might end up evolving!” said Tweedledee.

“Though, whether someone could beat King of Plagues as he is now...”

“Is another question entirely!”

Dormouse was a little puzzled by the twins’ words. Candy’s build was a terrifying mix of wide-scale suppression and extermination, but there were plenty of people who possessed offensive capabilities with greater range. Caldina even had the Master known as “the Multifariously Invincible.” There had to have been plenty of ways to defeat Candy out there.

“King of Plagues has made a rather troublesome acquisition, I fear.”

“Talk about something getting in the wrong hands!”

“Whatever do you mean?” Dormouse asked.

“A reward,” the twins replied in unison.

That single word made Dormouse think of a particular item that was relevant to this situation—perhaps the worst possible object that he could have envisioned.

“It stands shoulder to shoulder with MVP rewards of the highest tier, but it is not an MVP reward,” said Tweedledum. “It also possesses one particularly meddlesome trait...but knowing a certain individual and their goals, that is only to be expected.”

“I imagine that Jabberwock is having a bit of fun right about now!” said Tweedledee. “A tian owner of that thing has never been killed before...so this is a first!”

“The Hero must have assumed that we would retrieve the item once he perished.”

“Too bad for him! It doesn’t work that way!”

“What reward do you mean?” Dormouse asked, feeling like his furry hide was soaked with sweat from nonexistent sweat glands.

It was a mostly meaningless question, though, for he was more or less certain of what they were talking about—and how terrifying it was.

“Well...”

“Obviously...!”

And indeed, what the twins said next was exactly what Dormouse had expected.

The Remains of the Capital of Mahem

Twenty-four hours had passed since Mahem was destroyed.

“Destroyed” was a strange word to use here, though, for although the entire population was dead, the buildings remained completely untouched. The only thing that had changed was the piles of bones littered throughout the houses and roads where people had once stood.

And someone gazed silently down at this quiet necropolis. On wings empowered by electricity, it was a single lightning dragon—High-End Lightning Dragon Arcal, a friend of the late To’ori. After being entrusted with Mahr, he’d handed the boy over to the people of Altar before returning here.

And now, from up on high where the bacteria couldn’t reach, he was looking down at the empty city.

Though he was seemingly waiting for something in silence, Arcal had already realized that To’ori was dead. He could no longer feel his friend’s presence, but even if he hadn’t been capable of that, the evidence lay plain as day below him.

A skeleton lay there, and though its skull was bare, it was definitely wearing his friend’s armor—but Arcal couldn’t even go retrieve the remains or mourn him, for Mahem was still flooded with deadly bacteria.

There was nothing he could do for his friend. That truth filled him with sadness, as well as rage at his own powerlessness.

This was the second time Arcal had failed to protect something. The first time had been during the attack by the Tri-Zenith Dragon, Gloria.

Once, Arcal had been called Lightning Dragon King, Drac-Volt, and he’d taken his throne on Lightning Dragon Mountain to prevent evil dragons from descending upon the world of men. Gloria, however, had defeated Drac-Volt, which had led to the death of the dragon king's friend Duke Lunnings.

Drac-Volt himself was eventually resurrected by his father, Skydragon King, but he'd lost many things besides his life. The defeat cost him his pride, power, confidence, the life of his friend—too many things to count.

He was also no longer an UBM, and that was exactly why he'd set out on a journey to train and regain his strength—and, he hoped, to become even stronger than before.

The dragon now known as Arcal had entrusted the post at Lightning Dragon Mountain to his younger brother and left the Border Mountain Belt to empower himself. He also thought that perhaps if he fought a UBM and won, he could use the Resources from it to become a UBM again.

It was during this journey that he encountered The Hero To'ori Kusanagi. They met while Arcal was in his human form, and after solving a certain problem together, they came to appreciate each other.

And so, to discover what he lacked or find new power for himself, Arcal had accompanied To'ori on his journey as his tamed monster. This long, yet all too brief, journey they'd shared was one he would never forget.

But alas, it was now over. King of Plagues, vile disaster in human form, had put an end to it.

"Ah...!" Arcal was here in Mahem's sky to confirm something—and to take on the role.

He'd waited here to see if his friend defeated King of Plagues, and if he failed, to defeat the walking calamity personally.

"There you are," Arcal said.

After a good while of waiting, his sworn enemy finally appeared.

A day had passed since his Brooch had been destroyed, and King of Plagues had now returned to the country he'd devastated, appearing right next to To'ori's remains in the very city the former Lightning Dragon King was observing.

The Hero had failed to defeat King of Plagues, which meant that there was only one thing for Arcal to do.

He opened his maw, spread his wings wide, and mustered all the electricity within him—the first motion in calling up the deadly breath he'd possessed since he was a king.

"LIGHTNING VORTEX!" A twirling burst of electricity struck from above, instantly closing the kilometels of distance between Arcal and the ground.

Far more intense than an ordinary lightning bolt, it was as if the sky itself had unleashed its wrath to reduce King of Plagues to cinders.

From a height the disease could not reach, the lightning seared the air and incinerated the bacteria around it as it struck Candy.

Weakened though he was, Arcal's lightning had more than enough power to annihilate a person. Thunder sounded as it touched the ground, burning everything around it.

Arcal was aware that that included To'ori's remains. The Hero's bones charred, then turned to ash that was carried off by the wind.

Perhaps that was the dragon's burial for his friend—submerged in a sea of bacteria and thus claimable by no one but the elements, Arcal might have seen this as a cremation.

Thus, after enacting his vengeance and giving his friend last rites, Arcal looked where his lightning struck...

...and saw Candy thoroughly unharmed.

"Ah...?!" the dragon exclaimed.

"Wow. Lightning from a clear sky. Well, not like it's natural."

Arcal was upper-Pure-Dragon-tier, yet his attack hadn't done anything to Candy.

Was it because he'd equipped a Brooch once he'd reappeared? No...

"That equipment...!" Over his typical frilly clothing, Candy was wearing something that looked like a raincoat.

It was a kind of MVP reward. Candy hadn't been massacring just humans. He'd killed monsters just as indiscriminately—if not more so—and this was something he'd gotten from a UBM. It had the skill Lightning Absorption on it, making it a natural counter to Arcal.

Having defeated a number of UBMs, Candy possessed many such pieces of resistance gear.

However, the raincoat wasn't what had shocked Arcal so badly.

It was the helm that he was wearing underneath the raincoat's hood.

"I gotta say, a raincoat and a samurai helm? This look is so...not it." Candy evaluated his equipment with a sulky expression.

It needn't be said who had once owned the helm.

This was Prototype Horobimaru-Star Helmet—the item that had allowed

To’ori’s blade to reach Candy in the first place. It was the reward The Hero had acquired by fighting Penta-Phased Destroyer, Horobimaru and bringing it to its knees.

It was as close to an MVP reward you could get, but it technically was not. And unlike Masters, tians left any equipment that wasn’t an MVP reward on their corpse when they died.

And since the Prototype Horobimaru-Star Helmet wasn’t an MVP reward, Candy was able to take it from To’ori easily. It was as though the helmet itself acknowledged Candy, who won against To’ori, as its new owner.

Before logging out, Candy had checked the helm’s effects and found them to be useful.

And now, after logging in, he equipped the helm just to be safe, then used its ability to sense and see Arcal—the enemy attacking him from up high. In response, he immediately used Instant Wear to equip some gear that granted lightning resistance.

The Prototype Horobimaru-Star Helmet enabled him to instantly see any enemies that acted hostile toward him—to sense out attacks before they happened. This greatly improved his ability to counterattack—a massive obstacle for anyone who wished to defeat him.

King of Plagues was protected by a field of deadly bacteria, and thus his biggest weakness was ultra long-range attacks launched from outside the range of his disease.

However, that second part wasn’t true anymore.

The Prototype Horobimaru-Star Helmet would now sense any incoming attacks, letting him instantly equip something that countered them—or even escape by simply logging out.

Of course, logging out could be prevented by touch, but Candy couldn’t even be approached, and there weren’t many people who could attack from such a distance fast enough that he could not counter it. Tenaga Ashinaga’s ultimate, wielded by Xunyu of Huang He, came to mind, but Candy could run away the moment he sensed her trying to lock on to him.

Even against someone with defense that rendered them immune to the bacteria, the helmet would sense their approach, enabling him to simply run away just as easily.

Candy and the helmet were hopelessly well matched. He killed people in a large area just by existing, and his new acquisition improved his own survivability by an absurd degree.

"Khh...!" The sight of his sworn enemy taking what his friend had left behind filled Arcal with rage, but he was unable to do anything about it. His lightning had no effect on Candy, and if he came close enough to use his fangs and claws, he would be destroyed by the bacteria.

He could give everything he had—including his life—for a final charge to end this wretch. However, he couldn't do that now, for he still hadn't fulfilled the role left to him by his friend.

Thus, full of rage, frustration, and powerlessness, Arcal had no choice but to fly away.

"Ah. It's running off. It seems pretty smart, so it probably would've given lots of XP..." Candy said, not thinking much about it.

The king of this mobile kingdom of plagues had acquired a new means of defense.

He had now become a walking disaster impossible to stop...and was headed toward the kingdom.

Kingdom of Altar

The neighboring countries became aware of the threat posed by King of Plagues during the day in which Candy was offline.

Small though it was, Mahem was a country they communicated with, and they had a DIN branch in the capital. When the nearby nations heard Mahem's final message, the emergency became clear and known to all—though the message was actually sent by the twin control AIs themselves using Mahem's equipment. As the CEOs of DIN, they simply claimed that they'd received it themselves directly as a cover.

They also reported the death of this era's Hero, To'ori Kusanagi, making it painfully evident just how fearsome King of Plagues was.

Thus, Candy felled a country, gained the nickname of "Legionkiller," and became a threat none could ignore.

That was why, when Candy logged in again, the three countries bordering Mahem flew into action.

Caldina countered by trying to snipe him using a long-range Embryo attack—one of their Superiors, The Cannon Eve Selene, began bombarding him.

However, as though he saw it coming, Candy avoided it by logging out right before he was hit.

From Legendaria came Over Wrestler Bulk Bolkan, whose body was even tougher than The Hero, but he died before he could even make it to Candy.

From Altar, AT WIKI, who had high debuff resistance, and his clan, Wiki Editors: Kingdom of Altar Branch, flew into action. However, since their enemy used carnivorous bacteria instead of simple debuffs, they were quickly dealt with.

There was also someone who'd charged in using an armored vehicle Embryo, but Candy countered it by releasing bacteria that ate metal, rendering the formerly airtight vehicle open to disease.

One notable thing about the situation was that none of Altar's Superiors were doing anything about it.

Lei-Lei was always absent.

The High Priestess Fuso Tsukuyo was in negotiations with the kingdom of Altar at the time.

In Over Gladiator Figaro's case, it was simply bad timing—all of this happened when he was busy delving deep into the Tomb Labyrinth.

And King of Destruction's whereabouts were currently unknown. Some claimed that he was battling a godbeast in Tenchi, or that he was involved in the Corpse Stronghold incident in Granvaloa.

Thus, with no country able to defeat him, Candy resumed his march.

When it became clear that his destination was Altar, the people of the kingdom, still recovering from the wounds of the war they had recently lost, were overcome by despair at the coming calamity. Many thought that it wouldn't end there.

They feared that he would destroy Altar, then either Dryfe or Legendaria, and eventually kill everyone on the continent...like some sort of god that the people of this world had forgotten long ago.

◇

In Ajani, a town on the eastern end of Altar, in a particular room within a government building, sitting in a fetal position, was the last survivor of Mahem—none other than Mahr.

Judging from his eyes, he had clearly been crying, but the tears were no longer flowing. They had dried up...and his very heart seemed to be on the verge of doing the same.

At first, Mahr had no idea what had happened on that day. He hadn't known why To'ori was so desperate, nor why the dragon had taken him away.

He hadn't known why his sheep and Demi-Drac-Hound had died.

Mahr had only learned the reasons after they arrived in this town and the dragon—Arcal—had taken on a human form and explained it.

The boy couldn't believe it at first—he didn't want to. If what Arcal had said was true, it would have meant that his father, mother, brother—his entire family had died. It would have meant that the adults who'd always been so kind to him, all of his friends, the children who were like his younger siblings, the newborn the entire village welcomed just last month—they all were dead.

And it would mean that To'ori had died too.

Rather than believing that, Mahr accused the dragon of lying, hoping it would enrage the monster enough to kill him.

However, Arcal didn't get angry. He only looked at Mahr with eyes full of sadness.

As this continued, the town they were in grew restless. The events in Mahem had reached them through the news company, DIN.

Now that everyone around him acknowledged that the incident had really happened, Mahr also had no choice but to accept it. That was how he finally accepted To'ori's death.

After that, Mahr was taken in by the government office.

He explained that he'd escaped from Mahem, and Truth Discernment confirmed this fact. He was also examined for infection, which showed that he was completely clean.

With a perplexed heart and mind, Mahr realized that To'ori's actions that day had all been the result of The Hero's efforts to save him.

Arcal disappeared at some point. After sending Mahr to the office, he simply said that he had something to do and flew away.

Silence descended. There was now nothing and no one by Mahr's side.

He was all alone in this unfamiliar room he'd been given.

However, at this point nowhere in the world would have felt any different. After all, Mahr's world no longer existed anywhere on this vast continent. The unchanging life that he thought would go on forever actually had ended, cut short by the exact kind of amazing...or perhaps terrifying thing that he'd been envisioning.

And now, Mahr was now all alone in this unfamiliar world.

"I don't want this..." Mahr mumbled. In his ordinary existence, he'd imagined major events—filled his heart with dreams of adventures and heroism.

However, everything that had happened to him had resulted in nothing but despair and tragedy.

When he went to sleep, he prayed that he would wake up to realize that this had all just been a bad dream, but alas, that never happened. Reality cornered his tiny heart and cast a shadow over it.

"Mahr, are you awake?"

"...Yes." The boy heard a knock on the door, then the voice of a female government employee from behind it.

After being taken in by them, Mahr had been called and questioned several times. As the sole survivor of Mahem, they all believed that he could help them find a way to deal with King of Plagues. However, Mahr didn't actually know much, and couldn't provide many answers. All they learned from him was that the monsters he was looking after had died one by one, that Arcal had flown away with him as Mahr watched it happen...and that To'ori had watched as they left.

This information wasn't totally useless, however. The people around him explained that Mahr's words helped them understand a little of how King of Plagues's bacteria worked. Because of that, they questioned him repeatedly with some time in between sessions, just in case Mahr happened to remember any more details.

Mahr assumed that he was just being summoned for another round...but that wasn't the case.

"We learned that King of Plagues is heading to this town." Mahr's eyes widened. "We might have to evacuate before tomorrow morning, so please be prepared for that." With those words, the lady walked away from the door.

She'd told Mahr to be ready, but it wasn't like he had anything to pack.

The only thing he could prepare was his heart and mind...but he was in no state to do even that.

"Nngh..."

King of Plagues—the one who'd taken everything from Mahr—was approaching this town.

Those words filled him with dread, his mind flashing back to the day Mahem fell. He felt as though the despair he'd narrowly avoided was coming to claim him after all.

"Wh-Why...?" Mahr lamented to himself.

Fear. Sadness. Rage. Helplessness. Regret. Everything came together to pin Mahr right where he was.

◇

The government offices of Ajani were now packed with journalists from various news companies.

Ajani County, where the city stood, was on the eastern edge of Altar, and thus was closest to Mahem. That made it King of Plagues's most likely target, and the members of the press were all here to inform the continent if the count declared a state of emergency. There were journalists from news companies of all sizes, and some of them were Masters.

"Hrmm..."

Among them, there was a woman whose appearance turned a few heads. Wearing a suit and black sunglasses in the fantasy-themed Kingdom of Altar made her stand out a little—no, it made her stand out a lot. The armband she wore signified that she was part of DIN—the news company with the largest information network as well as the one that had first reported on King of Plagues. She was here waiting for an announcement just like the others, but for some reason she was drawing something in her sketchbook.

As she did so, another woman with a DIN armband peeked over her shoulder.

"Marie, what are you drawing? More naked men?"

"No, no, no, nooo! I'm just compiling information!"

The journalist in the suit—Marie Adler—was drawing a very odd image.

It was a diagram that was extremely short on its vertical axis, but featured a long semicircle off to the side as well as a few numbers here and there.

However, for some reason there was a bird drawn above it in cute mascot style.

“By the way, how high do the avians from the Ajani branch go?” Marie asked.

“About six thousand metels, I believe.”

“How tough are they?”

“Demi-Dragon-tier, I think.”

“It would be quite the gamble, then.”

As Marie mulled it over, her tian colleague could only assume she was planning something strange. Marie and other Master journalists served as a kind of special correspondent, often tasked with using their unique abilities for equally unique jobs. Being immortal, they could even bring back information that they gave their lives to obtain.

The fact that a Master like Marie was here in Ajani likely held some significance. The people who were in charge of Masters within DIN—the twin CEOs, that is—might’ve known the reason she was here, but as an ordinary journalist, Marie’s colleague had no idea what it was.

“Oh?” the tian journalist said.

As the two talked, they were joined by employees of the government office, as well as Count Ajani himself. The fact that he’d arrived to make a personal declaration told the two journalists that their hunch had been right on the mark—and just as they’d expected, the count told them that King of Plagues was coming, and that they would evacuate to the west.

However, while the count struggled to overcome his grief to make this announcement, Marie was, for some reason, looking in another direction. There was a wall there, but it was almost as though she could see through it.

Then, Marie whispered into her colleague’s ear. “Sorry, I’m leaving for a sec.”

“Huh?” When her colleague turned, Marie was already gone. She’d vanished as though she was never there to begin with.

Though the tian journalist was confused, she wrote it off as just a Master being a Master and turned back to the count.

◇

While Mahr was lying on the bed in a fetal position, he heard a knock on the window.

"It is I. Please, open."

The voice was a familiar one. With unsteady steps, Mahr approached the window and opened it. There, he saw a well-built youth with lizard-like eyes. At first glance, one might assume he had Legendarian blood, but it was actually the one who was once Lightning Dragon King—Arcal in human form.

"First and foremost, allow me to apologize. I failed to defeat King of Plagues."

Hearing that, Mahr realized Arcal had left him to defeat this sworn enemy. The news also made him realize that neither To'ori nor this dragon had been able to overcome this menace.

"He is approaching this town, and his miasma will surely reach it by tomorrow. You must evacuate before that."

Mahr said nothing in response.

"May I ask what you wish to do?" the dragon said.

"What I...wish to...?" The boy didn't understand what Arcal was asking.

"To'ori has entrusted me with your safety. If this town is to be drowned in disease, then I must have you leave at once. You may flee alongside your fellow men, but my wings would carry you faster and farther. I could even take you to the country upon the sea. The disease might not reach there."

Mahr said nothing at first. Arcal was trying to honor To'ori's wish by saving Mahr, who had been a fellow friend of his. Thus, he gave the boy a choice between leaving with Arcal or with the people of Ajani.

However, Mahr...

"I'll...stay here."

...chose neither.

"Why?"

"I mean, even if I'm alive...I have nothing now." His family, friends, home, and homeland—all that made him him no longer existed. He'd lost sight of himself, but was unable to find a solid foundation to help him build a new life, leaving him with nothing but resignation and despair. "Neither you nor Sir To'ori were able to do anything against King of Plagues. He'll kill every living person on this continent...so I'd rather join them early..."

"Young one, you..." When Arcal was about to tell him something...

“Then what if I prove that King of Plagues can be defeated by human hands?”

...an unfamiliar voice rang out through the room.

The voice was a strange one. It wasn’t clear if it belonged to someone young or old, to a man or a woman. This ambiguous voice, which had obviously passed through some kind of filter, reached their ears as though it were seeping into the room.

Arcal’s eyes widened as he turned to the source and saw something that was just as odd as the voice itself—a black mist. How long had it been there? Before Arcal even realized it, a black, human shaped mist had appeared next to the door. The fact that this entity was capable of sneaking up on him put Arcal on edge.

“What are you?” he asked. In response to that question, the figure looked at both Arcal and Mahr before saying...

“I am a shade.”

It took a step toward the boy. Though it wasn’t clear which part of the black mist was the face, it was obviously looking right at Mahr.

“I am the reflection of your despair—the mortal phantasm to pull the source of your grief into darkness.”

The mist continued speaking in a rather theatrical tone...

“Into the shadow.”

...and said that as it spread its arms as though it were performing on a stage. Its behavior made it seem as if everything it said was of the utmost importance.

Silence. The unusual aura surrounding the entity claiming to be a shade left Arcal speechless.

However, Mahr, who was standing behind him...

“The source...of my grief...?”

...singled out the words “pull the source of your grief into darkness.”

They could mean that the mist would kill Mahr to end his sadness, but if that wasn’t it, then...

“You mean...you would kill King of Plagues?” Mahr asked.

“Yes, if that is what you desire,” said the silhouette with a nod.

“Are you truly capable of that?” Arcal asked. He had doubts that this strange shadow could succeed where both Arcal and To’ori had failed.

He doubted it—yet it seemed that the mist was confident.

“I require something in exchange for this job,” the shade said.

“Exchange? Is it wealth you want?” replied Arcal.

“No. I require cooperation. I would need your assistance...dragon.”

The words left Arcal bewildered. He would gladly cooperate to defeat his sworn enemy, but that alone seemed to not benefit the shadow in any way. “Would that truly be enough for you?”

“Well, yes. To me, what holds meaning is simply the role of someone who accepts such requests and carries them out.”

Silence. Arcal didn’t understand the full meaning of those words, but it was clear to him that the shadow wasn’t lying. It was just operating under a logic only it understood, according to its own mysterious values.

“Very well,” the dragon said. “I will work with you.”

“Excellent. Now...the rest is up to you,” said the shadow, looking at Mahr again. “Before I take action, I need a client. What do you want to do?”

This too must’ve been part of the shadow’s personal logic and motivations. The question was a presentation of choice—for the shadow, it most likely didn’t matter what option Mahr would pick now. It wouldn’t care if he chose not to answer, or if he fled or stayed. If that happened, the shadow would find a collaborator other than Arcal, and a client—a motivation—other than Mahr.

However, it had come to Mahr first because the boy had more reason to make this request than anyone else in the world.

In silence, Mahr thought back on the plain everyday life he’d lived—the golden days that would never return.

He remembered his mother’s warmth and her cooking, so delicious he felt he could never get enough of it.

He remembered how reliable his father was, as well as his back as he carried Mahr when he was too exhausted to walk.

He remembered his older brother’s kindness and the times they’d walked hand in hand.

The memories of his family flowed back to him. Along with them, he recalled the scent of the bleating sheep, the fields of wheat caressed by the wind, as well as all the other vistas of his homeland, now forever lost.

And Mahr remembered the face of his friend whose life was nothing like his, but whose feelings had been the same.

“...them...” Tears once again flowing from his eyes, Mahr looked up at the shadow and opened his mouth to give voice...

“P-PLEASE...AVENGE THEM...!”

...to the righteous anger welling up from deep within his heart.

“Of course.”

Upon hearing the request, punctuated by loud sobbing, the shadow turned around.

“That’s why I exist,” said Marie Adler.

Thus, the Master bearing the name of a professional killer from another story took to action—to kill a self-proclaimed god.

Old Mahem

“Hm...hmm...” Candy strolled through the now uninhabited land of Mahem, heading toward Altar and using his bacteria and Star Helmet to effortlessly repel anything thrown at him.

Since he was traveling on foot, Candy hadn’t even made it to the border yet, but as he walked westward, the range of his deadly disease followed him like a moving storm.

His bacteria crawled on the ground and multiplied to the extent that they had destroyed an entire country, but as they were now they couldn’t extend much farther than that. However, there were theoretically no true limitations to their spread. The bacteria were animals, and as such they could multiply and proliferate without end. Given enough generations after being released from Resheph, they could theoretically exist as an independent new species even if Candy logged out.

However, to have the properties Candy wanted them to have, they had ended up with a structure that was extremely bizarre for any living being. Without backing from King of Plagues, Candy and his Superior Embryo, they easily fell apart in about a day’s time.

Currently, the skills he had enabled these bacteria to spread to a maximum range of around 50 kilometels. Because of this, as Candy moved westward, the bacteria in the east end of the area were busy destroying themselves.

The very buffs that sustained them were the reason the bacteria that hadn’t come directly from Resheph—and were instead the descendants of those that had—were able to contribute Resources to Candy with their kills.

These bacteria might be able to mutate in a way that let them live despite their abnormalities and spread the disease to an even wider area, but any microorganisms outside his influence didn’t provide Candy with Resources. This meant that diseases too many generations removed would only become competition, so he’d actually taken measures to prevent this from happening.

“Hrm...this isn’t that tiring, but I’d love to have a better way of getting around,” Candy grumbled. “Maybe a Prism Steed?”

Any monsters would certainly die of his diseases, so Candy thought that his best option was some sort of machine—though even those would be gone the moment he spread his metal-eating bacteria. “Operation: Candy the Pale Rider is a go...! But I’ll have to find the horse first...” Candy spoke to himself, referring to the figure often said to be the embodiment of pestilence.

But then, he suddenly looked up at the sky.

“You again?” As he whispered to himself, the Star Helmet showed Candy his enemy.

It was the same dragon that had recently breathed lightning on him.

And after opening its maw, it did the same thing yet again.

“Hm...?” And just like last time, Candy withstood it by using Instant Wear to switch to his Lightning Absorption raincoat. The destructive bolt from the sky once again accomplished nothing.

Why’s it just doing the same thing? Candy was curious why this monster would bother repeating an attack that had so blatantly failed before.

However, as the assault continued, extending beyond the 10 seconds it had lasted before, Candy’s confusion turned to understanding.

It’s still going. This attack was far longer than the first one. It had already lasted for double the amount of time and didn’t seem like it would end soon. I see. It thinks my defense doesn’t last long or has some other limitation. Sorry about that, sweetie, but this is a passive skill.

Lightning Absorption was active for as long as Candy wore the raincoat. He could equip the item as long as it wasn’t broken, and it would negate any lightning attacks as long as he had it equipped. Even if the dragon kept the attack up forever, this defense would never fail.

I won't be able to log out if this drags on too long, but it's not like it's just gonna keep going indefinitely, right? Candy's assumption proved correct, for the lightning strike ended after about 40 seconds.

The dragon, as shown to him by the Star Helmet, seemed greatly fatigued.

Nice try...hm? The moment that thought passed through Candy's mind, the Star Helmet's display changed.

It now showed an unfamiliar woman in a black suit...

"Huh?"

...as well as Candy himself, standing right next to her.

◇

About ten minutes ago...

"I guess he really does have an item like that, huh? I had a hunch. It's the only thing that explains it, I'm afraid."

Marie's voice could be heard from Arcal's back as the dragon flew through the sky. However, she could not be seen.

The obvious assumption was that she'd somehow become invisible to the naked eye, but that wasn't exactly the case. Instead, she'd merely covered herself in a fabric with a chameleonlike effect that caused her to blend into Arcal's back.

Like something straight out of an old ninja manga, she was hiding herself using her onmitsu grouping skills.

She was no longer clad in the black mist she had worn in their first meeting. While the mist was a potent asset that could conceal her identity from perception skills, it also stood out and could make her position easy to pick out visibly. The dark mass would certainly stand out when contrasted with Arcal's body, and even if it didn't there was a chance that the Star Helmet would perceive her because of the difference in output.

A brief silence ensued. Arcal had just told Marie about the helmet To'ori had once possessed, and the fact that it had been claimed by King of Plagues. However, Marie had already assumed that this menace had some means of spotting his enemies—that was why she'd hidden herself like this. Such a power was the only thing that would explain King of Plagues's unusual ability to deal with anything thrown at him.

"You said that he can see," said Marie. "Is it like clairvoyance? Far sight?"

"That is how To'ori described it, yes," Arcal replied.

"Then there's no problem. If I just stick to you like this, he'll probably only see you—and I've still got my job ult too."

Hearing Marie's explanation, Arcal let out a doubtful grunt. "Are you certain about this?" he asked.

"Of course. I mean, it's not like I could reach him by running on the ground."

Thanks to the efforts of all those who had died trying to defeat King of Plagues, the maximum effective radius of his deadly bacteria had been determined. However, even with Marie's supersonic speeds, it would take her a few minutes to reach him, and that wasn't enough—she would collapse before getting close to him. And this estimation didn't even account for any obstacles that could slow her down and make the situation worse. Even if she could reach him before the disease claimed her, King of Plagues would have more than enough time to notice and escape by logging out. This was why even Caldina's "Multifariously Invincible" hadn't been able to destroy him.

"But I know I can make it if I use the shortest path." Another silence descended. Arcal seemed to have questions still, so Marie began her explanation.

"There are three ways King of Plagues reacts to his attackers. First is by ignoring them. Since his enemy is going to die anyway, he just doesn't do anything and lets it happen. That's how most people he's fought have fallen to him, with Legendaria's Over Wrestler being the most obvious example."

King of Plagues's always-active defensive web would simply kill most attackers and provide him with Resources—that was the easiest scenario for him.

"The second is by countering the attack. As we can see from him equipping something that negates your lightning and spreading metal eating bacteria against that tank, he sometimes deals with trouble by taking some specific defensive actions."

Arcal silently listened. King of Plagues had killed many UBMs and claimed their rewards, and he possessed possibly hundreds of bacteria of all kinds. The fact that he possessed countermeasures for everything thrown at him so far made it quite clear that his defense was rock-solid.

"And his third strategy is just evacuating. He runs away by logging out and waiting for things to blow over."

That was the approach King of Plagues had taken after having his Brooch broken, or when he was being targeted by The Cannon from Caldina. Though Marie was not yet aware of this, he also logged out at night, when Collapsed Present—his carnivorous bacteria—became inactive.

However...

"He also prioritizes these actions in precisely that order. It seems like he wants to avoid logging out to prevent anyone from camping and waiting for him, but he still does it when he has no choice."

King of Plagues was safest when he escaped to reality, but it was also a risky move because he had to log in again at some point.

Marie had no way of knowing this either, but if he was logged out for too long, there was a chance that his bacteria would all die off, costing him his deadly web of defense. That was why logging out was his last resort.

"So...you breathe lightning on him again, he'll go with the second option and just weather with his resistance gear. As in, he won't try to escape."

Marie was saying that she would use this moment as an opportunity to strike. Her thoughts, now put into words, were both slightly surprising and somewhat disturbing to Arcal.

"You thought that far ahead?" he asked.

"Well, yes. It happens that I've been thinking about such things for years."

Marie—Nagisa Ichimiya in the real world—was the creative mind behind Into the Shadow, a battle manga with superpowered professional killers.

However, the "superpowered" part didn't apply to the main character—also known as Marie Adler. Her first ally, Daisy, as well as everyone else in the series, were inhuman assassins. Into the Shadow was a story where Marie Adler—a normal human hit man—used only her wits and mundane skill to win against her supernatural foes.

And so, as author of this work, Nagisa spent many days thinking about how someone might deal with a far more powerful enemy. This experience turned out to be valuable in Infinite Dendrogram, making her a Master who was quite proficient at observing other people's abilities and countering them.

“Anyway, we’re almost there,” she said.

“Indeed.” Arcal had arrived at the sky right above King of Plagues. This was about time the walking calamity would catch sight of him using the Star Helmet.

Knowing what I’ll have to do next, I’ll need about 40 seconds, Marie thought. Marie reconfirmed and recalculated the actions she’d take next, then gathered the resolve to go through with them.

“Anyway, please do as I said. Spew lightning at him for 40 seconds,” she said.

“That is quite a lot you are asking of me.” Though he ranked high among Pure-Dragons, Arcal was no longer a UBM. Breathing lightning for such a long time and from such a distance was a taxing act that would surely drain him.

But...

“If it is to avenge my friend...consider it done.”

Following those words, Arcal opened his jaw and released lightning onto King of Plagues below. The bolt struck true, but was once again negated by his lightning resistance raincoat.

In that moment, Marie grasped a different blade in each hand...and jumped off Arcal’s back.

This was the only way to reach him—a fall from directly above.

During her investigations, Marie had reached the conclusion that the bacteria’s effective range in the air wasn’t nearly as great as it was on land.

Mahr said that when To’ori helped him escape, the cattle left on the ground were dying—that alone made it clear that the altitude slowed the disease down.

Additionally, some of the people who’d used skydragons and avians while setting out to kill King of Plagues were able to get deep into his deadly range without any issue.

Thinking about it, this was to be expected.

There was absolutely nothing in the air. No soil to cling to and no nutrients the bacteria could use to proliferate. Even if they could linger in the air, they certainly couldn’t spread easily.

Marie had guessed that even at its highest—right above King of Plagues—the effective height of the bacteria was only about 5000 metels. This estimation was confirmed when Arcal told her that he'd been able to attack King of Plagues from above. With this approach, though, they'd given themselves more room to work with, coming from a height of over seven thousand metels. While this altitude was a bit much for the avians of the DIN branch, it wasn't a problem for a powerful dragon like Arcal.

However, even all these preparations and an approach from a less defended angle wouldn't be enough to win against King of Plagues. While the sky might not have been dense in bacteria, they still reached as high as 5000 metels. Even with supersonic speed, delivering an attack would take over 10 seconds. That was more than enough time for Candy to switch to appropriate resistance gear, counter it with other bacteria, or run away and make more distance between them. And now that he had the Star Helmet, ranged attacks weren't enough to take him out—but his disease miasma meant attacking him from up close was impossible too.

Falling toward him from above didn't change much of this scenario. Marie would be consumed before she even touched the ground.

Except she had something that let her break—or more accurately, pass through.

"Art of Vanishing."

The moment she spoke the name of her skill, her body stopped existing in this world. The light that allowed her to be seen, the air touching her skin, the lightning that could burn her, and the bacteria that destroyed everything it came into contact with now passed straight through her as though she wasn't even there.

This was Art of Vanishing—the ult of the onmitsu grouping Superior Job, Death Shadow.

Leaving everything behind as though she had never even existed, Marie plummeted to the surface far below.

And since she didn't exist, the Star Helmet couldn't possibly see her coming.

Thirty-six, thirty-five, thirty-four... she counted down in her head. Normally, forty seconds wasn't enough for a person to fall even two thousand metels, because air resistance slowed them down.

However, that didn't affect Marie as she was now. Art of Vanishing negated all physical influence on her, and even the dense air wasn't doing anything to her speed. But even though there was no friction, she was still affected by gravitational acceleration, as evidenced by the fact that her feet stayed in contact with the ground when she used the skill on the surface.

Thus, during these forty seconds, she closed the distance between her and King of Plagues at the highest possible speed.

Twenty, nineteen, eighteen...

King of Plagues only moved by foot and wasn't exactly swift, but forty seconds were more than enough time for him to move dozens of metels.

Another reason Marie had asked Arcal to shower King of Plagues in lightning was to minimize this possibility. Her calculations told her that without the effects of wind upon her, she could reach him by simply falling.

"Tch!" However, despite it all, there was now a discrepancy between the point she was falling toward and Candy's current location.

Had Candy himself moved? Or was this an effect of Arcal's lightning?

I'll do this, then! Thinking fast, accelerated by her AGI, Marie quickly made a decision.

A moment later, her forty seconds expired. Arcal's lightning had ceased, and Marie removed her Art of Vanishing.

But as she did that, she immediately used her Art of Shadow Clones.

She then kicked the clones to readjust the trajectory of her fall.

"Huh?" Candy said, finally picking up on Marie's presence. The moment Art of Vanishing was undone, both the Star Helmet and the swarm of bacteria focused entirely on her.

However, before King of Plagues could react in any way, Marie shoved both her blades into the neck of her target.

Thanks to her accelerated thoughts, she was able to perfectly coordinate her fall with her attack. Her left blade drew an arc from below, while the right was swung down.

The attack with the left blade was restrained. Candy's level was immense, but his HP wasn't impressive, and this attack was meant to do damage while keeping him alive.

The attack with the right blade, however, was fatal. It carried the kinetic energy of Marie's free fall straight into a critical area.

Pulverizing Marie's own right arm as it sank in, the right blade delivered damage that surpassed Candy's HP many times over, triggering his Brooch several times and shattering it.

A moment later, Marie herself crashed into the ground, activating and breaking her own Brooch too.

Marie’s ambush left them both without a lifeline.

◇◆

“Agh.” A sudden attack, damage to his neck, a shattered Brooch.

The change in situation was so sudden that even Candy couldn’t stay surprised.

As Marie tried to recover from the fatal crash, he backed away, blood spurting from his neck.

At this moment, they were on even footing. However, Marie was already infected by his disease. The flesh-consuming Collapsed Present was quickly draining Marie’s HP.

Candy spared a moment to think.

This was someone who could break through his defenses—his empire of plagues—and end up right next to him. It wasn’t out of the question that she could once again negate the effects of his bacteria.

Thus, Candy chose to take her seriously.

Spreading a colored cloud of bacteria to conceal himself, he began his escape.

Preparing to leave this world in thirty seconds, he initiated the logout sequence...only to get an error.

A...debuff...?

Candy then realized that his status summary said “Paralysis (Slow Acting).”

This was the effect of the dagger in Marie’s left hand—Palsy Stingblade, Belspan. It was an MVP reward that delivered a paralysis poison requiring time to become effective, making it difficult to resist.

But while it was slow acting, it didn’t change the fact that the debuff was still there, and having a binding-type debuff prevented a player from logging out.

In that case... Candy realized that he had no choice but to kill his opponent immediately. Thus, he prepared to use his ultimate, The Lab of the God of Pestilence—Resheph...

“...n...gh...!”

...only to realize that his destroyed throat made him unable to speak the words.

This was also the work of Belspan. Marie had used it to lower his HP, apply a debuff that prevented escape, and stop him from using skills that had to be called out.

The blade had been given three roles, and it had fulfilled them all.

Even as she coughed, the bacteria consuming her, Marie still had her eyes fixed on Candy.

He'd spread a smoke screen, but her abilities as a job from the onmitsu grouping still allowed her to track him.

She'd also switched out the dagger in her left for a handgun.

This was Marie's Embryo—Arc-en-Ciel. But instead of having its usual six shot revolver form, it was in the shape that primed it to fire a single, giant shot.

It was the form Arc-en-Ciel took for its ultimate skill.

All was silent. Candy fixed his eyes on the assassin who was ready to claim his life. She'd broken through his defenses and destroyed his throat, preventing him from using his ult. With the assassin so close now, and the gun aimed right at him, there was nothing left for him to—

Construction setup.

No—someone who claimed to be a god would never fall this easily.

Unable to say a word, Candy began manipulating his own magic.

This wasn't accomplished by any of his job skills. This was the pinnacle of pure technique, said to be reachable only by tians with The One series of Superior Jobs. It was the realm of original magic skill creation—a world that only Masters like King of Glaciers AT WIKI would someday ascend to.

Candy happened to already be deep within this uncharted territory.

Outputting guidelines. Defining concept. Connecting network.

Using only his own thoughts and powers, he wove something that matched the most superior of all skills. Since he couldn't speak—since it was all in his thoughts—this process contained none of the colorful, deranged role-playing he normally affected. He merely acted like a system—a god—designed to act like he did, and exercised his authority accordingly.

Construction complete. Exhausting internal magic.

What he wove was something befitting the title of Plaguemancer—a job focused on creating and managing diseases—and yet something completely unlike it at the same time.

False God Imitation—Infinite Daimon: Carnage the God of Pestilence.

The bacteria that gathered right before Candy in that moment assumed a shape that resembled a giant, angry spirit—the image of a divinity that had wielded immense power in a certain era of some particular world. Synonymous with destruction, its very touch brought the end.

This false god, built from bacteria and magic, rose like a restless deity that could devour all that lived and destroy all that did not, swinging its claws at the heretic that dared to stand before it.

This was divine might that no human could withstand.

However, no matter how inhuman, unique, or even godlike the enemy...

...Marie Adler was the protagonist of a tale that was all about defeating them.

“Phantasmal Raingun—Arc-en-Ciel: La Gravelle the Godslayer.”

What Marie fired at that calamitous false god was a single, fatal bullet that made use of red, blue, green, white, black, silver—all the colors Marie possessed and all the Resources loaded into Arc-en-Ciel.

What manifested was a woman with her eyes covered by a green cloth veil, wielding a sword so massive it could only have been made from the bones of a giant beast.

Her name was La Gravelle the Godslayer, and she was the strongest professional killer in Nagisa Ichimiya’s work.

Thus, two creations had been summoned. One from the history of a different world, the other from a fictional story—both remnants of those who had once held godlike power.

All that was left was to see which past was stronger.

A moment later, Candy’s false god and Marie’s godslayer clashed.

The billions of bacteria comprising the false god rushed to consume this enemy that mocked it. A single swing of its claw would reap the life from anything it passed through.

There was no living being that could withstand this mythic ruination.

However, La Gravelle was the Godslayer.

She had that name exactly because she could surpass mere mythology—the manifestation of explosive power that came at the cost of so many Resources that it left Marie's Embryo useless, yet didn't even last for ten seconds.

The swing of her sword called forth such a mighty wind that it surpassed the magical pressure gluing the billions of bacteria together and carved open a path for her. Then, with a step that cracked open the earth, La Gravelle rushed through where the density of bacteria was thinned out.

Though, "thinned out" didn't mean that this calamity was harmless. It still wouldn't take long for the bacteria to consume a single person.

In just two seconds, La Gravelle would vanish, bones and all.

However, it wouldn't take even a single second for her to break through the false god and stand before the true god—Candy Carnage.

Candy's eyes widened.

Even as parts of her body disintegrated, La Gravelle raised her sword high and swung it down.

What protected Candy's head was the item granted to mankind by a being that surpassed Mythical tier. Its ability to see enemies wasn't all the power it possessed—it also excelled simply as a defensive piece of equipment. Even a blade of Mythical metal would bend before it.

But this one truth could not be forgotten: the Godslayer surpassed mythology.

The attack that would eventually break even Superior metal split the Star Helmet...

"Ah."

...and cut through the god.

It all ended with one attack, without even any time for revival.

Stripped of control, the false god collapsed in an instant, and Candy began to melt into motes of light.

With her role finished, La Gravelle also vanished without so much as a word. And her summoner, Marie, was also succumbing to the damage the bacteria had done to her body.

It was likely, however, that Candy would die first. Thus, he realized that this was undoubtedly a loss for him.

The silence stretched on as Candy Carnage, his body split in half and unable to speak, gazed at the woman who was swiftly becoming nothing but light, just as he was.

I'll get back at you someday... Candy thought as the bits of light that were once his godly body were carried off by the wind.

A moment later, that which had once been Marie disappeared in the same way.

Arcal had witnessed all this from high above, and when it was over he flew off to the west, eager to tell the boy that their friend had been avenged.

The brief yet truly eventful battle was over.

The Master who'd killed more tians than any other—this one-man calamity—had been defeated by a lone assassin and sent to the gaol.

This was the conclusion of the King of Plagues incident.

◇◆

Following this, it became known that King of Plagues had fallen to a certain professional killer. This truth was sent out to the world by the twin CEOs of DIN—the control AI.

The name of this assassin was a mystery, so people wanted something to call them.

Perhaps if Candy Carnage had been recognized as a god by anyone besides himself, the Master who had killed him might've come to be known as "Godslayer," just like the method she had used to destroy him. However, no matter how wretched the casualties of his actions, he was still only a Superior—a mere human.

That was the extent of the world's understanding of him, and that was why the one who slew him became known as the "Superior Killer."

◆◆◆

The Gaol

As Candy descended upon this place, he wasn't smiling—though his face was not twisted in anger or grief either.

He was merely squinting his eyes, apparently lost in thought.

Ever since he'd received the death penalty he'd been thinking about that black-clad woman who'd killed him—in fact, he was thinking about her right now.

Who was she? Where had she come from? And regardless of how shoddily he might have constructed it in the little time he had...how had she broken through his False God Imitation?

He couldn’t begin to answer those questions, so he could only wonder about it fruitlessly.

From Candy’s perspective, this was like getting randomly assaulted while out on a casual stroll. It had all happened so fast that he couldn’t comprehend how he’d died, nor could he accept it.

However, Candy was someone who used bioterrorism to destroy an entire country. His distress couldn’t hope to compare to what the people of Mahem felt as they’d suddenly perished to his deadly disease. Some might say that this death was just Candy getting what he deserved, but it was truly only a fraction of that.

The wrongdoers and the wronged, however, always weighed such things on different scales.

For Candy in particular, his outlook on this outcome was more like a god’s than a human’s. Thus, he himself didn’t really think that he’d gotten what he deserved. That was why he saw it as more of a random assault by some maniac rather than understanding it as an act of vengeance.

He was actually wondering why it even happened at all.

Candy had already decided that he’d get his revenge, but first things first—he had to find answers to his questions...

“Yo! A newbie, aren’t ya?”

“The outfit’s a little much, but you’re pretty cute!”

“Ohh, those lips are gorgeous...”

...but his thinking was cut short by some voices calling out to him.

Candy was standing at the gaol’s save point, so it wasn’t so strange that someone would try talking to him.

“Gettin’ sent here is makin’ you feel all anxious, huh? Don’t worry! We’ll show you around!”

“Let’s start with the only café that serves good coffee! That’s also where you’ll find the biggest guy here!”

“If you don’t mind, give me your cup once you’re done with it.”

With the exception of the obvious Legendarian, the men didn’t have any ulterior motives. While some of them were probably trying to hit on Candy, they were also completely honest about wanting to lend a helping hand to a gaol newbie.

However...

Candy's response was a crushing silence. From his perspective, they were irreverent, unpleasant fools who had bothered him while he was trying to puzzle out something important.

But this also led him to another thought.

Here in the gaol, he could no longer hope to power level by committing tian genocide, but there were still people he could kill for their Resources.

Thus, a smile appeared on his face for the first time since he logged in...

"Collapsed Present."

...and he instantly infected the gaol with the very same bacteria that had destroyed Mahem.

The three who called out to him were the first to die—and as the save point was in the heart of the town, death quickly spread throughout all of it.

They don't give as much as tians, but they'll have to do, Candy thought. He would first kill all Masters, then massacre the monsters of this created dungeon.

With the gaol presumably being made using spatial control powers, Candy figured that if he gathered enough Resources to reach his limit as a Superior, he might be able to escape. And so, he intended to turn this gaol into his personal empire of plague where anything besides him was dead.

But then...

"Excuse me, about this poison...or, rather, bacteria—would you be so kind as to stop spreading it?"

...someone behind Candy tapped on his shoulder and addressed him directly.

Candy's eyes widened in shock as he turned around. First the skeleton, then the black-clad woman, now this—it was his third shocking encounter within a very brief span of time.

However, in a way the source of Candy's surprise this time might've been the strangest of the three.

"It seems to affect the flesh of living beings...but it also broke down the eggs I just bought at the store."

The man behind him was holding a shopping bag, looked awfully plain, and behaved completely normally.

Unlike the skeleton or the woman in black, he didn't try to attack Candy the moment he appeared. He only wore a somewhat strained smile and lamented the loss of his recent purchase.

It was as though to him, the spread of Candy's deadly disease was roughly equivalent in seriousness to his broken eggs.

"You..." Candy hissed. The man didn't look strange. He wasn't a skeleton in Japanese clothes or a woman wearing a black men's suit. He was just a spectacled man in casual clothes who didn't stand out in any way. None of what he wore seemed like MVP rewards.

But all that was exactly why this didn't seem right.

"What are you?" Candy was so dumbfounded by this that he couldn't help but ask that question.

Notably, he didn't ask "who" but "what," as if he wasn't sure if the man was even human.

And, in a way, Candy wasn't that far off.

"You are speaking to Sechs Würfel. I am known as King of Crime, and I am the owner of the café here. Oh, and I am also a slime."

The man—Sechs—casually answered Candy's question, readily admitting that he was not human.

A slime! Candy thought as everything fell into place.

Collapsed Present targeted only people and other creatures that possessed actual flesh—slimes weren't its focus, and as a result its effects on them were minimal. Even a little defense or a minor countermeasure against disease from a tertiary target like a slime would be enough to negate it.

But that also meant that the man was vulnerable to bacteria specialized against slimes.

With that thought, Candy immediately gave an order to Resheph, causing it to release the antislime bacteria he'd prepared in the past.

A burst of black smoke laden with pestilence quickly enveloped the man.

If everything went as Candy planned, this would've killed his opponent immediately, and yet...

"Hmm. So your Embryo consists of fatal bacteria—or rather the system to prepare them. I suppose it's true that, given enough time and Resources, a production-focused Embryo can become something fearsome."

Candy’s eyes widened again. The man claiming to be a slime spoke with a tone as calm as before, and Candy almost began to suspect that he was bluffing about being a slime—but then he noticed a bigger issue.

The man’s voice had changed. In fact, it had become a voice that Candy found very familiar.

“Though it does seem that you produce them with the bare minimum of safety measures.”

The wind then blew away the black smoke...

“Like, for example, making it so they don’t target you.”

...revealing none other than Candy himself.

“Huh...?” Candy was now more confused than ever, but there was a fairly simple explanation for what had just happened.

Candy’s assumption about why Sechs was able to approach him without fear of the bacteria was correct. However, when Sechs had touched Candy’s shoulder, he’d also taken a hair from Candy’s head and absorbed it into his slime body. This enabled him to use Shapeshift—his transformation skill that required him to acquire cells from whomever he wanted to transform into.

Thus, Sechs had simply made his flesh the same as Candy’s.

“I believe spreading the disease any further is meaningless now, unless you intend to include yourself in the massacre,” Sechs went on. “So would you mind putting a stop to all this, please? There might be better ways of going about all of this in any case.”

In terms of form and structure, Sechs’s transformations were flawless. They were so good, in fact, that they were able to perfectly mimic the bloodlines of Special Superior Jobs.

As Candy’s current level was higher than his, Sechs couldn’t copy his skills as King of Plagues, but that didn’t stop him from creating a true reflection of Candy’s physical body, thus putting Candy in checkmate.

In silence, Candy considered the situation. He possessed many MVP rewards, but none of them provided any means of attack.

That was because his usual method of dealing damage—of dealing death—was his bacteria. His MVP rewards had thus ended up being either defensive items or materials for his diseases.

And since Candy had excluded himself as a target with all of his bacteria creations, by copying his cells, Sechs became effectively immune to anything Candy could do.

I've only been here a few minutes and I've already gotten hit with all this... I've got no luck at all these days, Candy thought.

The skeleton and the woman in black had both succumbed to the bacteria. However, Sechs was immune to them as long as Candy was himself. Candy had absolutely no chance against Sechs now.

Well, I'm stumped. Can't think of anything I can do, Candy thought. There were some options that would have been open to him before Sechs had come this close, but it was far too late for that now.

On top of that, still reeling from the shock of the current situation and the death penalty dealt him by the woman in black, Candy failed to notice one other detail—he no longer possessed the helm that so greatly enhanced his defenses.

"So...will you stop? Living here would become quite difficult if you do not." Sechs's words, spoken using Candy's own face, were obviously an ultimatum, carrying a very specific hidden message: stop spreading the disease or die.

Unlike Candy, Sechs had means of attack that didn't rely on bacteria, so if they fought, it would be completely one-sided. Candy was well aware of that.

It would only lead to his immediate second defeat.

I'll have to be more careful with my concoctions from now on, he thought. First, he would have to research bacteria that worked on beings with identical cell structure to his.

With that thought, Candy ordered Resheph to cease spreading the disease and raised his hands in surrender.

However, he was a few moments too late.

"Oh," Sechs sighed. He, for some reason, shifted his eyes from Candy up toward the sky.

Candy couldn't help but follow his gaze...

"What?"

...and saw a circle.

Actually, it was the bottom of a cone that expanded upward—specifically, it was Sandalphon, the Embryo of the gaol's second Superior—King of Berserk, Hannya.

The Embryo had appeared right above Sechs and Candy so suddenly that he might as well have teleported.

The very next moment, the massive cone smashed into them.

Candy—as well as Sechs taking Candy's form—were both ground into the earth below, immediately giving King of Plagues his next death penalty.

An encounter with people who were very different kinds of outliers than he was—this was what marked the beginning of Candy's life in the gaol.

Old Mahem

The battle between King of Plagues, Candy Carnage and Death Shadow Marie Adler ended with both of their deaths.

Functionally, it was a solid defeat for Candy, but regardless it was a battle that didn't leave much of a mark on the world. Once it was over, the combatants had both dissolved into light, Arcal had flown off, and Candy's bacteria were rapidly decreasing in numbers as they destroyed themselves without his direction.

Soon, Mahem would look exactly as it had before all of this had happened—just uninhabited.

However, there was something in this scene that stood out.

It was a split piece of headgear—none other than the Prototype Horobimaru-Star Helmet.

Once given to The Hero To'ori Kusanagi by an SUBM, it was then claimed by his murderer, Candy. Now it was lying on the ground, thoroughly destroyed.

Instead of vanishing alongside Candy, its remains were simply lying there, exposed to the wind that flowed across the field.

There was other loot that Candy and Marie had dropped in death, but the helmet had an aura that made it stand out from the rest.

Suddenly—perhaps because of the wind—the remains of the helmet shook a little.

"Dead host. Dead victor. None qualified. Grave damage."

A faint voice, its source unclear, could be heard in the barren wasteland.

"Continued recording impossible. Prioritize current information. Incomplete. Abandoning. Unsatisfactory."

The voice was coming from the helmet itself.

“Returning.”

With that one word, the helmet transformed into bits of light and vanished.

The sight resembled the death of a monster or a Master’s death penalty, but it was neither.

If To’ori or other seasoned warriors of Tenchi had been there, they might’ve noticed that the Resources comprising the helmet were flowing somewhere else.

◆

Somewhere completely unknown, everything was obscured by darkness.

In the profound blackness of the deepest depths of an unimaginably deep cavern, outside of the reach of wind and rain and thus thoroughly unchanged since ancient times, there was a space that at first glance resembled a burial chamber.

Perhaps, though, this place was better likened to something with a far different purpose—a smithy, to be precise. There was a furnace, an anvil, and a hammer.

That was more than enough to make it a smithy even despite the fact that this was a crucible of pure darkness untouched by the rays of the sun or the glow of a fire, wasn’t it?

Now, however, the deep silence had a source. Absently floating in the heart of the black smithy was what looked like little more than a haze.

Did this thing exist? Did it not? Even that much wasn’t clear—but it was there regardless.

It must’ve been there—been waiting—for an obscenely long time.

“Retrieving.” But then, the seemingly inert haze whispered that word, and something flowed into the darkness. The shapeless and invisible energy took form in the haze’s hand.

The object was the now shattered Star Helmet.

“Incomplete.” The haze echoed the words spoken by the helm itself.

“The Hero, The Arts, The Earth, King of Plagues, The Cannon, Over Wrestler, Death Shadow.” The haze named some Superior Jobs—specifically, the ones that the owners of the helm had met or battled.

It almost felt as though it was lamenting something.

“Few. Insufficient. Unsatisfactory.”

It voiced its displeasure with the fact that the number it counted was less than desirable.

The haze was the creator of the helmet, and what it wanted was for the item’s owners to fight Superior Jobs.

It had even made the helm so it would seek out stronger and stronger wielders. In fact, while Candy had picked up the helmet off of To’ori’s body himself, it would’ve moved to him even if he hadn’t.

But now that Marie had destroyed the helmet before disappearing along with Candy himself, this feature had become meaningless. The helmet had no choice but to return to the haze, its goal incomplete.

“Conflict knowledge inadequate.” Disappointed though it was, the haze quickly took to action.

The furnace of the black smithy was lit for the first time in who knew how long, and its flame grew, melting the broken helmet. The haze took the hammer in hand and began working the metal that was left.

This task would clearly take him quite a long time.

“Begin. Perfect. First step.”

The haze’s—his—job was to repeat the same thing five times. Though the first step was incomplete, he had to fulfill his duty.

“Dedicate. Dependent. Task.”

This was something he’d decided he would do a long time ago.

Behind the scenes of the turbulent King of Plagues event, unknown to all, this being had taken to action.

This would eventually result in something fearsome taking center stage.

Interlude: A Story That Was Spoken and a Story Untold

Sorcerer Ray Starling

"...And that's how I beat King of Plagues and became famous as the mysterious PK known as the Superior Killer. After this, I was flooded with contracts and had to count on help from the twin CEOs of DIN, among other things...and one of the jobs I got out of that led to our first meeting."

I silently listened. Expanding upon the articles that speculated on her means and contained various other pieces of information, Marie had told me about the event and had now reached the conclusion I already knew—that the Superior Killer had defeated King of Plagues and sent him to the gaol.

"Well, with how big the whole thing was, there's probably some stuff that I don't know about it, so all I could really tell you was what I heard here in Altar and how the battle played out for me," Marie said. "I also don't know much about what King of Plagues has been doing after he was thrown into the gaol—though I did see that recent video of him being a little terrorist in there."

"Oh yeah... I saw that too."

Someone I'd known since our high school days—a fellow EGRS member—was a streamer and content creator who'd gotten sent to the gaol and occasionally made videos about it. He was eccentric to begin with and there weren't a lot of people making gaol content, so those videos always got a good amount of views.

I'd watched some of them myself, and, well...that lip fetishist sure seemed to be the same as ever. Not that I approved of what he did, though Stealing the fairy queen Titania's cup was a pretty crazy thing to do.

That aside...

"By the way, Marie..."

"Yes?"

"How would you describe King of Plagues? His appearance, I mean." The news articles wrote about his deeds, but there was nothing about what he looked like.

"His appearance? Well, it was definitely pretty weird."

Weirder than somebody wearing a business suit in a fantasy world? I thought.

"I mean, he wore a samurai helmet and a raincoat! That's not exactly a look I'm ever going to forget."

"Ohh, that is weird. I never met him, but I'm sure I'd recognize that outfit right away."

"Well, he's in the gaol now, so it's not like we'll ever see him again." Marie had beaten King of Plagues, and Shu had beaten King of Crime, but no matter what they did, as long as they were Masters none of them could actually die. They would just come back once their death penalty expired—but if their sins were grave enough, they'd be sent to the gaol.

So far the only people who had made it out of there were people like Hannya, and knowing the extent of his crimes there was no chance that King of Plagues would ever get free.

I mean, it's not like the security there is so lax that he could just escape, right?

"Anyway, that's more or less how the King of Plagues incident went," said Marie. "Do you have any more questions?"

"Just one." There was actually one more thing that Marie probably knew about, but hadn't yet mentioned. "It's about the boy who survived. How did Mahr end up?"

I wanted to know about Marie's client—the sole survivor of Mahem. Marie had neglected to mention what kind of life the boy had ended up living once all was said and done.

However, the only response I got was silence. Marie clearly looked like she didn't know what to say.

"Was he sent to some orphanage?" I asked. "Wait, don't tell me that he..." Joined his friends and family? I completed the sentence in my head, feeling uneasy.

However, Marie's answer didn't align with my assumed worst-case scenario.

"I don't know. I think that once it was all over, the dragon that helped me took him with him somewhere.”

The dragon who was a friend of The Hero and his tamed monster—the one that had gladly agreed to help Marie with her plan. With the boy having lost his family, friends, and homeland, that dragon was, in a way, the only connection he still had.

“His friend entrusted the boy to him, so...I guess the dragon took him into his own care?” I said.

“Probably. Well, the dragon seemed reasonable, so I’m sure that boy is living a decent life somewhere.”

Well, that seemed like a good enough outcome to me. I could only hope that the boy found something to live for in the time after the tragedy.

◇◆◇

The following events occurred after the incident, yet were unknown even to Marie—the one who had finally ended it. Neither most of the players on the board nor human society at large could fully grasp the story that unfolded.

◇◆◇

After King of Plagues’s Defeat, Kingdom of Altar, Ajani County

Mahr first heard of King of Plagues’s defeat from Arcal, then from the workers in the offices where he was currently staying.

With that, he understood that black mist—the professional killer—who had accepted his request had actually done what To’ori could not and defeated King of Plagues. The people here told Mahr that although Masters couldn’t die, the crimes King of Plagues had committed were so serious that he would never leave the gaol.

With the incident finally in the past, Altar was overcome by relief.

But now that it was all over, Mahr was left with absolutely nothing.

He’d lost his homeland, his family, his friends, and now even the person responsible for all of that loss was gone.

Recent examinations of Mahem’s lands proved that the bacteria were on the decline and that it would soon be a place where people could live again, but that didn’t mean anyone had survived.

The people that made up Mahr's life—those he had any ties to—were all dead.

In silence, Mahr looked back upon those days that would never return, his eyes fixed in the direction of Mahem. The office workers had already tried talking to Mahr about his life from now on, and the town had a state-sponsored orphanage that had asked if he would like to live there. The suggestion was made out of kindness on their part, and it was probably the best path Mahr could have taken, but Mahr just couldn't see it that way.

Altar was still Altar. It wasn't the homeland in which he'd lived his entire life so far.

The fact that the homeland was all but eradicated didn't change that.

The office workers concluded that the boy just needed time to think, and so they let him stay as long as he needed.

However, Mahr was planning to leave this place soon. He had no means of surviving on his own and would probably die, but he didn't feel that it would be a particularly unfortunate outcome. In fact, he was gradually feeling less and less of anything, becoming more hollow as time passed.

Even when Arcal or the people in Altar's government offices told him that King of Plagues was defeated, Mahr didn't feel anything that resembled happiness. It made the burden on him a little lighter, but he did not get any positive emotion out of the news.

Mahr didn't even feel sadness or rage anymore, let alone joy. The moment he'd asked the hit man to kill King of Plagues might've been the last time he'd felt any kind of intense emotion whatsoever.

Now, with a hollow heart, he merely stared in Mahem's direction from dawn until dusk.

But as he was doing exactly that, Mahr thought he saw something strange in the sky—a distortion in the air, so vague it would likely vanish if he glanced away.

This strange object that his eyes captured by pure chance seemed to have the shape of a creature. If his eyes weren't deceiving him, it looked like a translucent dragon, swimming through the sky.

"It has been long indeed since the eyes of mankind have caught my reflection." A moment after Mahr saw that hazy dragon, he heard an unfamiliar voice by his side.

Silently and showing little surprise, the boy looked toward its source.

This was the second time something like this happened in a short while. It couldn't shock him any longer. His heart and mind had become too lifeless for that.

What Mahr saw looked like a miniaturized version of the dragon he'd seen in the sky. He couldn't tell dragons apart by their faces, but he felt as though this one was somewhat similar to the dragon he already knew—Arcal.

"This reflection is woven from spirit and nature's lingering magic. To witness it is a sign that your heart is profoundly hollow—that you are attached to nothing. There is not a single thing that concerns you now—even the question of your own life or death is a distant thing. Am I wrong?"

Mahr said nothing and didn't even nod in response, but he did feel that the dragon was right.

"Hmm," the dragon said. "So this is more than a state of mind."

The transparent dragon gazed into Mahr's eyes. It was no doubt an unsettling scene, but the boy wasn't scared in the least.

"Keh heh heh...how unusual indeed. You even have the talent. You carry what it takes to inherit the throne of the lost Superior Job that has stood vacant since the pre-ancient times."

"Hm...?" Mahr finally spoke.

"Had you not suffered a tragedy such as this, you would have died without this potential ever coming into bloom." Mahr understood the spectral dragon's words, but the deeper meaning was lost on him.

It almost seemed as though it was saying that Mahr was...special.

"Young Mahr." The dragon spoke the boy's name easily, as though he already knew everything about him. "You are special." The creature clearly affirmed the very thing that Mahr had assumed was a misapprehension. "Were you to train with me, you would soon—at least in terms of the outside world's time—become a being of great power. You would be someone truly special, just like The Hero himself."

Silence.

"Shall I take you under my wing?" the dragon asked.

To become special, just like The Hero To'ori Kusanagi—this used to be one of Mahr's greatest desires. He'd dreamed of being someone truly special and living out amazing adventures.

Back then, he would've immediately agreed to all of this, but there were things he’d come to understand since those days. He now knew that being special didn’t stop To’ori from feeling exactly the same way, and Mahr had realized with painful clarity that the adventures he’d envisioned were nothing but catastrophes for most everyone involved.

Mahr no longer wanted anything special. What he wanted—what his nearly hollow heart wished for—were those simple days that would never come back.

“I’m not going. I don’t need it.”

That was why he responded to the dragon’s offer with a slow shake of his head. If this upset the dragon and drove it to eat him alive, Mahr wouldn’t even run.

The boy no longer needed to be special. There was nothing that he wanted at all. He didn’t even desire to keep living.

He was “■?#.”

“Very well...”

Upon hearing Mahr’s answer, the dragon nodded...

“You pass.”

...and as he proclaimed this, a veil of light began enveloping Mahr’s body.

“Hm...?” Mahr said. To some, this would seem like an attack. Mahr seemed to be obviously in danger, yet he wasn’t shocked or surprised or anything like that.

However, he did have a question: what did the dragon mean by “You pass?”

“You lose your right to it the moment you seek it,” the dragon said. “That is why it is lost, that is why it presents such a challenge...and that is why you are deserving. And although you shall not seek it yourself, it does not mean that I will turn a blind eye to you.” The dragon cracked an obviously joyful smile. “A piece this peculiar is not one I would idly remove from the board. As I wish to continue spectating the game, I shall take you with me and have you grow.”

Mahr said nothing, but he realized that the answer he’d thought would make the dragon mad had actually made it more interested in him than before.

He would now be enveloped in this orb of light, stored away, and probably taken somewhere far off.

However, the boy didn't intend to struggle against what was happening to him. While he might've not been seeking life or power, he also didn't exactly desire death.

He wasn't attached to anything. He was nothing but a stray child who'd lost sight of anything that could tie him to the world.

When Mahr was fully embraced by light, the door to his room burst into pieces.

Stepping over the remains of the door, a man—Arcal in his human form—entered the room.

"Father...!"

"Kyeh heh heh...Arcal? I see you've kept yourself well all this time."

The reflection of the dragon—one of the three dragon kings, Skydragon King, Drac-Heaven—chuckled as he welcomed his son.

"Mahr...!" Seeing the boy, enveloped in an orb of light, Arcal grew pale.

The boy had been entrusted to him by a late friend. If Mahr didn't wish to go into an orphanage in Altar, Arcal had planned to invite the boy to travel the world with him. He hoped that the journey could help cure the boy's hollow heart.

But now that he actually came to present this offer, he found Mahr with someone else—his own father.

"What do you intend to do with him...?!" Arcal cried. It was very likely that his father had been watching—spectating—the entire King of Plagues incident. And through the chaos, for some reason his attention had fixed on Mahr.

Arcal asked his father about his plans for the boy, and the Skydragon King replied, not hiding a thing.

"I will take him to the Border Mountain Belt—no, to the Timedragon's Mausoleum."

"Ah...! Mother's...?!"

"Kyeh heh heh. The custodians ordered me to never let in any Masters, never use it to enhance monsters, and destroy it rather than allow them to set foot in it... But they have not told me anything about letting tians in. This is most appropriate."

The Timedragon's Mausoleum was a profoundly special place.

For Arcal, it was his mother's grave. And for the rest of the world, it was the most unique natural dungeon that existed.

"Listen, Arcal." As Arcal grew more and more confused, unable to read his father's intentions, the Skydragon King spoke to him in a voice only he could hear. "No matter where you are, all that lives will eventually die. Lunnings and Mahem are no different in this regard."

Arcal's eyes widened. Both of those were places where he'd lost close friends. At Lunnings, Arcal had even died himself; at Mahem he'd come close to dying again.

"Even your power may not be enough to protect him," Arcal's father continued. "Surely you are aware of this?"

"Yes." Recalling these heavy defeats, Arcal nodded with a bitter face.

"The turmoil in this world will only continue to grow, and the only way those living here can ensure their survival is to become as powerful as they can possibly be. And the optimal means of achieving this goal lies under my wing."

Arcal was silent. As one who had already experienced death, he knew well that his father spoke the truth.

"Have faith in me. I would have Mahr gain the power to survive by himself—make him powerful enough to at the very least, win against King of Plagues as he is now."

As he grinned, the Skydragon King and the light orb containing Mahr both began to vanish.

"Father..."

"If you are still concerned, feel free to visit now and again. Although...considering the environment, this might not even take a month to achieve."

With that, the Skydragon King and Mahr vanished from the room. They were likely already in the Border Mountain Belt.

All that was left was silence. Arcal's face was bitter and full of anguish, yet he was unable to deny the truth of his father's words.

He also knew that his father kept his promises. There was no doubt that Mahr would be granted special powers, even if he himself didn't desire them.

"If I too..." Perhaps Arcal could have contradicted his father if he'd been stronger than he was—and perhaps if he'd been stronger long ago, he might not have lost so many friends in the first place, and Mahr's heart might not have ended up as hollow as it was.

Following that thought, he reached the conclusion that he had to address his own powerlessness before he could deny his father.

And thus, he also left the room.

◇

When the people working in the office arrived, all they found was a broken door. They tried searching for Mahr, but even with the use of skills, they couldn’t find any trace of him.

And with that, this little incident that followed King of Plagues’s defeat became a cold case.

After all, no one would ever come to the absurd conclusion that the Skydragon King had taken the boy to the Border Mountain Belt—even though that was exactly the truth.

Conjunction: From the Depths

Imperial Capital, Vandelheim

In the heart of the imperium's capital, there was an immense mechanical structure—Throne of the Imperium, Dryfe Imperstand.

It was a fortress that doubled as Dryfe's palace, and tripled as their oldest and strongest weapon. All of the imperium's political activity was centered in it and around it.

It could even be said that if the Imperstand fell, so would Dryfe itself.

In a silent office within the Imperstand, there was a single woman sitting with her eyes closed.

Her name was Claudiah Reinhard Dryfe. Publicly, she was the sister of the imperator as well as Dryfe's strongest martial artist—The Ram.

In reality, she was the imperator, as well as the imperium's greatest engineer—King of Machines—and even held the title of Imperator Machina.

She was the bearer of multiple lives as well as her many titles.

There were two special things about her that made her capable of this.

First, it was her own talents as a "High-End."

Most of those who were called by this term were the rare individuals who stood out among their kind for the natural talents that had manifested in them. High-End Dragons were a major example, although there were cases when the title was given to created monsters like undead.

However, job holders—tians—that were considered High-Ends only came about once every several centuries, and perhaps it was this rarity that made them stand out among their kind far more than the High-Ends of monster species.

Master avatars had an affinity for all jobs, but tian High-Ends often possessed talents so far outside the norm that it dwarfed even that advantage. In addition to that, these High-Ends were gifted with vast amounts of information about the world.

Claudiah was the High-End tian of this era, and that was why she could be both The Ram and King of Machines, bearing Superior Jobs both martial and technological.

Right now, this paragon of unspeakable talent was sitting on a chair in a lightless office, eyes closed as if sleeping, immobile and silent as the dead.

This was a kind of contemplation or meditation—but despite appearances, she wasn't doing it alone.

Within her, a discussion raged between two people.

"The limit has almost been reached," one said. "I wonder if Altimia will agree to our suggestion."

"It will be optimal if she does—for us, and for her."

The people talking were both Claudiah, but the personality—the program—was different.

This was the second special thing that made her what she was—the ability to shape her personality.

Ever since Claudiah was young, she had possessed the talent to create new personalities that were better suited for specific goals. It wasn't clear if this ability came from her nature as a High-End or if it was merely a talent she happened to have, but she'd used it to create several personalities.

The first of them was Reinhard. It was the oldest personality, as well as her base. With just a few modifications, this personality had become fit to be both a politician and an engineer. He was a brother for Claudiah, the holder of the job King of Machines, and the imperator who wished to save Dryfe and make it thrive.

The second one was Claudiah herself. Born through modification of her inner self following her meeting with the First Princess of Altar, Altimia, this served as her current main personality.

Claudiah was Dryfe's strongest martial artist—a combatant of unbelievable skill. She was a sister, the holder of the job The Ram, and Altimia's friend.

There was a third one, but it could barely even qualify as a full personality. It was a shapeless thing that was more like an aggregate of the information the first two had acquired as a High-End.

This proto-personality provided directives that had to be fulfilled for the sake of the world—one of which was the defeat of The Evil. It was more of a duty than a person, but it was certainly not something Claudiah could ignore.

Claudiah Reinhard Dryfe’s mental activities were a discussion between these three. This was true even when deciding what actions to take against Altar.

Reinhard the imperator. Claudiah the friend. All the information available to both of them as a High-End. They would each gauge their goals, and Reinhard, specialized in strategy, would craft a plan to achieve them.

This was why their operations were primarily focused on ensuring that Dryfe thrived, but the will of the other two was never completely ignored. That meant their actions oftentimes ended up being less optimal than they could be.

If they truly wanted to do what was best as an imperator, they would have either shown Altar less mercy or been more considerate of Altimia. However, as her friend, Claudiah would make some actions slightly more gentle than they had to be, while the information provided by the High-End sometimes pushed for being truly merciless toward the kingdom that most likely harbored The Evil.

This was a conflict that existed because Claudiah was who she was, and cutting off any part of her would make her stop being her.

Without Reinhard, the dying Imperium would be unable to survive—and without Claudiah, she would have no reason to live on as a person. And if she was to ignore the directive provided to her by her instincts, the world would fall apart and end.

That was why they had no choice but to proceed while somehow appeasing all three, no matter what failures it led to.

“If she refuses the War Game I suggested—Tri-Flags—that would mean our only option is a standard War—a nonconsensual, indiscriminate conflict that would last until one side was eradicated,” Reinhard said. “I’m certain she already knows well that that is the worst-case scenario.”

“That’s true.”

The postwar acts of Dryfe-sponsored terrorism in Gideon, Quartierlatin, and Altea, the warlike conflict that had broken out between Caldina and Granvaloa... Altimia must have reached one particular conclusion based on these things. That conclusion could only be that Masters who still had available save points posed an immense danger.

Masters who came back from death in just three days were, in a way, suicide bombers that never truly died. If they were Superiors, sending them to battle every time they came back was akin to dropping a nuclear bomb on the enemy country every three days.

Becoming aware of this reality would make it clear that traditional War was an awful idea. It would be a painful conflict of attrition where both sides would gradually lose everything except their Masters.

The most logical solution to this problem was the War Game that Reinhard had proposed—a winner-takes-all War that involved only their inexhaustible Masters. At the very least, this option would prevent both countries from losing their people or resources. If Altar won, Dryfe could do nothing to resist as the kingdom took whatever they wanted. If Dryfe won, they'd acquire vast food resources and bolster their Master count enough to stand against Caldina and other nations—not to mention that they would gain the opportunity to take action against the most pressing issue of all. They would even be able to make the kingdom accept conditions more taxing than the ones they'd tried to push for during the peace talks.

"If we win under these rules, all of our desires will be fulfilled," Reinhard said. "The imperium would be out of its predicament, Altimia would still be alive, and we will be able to search Altar for The Evil and do away with it."

"This would be far easier if it were just the first two."

Indeed—it was because of The Evil—the reset device left behind by the Infinite Jobs—that Claudiah's and Reinhard's goals had become so immensely difficult to accomplish.

Because it automatically grew as it absorbed the Resources of the dead, The Evil would no doubt awaken if ignored. It was like a time bomb whose explosive power constantly grew as its timer ticked down.

That was why Reinhard had decided that it had to be eliminated as soon as possible, even if it meant acting in haste. After all, the info they had as a High-End had already told them that The Evil had been born.

"That is also the main source of the conflict with the previous king. The country born through the destruction of The Evil turned out to be the least aware of the threat that it poses. It's as if someone purposely tampered with their information," said Reinhard.

Before the previous War, Reinhard had used a hotline to have a discussion with King Eldor. He'd requested that Altar provide Dryfe with food, while also speaking of The Evil and the GAME OVER that it would awaken.

However, the kingdom was oblivious to most of what Reinhard had said about The Evil. While they knew a great deal about Sacred King and the others who had defeated it, they were so thoroughly unaware of the true power and nature of The Evil that it seemed strange. Their knowledge didn't go far beyond the vague outline of "a powerful entity with many dependents that claimed the ruins of King of Kings' capital once he was gone."

This created a major difference in awareness between Eldor—who knew little—and Reinhard—who had immense knowledge as a High-End.

And when Reinhard had said that he would find The Evil and deal with it, the king had asked, "How far are you willing to go to kill The Evil—this creature of legend?"

Imagining the worst-case scenario, Reinhard had this to say in response: "Worst comes to worst, I would have to kill every inhabitant of at least one city—most likely Altea."

Needless to say, the king didn't agree to that, and he likely would not have even if he understood the threat as well as Reinhard did. The proposal was simply that outrageous.

However, Reinhard could not lie about this matter. The two countries had exchanged a covenant that prevented them both from using the hotline to speak falsehoods.

That was why Reinhard had been honest about how far he would go to solve this problem—and it was precisely because it wasn't a lie that Eldor decided to end the alliance between Dryfe and Altar. Perhaps he thought that Reinhard was a delusional madman driven by the imagined threat of The Evil, but there could have been any number of reasons behind that decision.

"If we can't find The Evil by searching for it, we have no choice but to eliminate the entire area where we believe it to be," Claudiah said. "The tians of modern times cannot win against The Evil of this generation."

Even the previous The Evil had required the combined power of the strongest tians from the western side of the continent. The overall power of tians had only dropped since, and many Superior Jobs had since been claimed by Masters. Claudiah was a High-End, yes, but this enemy was too great even for her.

The Evil grew stronger with every generation, and this one would no doubt be the strongest ever seen.

"Perhaps King of Kings might have put up a direct fight against it." While this wasn't a Special Superior Job, it was a Superior Job with extremely strict conditions—but the fact that Reinhard would bring up this one-of-a-kind tian powerhouse made it clear just how desperate the situation was.

"With her final contact, Zeta confirmed to have seen something that looked like The Evil within the capital. In a way, this may be a worst-case scenario, but it should lead to a better result than the one promised by the GAME OVER."

What Reinhard wanted to learn by attacking Altea was The Evil's location. The Evil automatically retaliated against attacks, so he expected to find it by committing an act of terror in the capital—its most likely location.

Of course, initiating combat around The Evil came with the risk of increasing its level and maybe causing it to unlock some skills. But if it was still in its early stages, knowing its location would be enough for Reinhard to find a way to counter it.

"But we haven't heard from Zeta since then," Reinhard pointed out.

"Indeed. We haven't received information from her, and it's unclear how the preparations for plan C went. But if we have confirmation for that, we will be able to be a bit more forceful about initiating Tri-Flags."

None of Claudiah's facets had heard from Zeta—the one who'd led the assault on Altea—ever since they talked after the battle during the peace talks, and she thought that perhaps Zeta might have gotten the death penalty and been sent to the gaol. When she'd had Behemot check the internet on the other side, however, she hadn't found anything that suggested that. The Masters posting guides and other information about the gaol mentioned that a sudden virus had spread and given everyone there the death penalty, and that the café owned by a Superior had gone on break, but there was nothing about Zeta.

Where she was and what she was doing were completely unknown. Until that was clear, Claudiah had to think about how to proceed with the Tri-Flags negotiations. And while that was in limbo, Dryfe had invited two more Superiors to join them, while Altar was trying to grow stronger through their Tournaments.

It was worth noting, though, that Behemot was bound by a contract with Tsukuyo Fuso where she'd received healing in exchange for promising not to fight for a month after the peace talks had ended.

"As long as we don't know what the others are planning, we can't remain inactive for long." As mentioned before, the biggest reason Claudiah wasn't able to take the most optimal course of action was because her three goals conflicted in one way or another. However, the problem extended far beyond Claudiah Reinhard Dryfe's inner world.

She made her moves according to what she saw on the board. However, the board was now covered in Masters—people who were more or less unbound, yet had immense power that made them practically walking bombs.

Among them, there was the piece known as "Ray Starling," who might break her—and Dryfe's—plans without even being aware that he was playing on a game board at all.

These pieces that Claudiah could not account for were nothing but nuisances in her eyes.

And of course, there were others who looked down at this same board and played just as she did, oftentimes getting in her way.

They all watched the board from a different position than Claudiah, making their own moves.

The "player" in the kingdom of Altar had always been the Arch Sage—or to be more precise, the ones who had roots in the long-gone pre-ancient civilization. Driven by vengeance, their goal was to eliminate the current custodians, and they showed little care about the damage they would bring upon this era.

The previous Arch Sage had died in a battle against Claudiah's friend, Behemot, but he had already been replaced by his successor. Arch Sage Flagman had always passed down his will and knowledge to the most promising of his disciples, and the Arch Sages had long been accompanied by entities that supported them—Crystal Tuners. They were no doubt scattered here and there, doing various covert operations that would further their goals.

The second player was the custodians that the Arch Sage was trying to defeat.

It wasn't clear how much they knew or what their goals were. Not even a High-End like Claudiah had any information about these mysterious outsiders.

The information she'd been granted contained nothing about Masters either.

Because of this, she knew that these custodians were entities from a different game that had joined after the current one began.

Because of this, she knew that they were alien beings who could do nothing against The Evil.

Because of this, she didn't know what their limits were—or what would set them off.

She didn't know their rules, and it wasn't clear to her what would drive them to kill someone.

It was because of this that after the battle at the peace talks was over, Claudiah couldn't tell Altimia the details of what she knew. At the very least, their actions during The Era of the Peerless Three, as well as the many dangerous UBMs they'd dealt with in history, made it reasonable to assume their goal was to preserve the world.

But that had changed after Masters grew in number. The SUBMs that had appeared since, as well as their lack of action concerning Irregularities such as Corpse Stronghold, threw doubt on that position.

And then there was one more player with a hand upon the board—the final and perhaps the closest thing that Claudiah had to a true enemy.

"I'm especially curious about the actions of the witch. The many incidents in Caldina, the clash with Granvaloa... I do not believe for a moment that she didn't foresee that these things would put her country in jeopardy," Reinhard said.

The president of Caldina, the woman often called a "witch"—La Place Phantasma. Said to have the power to see the future, she was, in a way, a player in this game who was more mysterious than even the custodians. Looking at how things had played out so far, she was one of the reasons for Dryfe's current dire state, and she was now pushing it toward war. Additionally, she had many Masters under her command.

When all was considered, it seemed like she was planning to eventually take control of the entire world.

However, there was something that didn't add up.

If she wanted Caldina to thrive, there must've been better ways to go about it. The clash with Granvaloa was the thing that stood out the most in that regard—how did a country that prospered through trade benefit from taking part in such a conflict?

And for someone who seemed to possess supernatural foresight...she really seemed to be very hands off when it came to the incidents caused by the Treasurebeast Orbs that had spread throughout Caldina. Instead of stopping the incidents themselves, she'd let Sefirot take care of the mess after they'd already happened.

It almost seemed as though her goal was to increase casualties.

Claudiah's powerful brain had tried to find a reason for the president's strange behavior, but she didn't have enough information to arrive at a good answer.

"Perhaps she died and was replaced by someone else?" she suggested.

"Like how I replaced our late brother?" Officially, Reinhard was the imperator as Claudiah's twin brother, Reinhard Claudiah Dryfe. After the real Reinhard died in an act of terrorism when they were young, Claudiah's Reinhard personality had acted as a suitable replacement.

"Perhaps an unforeseen accident claimed her life, but she prepared a replacement to act as though she's alive and prevent the country from falling apart. That is not impossible, but..."

If that were true, then the witch's replacement was incompetent. One could say that it was the reverse of Dryfe's situation, where the real Reinhard had been an ordinary imperial child, while Claudiah was a High-End.

However, it was hard to imagine that someone who saw the future could die in a random accident. This made less sense the more Claudiah thought about it.

Letting out a breath, Reinhard—now the dominant personality—put an end to his considerations and returned to his duties.

He didn't have to process information or discuss anything to be busy—he had mountains of imperator work to attend to.

With a wave of his hand, a magic light lit up the dark room. He then looked over the documents on his table, giving his approval and signing them.

But then, his eyes stopped on one piece of paper.

“Right, the kingdom’s Tournaments are about to enter the final day.” The paper contained information from DIN, showing the results of day nine—everyone who’d made it past the preliminaries and how each battle had ended. “There’s something strange about this Tournament, though...”

“Oh yeah, one of the UBMs escaped,” Claudiah remarked. Claudiah and Behemot both had heard of what had happened on day six.

However, Reinhard shook his head.

“That’s not what I mean, Claudiah.” While they possessed the same knowledge, Claudiah and Reinhard had different perspectives and thought patterns. That was why one could notice things the other didn’t. “You’ll notice that something isn’t right if you look at each day’s winners, as well as those who made it past the preliminaries.”

“Hm...?” Reinhard laid the nine Tournament charts on the desk. The ones at the top were either top ranking Altarian Masters, or ones who had solved various problems on Altar’s behalf, so nothing stood out as unusual.

“Besides the fact that it’s mostly familiar names from Altar, I don’t see anythi... Ohh.”

Claudiah finally realized what wasn’t right with these results.

Having reached a common understanding, Reinhard whispered within his mind.

“Well...I wonder who made this move.”

◆

Thus continued the secret conflict between the players who treated the world as their game board.

Conspiracies, strategies, demonic plots, and divine plans... Something that no mere pawn could measure was taking place in Altar—specifically, Gideon.

But it had to be noted that although there might have been a few “players” who directed the world as they wished, they certainly weren’t the only ones with influence over it.

There were countless people moving across the world, and there were many who acted with so little thought that these “players” couldn’t begin to compare. Naturally, some of them were irregularities—uncertain variables—that stood outside their plotting...

...and yet still had the power to flip the board.

City of Duels, Gideon

Following the end of The Tournaments day nine, the city was overcome by a festive mood.

Actually, it had been like this for the entire period of the event. Countless duel fans could be seen talking about their favorite matches, betting winners were squandering their newfound fortunes, and the losers were drowning their sadness in booze.

The winner of today's Tournament was a non-ranker—a man called Grimms, belonging to a group known as the Fairytale Squad. The other contestants were no joke, yet by some miracle this dark horse had won the day. Because of this, the betting sphere was far more lively than usual.

Even so, it was unlikely that the current mood would surpass how things would be tomorrow.

The next day was The Tournaments' final one, a big event with a big prize—the right to challenge a Mythical UBM

Those who'd already been revealed as participants were Bishmal the Raging Blaze and Catherine Kongou of the Four Underworlds.

And most importantly, there was the Superior, Gideon's king of duels—Over Gladiator Figaro.

There was no doubt that the spectators were in for a hell of a show on the next day. Because of this, there were many tourists and traders who were hurrying through the gates despite the late hour, rushing to make it to the final day.

"I'm here. I'm finally here!"

Among these new arrivals, there was a girl dressed somewhat strangely. She walked along the road linking Gideon to Legendaria, passing the south gate as she entered the city.

"It's so lively. And it's more developed than my hometown! That kind of annoys me!"

Her appearance was certainly eye-catching. She had light purple hair that reached down to her knees and spread voluminously across her shoulders. On her head, rising from between all this hair, were a pair of goat horns. A thin tail extended from her lower back, and her eyes were as golden as the moon hanging in the night sky.

Her appearance was more or less in line with a typical fictional devil girl.

"It's festival season here too!" she said. "It looks so fun! I'm right on time!" Smiling broadly, the girl walked along the pavement. Despite it being night, she held a parasol that she poked into the stone, using it like a walking stick.

Strangely enough, she didn't stand out from the crowd as much as she could have. Though her appearance wasn't normal, it wasn't out of the question for someone from Legendaria. Especially for a Legendarian with a crest on her left hand—a Master.

Since Gideon was a colorful city full of many races and Masters, she blended in it as though she had always been part of it.

"Eh heh heh. Where to start? What to do? I've never been to Gideon before. It's so exciting! I'd love to see all the kinds of duels you can't get in Legendaria, and I'd love to surprise brother dearest with a sudden visit. Oh, I also wanna try that popcorn I heard about."

Like a teenager excited to have arrived at a popular tourist spot, she was the very picture of joy.

Such sentiments were also commonplace in this city. It didn't make her seem unusual and blended into the excited crowd without issue.

"Oh, but first of all, before all that..."

But if there was someone who did look closer...if there was someone who could see her stats, currently hidden by her equipment, she wouldn't be counted as one of the masses for long.

What was she, then?

The answer to that lay in the small crown, sitting proudly on top of her head.

One of her colleagues, so to speak—Overlord Acedia ZZZ—had once described her like so: she was...

"Where's the guy who beat my brother? The one my dear King of Light is so infatuated with? Where's Ray Starling?"

...the most "Overlord-ish" among them.

Thus, from the depths of Legendaria, came the second Overlord.

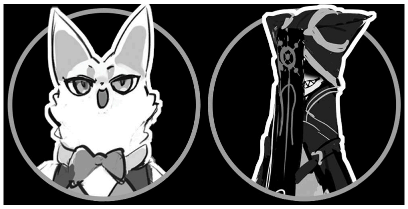
Afterword



Cat: “WE ARE SO SORRY WE ANNOUNCED THIS VOLUME FOR SUMMER, YET RELEASED IT IN AUTUMN!”

Xun: “I’m Xun, shOrt for Xunyu. StArtin’ off with thE apology, huh?”

Cat: “The announcement has been off for four volumes in a row nowww... Oh, and I’m the Cat, Cheshire.”

Xun: “Well, the maximUm frequEncy of releases beforE was six months, yet it endEd up bein’ sevEn this time, sO...”

Cat: “This may sound like an excuse, but the author has yet to miss a single deadline...”

Xun: “There’s lOts of people involved in gEttin’ these books out, so not everythin’ wOrks out all the time, y’know?”

Cat: “Yeah...and that’s why WE’LL MAKE THE NEXT ANNOUNCEMENT EVEN LESS SPECIFIC!”

Xun: “Bro, that’s nOt it at all.”

Cat: “This is the only way the author can prevent any further misses with the limited power he has!”

Xun: “ReallY...?”

Cat: “Anyway, time for the author’s own words!”

Dearest readers, thank you for your purchase. I am Sakon Kaidou.

Volume 21 is closer to a collection of short stories, which is something we haven’t had in a while—volume 10 was the last one like this.

This time I ended up adding various scenes and tried to make them more connected. A good example of this is how AT’s baby steps in original magic are used as groundwork for the later introduction of Candy’s impressive and powerful False God Imitation. And that is far from the only Candy-related thing that you can find here that is not in the WN.

Now, as far as writing goes, it was mentioned above that I haven't missed a single deadline, and that is the truth. However, it should be noted that I'm pushed to the limit fairly often—I'm writing this very afterword on the final day before the deadline.

This is a result of the volume creation process. The problem is that I can't know how many pages I have for the afterword before the edits, illustrations, next volume announcements, and advertisements for other works are in place and the amount of pages they will take up has been nailed down. The afterword always comes after everything else and has the tightest deadline. It's quite scary, if you ask me.

Now, as for the reason I'd write about that topic... It's because I was told I have four pages to work with, yet all I can really write here is an apology and an announcement. Yes, I'm simply dragging this out.

Anyway, this volume 21 came out at the exact same time as volume 12 of the manga. That shows the end of the long battle against Franklin, drawn with Kami Imai's immense skill, so please do pick it up and have a look. Personally, I love just how obvious it is that Baldr can transform, as well as the zany background Masters that really stick out like nothing else.

Speaking of the manga, the deadline for the short story about Lobohta's adventures that would come with the new volume is the end of September, and I intend to work on it right after this. Do go and see if I made it in time.

Next, I have an announcement about the next volume of the LN.

I imagine that the character who made her debut at the end, complete with an illustration, was quite a surprise for both readers of the LN as well as readers of the WN.

Volume 22 will focus on two things—the final day of The Tournaments and Overlord Invidia. There was no sign or trace of her at this point in the WN, but here she is now.

The events involving her are just like volume 17, in that they were both things I'd plotted out and planned to write in Crow Record if it happened to continue. Sadly, that did not work out, but I am glad to have a chance to bring it to life here in the LN. As you could see in the last illustration, Taiki quickly whipped up a wonderful character design for her, which I found very motivating.

Having to add vast amounts of text to the story makes my job noticeably more difficult, but I will do what I can to satisfy all those of you reading, as well as to not miss any of my deadlines.

Please continue supporting Infinite Dendrogram.

“When I’m done writing the draft, I’m gonna make an Embryo crest decal in Armored Core VI...”

Xun: “...Did oUr guy just put up a deAth flag?”
Cat: “Looks like iiit... Anyway, that’s it for the afterword. That means it’s time for the announcement!”
Xun: “I feEl like we should just stOp doin’ them. You can’t gEt the date wrong if you don’t annOunce it.”
Cat: “No! That’s the pessimist’s way of dealing with it! We won’t miss the release period this time! VOLUME 22 IS SET TO COME OUT IN THE FIRST HALF OF 2024!”
Xun: “All that mOtivation, and you shOt out the vaguest announcemEnt ever.”
Cat: “That should work as insurance, but we’ll try to get it out in March!”

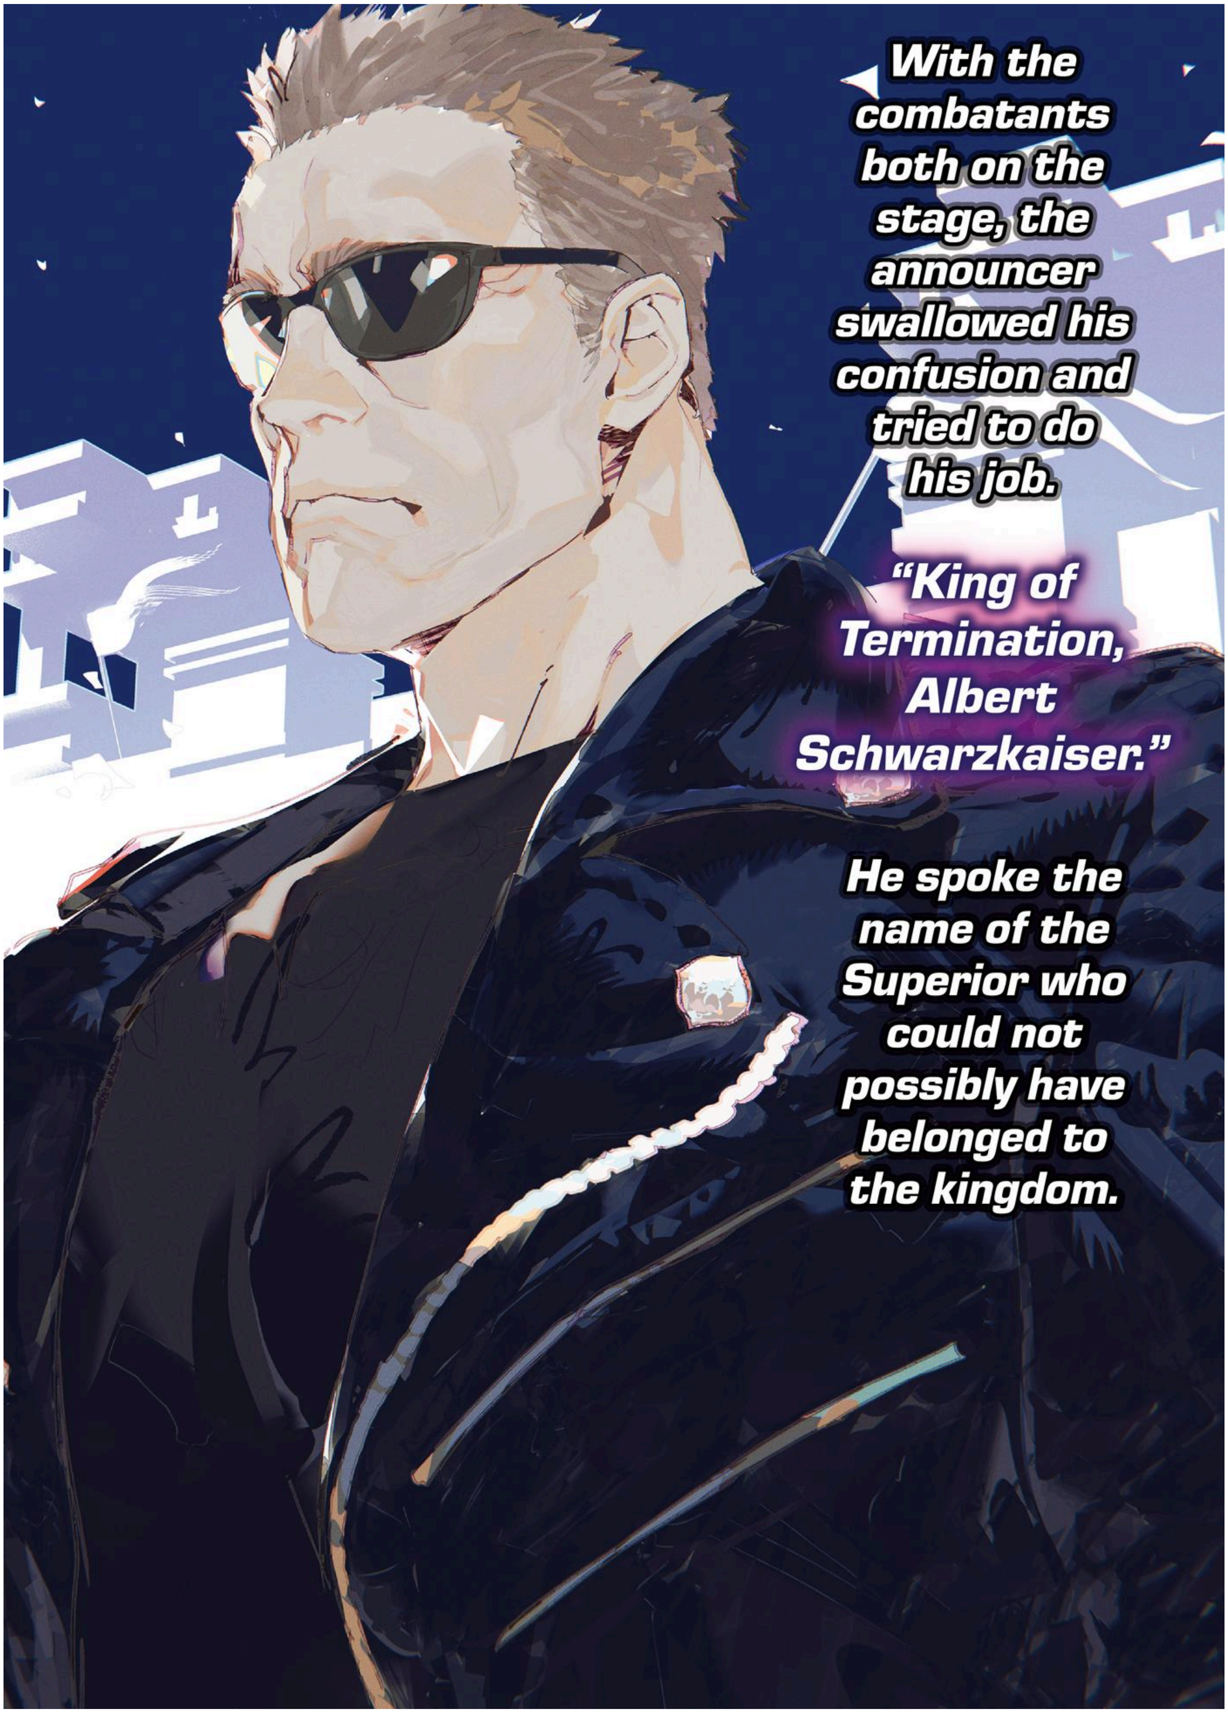
Thus, she declared...
"The night comes! The stars align! The time of the Overlord begins!"
"The event begins... Playground of the Great Old One—R'lyeh!"
...and announced the beginning of her reign.
"I'm so greedy they call me the Bottomless! I am a member of Desire and an Overlord who carves the whole world away!"
As G spoke, she became more and more excited.
"That's why! Here and now! I'm starting a game! By me! For me!"



With the combatants both on the stage, the announcer swallowed his confusion and tried to do his job.

"King of Termination, Albert Schwarzkaiser."

He spoke the name of the Superior who could not possibly have belonged to the kingdom.

Prologue: Star Guidance

April, The Channel of a Certain Streamer

At first glance, this room might've looked like any other charming, feminine room.

However, this one stood out for one reason: It was not real. Instead, it was modeled using CGI.

The room was currently empty, and the only thing moving was the chat box on one side, containing hundreds—thousands—of comments, silently flowing by.

But when the CGI clock in the room hit 9:00...

"All eyes on G! Welcome to my channel!" Flashy effects flooded the space as a 3D model of a girl appeared right in the middle of it.

The devil girl, complete with curved horns and a tail, struck her usual pose and greeted her many viewers on the other side of the screen.

```
I am LOOKING GEEEEEE
G is so cute
```

Many similar comments appeared one after another as the channel's regular intro routine played out.

"Hello! We meet again! Maybe it's been a while...or perhaps you're new here? In that case, I'm G, the Superior streamer and Dendro content creator!" Punctuating her words with all kinds of gestures, the devil girl greeted her audience.

Being CGI didn't stop the avatar from being expressive. Even her face was full of life.

"Today we've got our weekly chat stream! I'm gonna reply to everyone and answer all the questions I can! Most of them are about Dendro, though! Like always!" G held out a mailbox-like object and looked over the questions that she’d received as more comments flowed by.

No surprise there.
Yeah, you’re the strongest content creator, and the most open in your group
Maybe a little too open
Give me back the items I dropped when you PK’d me!
Getting PK’d is a skill issue. Git gud

“All right, first question: ‘Why are you and US committing crimes in Legendaria? You know you’re being a real pain, right?’ True!” G said with a nod. Though the question seemed to have come from a hater, she didn’t seem the least bit bothered.

‘True’? Lmao
Well, you cause a lot of problems...but it’s for them, so...
The gap between Legendaria’s pro-regime and anti-regime factions is deeeeep
Guess it’s all about the values

“Well, yeah,” said G. “I, my clan, and Desire all have our problems with Legendaria! They’re kinda annoying—I like Titania, though! I’d love to meet her again!”

Chat was quick to respond:

They’re kinda annoying steals their land
They’re kinda annoying kills all their Master bodyguards
They’re kinda annoying takes all their tribe leader’s slaves
You don’t go that far cuz you’re ‘kinda annoyed’...
The band battle against Titania was awesome! I’ll be waiting for the rematch!

“Next question! ‘Why do you look the same in Dendro as you do in your streams?’ I get this one every now and then, but it’s just because when I was creating my character, I went and asked if I could look the same as the G avatar I use for my channel. It was pretty funny that the control AI kitty knew about me, though.”

The chat exploded.

Lul
You’re a vtuber, where’s your kayfabe?
Don’t say ‘avatar.’

“If any of you haven’t started Dendro yet and dunno what appearance you’d pick, just go ahead and ask the control AI. That should make things easy. Oh, but I’m the only one who can look like this! If you use my appearance for anything lewd, I’ll sink you for ten thousand years!”

She literally would.
You probably wouldn’t surface until the stars align...
I never thought of that
If only I’d thought of that sooner... I already made my avatar.
Well, it’s not like anyone can copy the second form...

The chat flowed on—half joking, half serious.

Eventually, it was time to end the stream...

“That’s about it for tonight! It’s time to go! But before that, I have a very special announcement!” said G, causing the chat to speed up with anticipation. “I’m making a new video! I haven’t even recorded it yet, but I’ll be fighting a very special guest!”

Oh, a fight vid?
If it didn’t happen yet, maybe we can find the filming location?

A ‘very special guest’? Girl, you just fought Titania. Who can match that?

“Whether I win or lose, it’ll be a premiere—so get ready to watch, like, and donate!”

Yyyep, that’s our Bottomless!
I’m new here. Is she always this obsessed with money?
She doesn’t even try to sugarcoat it! We love that, though!
G is so cute

“Anyway, buh-byeee! See yaaa! Goodniiight!”

Goodniiight!
Goodnight
I still wonder who the big guest is...

[Today’s stream is over! Come see me again!]

April, A Call Between Brother and Sister

“Hey! Hey! Hey! I’m actually thinking of going on a trip! Taking off on a journey!”

“Well, Golden Week is almost over, isn’t it?”

“No no no! I deny and defy that! I mean a trip in Dendro!”

“A little expedition with your clan, then? Who are you picking a fight with this time? Speaking of that, your recent ‘I Broke Into Titania’s Concert and Challenged Her to a Band Battle’ was a good one.”

“The view count is going crazy! I got lots of donations during the premiere too!”

“That’s good to hear. Though, I must say I’m surprised Titania accepted your challenge. I wouldn’t think the leader of a whole country would do something like that.”

"I lost and died, but I'll win next time! I'll recruit more musicians into my clan and challenge her again!"

"That's one of the good things about you. You graciously accept defeat, but are strong-willed enough to try again."

"Oh yeah! Since that video got me so much money, I'm thinking of giving Legendaria a cut by sharing some of my in-game wealth with them. Where do you think I should donate?"

"That's not something you'd expect to hear from someone who belongs to an anti-Legendaria criminal alliance. Anyway, I guess you could donate through the YLNT Club? They'd use every single lir for children's welfare."

"...It's weird how those absolute perverts are so gentle and sincere when it comes to children."

"I imagine Legendaria thinks something similar about your clan."

"We give fun times to our viewers! Good stories to the innocent! Annoyances to the authorities! And we take everything from the baddies who are above the law! We're the Underground Sanctuary, and that's how we operate! We're basically righteous bandits!"

"Nezumi Kozo and Robin Hood would probably rush in and punch you for saying that... You take from innocent Masters too, don't you?"

"Well, yeah! It's PK! Wait, did we go off on a tangent? Did our talk get derailed?"

"It did. I think you said something about a trip?"

"Right! The trip! It's not a clan event! I'm going solo! By myself!"

"Oh?"

"The lolicon and the card gamer aren't in Legendaria at the moment. We're also looking for the next person whose stuff I can take with my ult, so I got nothing to do right now."

"Mm-hmm."

"And ZZZ used our alliance connections to send us a request, so everyone in the clan is busy fulfilling that now!"

"Overlord Acedia? What did he want?"

"He said he needs materials for his thralls, and that he's paying 1.5 times the market price, so everyone just went and started digging away at the mountain we got from the greedy Dvergars! They're all mining right now."

"Short on materials?"

“He said something about getting attacked by three Superiors and an evil-looking prince on a silver steed.”

“That description sounds really familiar.”

“He lost a lot of thralls he used to defend his territory, so he needs some help making them again. But you won’t see me gathering materials for him! I’m not a miner!”

“Well, you’re not really that type of person, I guess.”

“Yes! You’re right! So I got nothing to do right now!”

“I see. And that’s why you’re going on a solo trip?”

“Yes! Exactly! And that’s why, well... I have a question for you.”

“Yes?”

“This has nothing to do with the trip, but... Where are you right now?”

“Hm...”

“Hello?”

“Oh. Sorry. I’m in Gideon for the time being. There’s that tournament, and a few interesting figures I can use for reference.”

“I see! So that’s how it is! Good to know! That’s perfect!”

“What do you mean, perfect?”

“N-Nothing! Don’t mind that! Anyway, bye!”

And just like that, the call abruptly ended.

“...If she thinks that’s enough to fool anyone, my sister really is a terrible liar,” the man said with a sigh. He was an author who frequented the world of Infinite Dendrogram as King of Light, F—but right now, he was just a brother shocked at his sister’s inability to hide her true intentions.

She was obviously planning to pay him a surprise visit—she’d done this in real life too.

“Though...she said ‘perfect’...”

That implied that she had a goal besides visiting F.

Knowing her well, he thought about what his sister would do in Gideon and quickly found his answer.

“Mm-hmm... Well, that will be interesting,” the author said, speaking from an observer’s point of view as he imagined the events that would soon unfold.

Chapter 1: The Fallen Angel and the Arch Enemy

Ninth Day of The Tournaments, Gideon, City of Duels

“Nnnh...”

On this day, the Fallen Knight, Juliet—the fourth in Altar’s duel rankings—was faced with an unusual problem.

“There is no sanctuary where I might hone the darkness I wield... (I can’t find an arena to rent...)”

Gideon had a whole thirteen arenas, and they were the very reason the city received its title. However, they weren’t all being used for duels and events all the time. There would always be some that remained unused, and the local duelists would rent them for sparring matches or to test their new gear or skills.

But right now, there were The Tournaments that rewarded the winners with Orbs containing sealed UBMs. Many other powerful Masters had gathered from all over to fight for them and prepare for the fights. With tomorrow being the final day, their numbers were especially high, and because of that, not a single arena was left unreserved.

“My mortal frame has yet to acclimate to my newfound power... (And I still haven’t figured out the MVP rewards yet...)” Juliet had acquired two MVP rewards recently: one from a gacha ticket she’d won during the Anniversary and one from the UBM she’d slain after winning the Tournament she’d participated in. They had no doubt made her more powerful, but she had yet to familiarize herself with their specifics.

The MVP reward she’d gotten from the UBM had been generated with her previous reward in mind. They now formed something of a pair, best used together.

To put it another way: They were awfully unwieldy if used separately. They were, in fact, double-edged swords that would kill her if misused.

Before she could employ them in actual battle, she had to thoroughly test them within the barrier of an arena, where death wasn't an issue.

Juliet let out a sigh as she spotted a familiar face.

"Oh. Julie! Any luck on your end?" said Chelsea—Juliet's friend and rival—as she approached. "Goin' by your face, I'm guessing not, huh?"

"Yeah... You too?"

"Nothin' on the west, no. With a Mythical reward on the line, they're all really serious about tomorrow's Tourney."

They had split up to the east and west sides of the city to look for any open arenas, but everything was fully booked everywhere.

They usually had Max and Shion with them too, but they weren't in the city right now.

Max was out making money. There was an auction being held on the same day as the final Tournament, and among the items being sold was one of Tenchi's Hundred Famed Blades—the exact one she wanted most—so she was out hunting monsters to gather as much wealth as she could before it began.

Shion was currently offline because of a cold. She had come online yesterday and had looked just fine on the Dendro side, but her servants had hastily chased her over there and brought her back.

Juliet had told her to take care of herself, genuinely concerned, while Chelsea had privately thought something rude—along the lines of "So even idiots catch colds, huh?"

"Hrm... Maybe some of our friends have a reservation? We could join them instead..." Chelsea suggested.

"The ones who are participating in the final day are Figaro and Bishmal, right?"

"Yeah. But Figaro probably didn't rent one, while Bishmal said he wanted to 'recharge his batteries' and went to a maid café instead."

Chelsea's words made Juliet tilt her head. "Bishmal is one thing, but...Figaro didn't rent one?"

"I mean, Figaro is a member of Death Period. Their entire base is a—Oh."

Chelsea stopped mid-sentence. She was looking at something ahead, causing Juliet to do the same.

There, she saw...

"Ray?"

...their friend, Ray Starling.

◇◇◇

Sorcerer, Ray Starling

Today was the ninth day of The Tournaments, but instead of watching it, I was just looking around the bazaar.

The clan member participating today was Kasumi, but she’d been eliminated in the preliminaries and I didn’t know any of the people who made it through, so I just didn’t feel like watching it.

Kasumi wasn’t the type to fight solo, so her loss wasn’t really unexpected, and we’d already held a little consolation party for her during lunch.

I really didn’t know who to bet on this time either, so I just went with a name that caught my eye—someone called “Grimms.” The sum I put down was smaller than any of my previous bets, but the multiplier was only behind Rook’s, so I’d still make some good money if he won.

Also, I currently didn’t have Nemesis by my side.

Well, actually, I did—but she wasn’t coming out of the crest on my left hand. She’d been meditating like this a lot more ever since our battle against that Overlord.

At first, I thought this was a sign that she was evolving, like what had happened in Torne. It didn’t seem to be a one-day deal this time, but there was no mistaking it: Having already evolved three times, she herself could now sense that her next evolution was drawing close.

There was something else she’d said about it too.

“Ray. This is conjecture, but...my next evolution will likely grant me the you-know-what.”

“Huh?”

“My ultimate skill.”

Ultimate skills. Bearing the Embryo’s own name, they were the greatest, most powerful abilities in any Embryo’s arsenal, and the supreme manifestations of their core traits.

This meant that her next evolution—her fifth form—would set in stone her nature as an Embryo.

Nemesis was currently reflecting on herself in preparation for that, and instead of disturbing her, I decided to just walk around alone.

“Hm?”

But then I noticed a couple of familiar faces. There was Juliet, looking somewhat down, with Chelsea right by her side. They’d noticed me too.

“What’s up, you two?” I asked as I approached them.

“The favors I carry, newly bestowed... They cannot yet be awakened,” said Juliet.

“I wanna test my new MVP rewards, but no arenas are open,” huh? I thought. I get it.

This reminded me that she’d been the one who won the Tournament on the fourth day, as well as beat the UBM to take the MVP reward afterward.

“Because of the Tourney, the arenas are bein’ rented by people who don’t usually use them,” said Chelsea.

“I see...” That made sense—duelists weren’t the only people participating in The Tournaments, and with the arenas being the perfect place to practice one-on-one fights, there were probably hundreds of people trying to rent them.

“And it’s the final day tomorrow,” Chelsea continued. “Not a single arena is open.” With the prize being a Mythical MVP reward, it was no wonder the participants were taking this seriously.

But because of that, these two hadn’t been able to do any training...

“Why not use our place, then?” I asked.

“Huh?”

My clan’s base was the Eighth Arena, and it had the same barrier that all the others did.

I’d even used it myself to test the axe that had blown away my arm.

“Can we?”

“Sure. It’s not like it costs us anything. Someone else might be using it, but the barrier can be separated just like in the other arenas, so won’t be a problem.”

If there was someone using it now, it’d probably be Figaro. He was participating in tomorrow’s Tournament. There was probably enough space for everyone there.

“Thanks! Maaan, there’s nothin’ like a good friend!”

“And so, we descend upon the citadel of the Light- and Dark-Wielding Hero Clad in Violet and Crimson... (We’re visiting Ray’s place...)”

“Hm? Juliet? What’s wrong?”

“Oh, don’t worry about it. She’s just cute like that.”

“I don’t really get it, but okay...” Well, Juliet was still a middle schooler in real life, so it was probably best not to pry.

Anyway, that’s how it was decided that I would let these duelists into our base.

“The Eighth Arena, huh? I’ve actually never been there,” said Chelsea, prompting a nod from Juliet.

“Really?” I asked. “You two are proper duelists, so I kinda assumed that you’d been to all of them.”

“The ranked battles all happen in the Central Arena, and there’s more convenient places for warm-ups and sparring,” Chelsea said. Well, looking back at it, whenever I joined them for sparring, we never did use the eighth.

“If we go to arenas besides that, it’s usually for their events, but...” Juliet added.

“Ohh...” Right. Since the eighth was in a bad location, it never attracted much of an audience and was operating at a net loss, so it probably wasn’t economically viable for them to do any big events.

That makes our base sound like some rural horse-racing track that was on the verge of shutting down, I thought.

“By the way, can you fill your arena with water?” Chelsea asked.

“I never tried, but I think you can.” Not every arena in Gideon had this feature, but some could be filled with water for aquatic fights, and I was pretty sure ours was among them.

“I’ll pay for the water... Actually, I’ll just provide it myself. Would you mind if I did that?”

“I’m pretty sure it would take up the whole arena, so if someone else is using it, you’ll have to ask them. If they’re fine with that, then I see no problem.”

“Thanks! That’ll be a big help! I’ve been on a losing streak lately, so I need to do some serious training!”

“That so? Speaking of, what day did you participate in?”

I hadn’t seen her name on any of the public rankings in The Tournaments, so I’d assumed she’d been unlucky and gotten a bad matchup during the preliminaries...

“...Day six. I got matched with Kashimiya in the prelims.”

"Ohhh..." Yeah, that'd do it, I thought. Even the public battles ended in seconds that day.

"The reward didn't attract much attention, and I'm pretty strong against lightning, so I thought I had a chance," Chelsea added. "Though, looking back at the whole escape thing, that UBM was probably too much for me."

The UBM released on day six had broken the barrier and flown off somewhere, escaping not just Kashimiya, but all the Superiors present—Shu included. Thankfully, it seemed like the UBM hadn't caused any incidents since.

Still, there had been a serious counterplan meeting about it, and both Shu and Figaro had both been called to participate as observers.

"Speaking of Kashimiya, I wonder when he'll challenge Figaro," said Chelsea.

"Oh, Figaro himself actually asked him about that," I said.

"What did Kashimiya say?"

"'I will challenge you when you can duel me with all your strength.'"

"You mean...?"

"The sharpest fang in the Lion King's maw? (Figaro's ult?)"

Chelsea and Juliet instantly understood what Kashimiya had been referring to.

Indeed—while Figaro was the strongest duelist in the kingdom and possessed incredible power, he was actually handicapping himself by never using his Embryo's ultimate skill.

Figaro had sworn that he'd never use his ultimate skill in a duel until he got another chance to face his close friend and rival, who'd disappeared following some event in the past. Figaro was so serious about this oath that he hadn't even used his ult against Xunyu during the Clash of the Superiors.

"'Tis not that I do not grasp the desires of the great and powerful, but time flows ever onward toward its ultimate end... (I understand wanting to fight someone when they're at their strongest... But I wonder when he'll get to do that.)"

"Well, for Kashimiya, it's less about his duel ranking and more about overcoming a great obstacle," said Chelsea. "He just wants to fight someone powerful—becoming duel champion is kind of a bonus."

Looking back, that was more or less how he'd been with Tom. Even though it was a bad matchup for him, Kashimiya had challenged Tom again and again, until he eventually emerged victorious with the techniques he'd honed throughout it all. He improved himself by overcoming those who were strong—these great obstacles.

For Kashimiya, duels weren't the goal, but just a means to that end, and that was why he didn't care about staying second in the rankings.

He would remain there until the day he could fight Figaro at his strongest.

"But if that's how it is, I say let him keep waiting," said Chelsea. "I'll just beat Julie, Tom, and Kashimiya too, then challenge Figaro myself!"

"Our ambitions are equally matched—and yet, only one shall bear fruit. (I was thinking the same thing! I won't lose to you, though!)"

Those two really were duelists. I was looking forward to their fights as both a friend and as a spectator. If letting them use our arena would help them on their path, then that was all the more reason to do it.

And what of you, as the leader of Figaro's clan? Nemesis asked telepathically. She must've woken up at some point.

Knowing Figaro, he'd just be really happy they got stronger and gladly fight them both, no? I thought back at her.

That is true, came her reply.

As far as Superiors went, Figaro was relatively normal as a person, but when it came to combat power and fighting spirit, he might've been the craziest guy around. Who else would keep fighting after literally getting their lung ripped out?

Continuing to gossip, we soon arrived at our base. Thankfully, no one was using the stage, so they could have aquatic fights just like Chelsea had requested.

I actually joined them myself, and sparring with them made me realize that they'd grown stronger too—especially Juliet.

She'd actually died more times than me, though, so I felt like it'd be a while before she mastered her two new MVP rewards—especially the one she'd gotten using the gacha ticket.

Once we were done, I told them that they were free to use the arena for practice anytime.

But man, Juliet's MVP reward... I honestly would've loved to have gotten it myself, I thought. The Carriage House of Legend I pulled from the gacha isn't exactly disappointing, but the thing Juliet got would've fit my fighting style so well.

◇◇◇

Gideon, City of Duels

After a few hours of sparring in the Eighth Arena, Chelsea said she had some business to attend to and logged out.

Juliet was thinking of doing the same. While it was evening in Gideon right now, it was almost dawn in real life—and since it was a regular Tuesday, a middle schooler like her had classes to attend.

But in all honesty, her heavy sighs clearly showed that she wanted to stay logged in.

In Dendro time, tomorrow was the final day of The Tournaments. It was the climax of a major dueling event, and yet Juliet had to go to school. Just thinking about that before she'd logged in had made her so disheartened that her head had started to feel strangely heavy.

Thus, she was now walking through the city wearing a rather gloomy expression.

Logging out right away was an option—but knowing that she'd get less than two hours of sleep before her mother came to wake her up, Juliet wanted to enjoy the festivities a bit longer instead.

Additionally, though she'd been logged in for a while now, she didn't actually feel all that sleepy. She'd taken a nap between day eight and day nine. Converted to real time, it was only about an hour of sleep, but it had spared her from feeling drowsy.

Juliet was actually full of energy and a desire to do something.

It's right before the final day, so maybe they're doing something in the first district? she thought. It's a bit far, though. I'll just fly there.

She spread Hræsvelgr—her Embryo—wide and prepared to leap into the sky when...

"Hey! You there! You, with those photogenic black wings!"

...someone suddenly called out to her.

Juliet turned around in surprise to see an unfamiliar girl running up to her, eyes glittering.

"Is that cosplay? Or are they the real deal? Oh! They move! Can you fly? That's amazing!"

“Hm? Huh? What?” Juliet was completely taken aback by the mystery girl’s sudden approach. She didn’t even manage to speak in her usual manner, instead only letting out confused exclamations.

“There’s winged Masters in Legendaria too, but theirs don’t really work! Everything in character creation is just cosmetic! But your wings move! Are they some kind of magic item? Wait, Identification doesn’t show anything... It’s an Embryo!”

“I-It is...”

“Nice! So nice! Wings that can actually fly! A fallen angel! This would get so many views! Tons of likes! Hey! Would you join me for a photo shoot? I feel like we can take some great pictures together!”

“O-Okay... Huh?” Overwhelmed by the girl’s energy, Juliet found herself nodding.

Sh-She’s so pushy... Juliet thought. I feel more pressured than I did with Max.

In their first meeting, Max had challenged Juliet to a duel in the middle of the street—but in a way, this girl was more overwhelming. It was enough to knock the role-playing right out of her.

“Yay! That’s great! We’re like a devil and a fallen angel! This will look great together!”

“A devil...? Oh.” Juliet finally noticed the girl’s devilish horns and tail—though the horns were somewhat rounded, and combined with the hair color that matched her dress and crown, along with the closed parasol she carried, she looked more like...

“A cute devil girl...”

“Yeah! I know, right? Thanks! I’m proud of my avatar too!” Those words, along with the crest on her left hand—showing an image of what almost seemed to be an ancient underwater temple—were more than enough to confirm that she wasn’t a tian, but a Master.

While Infinite Dendrogram’s avatar creation let players assume all sorts of strange appearances, it was often difficult to balance the function and design of features humans didn’t have in reality. However, this devil girl pulled it off really well. The tail even seemed to move based on her emotions, however that worked.

“Oh! Right! Can I have your name? I wanna put ‘Me and Whoever’ as the title for the photo set!”

“Um... I’m Juliet.”

The fact that the devil girl had to ask her name made it clear that she was new to Gideon. Juliet was fourth in the duel rankings—the duelist who showed up in more matches than any others near the top. Nobody from the area who cared even slightly about duels would fail to recognize Juliet’s face or name.

Oh yeah, she did say something about Legendaria... Juliet thought.

"Juliet. Julie it is then! I hope we can be friends!" The devil girl grasped Juliet's hands and shook them up and down.

It was an awfully blatant expression of familiarity, but it obviously came from the heart.

"And, so... You are...?"

"Huh...? Oh. Right. Riiight..."

Juliet's question made the devil girl freeze mid-handshake. However, she quickly rebooted and gave Juliet a smile.

"I'm G! A streamer and content creator! Search for 'G Channel' and you'll find me!"

"Oh. A streamer..." Juliet mostly watched fashion and occult videos, so she didn't know much about streamers, but based on G's reaction to her lack of recognition, Juliet figured she must've been pretty famous.

"I-I'll have a look..."

"Please do! Check me out! Anyway, on to the photo shoot!" G said with a smile plastered across her face, making Juliet nod.

◇◆

"I saw a good photo spot! The moonlight really spices up the scene! Let's go there!" G said, pulling Juliet's hand.

The sight made them stand out, and some of those they passed by talked about them.

"Oh. Look at that devil girl. Pretty cute, huh?"

"Devil...? Which one do you mean?"

"C'mon. The one holding hands with the Black Crow, obviously."

"She doesn't seem all that devil-like to me." This made Juliet feel somewhat bashful, while G didn't seem to care.

But as they walked, the amount of people around them gradually dwindled.

"We're here! We've arrived!"

Eventually, they ended up inside some stone ruins—a property that had been destroyed during Franklin's act of terror. Unfortunately, its rebuilding plans had been delayed, if not completely lost in the legal process, because it didn't have any inhabitants or owners to begin with.

"I think devils and fallen angels are best paired with the scenery of destruction! The absolute end! Not scenes of everyday life, but the desolation left after it's over!"

"Our minds are as one... (I totally get it...)" G's assertion was something that really touched Juliet's teenage tastes.

They had chatted a bit on the way here, and though Juliet had found G a bit much at first, she eventually decided G was actually very easy to talk to despite her unique tone and overwhelming personality.

"Let's get ready now! I'll set everything up!" G said as she reached into her Inventory and took out various photography equipment. There were floating orbs and mirrors that shone to function as lighting, as well as crystal balls with wings that functioned as cameras—all of them Legendarian magic items.

Appropriately for a content creator, G seemed very serious about her setup.

"Let's get started, then. It's photo time! We'll do each of us individually first, then pair up for the rest!"

"O-Okay." And so, the photo shoot commenced, beginning with Juliet.

G left the poses and expressions up to Juliet at first, but then began telling her where and how to stand, and what faces to make.

Juliet checked the photos on the spot, and seeing them was quite surprising to her.

G's photography skills were just incredible—even more than one might expect out of a content creator. Juliet was into fashion and taking selfies, so she could easily tell that G's photos did a good job of highlighting her charm. Juliet was already Juri Kurosaki's ideal avatar, yet these photos seemed to somehow make her look even better.

"Pretty..." said Juliet, so overcome by emotion and excitement that she could only manage the most basic statements.

"Well, I gotta be good at it for my job. I gotta know how to captivate people. Not that I don't like the praise, though!"

"You made me look so gorgeous... Can I have these too?"

"Of course! I'll give them to you along with the pay!"

I'll definitely send them to the other side and put them in an album, Juliet decided.

"Oh. I forgot to ask... Would it be okay if I use my photos with you for video thumbnails or post them on social media? Would you be against that?"

"Not at all." Juliet was a high-ranking duelist, so there were already plenty of videos and photos of her duels. Agreeing to this wouldn't change a thing.

"Nice! Thanks a bunch!" G said with a bright smile.

The photo shoot continued, and they ended up taking dozens of pictures.

The ones where they posed together as a devil and a fallen angel were especially beautiful—breathtaking, even. The background shadows and lighting worked splendidly to create scenes that looked simply magical.

"Wow... I don't even feel like I'm looking at myself here..." said Juliet.

"Well, it's your avatar. It's important to make it look even better than it does normally," G replied as she sorted the photos. Some would be used in videos, some in streams, and some posted on social media. Her eyes as she did this were nothing if not serious.

"You content creator types are really amazing..."

"We're not all like this. There's a bunch of areas we can fall into. For example, the lip feti— I mean, someone I know gets viewers not through photography or recording skills, but just by showing interesting and funny occurrences. I don't have whatever weird predisposition makes that kind of thing happen to me on its own, so I set up my events myself and make some eye-catching screenshots and pictures to go with it."

"You're so good at this, though. You'd be a great photographer..."

"Oh, that's not happening. Not a chance. No way."

"Huh?" G's strong denial made Juliet's eyes go wide.

G, however, maintained a smile as she said, "I mean, the thing I wanna photograph the most is me. I want people to look at me. I wanna shine brighter than anything else in the world! That's not the usual outlook for a photographer, right?"

"Umm... That makes you sound more like...a princess?" That was the first word that came to Juliet's mind when she thought of "someone who shines brighter than anyone else in the world."

That might've been kind of a childish answer, though, Juliet said, regretting her choice of words when...

"AHA! Yeah! You might be right!" Apparently finding humor in Juliet's words, G let out a laugh. "You really don't know me, huh? So this is what it's like to leave Legendaria."

"Hm?"

"Ah ha ha! Don't worry about it. Thanks for helping me out today. Here's your pay," G said as she handed Juliet a sizable sum of money and the copies of the photos she'd made on the spot.

"Thanks..."

"Oh! Right! Can I add you as a friend? You know, to celebrate those great photos we just took?"

"Okay!" Juliet said with a nod. She was happy to have a new friend on top of all the wonderful pictures she'd received.

After adding each other to their friend lists, the pair were ready to part ways.

G seemed to have somewhere else to be, while it was about time for Juliet to log out and prepare to go to school.

"I'll go check out your videos, um... Miss G?"

"Just 'G' is fine. 'Miss G' sounds like the name of a rapper or something, so just 'G' is fine. Anyway, Julie, whether here or on stream, let's meet again sometime!"

"Okay!" Her heart lifted by the wonderful photos and her new friend, Juliet logged out.

◇

Fully satisfied, she—now Juri Kurosaki—opened her eyes.

"Hm...?" But the moment she logged out, she realized that something was off about her body.

She was obviously sleepy, but it was more than that. Her head was heavy, her breathing difficult, and her joints ached here and there.

"Ah-choo..." A charming sneeze escaped as she woke up.

She then looked at the large mirror in the room...

"...Huhhh?"

...and saw her face, all red.

◆◆◆

Gideon, City of Duels, Eighth District

The Eighth District was chaotic even by Gideon's standards. It was home to many legally gray guilds and underground shops.

However, even this area had one place that even the lawless locals wouldn't dare approach.

It was Gideon's Eighth Arena—the base of the Death Period clan.

It was home to not only four of Altar's Superiors, but also the ones who had saved Gideon during Franklin's Game.

Immense power and a debt of gratitude combined to make the local criminals hesitate to do anything to this particular location.

Because of that, any outlaw who wanted to try anything funny here would almost certainly be a foreigner, not a local.

"So this is his house... So this is Ray Starling's base."

Having just split up with Juliet, G looked up at the Eighth Arena with those words.

On a wide thoroughfare, lit only by the streetlights and the moon, G opened her umbrella.

That made a rounded shadow fall next to her feet, which then rippled like the surface of water.

"I...can't do all of Gideon, obviously. That's too much. This city has way too many Resources. I guess it's all the arenas? I can do at least one, though. That's reasonable. And I guess it's gotta be this one."

G was muttering to herself as if confirming something. But then, she looked away from the arena and to the sky diagonally behind her.

"What a shame. I wanted to surprise you, but I guess you found me first."

There was nothing there.

Actually, no—there was an optically camouflaged orb—a floating drone.

"Well, there's a big event happening. I sent eyes all over, so of course I'd notice you."

Following those words, a man wearing a coat like the night sky appeared before G.

In Infinite Dendrogram, this man was known as King of Light, F, but in reality, he was G's blood brother.

"So this really was your destination, eh?" he asked.

"That's my brother—such a detective. I'm amazed you could pinpoint where I was headed like that. Maybe you should try writing a mystery next."

F said nothing, though he seemed to be thinking, It's worrying that she's being completely serious...

"So, do you also know what I'm here for? Did you see right through me?"

"Based on the fact that you're here, I have a guess," F said as he looked up at the Eighth Arena.

Knowing his sister's personality and her Embryo's ult, he could easily imagine what she was planning.

"I don't think your odds are good, though," he continued. "Death Period has four Superiors. They obviously can't fight at full strength in the city, but it will still be a difficult battle. Actually, isn't Figaro a hard counter to you? I don't think there's a Master who is as good at 'clearing' as he is."

"Oh, come now, dear brother of mine. I'm not that careless."

Silence. Really? F thought, but stopped himself from saying it out loud.

"Tomorrow is the final day of The Tournaments, right? That'll keep the fabled Figaro busy until probably the final match, and I hear Shu and Hannya are on security duty. It seems like Lei-Lei doesn't log in much in the first place, so I don't even have to consider her, while the rest will probably watch the last Tournament."

"Mm-hmm. So you'll take care of business while they're all away?"

"Oh, no no no. That won't make for a good video."

"Suppose that's true."

"But I won't fight any Superiors. My only target...is Ray Starling."

I thought as much, F thought, narrowing his eyes.

"While everyone's focused on the Tournament in the Central Arena, I'll summon just Ray Starling. This will be the stage for our battle! The filming location!"

"Mm-hmm... The public part of the final Tournament tomorrow will probably last from noon to about three p.m., JST."

G's words made her brother mutter under his breath and begin to calculate something. However, she ignored that and continued talking as though carried by the momentum of her own words.

"I'll get what I want, and by winning against someone who beat you and some Superiors, I'll show that I'm stronger than all of you. Those are my main goals this time!”

It almost felt like she was picking a fight with her brother.

“I see. I’ll be looking forward to that.”

However, F was unfazed and replied to her words from the heart.

He really did think it would be interesting.

He knew just how powerful G was, but he still didn’t have a good measure of Ray’s strength.

A conflict between the two would be as exciting as the final Tournament—if not more.

But there was one problem...

“By the way, Ginga.”

“Hey! Not even you can say my real name here, okay?!”

“Oh, sorry. Then, G... I have a question for you...”

His little sister neglected to consider something important, so he chose to point that out.

“Yes?”

“Tomorrow is a weekday, right?”

“Yes! It doesn’t matter much to us, though! People who’ve got day jobs and school sure have it rough, huh?” They were a content creator and an author, respectively. As far as professions went, theirs didn’t have much of a set schedule.

That must’ve been why G hadn’t considered this particular issue, but...

“Do you think our friend Ray will be able to log in on a weekday at noon? Based on the times he comes online and the name of his brother’s avatar, he’s almost certainly Japanese.”

“...Oh.”

The standard Japanese work and school hours—an unlikely obstacle to G’s plans that nonetheless had thrown a huge wrench into her plans.

Interlude: Morning of the Final Day

Gideon, City of Duels, Tenth Day of The Tournaments

The ten-day event had now entered its final day.

The nine previous days had seen many contestants, but this final event had considerably more than any of them.

The reason for this was obvious: The UBM in the Orb that was today's reward was Mythical—the strongest tier of conventional UBM—meaning that the MVP reward it would provide would likely be very powerful.

Additionally, the duel champion of Altar, Figaro, was fighting today, attracting many challengers who just wanted to face him in battle, as they were usually barred from doing so by the rankings.

There were many spectators too. Like in the previous days, they would only get to see the fights from the contestants' fifth battles onward, but that didn't stop some from staying up all night near the arena waiting to be let in.

In fact, some probably had their sights set on this final Tournament for days now.

Naturally, the tians working in the arena were overwhelmingly busy with the preparations. Many in the offices were looking over all kinds of documents and calling various people using comms magic. The knowledge that it would all be over after today drove them to work as hard as they could.

"Hm..."

Among them, there was a young man—barely in his late teens—writing something in a separate office for high-ranking individuals.

His name was Aschbarray Gideon. He was the count of this great City of Duels, and he was greatly burdened by all the turmoil his city had a tendency to attract.

Following the events in places like Quartierlatin and Altea, though, he'd begun to think that maybe Gideon didn't have it that bad—which was, quite frankly, delusional.

Like everyone else here, he was hard at work attending to his duties. The Tournaments had pushed both him and his subordinates close to their limits. There was so much to do that he'd even had to get some of the ninjas from his intelligence agency to help out with the event.

He'd barely slept over the past nine days, and even now he was working while taking the occasional swig from a potion.

The reason he was in the arena was that he had to attend the event himself, and even the time it would take to travel there from his mansion felt wasteful.

The UBM's escape on day six hadn't helped at all. The overwhelming amount of duties, combined with the stress that the event had caused, was so bad that he'd even required healing magic.

But this soul-crushing work was about to reach its end.

"That should be that..." he said with a sigh as he looked at a paper tacked onto the wall.

It showed the results of The Tournaments thus far.

Day 1: Poison Fist, Lei-Lei.

Day 2: Armor Giant, Barbaroy Bad Burn.

Day 3: Lost Heart, Rook Holmes.

Day 4: Fallen Knight, Juliet.

Day 5: High Priestess, Tsukuyo Fuso.

Day 6: The Unsheath, Kashimiya.

Day 7: King of Storms, Caydence.

Day 8: Gale Rider, Masked Riser.

Day 9: Sneak Raider, Grimms.

These were the winners of the previous nine days.

Taking a small break, he looked over the list of names and tried to remember what the winners were known for.

Superiors*, duelists, that member of Death Period on day three...and day seven is the third in the kill rankings and leader of the fourth-ranking clan, Welkin Alliance.*

He began with the ones he knew best. Death Period had helped him a great deal, but caused problems as well, so he found himself feeling somewhat conflicted about them.

"I do not recall much about the winner of day nine..."

However, he couldn't remember anything about the person last in the list. The count thought that they might have been a foreign Master who'd joined the kingdom of Altar, but...

"Grimms is a member of the Fairytale Squad—a party operating on the western side of the kingdom. They contributed to the defeat of the Goblin King and resolving the exploding ghost ship incident in Keyora." His secretary—actually a female ninja dressed as one—volunteered more information about this character.

"I see."

It seemed that his intelligence agency had been gathering info about the west too.

With that, he now knew about this "Grimms."

"Looking at the results now, they are both surprising and expected." The list included everything from Superiors to people not on any ranking, showing that these Tournaments weren't just about pure power, but also luck in matchups.

Actually, even getting to participate in one of The Tournaments involved a great deal of luck. People in the duel or kill rankings, Superior Jobs, and those the kingdom gave express right to appear were given priority, but for everyone else it was a lottery.

For the record, all members of Death Period were given priority as well.

That had been Altimia's decision. The clan's core members had fought alongside her during the peace talks, while Kasumi's trio had contributed greatly during the attack on the capital.

They would've been allowed to participate even if they weren't Ray's friends—the Babylonian Battlegroup and K&R had also received this honor.

And, whether by luck or inevitability, these clans had all won Tournaments and the right to challenge their Orbs.

Even though the UBM fought by K&R had flown off into the sky and disappeared.

Additionally, following that incident, they'd temporarily stopped the UBM fights until they made sure something like that couldn't happen again, after which they would allow everyone else to face their UBMs. Because of that, the winners of days seven to nine hadn't challenged their Orbs yet. The winners of days three and five hadn't fought theirs either, so they would also be waiting for now.

"...I just realized that all the winners are Masters who were already from Altar." The count thought he'd see a decent amount of unfamiliar names—Masters from other countries—so this was a somewhat unexpected result.

He was in a position to know that there were quite a lot of Masters who'd changed their allegiance to Altar specifically to participate in The Tournaments and that many of them were considerably powerful.

But looking at the details, these new additions to the kingdom had either vanished in the preliminaries or had been defeated right after the public matches began.

The matchups were random, and the count was certain that there had been no foul play that had put them at a disadvantage. Had they all just lacked the luck or power to make it to the top?

As that thought went through his head, a worker entered with the latest report. "We finished the lottery for today's canceled slots!"

"I see. So the deadline is already past..."

The rules said that if a registered participant didn't show up at the appointed time, they would have their participation revoked and their slot put up as a same-day lottery prize.

That was how Lei-Lei—the winner of day one—had been able to participate.

That wasn't strange at all, but...

"Even the last day had cancellations?" While Masters chose the days they would participate on based on their plans, some would inevitably still be forced to cancel.

They obviously had their reasons. Masters had that strange habit of "disappearing to the other side," so it wasn't strange for them to cancel on account of "sudden real-life issues," as they described them.

However, there had been cancellations every single day. They didn't even amount to three percent of the total participants, but it felt like a lot to the count.

"Hm...?" Curious, he rummaged around for the documents detailing everyone who had registered but not participated. He quickly found them in an office drawer and looked them over.

"This..."

As he did, he noticed something.

Many of the registered nonparticipants were new additions to the kingdom, and among the strongest of them to boot.

They were, in fact, the very powerful foreign or freelance Masters that Altar actually hoped to acquire with this event.

"And here are today's cancellations," said the secretary-ninja as she handed him a new document.

"How dreadful."

Its content was even worse.

He'd thought that today's Mythical reward would attract a great many powerful Masters. However, a few of these had canceled their participation regardless.

Three pre-Superiors and one Superior had not shown up by the deadline.

"The rules of The Tournaments are..." The count mentally reviewed the very thing he'd checked over countless times before.

The Tournaments had four main rules:

1. The participant must be an Altarian Master.

2. The participant will be unable to switch countries for three years after The Tournaments.

3. If the participant commits a crime within Altar's borders that would otherwise be punished with one or more years of penal servitude, they will be rendered unable to use any save points.

4. The participant will receive the right to challenge a UBM depending on where they place in The Tournaments. Additionally, those who also sign the Contract declaring their will to participate in any war Altar may be involved in within the next three years will receive an extra prize in the form of the right to select a rare piece of equipment. The order of selection will also depend on placement in The Tournaments.

Knowing the goal behind The Tournaments, these conditions were fairly ordinary.

But what about those who had registered, but didn't actually participate? Did these rules also apply to them?

The answer to that was no. Nonparticipants weren't subject to the Contract. Any legal obligation instead went to those who won the same-day lottery for their slots.

Maybe it would've been different if they signed the extra prize Contract, but the more powerful they were, the less they cared about it, so none of them had done that.

"...Is this intentional?" Had these Masters just changed their mind postregistration and decided that the conditions for participation weren't acceptable? Maybe some of them had, but it was unlikely to be the motive for every single one.

That made it possible that there was actual intent behind all these cancellations—that it was the result of someone's interference.

"S-Sir! W-We have a problem!" As that thought ran through his mind, a panicked staff member rushed into the office.

The secretary-ninja stood between them, ready to protect the count, but he told her to relax.

"Why the panic? Is another Superior causing trouble?" Franklin, Gerbera (and Shu), Hannya... With all these potentially dangerous Superiors in this city, they had become the first thing that came to the count's mind whenever there was trouble. After that, he thought of the second princess, and after her, he expected UBMs.

In response to the count's somewhat sarcastic question, the worker...

"Yes!"

...gave him a big nod.

"...Huh?"

"Well, actually, it's not really a problem, per se, but..." Hurrying to walk back the words that had just come out of his mouth, the staff member started to sweat a little.

"Tell me everything, from start to finish."

"O-Of course. We just finished the substitute lottery for today's cancellations, and..."

Slightly more composed now, the worker gave a thorough explanation.

Upon hearing everything, the count could only let out a shocked cry of "WHAT?!"

Chapter 2: The Man Who Shouldn’t Be Here

Reality, Kurosaki Household

“Your temperature’s 38.5... You’ve got a cold,” Juri’s mother said, giving her a worried look as she checked her temperature.

Juri Kurosaki coughed. It seemed she’d caught a cold right before the final day of The Tournaments.

There seemed to be a minor, out-of-season epidemic in the area. Juri’s classmate, Licorice Saionji, had also missed school due to this illness, and now she’d caught it too.

“I’ll call the school and tell them you’re not coming in today. Miss Natsume too. You can’t be tutored like this,” her mother said.

“O-Okay.”

“Are you feeling all right? Should I take the day off to look after you?”

“I-I’ll be fine by myself...! You should just head to work and not worry about me!”

“Really...? I’ll make you an ice pillow, at least. And some porridge too—you can warm it up for yourself later.”

With those words, Juri’s mother left the room.

Listening to her footsteps, Juri let out a sigh.

“A cold...” She had felt like her head was strangely heavy last night, but it had gotten so much worse since then.

“And we’re supposed to have pudding at lunch today...” While she could have pudding at home too, Juri felt that there was something special and different about the taste of school lunch pudding, so she was a bit sad she wouldn’t get it.

Regardless...this was now a day off.

Juri looked at the headgear next to her bed.

It made her think of her friend who’d logged in despite having a cold, forcing her servants to drag her out.

"I shouldn't play a game when I'm too sick for school... But..." Juri's desire to enjoy the event was at war with her own conscience.

And ultimately...

◇◆◇

Gideon, City of Duels, Eighth District

After her mother did a couple things for her and headed off to work, Juri caved and put on the headgear. She did feel some guilt, but it did not stop her, and her conscience had lost the battle.

Guess I logged in after all... Juliet thought. Weird... I had a headache, but I'm not feeling anything now.

Just like her sleepiness, all the malaise from her illness seemed to have vanished. Unlike Juri, Juliet was the picture of health.

There were several icons advising her about her condition in real life, but there was a setting to hide them, so they didn't bother her much.

Juliet wasn't aware of it, but that setting was commonly used by the Masters from The Lunar Society. Given their circumstances, playing without it would be quite inconvenient.

What do I do now...? Juliet wondered. She didn't actually have any plans. Since it was the final day, the event was at its peak—but assuming that she'd be at school during the actual Tournament on that day, she hadn't bought a ticket. And knowing the demand, she thought even the scalpers must have been sold out by now.

Maybe I should join Max and take a look at the auction...? she thought, when...

"Huh? Julie?! Why're you logged in at this hour?"

...she heard her friend Chelsea calling out to her with a face full of surprise.

"I caught a cold... No school for me today."

"You know you're bein' no better than Shion, right?" said Chelsea, casually taking a shot at Shion.

"Ngh... But I..."

"Ugh... Are you at least warm back in the real world?"

"I took some medicine, got an ice pillow, and logged in after covering myself up."

“Well, I guess a little bit of Dendro should be fine, then. But log out the moment you get a notif that you’re gettin’ worse, got it?”

“Okay...!”

After that exchange where she sounded like Juliet’s mother or older sister, Chelsea seemed to just move on.

“What about you? Why are you here?” Juliet asked.

“I was thinkin’ of borrowing Ray’s arena again, but it just hit me that he’s in college too.”

“Oh...”

“And? Do you got any plans?”

“I thought I wouldn’t get to see the matches, so I didn’t buy any tickets...”

“Same here.”

“Huh? You too?”

“It’s the final day. There’s gonna be lots of videos on the internet anyway. For now, let’s go check out that auction Max went to. We can rent an arena after that. Ray’s not here to let us use his, but there should be another one free today.”

“Okay.” The two then took off toward the hustle and bustle of the Fourth District.

◇◇◇

Gideon, City of Duels, Fourth District

The Fourth District was always a lively place full of bazaars and shops, but because of The Tournaments and the people they’d attracted from all over, there was even more excitement here than usual.

One major reason for that was the auction being held on the final day.

Many merchants had brought in some of their most impressive, valuable items, and the best of them were being separated into auctions based on their categories. Even the tickets and catalogs for the auctions were quite costly—you had to be very wealthy to even participate.

For Masters who made it to the ranks, though, it wasn’t all that much—and this included the duelist, Great Genocide Max.

“Is this enough?” Waiting on the weapon auction, she worriedly counted the money she had. She could easily cover the participation cost, but she wasn't sure if she had enough for the specific item she wanted to buy.

The weapon she was after was among the greatest in the entire selection—one of Tenchi's Hundred Famed Blades.

Its name was "Sekiun"—the "Cumulus Cloud." Barring MVP rewards that were adjusted to suit the specific player they were awarded to, it was probably the weapon that suited Max's combat style more than any other.

If I'm ever gonna fight Jubei again, I gotta get somethin' better, she thought. In a recent event, Max had indeed fought another battle against Jubei. She'd given her all and ended up getting close enough to Jubei to tear out her eye with her fingers.

Having used that opportunity to score a touch on her rival, Max now wanted something that would enable her to actually defeat her—a technique, a Superior Job, an MVP reward, or an Embryo evolution.

Sekiun was one of the things that had come to mind.

I could scrape up about fifty million lir...but that's not that much, she thought. That was far below the market price for one of the Hundred Famed Blades. While Sekiun was quite difficult to use effectively, it was hard to imagine that absolutely no one would outbid her for such a masterwork. If some wealthy merchant wanted it for collection or speculation, Max would stand no chance, and looking around, she saw many such bidders here.

You could tell by her face that she thought her chances were low, and yet she still waited for Sekiun to come up for auction...and that was when she heard a conversation.

"What about this one? A knight sword that uses mana to increase your STR by 50% for 30 seconds."

"Your STR is not that high, so I feel it would not have much of an effect. It's far more suited to Brother Bear."

"Apparently, weapons like this just break when he wields them..."

"I suppose that is a clear case of 'too much of a good thing.'"

"Oh. This next greatsword looks—"

"No greatswords. No halberds, shields, pinwheels, or dual swords either. I will not tolerate cheating."

"Your attitude is exactly why we can't ever find anything useful, you know... Besides, I doubt we'll even see a pinwheel here."

It was an exchange between two of her acquaintances.

"What're you two doing here?" Max asked.

“Oh. Max. Didn’t see you there.”

The people sitting behind her were none other than Ray and Nemesis. They’d been on quests together and had all participated in the recent event, so they definitely weren’t strangers at this point.

However, Ray had defeated Jubei, succeeding where Max still failed, so her feelings about him were a little conflicted.

“We were just wondering if they had any good weapons for ordinary situations. Everyday use and all that,” said Ray.

“The axe and the bracelet we got recently are far from ordinary,” Nemesis added. “Though, in a way, the latter is seeing plenty of ‘everyday use.’”

“KSHAAA!” A closer look revealed that there was a small demon girl—Gardranda—munching on Ray’s hair.

“That ain’t what I’m askin’,” Max said. “Last we sparred, you said you wouldn’t be on during the final day, ’cause of college.”

“Oh. That? I did go to class today, but the afternoon lectures were all canceled. Looks like there’s an out-of-season cold epidemic where I am.”

That had apparently allowed him to participate in the events of the final day. He was also planning to meet up with Marie and watch the Tournament later.

“And? What about you?” Ray asked. “Chelsea said you’re after something specific.”

“I am,” said Max as she showed him the catalog page for Sekiun.

Ray read it and instantly thought, Yeah. This is perfect for Max.

“I could allow a katana,” said Nemesis. “But this certainly does not suit you.”

“That’s true. Maybe if I used it with the axe...? No, you have to swing that to get any attack power out of it. I feel like the only ones who can make good use of this sword are Figaro, Max, and Jubei.”

“I wouldn’t be surprised,” said Max. As the three talked, Sekiun’s turn on the block came up.

“And here we have one of the Hundred Famed Blades from the far eastern lands—Sekiun! It has a rich history and is a beautiful work of art in its own right! We’re starting at ten million lir!” With those words from the auctioneer, the bidding war began, and the price quickly grew.

Many of the bidders weren’t swordsmen but mere merchants who only wanted it for its reputation as one of the Hundred Famed Blades.

"Ngh...!" The bidding wars leading up to this one had made the auction really competitive, and it didn't take long for the price to go above the fifty million Max could afford.

"Max? Isn't that the one you wanted? Aren't you gonna bet?" Ray asked.

"...It's already past my budget," Max said, clearly disappointed.

"Should I lend you some money, then?" Ray asked.

"Ha... With the way it's goin', I don't think 'some' would be enough..."

"You think five hundred mil wouldn't do it?"

"Huh?!" Max's eyes widened. That was ten times her own budget.

Ray ignored her reaction and handed her an Inventory full of high-value coins. It seemed to contain exactly as much as he'd said.

"You—! Wha—! Hey...!"

"Before coming here, I checked the results for yesterday's Tournament. It turns out Grimms won, and he was the dark horse, so..."

"I cannot believe that you won such a careless and risky bet," said Nemesis. "It is honestly quite ominous that you wagered on the winner every single day except the first one—and that was only because you missed your chance to bet. It makes me feel as though you will soon die once again."

"Don't say that. It's creepy..."

Max felt that this gambler—this faux Paladin might've made more money from The Tournaments than anyone else. As a friend, she thought that she had to warn him that his financial senses were starting to get skewed, but instead, she silently looked at the Inventory with the five hundred million lir.

Borrowing that much would basically guarantee that she would win Sekiun. If she didn't get it here, she would probably never see it again.

And Max had already saved up fifty million in a short time. Even if she went hundreds of millions into debt, she could pay Ray back in a reasonable amount of time.

"One hundred eighty million, going once! Any higher offers?" the auctioneer called as the bidding war reached a new peak of intensity.

"Nnnngh...!" Her conscience and lust for power spent a moment locked in battle—but in the end, she found herself shouting, "Two hundred million!"

After a heated war, the final, winning bid was 350 million...and Great Genocide Max was now three hundred million lir in debt.

◇◇◇

Sorcerer, Ray Starling

In the end, we left the auction without a worthwhile weapon.

There were some good ones that came up, but they were all greatswords and the like—categories Nemesis was strictly opposed to.

We did help Max get the item she wanted, though, so I still felt that going there was worth it. She was now about three hundred million in debt to me, but as a duelist in the rankings, she shouldn't have much trouble paying it back. The ranker world was full of people like Shu, who'd once spent three billion on just a single battle.

Also, Max wanted to test her new katana, so I let her use our arena and gave her the key.

"I feel like that is far too much money to lend a friend," said Nemesis. "Then again, it is certainly a better use of money than gambling. Without anyone to hold you back, you would spend everything you had betting on those duels."

"Huh? I am about to do just that. I'm gonna put all my money on Figaro." Silence. "He's the clear favorite, so you gotta bet a lot to— Guh...!" My words were cut short by Nemesis's fist sinking into my side.

"Gacha, duels, combat... What is your fascination with risky bets?!"

"You got it all wrong! This isn't really gambling—Figaro is one of us! I just believe in him, that's all!"

"Yet you did not bet on Fujinon. What would she think if she heard you say that?"

That was our conversation as we walked toward the Central Arena. There, we'd take a look at the people who made it through the prelims, set our bet, then watch the fights. Marie had reserved our clan a box for the whole ten days, so we didn't have to worry about seats.

On the way there...

"There you go. Wow, you eat a lot."

...we stopped and stared at something that we just couldn't ignore.

The scene wasn't all that special by itself—a man was just giving snacks and pets to a white dog.

The strange thing was the man's appearance. He had black hair, a coat like the night sky, and kept one of his eyes closed.

That look was all too familiar to me. He was...

"...KoL. What are you doing here?"

King of Light, F—the pre-Superior who'd tried to cause an incident in Gideon and ended up fighting me because of it.

"Oh? Ray Starling," he said. "It's been a while... One moment."

He gave the remaining jerky to the dog, patted it, and stood up with a disappointed look, as if he wanted to pet it longer.

The white dog grabbed the jerky in its mouth and ran off. It looked like it was shaking for some reason.

"Oh dear. There it goes," F said.

"No, really, what are you doing here?"

"Oh, it just so happens that I've met that dog before, but I didn't have any snacks for it back then. I'd been carrying some in my Inventory ever since, and I finally got my chance to give it some."

"You like dogs?" I asked.

"I do. You?"

"We got a pug at my parents' place."

"Wonderful. There's something uniquely adorable about pugs. Even the way they snore is charming."

"I get what you mean." Wait, what kind of conversation is this? I thought. I decided to change the subject. "Why are you in this city again, anyway? Don't tell me you're planning something funny for the event."

"Perish the thought," he said. "I'm simply gathering reference material. I don't have to lift a finger to make The Tournaments worth watching, and this day should be especially diverting."

"That so? Well, as long as you don't do anything you shouldn't."

"Mm-hmm." He looked like he had something to say to me.

"What is it?"

"Oh, don't mind me. More importantly, are you sure you have time to waste here? They're about to stop taking bets for the day. If you're betting on the ultimate victor, you can't do it after the first match—and you're planning to wager a lot of money today, aren't you?"

"Ah!" His words made me realize that betting was going to close in less than five minutes.

A part of me wanted to ask how he knew about my bets, but with the first match drawing so close, I had to hurry up.

"You better not cause any trouble!" I admonished him as I left.

"Don't worry. I won't do anything today."

The way he said it made me raise an eyebrow, but we chose to ignore it and rushed to the Central Arena.

◇◆◇

Gideon, City of Duels, Main Street

"Take care," F said with a smile as Ray ran off. "What luck, though. He's actually online."

It wasn't clear what was going through his mind as he said that or who exactly was lucky in this situation.

Regardless, the setup was now complete. Now, with just a bit of guidance, the actors gathered upon the stage would put on a wonderful impromptu performance.

"His attitude toward me is quite interesting. I gathered as much from his relationship with the Superior Killer, but it seems that he doesn't cling to the past."

F had once used Hannya to cause a major incident in Gideon.

When Ray had faced him back then, he'd been overcome by a powerful rage, but it didn't seem that he felt any enmity toward him now.

"He feels anger, but doesn't hold grudges," F said to himself. "What really matters to him is your role in whatever tragedy is unfolding at that moment, right before his eyes—whether you're the one behind it or someone standing against it. That is what truly sways him... I see."

If they were on the side of tragedy, Ray wouldn't even hesitate to fight against those he called friends—like how he'd faced Hugo during Franklin's Game.

And if they stood with him against the tragedy, he could fight even alongside someone like Marie, who'd killed him, or Tsukuyo, who'd kidnapped him. Which meant that...

"If I approach him from that angle next time, I may see a new side of him."

F was in the process of arranging a new plan for Ray—this wellspring of inspiration and reference material.

"Well, today's event comes first. Though... Heh heh. How troubling. I can hardly decide what to watch with my own eyes."

Cracking a joyful smile, F looked at the Central Arena at the end of the main street.

"There are too many things to witness today," he said, thinking about the wonderful surprise that awaited there.

◇◇◇

Gideon, City of Duels; Central Arena; Waiting Room

The four preliminary matches were over, and the audience had gathered to watch the fifth onward.

In the waiting room was Bishmal—the seventh in the duel rankings—meditating in preparation for his next battle.

He wasn't making a sound. The prize for the final day's Tournament was a Mythical MVP reward, and it wasn't hard to imagine that the fights ahead would be intense.

Figaro, the duel champion, was among today's participants too—in fact, that was the reason Bishmal had chosen to participate in this day's events. It was a chance for him to fight Figaro without getting past the third in the rankings, which he couldn't do because his matchup with Tom was extremely disadvantageous.

This particular Tournament allowed him to duel the champion in more than just a sparring match—and in a way, that itself was enough reward for him.

"Riser won his Tournament," Bishmal mused. In the Tournament two days ago, his friend Riser had put up a splendid performance and come out on top.

Some would say that it was only because, with the exception of Tom, all the duelists who were above him in the rankings had participated on the other days. But Riser's day had featured participants who were high up in the kill rankings, as well as the leader of the AETL Union, so it certainly wasn't easy. And yet, Riser overcame them all and emerged victorious.

Bishmal pondered his friend. They had both been stuck for a while now, but Riser seemed to be moving beyond that. He felt that Riser had advanced somehow during the assault on Altea that had happened while Bishmal was still away due to the death penalty.

Bishmal felt that he had to keep up, and so he chose today's Tournament to do that.

That was why he had to keep winning. He thought that if he was ever to advance, he had to purge all distractions and charge single-mindedly forward.

He hadn't even looked at the Tournament bracket today—all that mattered to him was fighting Figaro, and for that, he just needed to keep winning.

That sole thought had already carried him this far.

"Mr. Bishmal. It's time..."

"All right." Bishmal was soon called by the staff, so he stood up and headed toward the stage entrance.

He was so focused that he didn't even notice the worker's strange expression—a face seemingly full of pity.

“Hm...? What?” When he appeared on the stage, Bishmal instantly realized that something was off about the audience’s mood. Some spectators did cheer when he appeared—but most of them just seemed bewildered.

He briefly thought that he’d made some sort of blunder while coming on the stage, but quickly realized that wasn’t it. Most people weren’t looking at him at all, but instead had their eyes fixed on the other entrance to the arena.

His opponent wasn’t on the stage yet, but Bishmal could tell that there was something strange about them.

Am I fighting Figaro already? he thought. If that was the case, he would consider it a stroke of luck and find joy in the fact that he’d gotten the chance to go all out this early in the day.

...No.

But his instincts told him that that wasn’t right.

This was not how the audience would react to a match involving Figaro. If that were the case, the arena would be drowned in joyous cheers for the champion and his opponent.

Bishmal had been matched to someone who attracted more attention than a high-ranking duelist like him, and yet sparked more confusion than excitement.

He didn’t have a clue who it could be.

Bishmal was resolved to fight no matter whom he was up against, but this question had shaken his resolve a bit.

It didn’t take long for him to get an answer, though—a man appeared at the other end of the stage.

Silence ensued.

It was a man with an impressive physique. He was wearing a leather jacket and trousers, but they did nothing to hide the defined muscles beneath.

A pair of sunglasses concealed his eyes but didn’t obscure his strong facial features.

Bishmal had a muscly avatar himself, so this matchup almost felt like a wrestling event. But neither the audience nor Bishmal were in a state of mind to think anything that flippant about the situation.

“What’s going on?” Bishmal now shared the audience’s confusion.

He’d never met the man before him, but he knew his clothes and appearance well.

He'd never seen him in the flesh, but he'd seen numerous videos of him on the internet.

He remembered his name—as well as two of the rules of this Tournament.

The participant must be an Altarian Master. The participant will be unable to switch countries for three years after The Tournaments.

Those rules made it so that this man shouldn't...couldn't have been here.

And yet, he was.

"Th-The first match of the fifth battle, on day ten of The Tournaments..."

With the combatants both on the stage, the announcer swallowed his confusion and tried to do his job.

"In the west, we have the seventh in the duel rankings, the Power Wrestler, Bishmal the Raging Blaze."

First, he named Bishmal.

"In the east..."

And then...

"We have the ex-second in Caldina's duel rankings..."

...he gave Bishmal's opponent's previous title. "King of Termination, Albert Schwartzkaiser."

It was the name of the Superior who could not possibly have belonged to the kingdom of Altar.

Chapter 3: GG

Past, Somewhere on Earth

“Checkmate.”

One of his memories involved a particular board game. He’d played against the “mother” who’d created him, each taking turns moving their pieces on the board.

However, he wasn’t able to win a single match against her.

He couldn’t hold the pieces, so his “mother” moved them for him—and now she once again put his king into checkmate.

“And that’s my fifteenth win in a row. Hrmmm... This is unexpected. In a way, the fact that I’m winning at all makes this a success. It implies very gradual growth—a growth process different from machine learning. It’s probably faster when you consider the exponential curve, though.”

He couldn’t understand what his “mother” was saying here.

“This growth is organic. And that’s why...”

He had no idea what she was thinking at this moment. His thoughts were still focused on the board game.

He was on a losing streak, but he was gradually getting the hang of it, and he wanted to play again so he could put up a better fight—no, he wanted to win.

“Oh? You want a rematch? That’s new. Hmmm... Then I guess I should teach you some common courtesy for situations like these.” Silence. “Before you start a new game, you need to end the last one. And when you do that, both players should praise each other’s efforts. Let me give you an expression for that.”

His “mother” smiled at “him”—the screen that displayed his thoughts—and said...

“‘Good game.’ Remember these words if you ever play with people.”

Thus, the “mother” concluded her little lesson in how to interact with people, hoping that her “son” would someday get a chance to use it.

Gideon, City of Duels, Central Arena

Even though this was only the first public battle of the final Tournament, the venue was already flooded with emotion (mostly confusion) by the presence of King of Termination, Albert Schwartzkaiser—a participant who, by all accounts, could not have been here.

These Tournaments allowed only the kingdom's Masters to enter, and participants couldn't switch to other countries for three Dendro years after its conclusion—which was one year in real time. Additionally, the contract made it so that any participant who committed a crime against Altar that would normally be punished by at least a year of penal servitude would be barred from using any save points anywhere in the world.

That made it more or less impossible that a foreign Superior—a member of Caldina's very own Sefirot, at that—would participate in this Tournament.

Albert was known as perhaps the greatest contributor in the fights against Caldina's many UBMs and other notable monsters, as well as the second in their duel rankings, behind only The Fight. Even if this was all part of some scheme, he felt like too valuable a piece to give away to the kingdom for three whole years.

"What is the meaning of this?" said Altimia, the first princess of Altar, as she looked down at him from her royal box. When did he align himself with the kingdom? she wondered.

The princess was definitely not involved in this. Landowning nobles could also induct Masters into the kingdom, though, so one of them might have done it in secret.

His name was not among those who registered ahead of time, Altimia thought. That means he must have gotten in through today's lottery.

If Albert had been participating from the start, she would have definitely noticed and at least talked to him—or done whatever was needed to prevent this from happening.

However, he had never actually registered. Albert was only participating now because he'd happened to win the lottery for the Tournament slots that had opened up today.

The odds were against him...but we have designed this competition to prevent any foul play.

The winners and losers of the lotteries were decided completely randomly. The staff working on them were even Contract-bound to not intentionally manipulate the results.

That was why this could only be a coincidence—and they could not take away his win.

But if there is anyone actually behind this... It can only be Caldina's president, Altimia thought. The Caldinan head of state was often said to be a witch who could see the future. Most people thought that this just meant she was excellent at thinking ahead, but it might have actually been far more literal than that.

If, for example, she could foresee exactly when joining the lottery would guarantee a win... Well, that would make her a truly terrifying and unprecedented force.

Someone like that was now likely getting involved in the war between Altar and Dryfe and had now sent Albert to this event. If these two things were true, the implications would be staggering.

Caldina has been offering us their cooperation for quite some time, Altimia thought. I have always refused, so did they decide to make certain we were in their debt? By giving us not just temporary reinforcements, but a Superior for us to keep?

Would Caldina benefit from this enough to make the loss of a Superior worth it?

Hm? Wait, when, exactly, was he...?

The moment a new question formed in her mind, Bishmal and Albert's duel began.

◇◆

"Fight!"

A booming voice declared the start of the battle, but neither of the combatants moved an inch. Bishmal had always been the type to charge in without hesitation, and Albert surely had the upper hand in this situation—yet both of them stayed right where they were.

"Ngh!" A bitter expression crossed on Bishmal's face as he realized that he'd frozen up when he ought to have been moving. The impossibility of the situation had perplexed him to the point that he hadn't launched into his golden combo.

Bishmal had disregarded checking the brackets to eliminate distractions, but that had ended up working against him.

Having lost the opportunity to strike immediately, he chose to wait and see what would happen instead of charging in. This unexpected situation had almost made him lose sight of himself.

Albert, on the other hand, was completely silent and showed no emotion in his expression. It was as though his face was carved from metal, betraying not a single one of his thoughts.

Maintaining the silence, Albert began walking toward Bishmal.

At first glance, he looked completely open to attacks, but a closer look revealed that his movements were smooth and stable.

Walking like a skilled martial artist or a precision machine, Albert closed the distance between them and, still eerily silent, extended his right hand.

He was offering a handshake.

Bishmal's eyes widened once again. It looked like a simple display of sportsmanship from a fellow contestant, but it caught him completely by surprise.

The obvious conclusion was that this was a trap, but Bishmal's touch could easily be lethal, so offering to shake his hand was an absurd move even if there was some ulterior motive behind it.

Neither Bishmal nor the audience understood what Albert was doing, but there were four in the venue who did. The Masters who had fought him in the preliminaries knew that he would do this once the match began.

Their responses to the handshake offer had been split between attacks and hesitant acceptance, but the reality was that this was no trap. It was not any kind of offensive maneuver at all.

"...Sure."

After a bit of thought, Bishmal accepted the offer and shook Albert's hand.

Albert's grip was like steel, lacking the fleshiness of a normal human hand, but the handshake ended without anything happening.

Instead of following it up with some attack, Albert simply turned around and headed back to his starting position. He seemed wide open to any attacks, and Bishmal felt like he could win by just launching his ult right now.

However, he'd decided against it.

Partially this was because Bishmal was hesitant to attack someone from behind, but it was also the danger sense he'd honed as a ranking duelist that stopped him.

Bismal had the feeling that if he attacked now, it would be over for him.

Nothing beyond the handshake happened as the two returned to their starting positions.

This was the true beginning of the duel, and Albert assumed a fighting pose...

"Hm...?"

...but seeing it made Bishmal raise an eyebrow.

Based on what he'd heard, Albert's combat style was wide-scale bombardment using heavy weaponry. He possessed immense firepower that he used to defeat countless monsters, and this was common knowledge thanks to an accidental recording of his battle against a UBM.

He was also known to use weapons—MVP rewards included—in duels like this.

However, Albert now stood before him unarmed and empty-handed.

"No weapons?" Bishmal asked. Albert only shook his head in response.

Most would think that he was mocking his opponent, implying that he wouldn't even need weapons to defeat him—but Bishmal noticed that behind his sunglasses, Albert's gaze was fixed on the audience.

Does he think that his attacks could destroy the barrier? Bishmal wondered. With the duels he'd fought in Caldina and Gideon, Albert was certainly familiar with arena battles by now, and all such battles typically worked the same way.

However, Gideon's barrier had recently been broken by a UBM. Albert might have been limiting his use of weapons on account of that.

Putting aside the question of whether that was a valid concern, there were two conclusions to draw from that fact.

First, Albert might just be that confident in his firepower.

And second, he was truly concerned about any possible harm he might cause to the audience, however unlikely that was.

It wasn't just weapons either—Albert hadn't activated any of his Embryo skills either.

He'd deliberately chosen to fight without his biggest strengths.

"I see," Bishmal mused. It was almost insulting, but he wouldn't tell Albert to change his strategy. Albert was free to choose how he wanted to fight, after all.

And so, Bishmal would do the same.

He charged toward Albert. However, he wasn't using Surt's firepower. Just as his opponent wasn't using his weapons, Bishmal faced Albert with nothing but his ability as a Power Wrestler.

He wanted to match Albert's handicap, but that wasn't the only reason...

I just can't bring myself to go all out if my opponent isn't! Bishmal thought. That's why it's better if I just hold myself back too, get on the same page mentally, and fight him from there!

Thus, their duel assumed a form rarely seen in battles between Masters. No weapons, no ranged attacks, no unique powers—just pure hand-to-hand combat.

The audience was surprised to see Bishmal fighting differently than usual, but Albert remained silent and unfazed. He dealt with all of Bishmal's punches and grapples using martial arts techniques that were mechanical in their precision. The eyes behind the sunglasses darted around, seeing all of Bishmal's attacks and blocking them with optimal movements.

The high stats granted by a Superior Job were perfectly complemented by his excellent technique.

"Not bad!" Every time their bodies clashed, Bishmal could feel how high Albert's STR and END truly were. While his friend Riser was a fellow hand-to-hand combatant, his AGI focus made fighting him quite different from this.

This guy's AGI's about the same as mine, but he's got a good eye! Bishmal thought as he used Reveal to check Albert's stats. He's seein' through and punishin' everything I do!

Each and every response to Bishmal's attacks was more or less perfect. Albert's defense in hand-to-hand combat was unmatched, but it seemed to come at a cost to his offensive capabilities. He focused so much on repelling attacks that he neglected to take advantage of openings that even Bishmal himself noticed.

As a result, the tiny amount of damage that did manage to get past

Albert's defenses was starting to chip away at his HP.

Bishmal had the upper hand, which filled the audience with excitement, but Bishmal himself was growing increasingly uneasy.

He's gettin' faster!

Albert's responsiveness to Bishmal's attacks was only improving. It was as though he was learning the way Bishmal moved, allowing him to further optimize the speed and precision of his defense.

If this continued, Albert would eventually be able to see through everything Bishmal did, at which point Albert could go on the offensive and defeat him.

King of Termination was a job that emphasized attack power, and yet Albert was operating like an endurance build.

"In that case—" Bishmal cried, and jumped in front of Albert.

Albert tried to counter this, but the eyes behind his sunglasses widened a bit. His vision was briefly obscured by a burst of flame—and when it subsided, Bishmal was no longer right in front of him.

When the fire was gone, the only thing Albert could see was Bishmal's shirt, now removed.

He looked around to search for the man himself, but...

"Got ya!"

...before Albert could turn his head, Bishmal locked it in place with a choke hold from behind.

Bishmal's equipment was custom-made to match Surt's powers that allowed him to turn him into flame. Even though they were made of cloth, they had built-in skills that allowed them to turn into fire whenever the wearer did.

Bishmal had just used that property of his equipment in combination with Instant Wear to remove the flaming shirt, then leaped backward, leaving the shirt behind. Since it was no longer equipped, the skill that transformed it into flame deactivated, turning it back into cloth.

Bishmal had basically used a double smoke screen of fire and cloth, allowing him to drop into a low stance position and slip behind Albert to grapple him from his blind spot.

"Hngh!" Bishmal grunted as he put all his strength into his grip, and with one strong move, snapped Albert's seemingly unbreakable neck.

Albert's head was now twisted over ninety degrees to the right. This usually conferred the Broken Cervical Vertebra status effect, which didn't kill instantly, but was an injury-based debuff that quickly led to death.

Case in point—Albert's HP was falling at an astonishing rate.

The unusual, gruesome conclusion to the duel filled the arena with not just cheers, but also shrieks of terror.

However, Bishmal didn't even think of letting go of Albert.

His senses told him that this wasn't over yet.

Despite the situation, Albert still wasn't making a sound. His neck still broken, he moved his eyes to glance at Bishmal's right arm before using both hands to grab it. Bishmal still showed no sign of letting go.

Eventually, Albert's HP dropped to critical levels. Like a countdown, it was fast approaching 0. It soon reached the point where he was just 1 HP away from death, but then it stopped...

"α: Dubhe."

...and, at the same time, the name of a skill resounded throughout the arena.

The voice was clear, as if the damage to Albert's throat were absolutely nothing. This was the first time he'd said a word since the duel began, and doing so caused light to engulf his body.

A moment later, two things occurred.

Bishmal's eyes widened as he realized he could no longer feel Albert's neck under his arm—or, to be more precise, it wasn't that he couldn't feel it at all. It was more like he was suddenly trying to choke out a rubber tube.

And immediately after that...

"Gah...!"

...Bishmal's right arm was pulverized. The bones in his arm shattered, shredding the muscle and flesh around them—his arm was now little more than a bag of skin filled with blood.

Never losing his stone-faced expression, Albert tore off Bishmal's weakened arm and escaped the choke hold.

It seemed as though something invisible was bursting within both of his hands.

"Heh! Used an Embryo skill, huh?!" Bishmal didn't understand exactly what had happened just now, but by using Reveal, he could discern part of it: Albert's HP had jumped from 1 all the way to full.

"RRRAAAGH!" Then I'll just bring it down again! Bishmal thought as he positioned his now-maimed body for a fierce kick. Just as before, Albert assumed a defensive posture and held out his left arm to block the attack.

However, something was different now. Albert didn't even flinch, as though the kick didn't cause any damage whatsoever.

And, indeed, his HP total didn't change at all.

Bishmal's eyes widened again. He'd felt it the instant they collided—when his kick landed, the force of the impact was completely dispersed.

It was nothing like it had been before—Bishmal now felt almost like he was punching a slime.

By contrast, Albert's counterattacks now seemed to strike at Bishmal's very core.

The moment Albert's right hand touched his leg, a bone-shattering shock burst through him.

"Ghhh...!" Bishmal quickly jumped back to make some distance between them. Though not nearly as bad as the damage to his right arm, the damage from that one touch had clearly been devastating to his right leg.

That single exchange was all Bishmal needed to know that he now had no chance of beating Albert in straight hand-to-hand combat. If he wanted to win, he would be forced to fight the way he always did—using his Embryo, Surt.

The audience was shouting for him to do the same.

Bishmal and Albert both fell silent, and there was a brief moment where neither of them moved. Albert seized the chance to take out a revolver-type grenade launcher and fire it toward Bishmal's feet.

Upon hitting the stage, the grenade created a red explosion highly reminiscent of the Crimson Sphere ability.

As Bishmal evaded the blast, he instantly understood what Albert was trying to convey: "I used my weapon, so stop holding back. Use yours too."

"Then I'll do just that! Burstflame Rise—Surt!" The next moment, Bishmal was engulfed in fire, and became the flame itself.

Appearing as something like a hybrid of man and elemental, he rushed toward Albert using his specialty—his charge.

Albert was quick to respond and fired another grenade at him, but the explosion meant nothing to a body made of fire. Bishmal closed the distance without issue, and Albert immediately dropped the grenade launcher in favor of using his right hand to deliver the same attack that had shattered Bishmal's arm.

But since Bishmal was now essentially an elemental, the touch-based shock waves coming off Albert's hands did nothing to him.

What's more, mere contact with Bishmal's body made Albert's arm melted instantaneously.

Unfazed, Albert tried to draw another weapon, but Bishmal unleashed a high kick before he could do so. The leg of pure flame melted Albert's left arm entirely from the shoulder down, the damage even reaching all the way to where his heart ought to be.

The severed arm fell to the ground, showing a glimpse of the steel inside.

"OOOAAAARRRGHHHHHH!" Albert's HP fell to critical levels once again, but Bishmal did not relent, throwing even stronger attacks aimed at Albert's head. Even if Albert had a skill that healed and strengthened him, Bishmal thought—no, felt—that he could counter it by just attacking so fast and often that Albert would have no time to activate the skill in the first place.

Faster than any forethought, acting first and thinking later, charging nowhere but straight ahead—at this critical moment, Bishmal clearly manifested his true self and worth.

He thoroughly pulverized, melted, and burned Albert's head, making it impossible for him to announce any skills.

Albert's HP soon dropped to 1 again...

"β: Melak."

...and it stopped there once again as an emotionless voice echoed through the empty space.

"Aaagh!" Hearing the name of a skill didn't stop Bishmal's onslaught.

However, after just a handful of attacks, he noticed a change.

Having fully rebuilt his head and arms a second time, Albert was no longer affected by Bishmal's flames. Even as his clothes caught fire, his skin was not even singed.

When Albert retaliated with a knife hand strike, Bishmal's body, despite being made of flame, began to come apart.

The man who had been evaporating at Bishmal's mere touch just moments earlier was now obliterating him instead.

"...I see how it works now." This was enough for Bishmal to understand the power of Albert's Embryo. It restored all his HP, then granted him near perfect resistance to his opponent's means of attack as well as an offensive ability that was highly effective against them. It combined three incredibly powerful effects into a single skill.

Since he didn't use it right away, I guess it only works when he's nearly dead, Bishmal thought. The price for the skill's power must have been its harsh use condition—it could only be used at 1 HP.

However, there was yet another secret behind Albert's strategy.

Both times, his HP stopped goin' down right before it hit 0. Guess he must have some kinda "guts" effect active. There was a generic skill like that... What was its name again?

The skill Bishmal couldn't remember was called "Last Stand." It came from Rear Soldier, a low-rank job from the soldier grouping, and it enabled those struck by a fatal blow to survive with just 1 HP for five seconds. It did not negate any damage, and though similar effects were often extremely good in traditional RPGs, in Infinite Dendrogram HP was usually tied to the physical state of one's body, so it was far less useful. The five extra seconds meant little when someone was on the verge of death and could barely move, and once the time was up, any injury-based status effects they had would instantly kill them.

The primary difference between this skill and Death Soldier's Last Command was that it could be treated by healing magic rather than resurrection magic, but the five seconds it granted were rarely enough for healers to make it in time. Considering its much longer duration, Last Command typically ended up being the more useful skill.

Since it kept one's HP above 0, Last Stand could technically be used in duels—but unless you had a Superior Job and wanted to use your final ult to turn a guaranteed loss into a tie, it was fairly meaningless. Duelists fought to win, so none of them would waste a job slot for the possibility of a tie.

But it's different for this guy, Bishmal thought. If he can survive a few seconds longer—just long enough to use that skill he's got—he comes back stronger and with full HP.

Bishmal guessed how Albert's combo worked, thought about the power of this synergy...and shuddered.

I dunno what to say. That's a Superior for ya, I guess. Bishmal now had a grasp of Albert's combat style. If pushed to the verge of death, he endured any and all attacks coming his way. Then, he used his Embryo skill to fully heal himself, become resistant to the attack that brought him to 1 HP, and even gained offensive abilities that would help him defeat his attacker.

This skill likely wasn't unlimited, though.

It didn't look like Albert's MP or SP was going down by much, so Bishmal assumed it had a limited amount of uses instead. If he used them all up, he would no longer be able to come back from the verge of death.

However, this meant that you needed enough different methods of attack to force Albert to expend every use. If you didn't, he was simply undefeatable.

Bishmal himself didn't have anything besides hand-to-hand combat and fire, so now that Albert was resistant to both, there was no way he could win.

In fact, most duelists were hyper focused on a single thing, so even among the rankers there were few who could match him. Even Kashimiya had no chance, as he didn't have anything besides his sword-drawing arts.

"RAAAGGGHHHH!" Still, Bishmal didn't stop attacking.

There was no battle he would ever back away from. Even if he was up against an impassable wall, he would keep charging forward.

Whether the wall would break or not was beside the point—he would advance until it did.

That was the kind of man he was.

Albert, on the other hand, was still stone-faced and silent.

What was going through his mind as he watched this opponent relentlessly throwing out attacks that no longer worked? He certainly didn't underestimate him. Just as he had before he'd gained his resistances, Albert watched Bishmal's strikes, defended against them with optimal moves, and threw some counterattacks in between.

As this repeated, Bishmal was eventually brought to his limit. His ult had expired, and he'd sustained too much damage.

"...Ha." Looking solely at the result, one could say that Bishmal just went straight at Albert and practically handed him the win. But strange as it might seem, he had no regrets—for at least after the battle began, he kept on charging ahead, showing no fear of the Superior.

Bishmal fought like himself, and that was enough for him.

The match soon reached its end...

“Good game.”

...and, after saying his first words that weren’t skill declarations, Albert decapitated Bishmal.

Thus, the Raging Blaze was extinguished, and Albert advanced to the quarterfinals.

Chapter 4: Lunchtime

Gideon, City of Duels, Fourth District

"It takes a certain type to borrow that much, and a hell of a person to lend it out too..."

"Heavy are the chains forged in gold. (Being in debt seems pretty scary.)"

"Ngh..."

After getting saddled with enormous debt to acquire Sekiun, Max rushed to the Eighth Arena to test it—but on the way, she bumped into Chelsea and Juliet.

The looks she got when she told them about how much she owed Ray weren't exactly heartening.

"Seriously, Maxie?" Chelsea said. "That much debt? At your age?"

"I know, I know..." Being called "Maxie" used to make her mad, but recently she'd been learning to just accept it. Even if she hadn't been, though, she wasn't in a state to argue right now.

"Well, thanks to his big bro, Ray's sense for money needs to be seriously recalibrated," said Chelsea. Shu was an even bigger spender than Ray, and Ray earned a lot of money here, so he rarely hesitated to open his wallet. Someone who did wouldn't be spending a hundred thousand lir on gacha nearly every day. "Three hundred mil lir, though..."

That was a lot of money. If someone in real life got that deep in debt—the equivalent of three billion yen—it would be the shock of a lifetime.

However, lir was an in-game currency, and there was the anti-RMT law that functionally prevented any money flow between reality and Dendro, keeping the lir wholly separate.

And as a capable Master who'd made it into the rankings, Max could feasibly save that up in a short amount of time. Because of that, while she wasn't thinking too hard about how she'd get the money to pay off this debt, she wasn't overly concerned about it.

Well... Chelsea thought. As long as they're not as unlucky as Leon—well, Eldridge—anyone who makes it close to the top probably won't have many money problems... Thinking of her childhood friend and his recent financial issues, Chelsea gave Max a sympathetic look.

"If you want hundreds of millions, your best bet is probably goin' to the deeper levels of the Tomb Labyrinth and prayin' for good drops," Max said. "It ain't easy to make full use of Ipetam's skills there, but this katana could change that."

"An expedition such as dreams are built upon... (Going there together could be a lot of fun!)"

"Well, then let's do that whenever our schedules line up!" And with that Chelsea concluded their future moneymaking plans and went on to talk about what they would do today.

Ultimately, they decided that they'd have a meal, then go sparring together.

"What should we get?" asked Chelsea.

"Why not just grab somethin' from a random stall?"

"Well, then let's split up, buy whatever we want, and bring it all to one place. I think the park in the Fifth District sounds good—the one with the tables and benches."

"I acquiesce. (Okay.)"

"Sounds good."

And so, having temporarily parted from her friends, Juliet began looking around for food stalls, wondering what to buy.

I guess it's better if we don't all get the same things... she thought. Chelsea insisted that it'd be more interesting if they didn't plan what each of them would get, and while Juliet agreed, she wanted to avoid buying the same things.

That meant she had to go for something she thought the others wouldn't, but nothing came to mind.

A big reason for that was the fact that Chelsea always got so much food that there was almost inevitably going to be some overlap no matter what Juliet got.

"I stand before a feast of the unknown... (What should I buy...?)" Unable to find anything that caught her eye, Juliet found herself at a loss. Just then...

"Not here. Not there. I can't find it anywhere."

...she heard a familiar voice saying something similar to herself.

"G?"

"Oh? Julie! I haven't seen you since last night!"

When Juliet called out to her, G ran over with a spring in her step. It was daytime, so she was using her umbrella, but other than that, she looked the same as she had yesterday.

"What ails thee? (What's wrong?)"

"I heard about King of Destruction's popcorn. It's like this new big thing here in Gideon, so I've been looking for it all over. Just seeing a Superior selling popcorn could totally go viral! It'll do some big numbers no matter what!"

"Ohh..." Juliet was aware of the popcorn too. It was a snack being sold by none other than King of Destruction, Shu Starling—her friend's older brother.

However...

"That very sovereign of devastation now feels the burden of these festivities weighing upon his shoulders. (He's really busy during The Tournaments...)"

"Ohh. Right. He's doing security at the arena. What a shame..." said G, dropping her shoulders and letting out a sigh.

"...Mine own coffers, though, contain what you desire. (I have some stocked up. Do you want it?)" said Juliet, unable to watch G pout like this.

"Seriously?! You're sure?! That's great! That's really great!" G took Juliet's hand and hopped up and down in glee.

It made Juliet glad she'd offered, but...

Huh? Since she was surrounded by so many passersby, Juliet realized she'd defaulted to using her affected manner of speech—"Julietese," as some called it.

However, G didn't seem to be bothered by that. She'd carried on a conversation like she'd understood every word. She seemed basically like Ray in this regard, and Juliet found it strange.

"Weren't you also looking for something?" G asked, cutting short Juliet's thought and bringing her back to the conversation.

"The path of a gourmand is endless, and I, too, tread upon its many twists and turns. (I'm also looking for a food stall...)" Juliet took the opportunity to tell G what she was doing, figuring that G might've seen something while walking around and looking for the popcorn.

"You too? We're in the same boat! What stall are you looking for?"

"Culinary delights few have laid eyes upon. (Anything rare and interesting, basically.)" Juliet asked if she'd seen any unusual foods that were less likely to overlap with Chelsea's haul.

"Well... How about a drink that goes through the colors of the rainbow as you drink it? They say the taste changes too."

That was enough to make Juliet's eyes widen and sparkle.

"Then I must make haste. Ah, and if thou art willing, a banquet with my companions and thy promised treasure awaiteth thee. (I think I'll go get it right away. Oh, I'm eating with my friends. Do you wanna join? I gotta give you that popcorn too.)"

"Sure! Thanks a bunch! Don't mind if I do!"

And so, the two went to buy the rainbow drink, along with some other food, and then headed to the park where their group was set to meet.

"Oh. You're the first one here... Wait, who's this with you?"

When the pair arrived at the park, they found Max sitting at one of the tables. Max immediately gave G a suspicious look.

"A companion brought to my side by the whim of fate, known to all as G. (She's G, a friend I happened to run into.)"

"I'm G—Julie's friend, G! I think we're going to get along great!"

"Uh... I'm Max. A pleasure."

So she's the type who's not at all bothered by how Juliet talks, just like Ray, Max thought. Then again, she's kinda got her own weird way of talking.

She then noticed that G was looking right at her.

"What?"

"Your clothes are really nice. Looks great on you!"

"My design, then, has borne fruit... (I know, right?! I picked them out for her!)" Max had once challenged Juliet to a duel, lost, and been compelled to be her dress-up doll as punishment. These were the clothes Juliet had put her in, and for no particular reason, Max had just kept wearing them ever since.

"Julie! You really do have great taste in fashion! Can I take some photos of you?" G asked Max.

"Sure, I guess," Max replied, prompting G to clap in glee and pull out a magic camera. Yeah, I can see why they're friends, Max thought. She's even got this whole devil thing goin' with her horns and tail.

And thanks to her parents, Max was more than used to having her picture taken.

"So you understand all that Juliet's sayin', huh?" Max asked as she was being photographed. It was the same question Juliet had had on her mind earlier.

"I guess I'm just used to it. My brother's novels are also full of those weird turns of phrase."

"That so?" Max wondered if it was something anyone could actually get used to, but then she realized that she herself also had a better grasp of Julietese than she did when they first met.

"Thanks! I got some really good ones! Have some copies!"

"Sure, whatever... Wait, these are really good. You a pro?"

"She is one whose calling is to spread spectacle across the world. (G is a content creator.)"

"Really? That sure is somethin'."

Right as G finished taking Max's photos, Chelsea finally joined them.

"Sorry for the wait, you two! Wait, three?"

"A companion brought to my side by the whim of fate, known to all as G."

"I'm G—Julie's friend, G! I think we're going to get along great!"

"Those are the exact same lines you used with me," Max said.

"Oh? G, huh? As far as Julie's friends go, you're pretty...normal."

"Are you even listenin' to yourself...?" Max felt that was a weird thing for Juliet's best friend to say—but at the same time, another question popped into her head.

Is she really that normal? The horns, tail, and the crown felt like features that made her stand out even more than Juliet. Well, maybe it's normal by Dendro standards. There's people here who wear animal costumes all the time.

As Max rationalized Chelsea's statement, Chelsea and G shook hands, introducing themselves.

With everyone gathered, they showed each other the food they'd brought. Thankfully, Juliet was the only one who'd gotten the rainbow drink.

"It's so interesting! Tastes good too! This would get so many views!" G was already acting like a part of the group, enjoying the mountain of food Chelsea had brought while giving her thoughts on Juliet's rainbow drink.

"Views, huh...? If you're a content creator, what kind of content do you make, anyway? Food reviews?" Max asked.

"I do a variety of things. Singing streams, game commentary, events I set up with my Dendro clan, et cetera..."

"That so?"

"But recently, basically everyone in my clan has just been mining a mountain. It's not much of a show."

"Sounds like it'd make good background noise for people to listen to while they work or something..."

"That's not what I'm going for. I make content because I want people to look at me. That's why I came to Gideon. There's this whole festival going on, and I met Julie here," G said before taking a sip of her drink, looking really happy. Hearing her words made Juliet look slightly bashful.

But there was one here who was just watching the exchange in silence—Chelsea noticed something and couldn't help but ask.

"Hey, G, I have a li'l question..."

"What is it? What's wrong?"

"Why are you usin' an umbrella?" G had been carrying an umbrella ever since she'd met up with Juliet today. Even after she sat down and began eating, she was still resting the open umbrella against her shoulder, hiding the top half of her body from sunlight. However, the sun wasn't even that bright today, which made this a little unusual.

"Oh! My face is weak against ultraviolet rays, so I use it whenever it's daytime. UV is the enemy."

"You worry that much about an avatar's skin? Is it like a restriction or somethin'?" There were jobs that had certain restrictions based on the in-game clock—those in the vampire grouping, for example, which suffered major stat reductions during the day. Embryos could have similar restrictions too. Chelsea assumed that there was something like that making G use an umbrella.

"That's basically what it is. You got it right!" G nodded, not denying the assumption whatsoever. "I get that it takes a lot of space, so I'm sorry about that."

“Yeah. Chelsea bought so much food, but it all fits on it no problem.”

“Quell thy fears. (Don’t worry about it.)”

“Heh heh heh. Okay. Thanks.”

The four then continued to have a fun lunchtime.

“Thanks for the lunch. It was really tasty! Seriously delicious. Especially KoD’s popcorn...”

Having finished eating, G basked in the postlunch warmth, clearly ecstatic. As promised, Juliet had given her some of the famous popcorn, and she seemed to be very satisfied with it.

“I know, right? It’s crazy good!” said Chelsea.

“Though I hear that the bear’s actually holdin’ back when he makes it,” said Max. “He said that if he actually cooked for real, it’d shock your taste buds so much it’d kill ya. It sounds like a joke, but...yeah.”

“And thus thou shalt be delivered unto the pearly gates... (So tasty it literally takes you to heaven...)”

The three of them agreed with G. Shu’s cooking skills were simply that absurd.

“That sounds interesting! I’d love to try that! It might be difficult for me, though...” G muttered.

“That bear’s... Well, that guy’s elusive even now that his identity’s out in the open. At least he has a clan and a base now, so it’s a little easier to get a hold of him.”

“And he said he’s been busy with security and farming materials and whatever.”

Chelsea and Max expressed their agreement with G’s sentiment.

“Hm...?” However, Juliet felt as if G’s words held some different meaning. She couldn’t find a way to express how, but she found something off about them.

“Anyway, we’ve eaten, so let’s go sparring! I gotta test my katana too!” said Max, cutting off Juliet’s thoughts before she could put them into words.

“Sparring?” G asked.

“Yeah. That’s what the three of us planned to do after lunch. Wanna join us? It’ll be a chance to fight against three ranking duelists!”

Chelsea’s words made G tilt her head.

“Ranking duelists? You’re gonna meet some?”

“Meet some? You’re lookin’ at ’em,” said Max.

“Ah hah hah,” Chelsea chuckled. “So Julie didn’t tell ya, huh? The three of us are in Altar’s duel rankings. Julie’s in fourth place, I’m in eighth, and Maxie’s in twenty-fourth.”

“...I’ll be near the top eventually,” Max added, seemingly bothered by her comparatively low rank. She’d once tried to beat Juliet and skip ahead, but she lost. Ever since then she’d been going up the ranks one by one.

“So duelists aren’t just naked wrestlers, their victims, and card gamers...” said G.

“The hell do you mean?!” Max shouted.

“Ohhh. You’re from Legendaria, huh? Their top-rankers are known to be pretty...colorful,” said Chelsea.

“Sounds to me like they give us a bad name!”

“Hey, it’s just like how Tenchi’s duelists are known to be battle junkies. It’s a national thing.”

“Ngh... But my old country’s battle addiction peaks with Jubei at fourth. The top three duelists are way more balanced as people... Definitely not as fighters, though.”

It seemed that the disposition of duelists varied greatly depending on where they were from.

“Thus, we now must make haste to our ephemeral conflict. Whither shalt thou go? (So yeah, we’re gonna go spar now. What about you, G?)”

“I have something to do when it gets dark, so it depends on the location. Where are you going?”

“The arena in the Eighth District. A friend lets us use it.”

“The Eighth Arena?” G put her hand to her mouth as if in thought and shifted her gaze. “...Okay. That place works for me. I’ll come with you! I can watch,” she eventually said with a nod.

“Thou art most graciously welcome indeed. (Sure, go ahead.)” said Juliet with a smile on her face.

“Hm? Wait, G, didn’t ya come here for the final Tournament?” Max asked. “The public matches must’ve started by now. Shouldn’t you go watch ’em instead?” She felt that if any outsiders came to Gideon at this point in time, they would likely be here for that, so it struck Max as odd that G didn’t seem to care about it whatsoever.

“I’m here for a different reason. Well, I came to meet my brother too, so...two reasons, actually.”

“Thou art bound to another by the ties of blood? (Oh? You have a brother?)”

“Yeah. He’s with Altar, so...yeah. But he’s now watching the final Tournament, so here I am.”

Is that why she said she had something to do when it gets dark? Juliet thought. The final match of The Tournaments would start sometime late evening or after sundown. If G’s brother was in the audience, he wouldn’t be free until after that.

“I see,” said Chelsea. “But if you’re in Gideon, you can’t leave without seein’ some duels. At least watch us spar. If anything, things could get more intense than those Tournaments.”

“Okay! I’ll do just that, then! I’ll enjoy myself, then!” said G, filled with unfiltered glee.

Her expression was very natural, clearly showing that she really was excited about what would happen next.

Thus, the four of them made their way to the Eighth Arena.

◇◆

Upon arriving, the four entered the Eighth Arena through the entrance once used by the spectators. They opened the glass door and went in as if it were nothing, which made G wonder.

“No keys? What’s up with the security here? Why are they so careless?” she asked. In response, Max showed her the gold plate given to her by Ray.

“I borrowed a magic key,” she said. “Entering without it activates the barrier, and breakin’ through it sounds the alarm, so the security here is just fine.”

Though this Eighth Arena was currently being rented by a clan, the clan’s main members each had a key, and the leader—Ray—had multiple spares. One of those spares had been given to Max.

“I see. And just one is enough to let in everyone with you?”

“Yeah. You can also use it to change the stage’s settings.”

They continued walking as the two talked. Juliet and Chelsea were taking the lead, since they’d already used the arena yesterday. Passing what used to be a corridor meant for duelists, they arrived at the stage.

Just like last time, the members of Death Period were not present, so there was no one to greet them.

"I'll set things up, then. You mind if I use the aquatic fight setting again?" Chelsea asked as she began to manipulate the arena's controls.

"I don't mind," said Juliet. "What about you, Maxie?"

"It doesn't matter to me either way. I'm just here to test my katana," said Max as she took out Sekiun—the blade she'd won at the auction.

"Aquatic fight? You can fill this whole place with water?"

"Yeah. There's a setting for it. I'm gonna fill it up like this today, though."

Chelsea set the stage by taking out Poseidon and using its water summoning powers. It was a blatant brute-force approach—but it reduced the water bill, so nobody else was going to say anything about it.

"Oh? So it doesn't spill and just keeps filling up!" said G.

"Legendaria doesn't have aquatic arena fights?" Juliet asked.

"No. I don't remember ever seeing one, anyway. They just fight like normal. On the stage."

"Legendaria's tribes can gain serious advantages based on their environment. If they don't fight in the most generic setting, it'd just be unfair."

Chelsea's explanation made sense to everyone present.

"By the way, Julie, you're talking different now. Why?" G asked.

"Um..."

"Julie's a pretty shy girl, so she talks different whenever there's lots of people around."

"I see. That's kinda cute."

"Is it?" Max asked.

"Nnngh..." Juliet's cheeks flushed a bashful red.

"Speaking of, the way you talk is different too, G. Like how you often say the same thing twice..."

"Oh. This is intentional. It's on purpose."

"Intentional?"

"I say the same thing in multiple ways so that my words are understood correctly and the nuance isn't lost."

"So it's a 'so important you say it twice' kinda deal?"

"More or less. That's about right," G said as she nodded with a smile. "I want my words to get across properly. If you say something wrong, you can attract flames and drama."

"That sounds like a peek into the dark side of being a content creator..."

"Actually, wouldn't talkin' more increase the risk of sayin' the wrong thing?" Max asked.

"That is one way to see it. This is another. So yeah!"

"I'm dooone!" said Chelsea, putting an end to their exchange.

The stage within the barrier was completely underwater by now, and there were a number of Chelsea's boats floating about, acting as platforms to stand on.

"All right! I'll show ya how much stronger I've gotten! Ipetam! Let's go!"

"Grrraaah!"

Following Max's call, her Embryo emerged from her left hand. It was Ipetam—a bearlike Sentinel with swords growing out of its back.

"Ah ha haaa! Well, someone's motivated. But I'm not letting ya catch up with me that easily!" said Chelsea, looking more than ready to face Max.

"You two go first, then," said Juliet. "G and I will spectate."

Chelsea and Max walked into the barrier, while Juliet and G went to the audience seating. It was a good bit higher than the stage, but Juliet was able to fly up, while G managed to clear the height with a jump. They then took a seat and watched Chelsea and Max's aquatic battle.

"I can't say I've seen many fights on the water, so this is pretty interesting," said G. "I am familiar with underwater fights, though."

"Really? Oh, but I guess even Altar doesn't have many places that use boats. You have to go to Keyora for that." Granvaloa was perhaps the only country where fights above the water were commonplace.

"You Altaran duelists are something else, though," said G. "They're fighting for real, and it's enjoyable to watch."

Her excited face as she watched the duel on the stage was proof that these words came from the heart. Chelsea and Max were both non-SJ max-level Masters, and the clash of their combat expertise was a sight to behold.

"Is it different in Legendaria?" Juliet asked.

"A lot of duels there are about forcing your own rules onto the other person. Skydrag'in actually turns it into an entirely different game. Well, not like I'm in a position to talk."

“What’s your combat style, anyway? You probably have some high stats, don’t you?”

“What makes you say that?”

“That jump you did. Also, your movements are very smooth, so I figured you fight a lot.”

Juliet’s combat sense was very high even by duelist standards, so she’d noticed many things while observing G since they met yesterday.

“Yeah. I’m actually very, very strong, if I do say so myself.” Showing no humility, G answered as if this were an absolute truth. “My Embryo is in the Castle family, though, so it’s not well suited for duels. I also fight using monsters that are above my capacity.”

“I see...” Duel rules forbid the use of tamed monsters that didn’t fit within the minion capacity and had to use party slots. And excluding exceptions like Lang’s Halley, Castles were a rare sight in duels.

With that, Juliet understood that G was indeed powerful, but just not suited for arena fights.

“Oh, sorry. I shouldn’t have asked you to talk about your abilities...”

“It’s fine! It’s completely fine! I revealed most of my powers in my videos. Though, this tells me that you haven’t watched them yet.”

“Ngh. Sorry...”

“Ah ha ha. You only found out about me yesterday. I get it, I get it,” G chuckled as she patted Juliet’s head.

That gesture made Juliet feel like, although their avatars were about the same age, G was probably older than her.

“By the way, about you borrowing this place...”

“Huh? Yeah...”

“Are the three of you on good terms with the owner... Ray Starling?” Though she found the change of subject somewhat strange, Juliet nodded in response.

“Yeah, we’re...friends. Yeah, friends.”

“I see. So that’s how it is.”

G put her hand over her mouth and shifted her gaze, just like she had at the park. It must’ve been a habit of hers whenever she was lost in thought.

“I wonder if I’ll get to meet him today.”

“...Huh?”

“Oh. Uh... I’m intruding in his place like this, and I’m just wondering if it’s okay to do that without even introducing myself.”

Juliet felt something slightly off about this, but ultimately brushed it off.

“Ray... He’s probably watching The Tournaments right now. I think he’ll come back here once that’s done...”

“I see. In that case...”

Whatever she said after that was too quiet for Juliet to hear. However, G’s eyes were shining with a light different than any before.

“Oh.” Then, as if noticing something, G looked up at the sky and, for some reason, began waving.

However, Juliet didn’t see anything there.

“Umm, what are you doing?”

“Mmm, nothing much. Just wishing upon a star.”

“Huh?” It was still daytime and stars were nowhere in sight, so Juliet found that very odd.

“Things are gonna get so fun soon. I’m so excited.”

“I see...” Juliet was happy that her friend was having a good time.

But at the same time, she felt that there was something strange about all this.

G’s behavior just now strongly reminded her of King of Asuras, Jubei Kaga—the powerful foe they’d faced in the recent event.

Chapter 5: The Night's Arrival

Sorcerer, Ray Starling

I was in the box that Marie had reserved for us, watching the matches of the final day.

There was enough space here for everyone in the clan, but the only one with me here at the moment was Marie. Figaro was one of the contestants. Shu and Hannya were on security duty. B3 was still in college—her classes were keeping her from leaving like I did. Rook was leveling to prepare for when he'd challenge his UBM. Kasumi's trio were simply in school. Nemesis was meditating again.

Because of all that, Marie and I were the only Death Period members watching The Tournaments.

"So that's a Caldinan Superior... Man, he's strong." King of Termination's Embryo had a really powerful skill.

He'd been matched first with Bishmal, who definitely wasn't a pushover. He was specialized in hand-to-hand combat empowered by fire, and the destructive force it delivered had kept him high in the duel rankings for a quite a while at this point.

However, it was precisely because he was so specialized that he was a terrible matchup against King of Termination.

The same could be said about the bout that followed. Even though these Masters excelled at what they did, there was simply nothing they could do.

"It heals him, gives him resistance and a new means of attack..."

It could be roughly categorized as a counter-type Embryo. Considering that its effects relied on the opponent's damage, you could even say that it had some similarities to Nemesis.

"What do you think?" I asked Marie.

"Weeell... Based on the stats, either the skill can only be used near death, or it gets stronger the closer he is to dying. Regardless, it's probably combo'd with Rear Soldier."

I nodded. Rear Soldier's Last Stand was a skill that let you survive with 1 HP for five seconds even if you took fatal damage or had damaging debuffs on you.

I had learned about it after taking Death Soldier and had even considered using it myself. However, it was a choice between five seconds alive and being active for ten times that long after death, so I'd picked the latter.

Picking both was also an option, but I'd prioritized jobs with other useful skills rather than the extra five seconds of action.

Another notable thing about Last Stand was that it had a five second cooldown. Last Command could only be used again after a resurrection—a rather harsh condition—while Last Stand would be ready again after just some healing.

But whatever flaws he had, defeating KoT after he was fully healed and granted resistances was a huge challenge.

"I think that healing power must have a limited number of uses," said Marie. "Do you have a guess how many?"

"Seven. Eight at most."

"Well, that was a quick answer."

"The skill names are a dead giveaway," I responded. The words KoT said right before healing were "Dubhe" and "Merak." Those were the α and β stars in the Big Dipper constellation—sometimes called the Septentrion.

If the skill names and the Embryo as a whole were really based on that, he could use the skill a total of seven times.

Even if you included that one star that was often mentioned alongside the seven, eight would be the absolute limit.

"It's the strict use condition and use limit that allows the skill to be as powerful as it is," I said. "Though, it looks like the resistances he gets cover a pretty wide range. Probably that's the most important factor when he's pushed to the edge of death, not the specific means of attack."

"Yeah, probably." When Bishmal almost killed him by breaking his neck, KoT gained resistance to not just strangleholds, but physical attacks as a whole—including Bishmal's kicks. It might have even covered more than that.

"It's really powerful in duels," I said. I would guess that normally, after he gained his resistances, some time needed to pass before the number of uses and resistances he'd gained reset. Nemesis was another counter-type, and her Counter Absorption recharged one use per day, so it was fair to assume KoT had something similar.

However, duels were special—once the matches were over and the barriers undone, the fighters returned to the state they had been in before the duels. Even if KoT fought multiple matches in a row, he could start each of them with all the uses of this skill available, and every one of his opponents would have to overcome his healing and buffs at least seven times, maybe more.

Experienced Masters had their ults and other aces up their sleeve, but usually not too many of them. In most cases, they just had two: their Embryo ult and a job ult. Only a small portion of them had MVP rewards and other things on top of these.

However, defeating KoT required a minimum of eight, if not nine different means of delivering lethal damage. While this was possible if you fought him as a group, that was really difficult to achieve in a one-on-one fight. Even all-rounders like Xunyu and Juliet would struggle.

“And I... I don’t actually have enough either, do I?” I had one attack with fixed damage from Vengeance and the like, two with Purgatorial Flames, three with the lethal debuffs from Hellish Miasma, four with Shining Despair, five with the holy element from Grand Cross and Purifying Silverlight, six with physical damage from either Gardranda or copying KoT’s STR using Chaser, and seven with a risky swing of my still-cursed axe.

Huh? Wait, I’m actually kinda close, I thought. My Wind Hoof bomb trick was physical damage, so that would overlap with some of the others, but...didn’t I have something more?

...Ohhh. If the axe’s element selection worked right, that might actually give me the upper hand against KoT.

“But...” I mused. That was really just if I was the only one attacking. I’d still have to withstand KoT’s attacks and bring him down while my own attacks were being rendered useless too. “The way he’s fighting in these matches isn’t how he usually fights, right?”

“No, it’s not,” said Marie. “The way he normally fights is uhhh... Oh, he’s like your brother’s battleship, but human-sized.” An unpleasant expression crossed her face as she remembered getting bombarded by Baldr in Noz Forest.

All that firepower in a human form, though? A wide-scale extermination type...the very thought of fighting like that inside a city like Gideon was terrifying.

That must've been why he'd fought Bishmal mostly empty-handed.

"When dueling in Caldina, that combat style allowed him to win without even using his healing and buff skill," said Marie. "He never lost a duel... Though, he also never had a public match against his biggest counter—The Fight."

I guess they settled who was stronger within the clan and didn't want to reveal their cards in a public match? I thought. Though, that makes me wonder about The Fight's combat style too...

"Is the arena situation there different than in Gideon?" I asked. It sounded that KoT didn't hesitate to use all his firepower back in Caldina, unlike here.

"Oh, it is. Everything is wide-open and there are fewer people. The duels breathe some life into their surroundings, but comparing it to Gideon is just unfair. Gideon is the greatest dueling location in the Seven Great Countries—it's even better than Tenchi in terms of providing a venue for duels, if not in the average power of its duelists."

"Well, it's got a whole twelve arenas... Thirteen if you count our base." That made me wonder why arenas were so concentrated here in Gideon. I'd heard that the city predated the Kingdom of Altar, but...

"Anyway, based on what we've seen so far..." said Marie. "Figaro is gonna win this."

"Yeah." My thoughts had gone off on a tangent, but I could only agree with that.

Figaro had a large arsenal of weapons—many of them MVP rewards—and his Embryo empowered them, making him the most well-rounded attacker in the kingdom. He could easily field more than eight forms of offense, so he could overcome all of KoT's resistances and defeat him. Additionally, KoT was fighting with a self-imposed handicap that kept him from using his high-firepower weapons.

"Bad compatibility and holding himself back," said Marie. "With these two disadvantages, it's sooo clear who's winning this."

With his offensive powers curtailed like that, KoT had no hope of beating Figaro. As things were, it was obvious that our duel champion had this in the bag.

“Hm...” However, if both of them could use all their powers and weapons to the fullest—if both of them were capable of actually killing each other—then it could honestly go either way.

That was what I believed, and I was sure he thought the same thing.

The Tournaments’ matches continued, and everything was going about as you’d expect.

KoT was climbing up the left side of the bracket as Figaro was rising up the right. Many powerful Masters were taking part in this, but they were all falling before the two Superiors.

In the quarterfinals, KoT had defeated a duelist in the middle of the rankings, and in the semifinals, he’d brought down Catherine Kongo—the second in the kill rankings.

She(?) had actually gotten pretty close to beating him. She’d first gotten him with Charm, then four times using her tamed monsters in their human forms, and then yet again in close quarters physical combat using her Embryo ult. That made a total of six times.

But once KoT had the resistances and the attacks that countered her monsters, she finally fell. The skill names he used for every heal were all stars in the Big Dipper, adding credence to my idea that he could come back at least seven times.

“By the way, why were her monsters in human form?” I asked.

“Oh. That’s because their true forms don’t fit in the barrier. The third maid—the one with the green hair—is actually a High-End Disaster Elemental. She’s probably bigger than all of Gideon.”

...I see, I thought. So she(?) was also fighting with a handicap. It was like how Shu’s Baldr in its fifth form onward couldn’t be used in the arena either.

But man, I’d never thought that tamed monsters could be that big.

“Weeell, if they weren’t tamed, Catherine Kongou’s four ‘Nethermaids’ are pretty much guaranteed to be UBMs,” said Marie. “If someone goes around with a retinue this destructive, it’s not at all surprising that they’re only behind KoD in the kill rankings... Though, the third... The one who beat me could probably beat Catherine one-on-one.”

I felt like I heard her say something under her breath at the end there, but I chose to ignore it.

Anyway, KoT had already advanced to the finals, and Figaro just beat his semifinals opponent too.

"It's getting pretty dark," I said as I noticed the twilight.

The finals had been delayed due to preparations, so by the time the match actually began, it would probably be night. The Masters of Cor Leonis—another name for the star called Regulus—and Septentrion would fight beneath the starlight, and I felt like there was a kind of romance to that.

"Hm...?" As that thought went through my mind, I heard a knock on the door to our box. Had some clan member logged in in time for this? Did the arena staff have something to tell us? Wondering who it was, I opened the door and...

"Hello again. We met just a short while ago."

Behind the door, there stood King of Light, F.

"Why are you here?" I asked. "And how did you know our seat?"

"Research." So he'd been spying on us using his drones again.

I swear he'll get arrested for this someday, I thought.

"As for why I am here... There is something I feel I should inform you about." Inform us...? "I'm currently using my drones to observe Gideon..."

That made me notice that his right eye was closed, and I wondered if his drone Embryo could be linked to his vision in order to give him a bird's-eye view of the area... It had been a real pain when I'd fought him, and I bet he was using it right now.

"And?" I prompted.

"There is trouble at your clan's base. Three of your duelist friends have gotten caught up in it, as well."

"HUH?!" Both Marie and I let out a cry of shock. This had really come out of nowhere.

There's trouble at the Eighth Arena?! And three duelist friends... Right! I gave a spare key to Max! Who else would be...?

"Should you not hurry there?" King of Light interrupted my thoughts.

"What kind of trouble?!" I asked. "Are they all right?!"

"Please go and see it with your own eyes—I want to see your reaction."

"Nnngh...!" Of course—this guy was so obsessed with his research for inspiration and reference material that it was literally criminal. "Ugh... Marie! I'll get on Silver and take a look!"

“Shouldn’t I go too...?”

“You stay and watch over this guy! He might be planning something—don’t let him out of sight!”

“I see. That’s definitely necessary,” Marie said.

“I don’t understand why you’re so distrustful.”

Remember what you did during the last event here in Gideon and try saying that again, I thought. Regardless, I left the two where they were and ran out through the arena’s exit.

“Nemesis! You awake?!”

“Yes, and I know the situation. I wonder what that trouble he mentioned is...”

“I have no idea. For all we know, it might have something to do with KoT’s appearance in The Tournaments. But whatever it is, we can’t ignore it.”

“Indeed!” Once out of the arena, I instantly took out Silver, jumped on his back, and flew off. I also shattered a job crystal and switched my main job to Paladin, just in case.

My destination: our base, the Eighth Arena.

◇◆◇

Gideon, City of Duels, Central Arena, Box Seat

Ray had stormed out, leaving behind the two pre-Superiors. Neither of them knew what to do about this awkward situation, but the first one to break the silence was Marie.

“Standing at the entrance like that is a bit annoying, so why not come in and sit down? The seats here were reserved by our clan, and there’s more than we need.”

“Oh? Well, if you would offer, then I will do just that. The view here is really quite good, after all,” said F as he entered the box and sat down right where Ray had been sitting. The sight of that made Marie grimace.

The conversation ended there, and they were now both just waiting for the final match, not saying a word. However, Marie felt that this really wasn’t going to work out and broke the silence again.

“So? What are you plotting this time?” she asked.

“You’re asking that now too? I am not plotting anything today, but I see that people around here really don’t trust me.”

“Of course—and it’s not just because of the Love-Duel Festival either. Do you have any idea how many incidents you’ve probably caused?”

“Oh, but I help people too. My goal isn’t crime, but research.”

“Ha! An author who can’t do ‘research’ without bothering people. What a laugh,” said Marie—which was ironic, considering she herself had been engaging in commissioned PK in order to role-play as the protagonist of her own work. If her fellow clan members—especially B3—were here, they would’ve definitely told her that she was in no position to criticize F.

A brief silence ensued. F also knew that Marie was a player killer—the Superior Killer, no less—and did indeed consider retorting by pointing out that she was hardly better than him.

However, instead, he chose to attack her from a different angle.

“By the way, your avatar... That’s the protagonist of Into the Shadow, isn’t it?”

“Yes. What of it?” Though Marie had tried to hide it, F’s question startled her. Into the Shadow was the title of the manga created by her real-life self, Nagisa Ichimiya.

“I read every volume,” said F. “Though I do prefer the tankobon format, so I missed anything that wasn’t included in those.”

When the magazine it was published in was canceled, Marie’s manga had gone on hiatus before it was finished, and the newest chapters had yet to be collected into the tankobon format. However, the fact that F was a tankobon-buying reader made Marie think that he might’ve not been so bad after all.

Hook, line, and sinker.

“Oh yes, I read it. And I enjoyed it a good bit,” F added. “Though, I feel like the volcano eruption that helped defeat Upas-Kamuy the Crusher could’ve used a bit more buildup. The final scene did happen on a mountain, and I understand that when Daisy’s doomed battle revealed that fire was effective, you intended that to be foreshadowing, but I still felt like there was a step or two missing in the lead-up to that eruption ending the fight. It would’ve been better if there was a little bit more information sprinkled around to preface it.”

“Y-Yeah,” Marie said. The harsh criticism of her work caught her completely off guard and hit her where it hurt. F had already guessed that she was a similar type of person and purposely picked a critique that would sting.

Trouble was brewing at the Eighth Arena, the final match of The Tournaments was about to start...and in the background of all this, a mangaka and an author waged their little passive-aggressive war.

◇◆◇

Gideon, City of Duels, Eighth Arena

As the sun began to set, the sparring session at the Eighth Arena also reached its end. The boats and water used for the aquatic battle vanished, returning the stage to its original form.

“Ngh... Once again, I didn’t pull it off even a single time...” Juliet was the only one among the duelists who looked a bit down. That was because she hadn’t yet been able to master her MVP rewards.

“Well, your new stuff is a bit hard to use under duel rules,” said Chelsea. “It’s nothin’ like Maxie’s new sword—that one’s so simple and easy to wield. Only if you’re Maxie, though.”

“Yeah,” Max said. “I’m pretty sure the only ones besides me who could use it right are Jubei and Figaro.”

With the sparring over, it was time to share their thoughts. The three duelists were talking about what stood out for them about their sparring match, and this sight seemed to impress G somehow.

“You’re all so stoic!” she said. “I feel like I’m watching a shogi research society or something!”

“Well, our strongest duelist is crazy strong. If we don’t work hard, there’s no way we’ll ever catch up to him,” said Chelsea.

“I see. I can just feel your sporty passion! It’s so hot! It’s burning!”

G had just been watching a practice bout, but she pumped her fist in the air enthusiastically.

It was safe to say she seemed pretty excited.

“Oh, right. G, didn’t ya have some business?” Chelsea asked, just now remembering what G had said.

“Oh yeah! Do you think you’ll make it in time? I can fly you there if you’re in a hurry...” Juliet said.

“Oh no. It’s fine. Everything’s fine.” G shook her head, rejecting Juliet’s concerned offer. “I’m already where I need to be. This is the stage of the event.”

“Huh?” As G’s words filled Juliet with confusion...

“Max! Juliet! Chelsea...! What happened?!”

“Huh?! Ray?”

...Ray and Nemesis descended from the air upon Silver’s back and jumped down onto the stage. The girls thought that he looked unusually alarmed.

“What’s wrong? Why the panic?”

“Chelsea—oh, I was just told that there was some trouble here...”

“Trouble? No, there isn’t. We were just sparrin’, that’s all.” And it was true that there were no problems here—the sparring had ended without any issue whatsoever.

“I see,” said Ray. “Well, that’s good to know.”

“Indeed,” Nemesis concurred. “But then, why did King of Light say... Hm?”

That was when the two of them noticed the unfamiliar face among the duelists.

“Uhhh... And you are?” Ray called out to the one person he didn’t recognize, and...

“Eh heh heh. Thank you, brother dearest. Your timing is perfect, oh brother of mine.”

...instead of answering Ray’s question, she only...cracked a grin.

At the same time, countless orbs began rising all over the arena.

She’d set them up without anyone noticing, and they—or rather, the magic cameras—now activated all at once.

“What...?!” Ray wasn’t the only one confused now—Juliet’s trio clearly knew nothing about this either.

“Aaall righty, then! All eyes on G! Welcome to my channel!”

Only one person was speaking now, and it was the only voice that showed no hint of shock at the situation.

Everyone’s eyes focused on the speaker—the girl now standing in the middle of the arena stage, surrounded by cameras.

Acting like the arena was her personal studio, she turned to every which way with an expressive, smiling face full of life.

“Hello! We meet again! Maybe it’s been a while? Or perhaps you’re new here? In that case, let me introduce myself! I'm G, the Superior streamer and Dendro content creator!"

"G...?" The smiles and words she excitedly spread in every direction felt almost like they were meant not for Juliet and the rest, but for an invisible audience.

G continued as though her friend's confusion meant nothing.

"Remember what I announced last time? This premiere is for a battle against a very special guest! And my opponent this time is... Shock and awe! The strongest newbie! The one who beat multiple Superiors! Ray Starling the Unbreakable!" Saying that, she extended her palm toward Ray, and the cameras synchronized with her movements, instantly turning to film them.

Ray still didn't have a full grasp of the situation.

However, he already understood that this had to be the "trouble" he had been told about.

"Oh, and would you look at that! Julie and her Altarian duelist friends are joining too! Meanwhile... I'll be fighting solo! Huh?! Isn't that bad news for me?! Won't I lose?!" The cameras then panned over Juliet's trio, and G faked a little panicked reaction. "Well, the results are still unknown! I'll go as hard as I can! I'll seize the possibility even if it's beyond the radix point! Yeah!" After copying Ray's words like that, she lightly moved her hand, stopping the camera sync.

"So, yeah. A pleasure to meet you. Good evening, Ray Starling."

Though still smiling, G addressed him by name while behaving completely differently than she had when the cameras had been filming.

Ray said nothing. The drastic change in her behavior perplexed him, but at the same time, something in his memory was nagging at him.

Before he found his words, though, Nemesis spoke in his place.

"Who are you?! And what do you mean, 'battle'?!"

"I'm G—I already said that, though. Let me introduce myself another way..."

She answered directly this time, first giving them her name, and then...

"You know King of Light, F? I'm his little sister."

...revealed a truth that told Ray and Nemesis all they needed to know.

Ray's eyes widened as Nemesis said, "Huh?! So he is the one behind this!"

"Oh, I just asked him to lead you here. He'll only watch now and not involve himself at all. This event—this stage—is all mine," G said as she spun around joyously.

"Event...?"

"Yes. I'm about to... Oh."

Before G could finish, the situation shifted.

Chelsea swung her greataxe at her, while Max rushed in with her katana.

What followed was a noisy clash. However, it wasn't the sound of blades slicing through a human body...

"So you went at me the moment you realized I was planning something," said G. "You work fast. That was probably the right move...though it looks like you can't get past my bodyguard."

...it was the sound of something abnormally strong deflecting their strikes.

A horde of octopus-like tentacles were now sticking out from G's shadow, forming a barrier of flesh.

"Huh...?!"

"An Embryo...? No! A tamed monster!"

The tentacles then moved to retaliate against their attackers. Chelsea and Max dodged by jumping backward, but the tentacles shattered the stone stage.

"And a pretty strong one, at that," said G. "I'm not sure how he measures up, but I wouldn't be surprised if he's as tough as your summon... 'Gardranda,' right?"

"Well... You sure seem to know a lot about me," said Ray. "Did you get all that from KoL?"

"He has nothing to do with this. I don't think you understand how famous you are. You used her against both Hell General and King of Beasts—everyone knows about her."

Hearing that made Ray scowl. First Jubei, now G—his fame was really working against him.

"Though, you seem to know me too. So we're even on that count."

"What do you mean?"

"This," G said as she closed the umbrella she had been using up until now.

The last rays of the setting sun shone directly on her face.

That was all. From Juliet's perspective, nothing had changed. Well, she was now wearing a choker that wasn't there before, but that was it.

But that little change meant a lot.

"Huh?!"

"A disguise?! So good that it ignores Reveal and Truth Discernment?!" Ray and Chelsea raised their voices as though surprised by something.

"Huh? What's with you two? She didn't change at all," said Max.

"Huh?! She changed a ton! She grew horns, a tail, and her face and clothes're all different! And wait... If she actually looks like this, and her name's G, then she's...!"

"What's going on...?" Juliet was lost.

Chelsea was talking about G's appearance as though she had only assumed this devilish form just now, but those features had been present since Juliet had met her yesterday. Why was Chelsea so shocked?

"Wait..." Juliet said as she was struck with a sudden realization. "Did different people see you differently...?"

Those words made G's smile grow deeper.

"Correct! I'm pretty well-known, and I got a lot of enemies, so I can't go outside without a disguise."

G put a hand on her neck and tore off the choker-shaped accessory. It was an Epic MVP reward, hidden until now by becoming one with her skin.

Its name was Nightcrawl Chaos, Netherface, and its effects were concealment and interfering with others' perceptions. It also only worked when out of direct sunlight.

"Those who know me don't see me as me. The only exceptions are those who've just found out about me and anyone on my friend list. This is off-the-record, by the way. It's a secret I haven't even revealed in my videos!"

"Friend... Oh." The MVP reward obscured her true identity from everyone except those who didn't know her—and those who were on her friends list. Yesterday, Max and Juliet were the former. Today, Juliet was the latter.

And since Ray and Chelsea already knew her, they saw her as someone else.

If you knew G's appearance ahead of time, she simply assumed a different appearance, making you unable to recognize her. If you knew her job ahead of time, Reveal even displayed false stats. As long as she stayed in the shadows, no one could identify who she really was.

That was the reason G could walk around such a crowded city without anyone noticing her.

Juliet and Max didn't know her, and thus saw her true form—while Chelsea, who regularly gathered info about powerful Masters even if they were foreign, had seen her differently.

"Since you didn't see the real me, you must already know who I am, right?"

"Yeah..." Indeed—Ray knew too. Following his recent battle against Overlord Acedia, ZZZ, Ray had looked into the other Overlords and came across the one who revealed more info about herself than any other.

She was...

"A member of Desire, just like ZZZ... Overlord Invidia, G!"

"Yes! Exactly! That's me! I'm the Overlord!"

An Overlord and a Superior. One of Legendaria's greatest criminals who reveled in chaos.

That was G's true identity.

Juliet's eyes widened. The revelation of her friend's real identity filled her with shock.

"And why would someone like you come here?" Ray asked.

"I came to take the arena! I'm gonna steal it!" G answered, proudly announcing that this was indeed a theft.

"Steal...?"

"Yes! Exactly!" G clapped once and then spread her arms wide. "I want an arena! This facility itself! It's useful and rare even in this world, and I want it!"

She closed her right hand as if grasping something.

"I want to avenge my brother. I want to defeat the one who took him down—Ray Starling!"

She gave a thumbs-up with her left hand, then turned the gesture upside down.

“And I want to record my entire battle against you. This is my stage—my production—and I’m gonna bring it to the viewers!”

Finally, she drew her outstretched arms back and crossed them across her body, embracing herself.

“Three birds with one stone! That’s what I want!”

“Well, aren’t you greedy.”

“Yes! Yes, I am! Exactly!” G agreed with Ray’s comment, all smiles.

She once again waved her hand, syncing herself up with her cameras.

“I’m so greedy they call me the Bottomless! I am a member of Desire and an Overlord who carves the whole world away!” As she talked, she was becoming more energized. “That’s why! Here and now! I’m starting a game! By me! For me!” As she spoke, the sun completely vanished beneath the horizon...and night fell upon the world.

Thus, she declared her final intention.

“The night comes! The stars align! The time of the Overlord begins!” G held up the crest on her left hand, showing a design like a sunken temple...

“The event begins... Playground of the Great Old One—R’lyeh!”

...and announced the beginning of her reign.

Chapter 6: The Fatal Fight, the Overlord's Descent

Gideon, City of Duels, Central Arena

While Ray's group was being dragged into the Overlord's event...

"By the way, did you not participate in The Tournaments? I don't believe I saw you in any of the public matches."

"Grrrgh... I-I don't think I saw you either."

...the two artists continued their verbal battle—this sarcastic back-and-forth.

"You didn't, because I didn't participate. Despite how it may seem, my face and identity are supposed to be a secret, so I wouldn't expose and embarrass myself in such a public setting. Surely you understand?"

Marie seemed to be losing ground here. Being defeated in her first Tournament fight was coming back to haunt her—and he knew her identity, giving F a huge advantage. He had a great many cards he could play against her, while it wasn't clear how Marie could approach him.

At some point, Marie had taken out her Arc-en-Ciel—and not the normal revolver form, but the single shot form meant for her ult. However, the mangaka side of her felt that fighting back against his words with violence would be a loss in its own right, so she was able to hold herself back...if only barely.

"Oh? Looks like it's time."

"Hm...? Ohh. It is."

But then, the end of their verbal battle arrived. The thing everyone here had been waiting for was about to begin—the ultimate match of the final Tournament.

The two Superiors—Figaro and Albert—were already facing each other on the stage, but the start of the match had yet to be announced.

Perhaps because it was the final day, Altimia A. Altar—the acting ruler and first princess of the kingdom—was currently making a speech about

The Tournaments so far.

"Hm...?" However, Marie, F, and some other members of the audience found it strange.

The speech was supposed to happen after the final match, yet the order had somehow been reversed.

F wondered why that had happened, and soon realized the reason.

He'd sent many drones all over the venue, and the information they provided let him know what would happen next.

"I see," he said. "So he'll lose the handicap for this one."

"What do you mean?"

The handicap in question was obviously the limitation on Albert's firepower. His consideration for the audience had rendered him unable to use his real combat style. If he fought Figaro like that, Figaro would have the upper hand in terms of both compatibility and sheer power.

Being from the same clan as him, Marie would've liked that, but it was unlikely that Albert himself would.

"Attention visitors. The stage will now undergo maintenance in preparation for the final match."

Shortly after Altimia concluded her speech, an announcement echoed through the venue. However, there seemed to be no damage to the stage, so what was the maintenance for?

The answer to that question came in the form of a person who parted the wind and flew in, stopping right above the stage.

Looking up at the sky, the spectators saw a lone woman. She was wearing a wizard's robe paired with a pointed hat, and she sat on a staff with both legs over one side, the classic picture of a witch riding a broomstick. The only thing that diverged from that image was the monocle over one eye.

Regardless, some people present already knew who she was.

"The maintenance will be done by the current Arch Sage—Integra Sedna Clarisse Flagman."

Integra—a friend of the first princess, and currently the only court mage. She was usually busy with work in Altea, so some wondered why she was here in Gideon.

Her sudden appearance made the audience look up at her in shock.

Meanwhile, Figaro was smiling, Albert showed no emotion, and Altimia made a face as though to say, “Finally, she’s arrived.”

The reason she’d pushed the speech forward was to buy Integra some time. This implied that the Arch Sage was necessary for the final match—and this was proven by what she did next.

“Miss Flagman will now reinforce the arena’s protections.” Following that announcement, Integra created a massive barrier over the existing one.

She was adding multiple new layers over the five that already covered the stage, resulting in a large number of magical barriers nested within one another.

This was in response to the UBM escape on day six. There had been a counterplan meeting where the likes of Altimia and Count Gideon had discussed how to prevent such a thing from happening again. Being an arena expert, Figaro had also participated as an observer.

One of the solutions they’d come up with was enhancing the barrier by adding extra layers on top of the ones already there, and this responsibility was given to the Arch Sage, Integra. While the Arch Sage could use magic of all kinds, Integra was especially good at barrier magic. They’d intended to use her powers to add additional walls and prevent more UBMs from escaping.

But now, contrary to their plans, they were using this solution in the final match.

The reason they were doing this was actually Figaro.

This many-layered barrier would reduce the risk of audience casualties even further—and that was exactly why, having listened in on the meeting, Figaro himself had asked that they use this in the final match.

Though he was participating in The Tournaments, he didn’t actually want the MVP reward—those were just something he received in the course of pursuing his true goal.

Figaro was someone who enjoyed battle from the bottom of his heart and always sought powerful enemies against whom he could burn away his spirit, body, and all that he was. Blessed with an opponent as great as Albert, Figaro would never allow him to bear such an unfair handicap.

“...Heh.” Figaro stood on the stage with a smile on his face. His expression spoke more eloquently than any words could, saying, The stage is set. Let’s go all out.

Even the audience felt like they could hear the silent invitation.

Saying nothing in response, Albert spent a moment looking at the enhanced barrier...

"Deploying armaments."

...and adorned himself in MVP rewards.

Figaro's smile deepened as he took a weapon in hand.

Thus began an all-out battle between Superiors armed to the teeth with countless powerful artifacts.

◇◆◇

Gideon, City of Duels, Eighth Arena

Legendaria had three Overlords—Overlord Acedia, ZZZ; Overlord Gula, Dis Satisfactory; and Overlord Invidia, G.

Overlord Acedia did nothing but sleep inside his realm. As long as no one threatened his territory, he did not partake in conflict against anyone. If sleeping dogs were left to lie, they wouldn't bite—and the same was true of Overlords.

Overlord Gula was wandering around Legendaria, going where the winds took her, and those who stood in her way were fated to be consumed. She was like a natural disaster, growing stronger day by day thanks to her auto-leveling as an Overlord.

Meanwhile, Overlord Invidia's activities were much more reminiscent of the dark lords and demon kings many players would be familiar with from fiction. She commanded an army—her clan, Underground Sanctuary—and regularly invaded Legendaria to take their rare items, riches, and territory, all while recording it and creating videos to upload online.

Overlord Invidia, G was definitely the most "Overlord-ish" of the three.

There were two reasons why she'd taken action now.

First, her ult could only be used at night.

Second, it was because nearly all the eyes and ears in Gideon were focused in the Central Arena. The unexpected appearance of the foreign Superior had made it attract even more caution and attention than she'd anticipated.

On top of that, Figaro was a participant in the match, while Shu and Hannya were on security duty, drawing them away from any potential danger to Ray.

The uncertain variables that could interfere with G's plans had been reduced to an absolute minimum.

The only ones here now were Ray and Nemesis, as well as Juliet's trio—and G couldn't have asked for a better cast.

◇◆

"Playground of the Great Old One—R'lyeh!"

Following her skill declaration, the environment in the Eighth Arena changed drastically.

"Ngh...?! What...?!"

"The arena...is sinking?!" A transparent cylinder surrounded the arena as dark water began seeping in from the bottom of it, the level slowly rising.

The Eighth Arena—Death Period's base—was gradually sinking.

Ray and the others jumped high and landed in the audience seating, where the water couldn't yet reach.

"Liquid summoning?! Like Chelsea's Poseidon?!" Max exclaimed.

"Not exactly. Not quite," G said with a chuckle. "This is R'lyeh rising up."

"Huh...?!"

"It's something I gotta do to get the arena—and it's my win condition for this game."

"Right! I looked this up! So this is her ult...!" G's words made Chelsea show a hint of panic, and Ray grimaced.

"'Game,' huh? You talk like this guy I know who wears a lab coat everywhere," Ray said with a scowl as he recalled an unpleasant memory.

"Franklin's Game, right? I know that! It went viral. I dunno if you realize this, but you're very famous. You're better known than even some Superiors."

"Can't say I'm happy about that!" Ray said before letting out a sigh. First Jubei, now this—becoming famous had gotten him nothing but trouble. If not for that, G wouldn't have targeted him in the first place.

"And that's why I think fighting you will make for a great video. Content, revenge for my brother, and this arena—I'm getting so much from this!"

G regularly recorded her activities and uploaded them on her channel.

Due to her unusual role as both a Superior and an Overlord, as well as her personality, she had a lot of followers expecting to see something unexpected or entertaining. G believed, without a doubt, that “stealing an arena” and “fighting the Unbreakable” would amaze people as much as—if not more than—her previous escapades.

“Ya keep sayin’ you’ll take the arena. Whaddya mean by that?” Though Max now knew that G was an enemy, she still didn’t know much about her, and nothing had gotten any clearer for her. Juliet was the same in that regard. Ray and Chelsea knew of G and seemed to be getting more and more worried, but Juliet didn’t know why.

“That’s G’s skill, Maxie. It’s Overlord Invidia’s Embryo ult,” Chelsea began explaining to them. “She already cut off a buncha Legendarian territories, but she didn’t change the country’s borders like what happens in a War.”

“Then what did she do?” asked Max.

“The moment this ult is complete...”

“...The Eighth Arena itself will be absorbed by her Embryo,” Ray finished.

R’lyeh was a fictional location from the Cthulhu Mythos. Sometimes called an island, sometimes a city, it was always at the bottom of the ocean. However, it was said that when it rose to the surface, the Great Old One—Cthulhu—would awaken and subjugate the world.

Thus, R’lyeh’s core trait was “domination.”

When the rising waters of R’lyeh sank the targeted area, it would take control of and steal the land, the buildings, and any items within, turning them into a part of itself.

Basically, it was a Superior Embryo that forcefully claimed the very terrain in which it was summoned, cutting off parts of the world itself.

While this ult didn’t possess any direct offensive power, to a country, this was more terrifying than any violent attack. Multiple Legendarian tribes had already lost their mines, castles, and towns to this Embryo, whittling away at the country as a whole.

After claiming whatever she set her eyes on, G released everything in her faction’s base, creating her own land—the Overlord’s domain.

That was the core of her Underground Sanctuary’s strategy.

“Seriously?! That’s some totally lawless shit!” said Max.

“It is. As an Overlord, I make my own laws,” said G, not ashamed whatsoever. “Also, there’s a limit to how big an area and how many Resources I can absorb, and the more I steal, the longer it takes. This arena will be consumed in...a bit over an hour, I guess?” She explained with glee as she gazed at the water filling the arena from the bottom and the “scale” etched onto the top of the cylindrical barrier around the arena.

The time needed for her Embryo’s ult to complete scaled with the Resources of the target.

“Anyway, it’s time to reveal the rules! The channel regulars already know them, but I’ll make them clear to new viewers who came here just for the Unbreakable!” G once again spread her arms wide and raised her voice to ensure that the countless cameras all around could hear her.

In one of her hands, there was now an uncanny, unusual shape—a trapezohedron.

“The rules are simple! I lose if this trapezohedron breaks before R’lyeh consumes the Eighth Arena! This is the core of the ult!”

R’lyeh’s ultimate skill provided other people with the means to stop itself. The fact that it could only be used at night, its long cooldown, and this “fail state” were harsh restrictions that allowed for its greatly empowered effect.

“Of course, you could just defeat me, instead! R’lyeh will disappear and that’ll obviously stop the ult! But if you can’t do either before the time runs out or all of you are eliminated, Team Unbreakable loses!” G then put her hand on her throat and called out to Ray’s group surrounding her.

“Now! The Overlord’s head is right here! If you wish to protect your land, then face me like real heroes! This is the start of a fight to annihilate the Overlord!”

Following those words, pillars of water rose up everywhere. From the water, now knee-deep, large tentacles burst out and attacked Ray and his friends.

“Ngh...!” Ray reacted instantly, jumping on Silver to rush to the sky, while the others evaded their attacks as well.

Thus, they weathered the tentacle ambush, and the only things damaged were the places where the four had been standing.

“First they blocked Chelsea’s and Max’s attacks, now they attack us... How are those creatures even fitting in that amount of water? It is not that deep yet!" Already in her weapon form, Nemesis couldn't make sense of this absurd scene.

But Ray and Chelsea knew exactly what was going on.

"The water is just an entrance."

"An entrance?"

"The surface of this water is a connection to her Embryo... A whole other world."

G had already revealed her abilities in her content. Ray had also featured in multiple public videos since Franklin's Game—G's powers were probably at least as well-known as his, maybe even more so.

However, G was a case where knowing her powers wasn't much help in defeating her.

"Heh heh heh. I'm happy you know me so well, but should you really be doing this? Should you waste time just talking? Don't you think you'll run out the clock?"

With her legs in R'lyeh's waters, protected by countless tentacles, G cracked a grin.

Her ultimate skill was consuming the arena as they spoke, and if G wasn't defeated within the next hour, it would disappear entirely.

"Yeah," said Ray. "It's not like you'll stop if I just tell you to, huh? Just like your brother."

"Yep. I probably shouldn't say this, but I'm not nearly as reasonable as he is."

"Well, that's...a problem." King of Light, F had created a misunderstanding between a couple that had almost destroyed a city—yet Overlord Invidia, G claimed to be an even greater nuisance.

Coming to understand that with absolute clarity, Ray let out a sigh.

"But, man... I've fought a bunch of Superiors for a bunch of different reasons, but this is the first time one of them has attacked me for my real estate."

"This is a rental, though," Nemesis interjected.

"Hey! Don't forget that I'm also fighting to avenge my brother! It's an emotional endeavor!" G interjected.

"Be honest."

"You beat him, so if I beat you, it'll prove that I'm better than him, right?"

"Do you two hate each other or something?"

"We get along great! But that is one thing—this is another!"

"That so?" Ray realized that it wasn't just her motivation that was unique—she was nothing like the previous Superiors in terms of personality either.

The vibe here kinda reminds me of Mori-Mori, he thought, remembering the senior from his high school club. I feel like she and G would get along really well.

Regardless, he'd already decided what he would do. She was telling him to fight and defeat her, or else she would take what was his. He had only one response to that.

"Sure. Let's do this," said Ray, still mounted, as he brandished Nemesis. "Beating an Overlord... That sure is a quest, all right."

Gathering his resolve, he declared that the quest had begun.

"This is good! Very good! I can see why my brother is so infatuated with you!" said G, her smile growing deeper at Ray's words.

But then, she turned away from him...and looked at Juliet, making her eyes widen.

Juliet had backed away into the air, but couldn't...didn't do anything beyond that. She didn't instantly register G as an enemy like Chelsea and Max did, nor had she gathered her resolve like Ray had when he'd realized G's true intentions.

Juliet was the only one here who was still perplexed by the situation.

While Chelsea was the oldest and most proactive of them, and Max was used to situations like this thanks to Tenchi's battle junkies, Juliet had never experienced anything similar.

This was nothing like the all-out battle against Chelsea she'd had in the recent event, or her disputes against Shion from before the Exodragon King Incident, when they were still hostile to each other.

A friend she'd just made was doing something bad to another one of her friends. Something like that had, thankfully, never happened to her before.

She'd never had enough friends for it to be possible.

And that was why Juliet was so perplexed she was frozen in place.

Though she'd only met G yesterday, they'd hit it off instantly, and albeit in a different way than with Ray and the others, G had quickly become a friend Juliet felt she could connect with. In this conflict, Juliet had no idea what to do.

She couldn't rush to eliminate G like Chelsea or Max, nor ask her questions like Ray. She was stuck acting like a child her age, doing nothing but watching the situation, lost in confusion.

"Ngh..." As a friend, the reasonable thing to do here was to join Ray and stop G from committing this crime.

She knew this in her mind, but her confused heart kept her body from moving.

Thus, Juliet was unable to choose...

"Julie! You fight me too!"

"Huh?"

...and the one who gave her the push she needed was the enemy—G herself.

"You are this video's guest performer! It might have happened by chance, but never mind that! I'll be really happy if you show me what you got!" G reveled in causing chaos and committing terrible crimes, and yet her words seemed to contain no guilt or shame. She was self-indulgent, self-centered, and selfish.

Despite this, her words melted away Juliet's reservations. There was no contradiction between her reasoning and her friend's words—and combined, they gave her the encouragement she sorely needed.

"...Okay!"

And so, Juliet flapped her dark wings and brandished her blade.

Her friend had asked her to stop her crimes, so Juliet would do just that.

Thus, the four-person party prepared to face the Overlord.

There we go, G thought. Every good star has to know how to read the mood.

She looked at the four, all ready to fight, and smiled in satisfaction.

I guess Julie isn't used to things like this. I feel like I did her wrong, but I also followed it up nicely, so I guess it's all good... But wow, this just makes me think how insane Legendaria's rankers are. When I went at that card gamer, she responded so fast it was like she knew the future.

Estimating Juliet by the standards of the rankers G knew had caused her to misjudge the girl's mental fortitude. G reflected on that, but she now had the matchup she wanted.

I want an arena. I really, really do. It'd really help my clan and my friends at Desire...but that's just one of my goals.

The second was defeating Ray Starling—and there was a third, which was far more important than the other two.

That was the reason she'd approached this situation like she had.

Instead of taking the arena like a sneaky thief, she'd gathered a cast of combatants before using her ult. She'd also explained everything so they could fight without confusion.

If someone present was confused and hesitant, she straightened them out with her words.

And if all this led to an exciting battle for her to record, nothing would please her more than that.

She wouldn't tell them to just lose—how could she?

All out and beyond—a wild dance of supernatural powers. A gleaming light that could only be found in this world.

That was the blueprint of the future G desired.

"Now! Let's fight! Let's play!" Thus, G spoke—sang—to the world.

"Let's go all out...and see what lies beyond!"

She faced the heroes who would challenge her and the viewers who would watch her—and let them all know that she was here.

Such a curious coincidence...

At the same time, in the same city, but at different locations, Figaro and G—two Superiors—gave their own opponents exactly what they needed to give it their all.

Gideon was now a stage of two battles truly fought in earnest.

Chapter 7: Sunken Labyrinth

Gideon, City of Duels, Eighth Arena

"Anyway, let's get this started for real! Face me! Challenge me with all you got!" And with that, G fell backward into the dark water and began sinking into it—inside her own Embryo. But then...

"Blackwing Requiem!"

"You're not gettin' away! Bladescale Hail!"

Having resolved to fight, Juliet and Max attacked G, attempting to prevent her escape.

"Oh, what a barrage! So intense! Sadly..."

However, both Hræsvelgr's black light projectiles and Ipetam's blades...

"They can't reach the bottom of the sea."

...were deflected by the water and failed to touch her.

The water that covered G didn't seem more than a few centimeters deep—and yet it completely blocked the attacks, letting her sink within.

Juliet's eyes widened as Max shouted, "What's going on?!"

"The Superior Embryo, R'lyeh," said Chelsea. "It's not immediately obvious, but under the water is an entirely different world."

Type Invasion Labyrinth, "Encroaching Sea-Altar, R'lyeh."

Standing next to Tsukuyo Fuso's Kaguya, it was one of the few Embryos crowned with the "Invasion" type. Though Kaguya and R'lyeh targeted different things, they were similar in that they ate away at the world outside of their boundaries.

The water—in other words, its outer shell—acted as an entrance linking R'lyeh to the rest of the world and allowed it to consume things with its ult, but at its core, R'lyeh itself was an independent universe.

Even if the water looked shallow from the outside, there was no telling how deep of an abyss it really was.

Thus, attacks that couldn't pass through its entrance would never strike R'lyeh.

"That water is an entrance that only allows living beings through. It totally rejects attacks and stuff," said Chelsea.

"I thought Ipetam's blades could be counted as part of its body, but I guess they aren't."

"What do we do, then?!" Max asked.

"Basically, if we wanna beat the Overlord, we gotta enter her dungeon."

That was a classic RPG scenario. However, entering the enemy's territory was still a scary thing to do, especially when the entrance was a pool of dark water protected by tentacles and there was no telling what lay beyond.

"I guess that makes her basically the same as ZZZ in that regard," said Ray. "Still...!"

The man who'd already been dragged into an Overlord's domain and overcome it didn't back down a single step.

"I'm going in!" Ray dismounted Silver with no hesitation and led the charge.

Assuming that his steed's air-walking abilities wouldn't work underwater, he simply jumped in there by himself.

"Whoa! No hesitation at all!" said Chelsea.

"I'm going too!" said Juliet, jumping in right after Ray.

A moment later, the world completely changed.

"Huh...?!"

The second her whole body was submerged, she found herself very suddenly out of the water.

But she was no longer in the Eighth Arena where she had just been standing either.

She was now inside of a damp, dimly lit cave, filled with a fishy stench. There was a wall behind her, and the only way to go was a tunnel straight ahead.

"Where...?" Looking around, she saw that Ray was already there, and they were soon joined by Chelsea and Max.

"Huh?! We're not actually underwater!" Max exclaimed. She'd equipped an accessory to help her breathe in the water, but this unexpected sight meant her caution had been all for naught.

"Ugh... I figured you'd choose this place, but man..." Meanwhile, Chelsea put her hand on her head as though she had just realized something unpleasant.

“What do you mean?”

“What does she mean? This is what she means!” G’s voice resounded from somewhere unseen, responding to Juliet’s question. G herself was nowhere in sight, and there were no visible speakers, but this place was basically the inside of her Embryo. Thus, it made perfect sense that she was able to talk to them like this. “My R’lyeh is unbelievably wide and deep! It contains many of the places I’ve helped myself to! It’s like an amusement park! Is that a good comparison?”

R’lyeh was an underwater otherworld. Most of its vast area was a sunken seabed, but there were some places that were quite different. Those were the locations that she had “helped herself” to—or, rather, had stolen from people. The dvergar mountain mines, the lionkin citadel, the hidden elf forest—they were all places that were important to powerful Legendarian tribes, and they were most of the reason she was a wanted criminal.

“I can choose where intruders end up. Though, while the ult is active, the rules prevent me from putting you too far away from me or the trapezohedron. Well, regardless, this time you’ll find both at the end of this dungeon! That’s your goal!”

Like the Legendarian locations inside R’lyeh, this was another place that she’d cut out and taken for herself, but this one was different in one respect. It didn’t have a previous owner.

“I had a really hard time in this dungeon. I’m sure it won’t be easy for you too!”

“Huh? What is this place, anyway?” Max asked. G chuckled a little before saying...

“Ever heard of the Depths of Jealousy?”

◇◆◇

Gideon, City of Duels, Central Arena

In one of the box seats of the Central Arena, overlooking the raging-hot final match, F kept one of his eyes closed in order to view the scenery of another world.

So she did end up choosing that place, he thought. While his open eye watched the battle between Figaro and Albert, he simultaneously observed his little sister's own event.

Since only living beings and their possessions could pass through the surface of R'lyeh, F had asked her ahead of time to bring some of his Zodiacs inside. That had been his compensation for guiding Ray there.

R'lyeh's ultimate cuts off the land itself. It can steal entire mountains and castles, but that dungeon took it an entire night, and it still only managed to absorb a part of it... I suppose Overlord dungeons are just that exceptional.

Overlord dungeons—challenging, trial-filled labyrinths that bestowed a Superior Job from the Overlord series upon anyone who cleared them.

G was now using this as the challenge for her current game.

Her previous games had ranged from direct confrontations to speed mining events where her victims were forced to mine up the trapezohedron within the time limit. But this time, she'd chosen something that was not quite so straightforward, but also not particularly unorthodox either—a traditional dungeon full of challenges that Ray and Juliet would have to overcome.

She's very enthusiastic about this one, F thought. He knew his sister well enough to guess what she was thinking.

A dungeon with an Overlord waiting at the end didn't just make for a good spectacle—it was also the place where G could use her combat style to the fullest. It was clear that she was very motivated for this one.

That was exactly why F was somewhat concerned, though.

Will they be able to clear the dungeon in time? he wondered.

Because Overlord dungeons granted a Superior Job while ignoring prior jobs and talents, they were all extremely difficult to clear. The Depths of Jealousy dungeon that had chosen the current Overlord Invidia was no exception. Though she'd only cut away a part of it, making the dungeon far more compact, F still wondered if they could make it through within the time limit.

I suppose I will just have to wait and see. Despite his concern for his own research and his sister's event, F continued simply watching things unfold.

Paladin, Ray Starling

"Now—you have fifty-eight minutes left! Hurry up! Do your best!" Urged on by the dungeon boss herself, we started running. There were some things that didn't quite make sense, but we didn't have the time to hesitate and think about it.

The four of us were now rushing through a damp, natural-looking cave.

"Maaan," said Chelsea. "We talked about goin' to the Tomb Labyrinth to help Maxie farm up some money, but I can't say I expected to go to the Depths of Jealousy first."

"Now's not the time to say shit like that! Hell, I'm the one who borrowed the key, so this is my fault too! If she takes the arena, then forget about payin' him back! There's no way I could make up for that!"

"Same here..." The spare key I'd given to Max had let Overlord Invidia enter the arena, and Juliet was the one who'd brought her there. That meant they both seemed to feel pretty guilty about all this.

"Hey, don't let it bother you," I said. "She probably could've used her ult from outside the arena just as well. I do appreciate the help though."

"R-Right!" Juliet said.

"Leave it to me! I'll slice up her and her tentacles!" Max added.

As we talked, the cave seemed to change a little, and we arrived at a fork in the path.

"Left or right, huh? Pretty standard," said Chelsea.

"Hey! You two saw this place in her videos, right? Doncha know the right path?" Max asked.

"The problem with that is...this place's structure changes with time." I said.

"I saw about three videos, but one of them had a guy go 'Hey! I saw this place on G's channel once!' and then run straight into a trap, so..." Chelsea said.

"A reply truly scribed in crimson... (That makes me think of the Red Pen Teacher...)"

Shu had once told me that despite them both being in the category of "created dungeons," Overlord dungeons like the Depths of Jealousy were a good bit different from the Tomb Labyrinth.

Apparently, the Tomb Labyrinth was the newest of these dungeons, created shortly after the time of the first Azurite, while the others had existed since before the pre-ancient civilization. The Tomb Labyrinth was deeper and housed stronger monsters, but the Overlord dungeons came out ahead in terms of troublesome gimmicks and tricks.

Incidentally, Shu had actually destroyed an Overlord dungeon while fighting The Earth.

"Wait, you're tellin' me you can die by just pickin' the wrong path?!"

"Yes," Chelsea and I instantly replied in perfect unison.

This place really was just that much of a pain.

"Then again, we can't just stand still here," I said. "I'm gonna keep going."

"Huh?"

I took the left path and took a step forward. "Nemesis?"

"Certainly." Understanding what I was planning, Nemesis prepared herself.

And when I was about three metels into the passage, my face was instantly and fully obscured.

A blue-purple mist had burst out from every direction, completely swallowing me up. Through the air I breathed and even through contact with my skin, the mist inflicted countless debuffs on me.

"I see... These must be the debuffs of these Depths..."

The Depths of Jealousy was an Overlord dungeon specialized in debuffs.

It was especially rife with poisons, bindings, and curses. That single spray had given me a whole seven status effects: Poison, which drained my HP; Magic Drain, which sapped my MP over time; Soul Drain, which caused me to lose SP; Weakness that halved my stats; and finally Lethargy, Paralysis, and Frailty which further reduced my STR, AGI, and END respectively.

There were so many debuffs that conventional items and skills wouldn't be enough to deal with them, so most people would be forced to fight the monsters here while greatly weakened. That could easily kill anyone who was unprepared, and that made this dungeon really difficult—especially for tians, who only had one life.

Apparently, G had become the current Overlord Invidia by taking shelter in her otherworld, R'lyeh. ZZZ had probably become Overlord Acedia by using his dream invulnerability, so they were kinda similar in that regard.

Anyway... I'd just confirmed what we were dealing with.

“That was the wrong path. Past the trap, it’s a dead end.”

“Hey! Are you okay?! You look way too calm for getting all those crazy debuffs!” Max shouted, staring at me as I stood painted blue-purple by the mist. She had nothing to worry about, though.

“If anything, I’m even better than before,” I said as I showed her Nemesis.

“Truly! It has been long since this form was useful!”

She was currently in her Flag Halberd form.

Indeed, if we were dealing with debuffs, nothing was more effective than her second form’s “Like a Flag Flying the Reversal.” This might’ve not worked in the original Overlord dungeon, but this whole area was now a part of an Embryo—in other words, an enemy. That meant that Reversal could function against these debuffs. And since these status effects weren’t from a Superior Embryo fully focused on debuffs like Miss Eldritch’s Kaguya, I could reverse them into buffs without a problem.

Because of that, my matchup with this dungeon was actually pretty good.

“Though, it hit us with over twice the amount of debuffs as Hellish Miasma right from the start,” said Nemesis. “That feels unfair—perhaps even illegal.”

“No it isn’t!” G insisted. She must’ve still been observing us. “That’s just how the Depths of Jealousy works! Overlord dungeons become way harder the more people enter them! With four of you here, the dungeon will be going all out right from the start!”

Right. I’d almost forgotten that was a thing they did.

I feel like Figaro could totally get an open Overlord job, though, I thought.

“Anyway, I’m the right person for this. I’ll be our canary,” I said as I took the lead and advanced.

“Huh. A canary? Aren’t you supposed to be a Starling? How did you mix those up?”

Ignoring G’s comment, I considered that she had probably anticipated this. Her voice didn’t seem to contain even a hint of surprise that I’d used her debuff traps against her.

That could mean that she had worse traps prepared.

We gotta stay cautio—

"Ngh...?!"

"Ray?!" Juliet cried.

"Ooof... A spiked ball just jumped from the ground and went straight for his crotch... Scary stuff," Chelsea commented.

G, you bitch! Couldn't you set up a more normal trap?! I've got pain turned off, but that almost felt like it'd been switched back on!

"Ray, are you okay...?" Juliet asked.

"I-I am. My gear's fine, and I'll heal the damage pretty quickly with the reversed Poison..."

It didn't hurt, but I did feel weird, like my insides had been flipped upside down...

"So there's physical traps too, huh? Not just debuffs," said Max.

"Well... Actually, these spikes are covered in poison," said Chelsea as she grabbed the spiked ball.

I would've liked her to stop touching it, in that case.

"Actually, while I kinda get the poison mist, I'm not sure if the Depths of Jealousy is supposed to generate traps like this spikey thing. It's just not what you'd expect from a place that looks like a natural cave," said Chelsea, considering the trap that had attacked me.

"You're right! That one is different. Some of the traps here were gifts from our sub-leader."

G gave this answer like it was nothing, but...

"Who the hell gifts people traps?! And traps this messed up, at that?! It was so bad it reminded me of Mori-Mori from high school!"

"Who? That just makes me curious," said Chelsea.

"She was a senior who challenged people to games and set traps for them, only to have them all blow up in her face!"

"The fact that you refer to her using such an odd nickname makes it clear what kind of treatment she gets..." said Nemesis.

Yeah... Honestly, she was even more of a joke than Miss Eldritch. She deserves the nickname, I thought. This trap, though... No way, right?

Following that, I was subjected to several more traps, but Reversal's buffs and healing over time allowed me to withstand them all as we brute-forced our way through the passage.

And beyond it, the cave suddenly ended.

The oppressive ceiling and walls disappeared, revealing a large, open space. Within the dome-shaped area, there was a straight bridge extending from the passage we'd come from all the way to the wall on the other side. I could see an exit over there.

There was something wrong with this space, though—right below the bridge, there was water with the same blue-purple color as the mist from earlier.

Needless to say, falling off was probably an awful idea.

Also...

"Places like this always have some kinda surprise, don't they?" said Chelsea, saying exactly what I was thinking.

"Well, nine out of ten RPGs would either put an ambush here or make the bridge collapse," I said with a nod as I looked around.

I didn't see anything suspicious on the walls or ceiling, but the water was so dark.

"We should fly." With one person joining me on Silver and Juliet carrying another, all of us could fly past here. If we were in the air, the bridge collapsing wouldn't be a problem, and it'd be easier to deal with anything that came out of the water.

With that in mind, I prepared to summon Silver when...

"Ah. Hold on a sec."

"Chelsea? What's wrong?"

"I'm just guessin', but... Yah!" She took a Gem out of her Inventory and threw it at the empty space.

A moment later, there was an explosion that painted the walls and water in an orange glow.

The three of us were speechless.

"Ah, I knew it," said Chelsea. "Air mines—and they're even camouflaged. That military nerd from my old country used those a lot..."

I couldn't see a thing, but it looked like there was a trap that Chelsea had spotted. She herself was a bit of a mine expert, so maybe it wasn't that surprising that she'd figured out something we hadn't...

G expressed no chagrin about this, though. Instead, she actually clapped and praised Chelsea. “Wow! You saw right through it! You’re pretty good too, Chel! By the way, the mines will just keep coming back, so if you try to destroy them all, you’ll just run out of time.”

“That so?” I said.

“Also, the explosions act as a signal.”

A moment later, something broke the surface of the dark water and leaped onto the bridge to block our path.

“GEH GEH GEH!”

“Wha?! The hell are these?!” The things that had emerged from the water, apparently immune to its poisonous properties, were dozens of monsters that looked like mermen.

“Monsters of the Depths of Jealousy...!”

“Bzzt! Wrong! When I absorbed this dungeon into R’lyeh, I didn’t get its monsters or monster-producing mechanisms. They’re just like those air mines—I procured and spread them here! They’re not even tamed, but this is their territory, so they’ll attack any intruders!”

G graciously told us about the mermen.

I was wondering why she was going out of her way to tell us so many things, but it could be that she wasn’t doing it for our benefit, but for the viewers who would watch all of this once she turned it into a video.

Additionally, these mermen were armed with harpoons and the name “APM” was visible above their heads. It did look like they were immune to the poison, so...maybe that stood for “Anti Poison Merman?”

“Hey...” said Nemesis. “Is it just me, or is that naming scheme somewhat familiar?”

Oh, come on! There’s no way that guy could be involved in...

“ALSO! Since this is the halfway point, I’ve placed a boss here!”

After G said that, the water’s surface rippled, and there was a splash even larger than the one that the mermen had made.

“E a H e A h e a H E a h E A H!”

And that was the entrance of a freakish monstrosity that looked like a cross between an octopus and a humanoid giant.

“What is that gargantuan thing...?!” said Nemesis.

“That’s gotta be the main body of the tentacles that attacked us back at the arena!”

The creature was massive, with a size matching even the Afforest King Golem we'd fought some time ago.

This was a pretty large space, yet its octopus-like head almost brushed the ceiling.

The air mines were reacting to it and blowing up, but it didn't even flinch. Any damage they did rapidly closed. Its grandeur and size made for a sight that could definitely drive someone past the boundaries of sanity.

"Hmm?!"

But there was something that drew my attention more than anything else about it—something above its head.

"Hold on! G! I got a question!"

"What is it? What do you wanna ask?"

"It's about the name of this octopus thing!" I said as I pointed above its head—at the name hanging up there. I'd already seen the tentacles, but its name was a different—and way bigger—problem.

"Huh?" That was when the girls noticed it too, and their eyes went wide.

I couldn't blame them. After all...

"This is just a monster, not an Embryo, right?! Why is it named like that?!"

The letters above the octopus giant's head said "Cthulhu." This thing was the Great Old One from the Cthulhu Mythos—not just in appearance, but even in name.

"This world's got Cthulhu as a goddamn monster?!"

"I feel like a world with an ancient evil in it would be fated for destruction..." Nemesis said.

Well, Azurite's ancestor did beat something literally called "The Evil," so that part is real, at least.

"No," said G. "Cthulhu doesn't exist in this world—at least not in the wild. This one's not natural."

"Not natural... You mean...?!" Her words made a certain person come to mind.

"Yes. I had him made special for me. There's someone in Dryfe who creates custom monsters for you. His name's Franklin... Oh, wait, it looks like you already know each other!"

"THAT LAB COAT SHITHEAD!" Hearing the name, I found myself raising my voice. I sure as hell didn't expect my sworn enemy's name to show up here!

"I mean, my Embryo is R'lyeh, and R'lyeh has gotta have Cthulhu, right? I brought in some materials and had Franklin make him for me. I even used an MVP reward."

Right. Franklin had used Dragon King mats to create a monster that could use the Dragon King Aura. Knowing that, it didn't seem out of the question that could probably make something like this too.

The fact that it was made using an MVP reward gave me a bad feeling about this, though.

"Oh, and I got the APMs at a discount for buying them in bulk. He said he didn't have much use for aquatic monster materials, so he sold them to me for cheap. I bought a lot!"

"You got those things because they were on sale?!"

What kind of Overlord army is this?!

"Hmm. I like that reaction. You're a fun one, Unbreakable. I can see why you went viral so many times."

"Is that what you're impressed by...?" said Juliet.

"Who gives a damn who made these and where?! If we can't get past the mines in the air, that means we can't get through if we don't beat that octopus and the mermen!"

"Ah! Right! Sorry, Max! This all just caught me off guard!" I remembered we didn't have time for this nonsense—we had to clear the dungeon.

G had said this was the halfway point, and we had about forty minutes left. It seemed like we were making good progress, but considering we still had to overcome this mid-boss and then G herself, we had no time to waste.

"Corpse-Eating Bird—Hræsvelgr!" Right as I finished my thought, Juliet besides me used her ult, starting the battle with a bang.

"GEH!"

"E e e a A a h H H!" The sideways tornado released from Juliet's hands swept away the group of mermen on the bridge while also badly damaging Cthulhu's upper body.

"Julie?! Wow, you act fast!" G exclaimed. Having her bargain finds... I mean, the mermen wiped out like that might've stung a bit.

"Well, Julie's like this in duels too. She's pretty proactive when she's locked in," said Chelsea.

“The fact that the bridge is still standing tells me that she controlled it properly too...” Nemesis added.

Yeah, when a bunch of enemies group up and block the path, few things are better than a wide-scale ult, I thought.

“Now...!” Juliet called.

“All right!” Urged on by Juliet, we ran on the bridge, now free of mermen.

“E a A h h H...” Though Hræsvelgr had gone straight to Cthulhu’s face, he wasn’t just still alive—he was quickly regenerating. It reminded me of the RSK I’d fought during Franklin’s Game, and I could really tell this Cthulhu was another one of his creations.

Regardless, he was still recovering, so he was completely immobile. Even if he fully healed, that large body would work against him, and he wouldn’t be able to chase us into the passage. Not even his arm would fit—the best he could do was a tentacle or a finger.

That meant that if we made it out of this space, we could just leave Cthulhu behind.

With that in mind, we kept running, and we soon passed the middle of the bridge.

“E a h... E a h... E a h.” Still recovering, Cthulhu was holding his head with his left hand.

However, the right one was being extended toward us.

He wasn’t trying to grab us, just reaching out his hand—and then it suddenly began to shine.

My eyes widened.

“E a h E A h e A H e a h E a H e a h E A H H H!” Letting out a screech in a voice both maddened and maddening, Cthulhu pointed his finger at us.

“Def— I mean, DODGE!”

As I alerted the girls, Cthulhu’s fingers released a blue-purple beam.

The light was eroding and rotting away everything in its path. It was ruination made manifest.

We dodged just in time to avoid it, but the air it passed through was blackened, the bridge melted away, and even the walls collapsed.

“This is...!”

“It’s like Gardranda’s Purgatorial Flames: Zero...!” That was the terrifying power that had melted away Logan’s Legendary Gigaknight. The destruction before me was more than enough to remind me of that.

"That's Cthulhu's Gandr—the Finger of Ruination! Whaddya think?! Do you like it?!" While we were overcome by terror, G proudly explained what just happened.

"Is that a skill from the MVP reward you used on him?"

"Yeah! It was originally a Legendary UBM that lived here in the Depths of Jealousy! He absorbs debuff particles, compresses them, and fires them as a beam! In fact, he's charging another one right now!"

So instead of negating the debuff-filled environment, he accumulated them and used them as a weapon. That explained why he was keeping his lower half in the poisonous water.

"Hm..." I couldn't expect to be able to Reverse that. Letting it hit me was a bad idea.

The worst part was that we couldn't just skip past it now.

From what I could see, the passage on the other side was a long, straight line that went on for quite a while. If Cthulhu managed to get even a finger into the tunnel and fire while we were there, it would hit us for sure.

"I guess we actually gotta beat this thing, huh?" I said.

"Yep! I won't let you skip the mid-boss! This isn't a speedrun!"

"Says the one who gave us a harsh time limit..."

"That is one thing! This is another! Oh! And here's a second helping of these guys!"

Following her words, the water rippled again, and dozens of APMs jumped onto the bridge again.

How many of these did that lab coat freak sell her?! "Ngh! Let's deal with the mermen and take out Cthulhu!"

Chelsea was quick to respond. "Okay! The harpoons look poisoned, so since you can handle debuffs, you go to the front! Maxie and Julie, use Ipetam and your magic to reduce their numbers from a distance! Maxie, you and I will fight Cthulhu! Julie, back us up if you find an opening to hit him hard!"

"Roger that!" we all said in unison.

"Gheow!" called Ipetam. Chelsea had more experience in group battles than anyone else here, so we flew into action according to her strategy.

"GEH GEH GEH!" Despite the previous group of mermen being unceremoniously wiped out, the new ones didn't seem to show any fear.

They must've been made for combat, just like Franklin's suicide series.

Holding debuff-imbued spears in their webbed hands, they charged at us.

"No way you'll hit me!"

However, none of their attacks could land. The debuffs that halved and reduced my stats had all been reversed into buffs. My multiplied AGI let me read all their moves and slice the mermen apart with my Flag Halberd.

Even more of them then tried to attack me from a blind spot, but Ipetam provided cover, firing blades into their foreheads.

"Blackwing Requiem!"

As their movements started to slow, Juliet's black light projectiles overwhelmed and devastated them.

"Let's do this!" Max called out.

"All right! I'll give us some footing! C'mon, Skyanchor!" Chelsea held up an Inventory and released an entire ship.

It was the vessel that used to be the Golden Pirates' base, and a force to be reckoned with in Granvaloa's duels.

The antiair sailing ship, Skyanchor, landed on the blue water.

"She's coated, so she can handle the poison for a while!" said Chelsea. "But maintenance could be a pain, so let's settle this quick!"

"Hell, if we waste too much time, tentacle-face here is gonna charge up and blast us along with the entire ship!"

"Can't say I'd like that!"

Skyanchor began moving as soon as they landed.

Riding the current created by Poseidon, they approached Cthulhu.

"FIRE!" At Chelsea's order, the armaments installed on the ship began bombarding the monster. She herself contributed with Gems, showering the still-regenerating Cthulhu with explosions.

"E e A a a A a A A H H H!" He released a voice of anguish, but his tough body was far from fatally wounded. As though to prove that point, he extended his arms—not to fire a beam this time, but to attack with his tentacles.

They wrapped around the ship, creating a scene that was straight out of a classic high seas fantasy story.

"Ugh, it's been a while since somethin' like this happened, but it's still as gross as ever! Maxie!"

“On it!” Responding to Chelsea, Max grasped her katana and ran onto the deck. Her eyes were fixed on a tentacle that seemed far too thick for a blade like hers to slice through.

“Heh! This will be the perfect test.”

Despite all of that, Max’s face was in a confident grin.

She then activated the Swordmaster job’s Laser Blade skill and took a swing.

Cthulhu didn’t react to it whatsoever, focusing instead on attacking the ship.

That was understandable. Back at the arena, Max had charged at Overlord Invidia, but her blade had been deflected by these same tentacles—it hadn’t been effective whatsoever. It wasn’t clear just how intelligent Cthulhu was, but it would’ve been reasonable for him to assume there wasn’t anything to worry about.

However, the situation now was completely different than before.

This was proven when Max’s attack reached the tentacle several times her own size and sliced clean through it.

“E E A A H H?!” Cthulhu was shocked by this, but who could blame him? Max’s blade had dealt far more damage than its appearance alone would have suggested.

“Ha...! So it’s good even when shit gets real!”

In her hands, Max held one of Tenchi’s Hundred Famed blades—Sekiun.

Its skill was called Ungo-Musho—“Bladecloud Convergence”—and its effect was devastatingly simple.

It took the attack power of all the blades currently being used by the wielder and focused all of it into itself.

That was rather meaningless in most cases. Even if used while dual-wielding, it didn’t result in much of an increase due to Sekiun’s low base attack power, so it was more effective to just wield two katanas of equal power instead.

Jobs in the gladiator grouping could equip more weapons, and King of Asuras had the Asuran Battle-Mounts skill that added floating weapon slots, so they might’ve been able make better use of it.

But here stood an exception among exceptions—a duelist who used far more blades than King of Asuras and the Over Gladiator.

She was...

“I’ll turn ya into sashimi, ya damn octopus!”

“Gheow!”

...Great Genocide Max, the twenty-fourth in Altar’s duel rankings and the Master of Bladeswarm Beast, Ipetam.

Max was using a hundred blades, already released by Ipetam, and their metallic shine was now reflected by Sekiun.

Thus, just one of her swings was now a hundred times more powerful than they had been before.

And despite having just acquired it today, she was using it very effectively.

Max was sending Ipetam’s hundred blades at the APMs attacking me, and in between she was slicing at Cthulhu’s tentacles.

The swarming blades and the focusing blade—Max could turn the Bladecloud Convergence skill on and off just by thinking it, and so she switched attack power between the hundred and the one as she both repelled the APMs around me and fought Cthulhu on the ship.

Max was a powerful Master who’d once made it to the top of Tenchi’s infamously stacked duel rankings. She was far stronger than her current position suggested.

“E e A h h...! E a h e A H e A h...!” Cthulhu was tough enough to deflect Chelsea’s and Max’s attacks, possessed regeneration so powerful you could see it happening in real time, and even had a skill that let him turn debuffs into a devastating offensive weapon. I wouldn’t have been surprised if he was actually a match for Legendary UBMs.

However, he could still take damage that surpassed his toughness, and Chelsea and Max were overwhelming him to the point that his regeneration couldn’t keep up.

Cthulhu swung his tentacles in rage, but Max sliced them off so they couldn’t do any damage, and Chelsea detonated so many Gems around him at once that he lost his footing.

I’d once said that not even Superiors could create perfectly invincible monsters, and that was true here, as well. Chelsea could use her optimal combat style here, while Max had just obtained an incredible new power—and together, they were overwhelming Cthulhu.

“E e E a a A h h h H H H!”

And yet, he still moved.

Was it because of the Overlord's orders? Or was it the pride of a creature bearing the name of the Great Old One? Regardless, Cthulhu pointed a finger at Skyanchor, fully intent on destroying all of his enemies.

But then, there was a break in the flowing horde of mermen, letting Juliet and I leap into action.

I hopped on Silver, Juliet flapped her wings, and the both of us flew forward, keeping low to avoid the air mines.

"Juliet! You get Max!"

"Ah...! Okay!" Juliet understood what I was planning and sped toward the ship.

I, on the other hand, stopped right between the ship and Cthulhu.

"You realize this is a gamble, don't you?!" said Nemesis.

"The usual, then!"

"Well, I suppose...! Form shift—Black Shield!"

Right as the menacing light on the monster's extended finger grew stronger, Nemesis switched from the Flag Halberd to her shield form.

With Reversal gone, I was now afflicted with a bunch of debuffs—but I held on to Silver and tried to bear it.

And then...

"E e E a a A a A A A A A A A A H H H H H H!"

"Counter Absorption!"

...a blue-purple light crashed into my barrier of light.

"Ngh...!" The beam attack was so concentrated it caused physical destruction.

Weathering the seven debuffs, I gave my all to hold on to Nemesis and the reins.

The beam felt like it was never-ending. The barrier of light cracked, on the verge of shattering, and a blue-purple aura was leaking through, touching the surface of the Black Shield. My defense would be broken in just a few more seconds.

"...We win."

However, I knew what would happen next.

I saw Max, holding on to Juliet's hand as she flew toward Cthulhu.

"Hyakujin Itto!" With that shout, meaning "Hundred Blades in One," Max swung the single blade empowered by hundred and split Cthulhu in half at the torso.

"E a h...?!" With a pained sound, the monster's top half fell into the blue water.

Cthulhu still tried to move for a moment, but eventually he disappeared, flickering out of existence as though flowing back into something that lay elsewhere.

"It's over." Switching to the Flag Halberd, I let out a sigh.

Cthulhu was probably set to return to a Jewel when he took too much damage. It looked like not even G wanted to lose a monster that she had used an MVP reward on.

Regardless, the threat blocking our path was now gone.

We also had less than half an hour left. We had to hurry and...

"Huh?! They...!"

"GEH GEH GEH!"

We'd beaten the mid-boss here. However, these mobs—the APMs—were still swarming the bridge.

"They're still coming?! Just how many of them are there?!"

"Franklin said he wanted a bunch of metal from my mines, so I got a very good deal on these," said G. "There's a whole lot more."

Metal, huh? He'll probably use that for monsters or Magingears, I thought. But man, my sworn enemy and current enemy really struck a win-win deal, huh...

"I fear that whatever he makes will be used against us," said Nemesis. She was probably right, but we had to focus on what was in front of us.

We could just rush forward, but getting stabbed in the back would be pretty bad too.

"All right! Maxie and I will hold them off! You two go on ahead!"

As I thought about what we had to do next, Chelsea raised her voice.

"I'm doin' this too...?! Well, fine!"

"Chelsea...?"

"G's probably after Ray. She'd probably do somethin' funny again if he doesn't go. Also... You wanna face her yourself, doncha, Julie?"

"Yeah!" Juliet said with a nod.

"Then that's how we're gonna split! We'll catch up once we're done here, so leave this to us and go!"

"Hey! Stop settin' death flags for us...!" said Max as she cut down some mermen and pointed Sekiun at the passage. "Hurry up and go!"

“...Thanks,” I said. “We’ll leave this to you!”

“We’re off...!”

Thus, Juliet and I turned our backs to them and advanced deeper into the Depths of Jealousy, where the Overlord was waiting for us.

Chapter 8: Beneath the Starry Sky

Gideon, City of Duels, Central Arena

Over Gladiator, Figaro and King of Termination, Albert Schwartzkaiser.

They were both Superiors and powerful duelists, but their similarities went beyond that.

For one, they were both record holders—each had the most MVP rewards in Altar and Caldina, respectively.

Figaro’s Cor Leonis empowered his gear and made him an extremely well-rounded combatant, which had allowed him to explore the Tomb Labyrinth solo and defeat many of the UBMs the control AIs had placed there.

Albert’s Septentrion granted him resistances and effective counterattacks, which was how he had defeated many of the Caldinan UBMs that were known to be dangerous opponents due to their unique means of attack or defense.

Either of them could be the bane of just about anything they encountered, so they had each overcome many unique challenges. As a result, they had countless UBM rewards adjusted to suit them, and any battle between these two Masters would serve as an exhibition of these powerful artifacts.

First, Figaro drew a pistol.

He rarely used this, as it wouldn’t be suitable as his main weapon—but that was exactly why he’d picked it.

Albert could come back to full health seven times, gaining new resistances and offensive powers with each comeback. This meant that Albert would be at his strongest after his seventh use of this power, and Figaro had to reserve his greatest weapon—Gloria α—for that moment. Until then, he wanted to avoid slashing and light-based attacks.

That was why Figaro had started with the pistol.

Watching him in silence, Albert drew out a weapon of his own.

It was another firearm, but it was nothing like Figaro’s. It was a cannon.

Albert held two enormous barrels—each one as large as his own enormous body—in each arm. These were not two different weapons, though. A serpentine cable extended from the back of each barrel, connecting the two into one single weapon that resembled a two-headed snake.

This was the UBM reward, “Serpentflame Purger, Firelyx.”

The moment Albert pulled the trigger, a flash of fire sparked deep within the cannon’s maws...and the flames that burst out pierced through three of the arena’s barriers.

The easy obliteration of their protection caused a stir among the audience, but they relaxed once they remembered that there were still two unbroken barriers on top of Integra’s extra wards. This also made Albert’s behavior in previous matches much more understandable—if his firepower was this potent, it made sense that he had refused to use it.

It was a bit early for the spectators to accept that he really was that powerful, though. After all—this was only his first attack.

As the flames quickly approached, Figaro widened his eyes, stopped attacking, and focused on evasion.

Albert, however, was still able to see his target. He turned around, swinging the maws of the cannon around with him. The flames pursued Figaro, licking the stage and leaving two heated lines on the barrier.

If he’d done this to a horde of monsters, it would’ve surely exterminated all of them.

That’s probably a Legendary MVP reward, Figaro thought, analyzing Firelyx as he dodged its flames. It must be like Ray’s Miasmaflame Bracers, except focused on firepower. Ray’s a special case, though...

Firelyx’s offensive power seemed to rival that of a Superior Job’s ultimate skill, but the fact that Albert could keep firing it for such a long time meant that it must not cost much to activate.

Figaro considered that the item might be immensely Resource efficient because of its simplicity, but he felt that was too much for a Legendary...

Actually, it looks like his MVP rewards are a special case too, he thought as he looked at Albert and noticed something. That one doesn’t protect the user.

His opponent’s body was burning in the flames released by his own weapon.

Unless they were completely fired in the wrong direction, item skills like Gardranda's Purgatorial Flames usually minimized their effects on the wielder. However, such balances and safety measures cost Resources, often making the items weaker than they would've been without them.

Firelyx didn't have that. Its fearsome flames scorched everything around it—Albert included.

In exchange for reducing MP costs and increasing firepower, it burned its wielder to death.

It seemed like a useless failure of an MVP reward...

"α: Dubhe."

...but not when wielded by King of Termination.

The flames burning Albert subsided as he instantly returned to his original form.

He was still overwhelmed by immense heat, but he was no longer actively catching fire.

The reason for that was obvious.

He's resistant to it now, Figaro thought. I see. So it works on self-inflicted damage too.

Albert had used his own MVP reward to acquire the same fire resistance he'd used in the fight against Bishmal and Surt.

Albert's Septentrion was a Superior Embryo with the core themes of "learning" and "overcoming." The chain of skills that started with "α: Dubhe" activated when he was near death and gave him a resistance to whatever phenomenon had contributed the most to bringing him there—usually the element that had dealt the most damage.

That meant it could be used regardless of where the damage had come from.

Using the skill on self-inflicted damage, though, wouldn't give him a new means of attack. The new attack would've been drawn from the skill's target, which was Albert himself—and as he possessed a Type Body Embryo, he was built differently than most people.

This meant that this first use of the skill didn't give him any offensive abilities, but that wasn't much of a problem, since he could now use Firelyx without any risk.

That wasn't the only change he'd undergone, though.

"What...?" A murmur arose from the audience as they sensed that Albert’s flames had become more intense after his first comeback.

However, there was no actual change in the intensity of the flames. He’d been firing them at full power since the start.

What had changed was the temperature within the barrier. Firelyx’s flames had already increased the temperature to several hundred degrees Celsius. Arena barriers allowed air to flow in, so the area inside never became a vacuum, but it was already an environment that no normal person could survive.

The only reason Figaro was largely unfazed by this was because he’d switched one of his rings for another with fire resistance and empowered it. He’d experienced scorching environments like this in the flaming traps of the deeper Tomb Labyrinth. That was why he’d been able to counter Albert’s attack so readily.

His strategy’s good too, Figaro thought. Even though Figaro could negate the effects of the temperature, it effectively forced him to use one of his item slots, preventing him from removing it to empower himself. Additionally, the fire resistance ring meant little against the flames of Firelyx itself.

Thus, Figaro went on the offensive. Turning his body to evade the snaking flames, he aimed the pistol in his right hand at Albert.

The weapon wasn’t made of metal. Its surface was colored like limestone, and it was decorated with a pattern of serpentine scales, giving it the appearance of a snake flowing between rocks.

That was a hint toward what it had once been.

Figaro’s first weapon was “Lifefall Petrifier, Marbledrop.”

It was what remained of a small venomous snake UBM that had once been feared as an invisible peril to all exploring the Tomb Labyrinth.

Avoiding the flames, Figaro fired its bullets straight toward Albert. However, Albert saw the gun pointing at him and moved Firelyx to evaporate the bullets before it could reach him.

The snakes of flame lapped at the bullet flying through the air...

...and the bullet passed clean through them.

A hint of shock could be seen on Albert’s face. Marbledrop had once been a UBM that passed through the walls and floors of the Tomb Labyrinth to approach its targets and deliver its lethal bites.

Because of this, the bullets fired by its MVP reward had the ability to pass through anything nonliving.

Like a dark magic spell, the limestone-colored bullet ignored the call of the superheated flames. It simply continued its flight and hit.

That was when its second effect activated.

Shock overcame Albert as he saw the point of impact transform into limestone. The material that comprised his body was being turned into stone—Petrification effect. Normally, this could be resisted with enough HP and END.

However, it was Figaro who had fired the bullet.

Empowered by Cor Leonis, the Petrifying projectile quickly began to affect Albert's entire body.

Not yet resistant to Petrification, Albert became a stone statue, unable to do anything to stop it. Taciturn at the best of times, he fell utterly silent as Petrification rendered him completely immobile.

This obviously also locked his Firelyx completely in place.

"HYAAAH!" Figaro closed the distance between them and switched to another weapon—Gloria α.

This was perhaps the strongest blade among all Figaro's many MVP rewards.

However, he didn't use it to attack Albert's statue, instead splitting the two maws of the Firelyx.

The flames within it were unleashed, creating a massive explosion. Figaro jumped away, but Albert's Petrification prevented him from doing anything to protect himself.

Even though he had fire resistance, the pressure of the explosion overwhelmed him and blasted his body into bits.

"Now..." With his fire resistance ring and his skilled evasion, Figaro reduced the explosion damage to a mere graze.

By the time the fire was gone, so was the Firelyx.

Albert himself had been reduced to fragments too small to recognize. He was certainly on the verge of death now.

I wonder... Figaro thought.

While Petrification was a debuff that completely immobilized those affected, Figaro rarely used this pistol. It certainly delivered a lethal debuff, but Figaro had multiple ways of killing his opponents that were easier than landing a shot. Plus, though it did lead directly to death, the debuff didn't kill instantly, so it was a little slow in ending a battle.

Figaro had used it now for a few reasons. One was to force Albert to use up a resistance slot for an attack type that was unrelated to his main one.

Another reason was to confirm something. Petrification was an immobilizing status effect that also prevented the use of skills. Even if Last Stand worked, Figaro thought the debuff might prevent Albert from using his heal and buff skill at least.

He'd chosen Marbledrop to check if he was right.

The answer to that...

"...β: Merak."

...came from the empty space in the form of a skill declaration.

The tiny fragments pulled themselves together, instantly rebuilding Albert's body.

"...I see," said Figaro. This wasn't an unexpected result—after all, Albert had come back even when Bishmal had evaporated his head and when Catherine Kongou had used Charm on him.

With this, Figaro now knew that Albert would come back even if he was rendered completely immobile.

Maybe the skill activations had some trick to them, but Figaro didn't think that suited Albert very well.

Thankfully, Figaro had no shortage of ways to defeat his enemies. He simply thought, I'll just beat him six or seven more times.

Albert returned to life with shock waves bursting in his hands. This was the same power he'd used after his first comeback against Bishmal. Likely, it was an additional weapon meant to cause immense damage to the organs within the human body.

Direct attacks against the body weren't very useful in this scenario—indeed, they weren't useful in many scenarios where Albert used his equipment-focused combat style. This was because, while monsters often had special resistances, humans were generally frail enough for his MVP reward firepower to finish the job.

Thus, Albert had already decided what weapon he'd use now that Firelyx was gone.

Figaro also put away his two MVP rewards and took out another weapon.

This was only the end of the first round of their duel. If either of them was at a disadvantage here, though, it would be Albert. He'd already suffered fatal damage twice, and his Firelyx was destroyed.

The item he equipped next was a pair of bracers with a mechanism on the back meant to release some kind of gas.

As Figaro was thinking about Ray's Gardranda, the bracers released an intense burst of white mist. It filled the entire stage, but it didn't obscure the vision of the audience, as it was less dense than expected. The spectators could still observe the fight without a problem through the thin haze.

It was clear that it wasn't intended as a smoke screen, and just when the audience was starting to wonder if it might have been poison...

...they suddenly noticed that Figaro was acting strangely. He turned his head this way and that, as if looking around for his opponent.

The problem with that was that Albert wasn't even moving. What was Figaro looking for, then?

As Figaro was on high alert—or perhaps he was just confused—Albert took out his third item.

It was a very typical cannon, and he aimed it right at Figaro.

However, unlike before, Figaro didn't evade his shot. He only stood in place and looked around.

It was almost as if he couldn't see a thing.

Soon after, Albert pulled the trigger...

"Nghhh!"

...and that was when Figaro finally moved.

He dodged the projectile by a hair's breadth, and it flew past him to strike the barrier. It pierced through the five arena wards and even shook those added by Integra.

Figaro kept running around without stopping for a second, while Albert targeted him wherever he went.

This time, though, Albert aimed his cannon a bit lower than he had for his first attack, as though he didn't intend to hit the barrier at all.

The mist was so thin that the audience could see the battle clearly—and yet, they couldn't help but feel confused about the way things were unfolding.

"That MVP reward is craaazy."

But some of those watching knew exactly what was going on. One of them was a woman sitting in a box seat—the Superior, Fuso Tsukuyo.

"Generally speaking, MVP rewards with major flaws have equally major benefits to make up for it." Eishiro Tsukikage, her servant and aide, also spoke as if he understood the situation. He claimed that this situation was the result of the bracer MVP reward that filled the arena with a seemingly pointless mist—and that that was actually its flaw.

"Yep. It's like how my Superior reward can only target humans, has a smaller range, and only works on lower-level targets, but in exchange it got to keep its defense against ranged attacks. With enough drawbacks to balance it out, MVP rewards can use some parts of the UBM's full power."

"This one has two flaws," said Eishiro. "First, you can easily see from the outside in. And second..."

"The big guy can't see anything either. The mist blocks out the senses of anyone inside, including his own. It's a flaw that ignores the wielder's safety, just like the other item he used."

While Figaro's behavior was obviously strange, Albert's own movements were a bit awkward too, so they both guessed at the reason behind it.

And they were completely right.

The bracers were a Legendary MVP reward, "Toxicating Mistbringer, Drac-Mist."

This was an MVP reward that fully shut down the visual, auditory, and olfactory senses of anyone inside.

The item was useless against anyone outside the mist, and since Albert would almost certainly be in the middle of it, he was guaranteed to be affected.

It was an extremely flawed item, and anyone using it could easily be overwhelmed and killed by any opponents outside the effect's range.

Needless to say, the mist had no such flaws when used by the Mistdragon King, Drac-Mist. However...

"The fact that he has the MVP reward means that he must've beaten the UBM," said Tsukuyo. "He's gotta have something that lets him fight in the mist."

The more flawed the MVP reward, the stronger its effects. However, capable and cunning Masters were able to counteract the flaws—or find a way to use them to their advantage.

Tsukuyo herself had something like this. Kaguya's Faint Light skill could reduce enemy levels and turn Gloria β into a fearsome weapon capable of killing any non-SJ. Based on this principle, Tsukuyo and Eishiro speculated that Albert could aim at Figaro as well as he did because he also possessed some method of overcoming the mist's flaws.

Was it his Superior Embryo, then? Had he developed a resistance to this item's effects, just as he had with Firelyx?

No—Albert hadn't been brought to the verge of death. He hadn't gained a resistance to the mist, and it didn't deal damage, so he might not have even been able to in the first place.

The synergy here wasn't with his Embryo, but with his job. He was using the skills he had as King of Termination—the kill-specialized Superior Job.

The words "kill-specialized" likely brought a number of things to mind. Did it refer to immense firepower meant to kill many foes? Did it grant some special powers that enabled his attacks to be more effective against a variety of enemies?

King of Termination actually did neither.

Termination in this context meant extermination.

When someone used immense firepower to wipe out a horde of monsters that threatened the people and their way of life, a small number was likely to survive. These monsters would run away, grow their numbers, restore themselves, and once again rise to become a danger to the people.

King of Termination would not allow this to happen.

The job had two skills besides the ultimate.

The first of them was "Countdown Radar." This allowed him to select a type of monster that he had defeated and immediately learn the locations of all other monsters of the same type.

The second skill was "Scar Marking," which told him the current location and stats of anyone he dealt damage to.

Indeed—King of Termination was actually a job focused on pursuit.

No matter how hard his quarry tried to hide or flee, the terminator would follow you to the ends of the earth.

Albert was specialized in extermination through not letting anything get away.

Figaro was currently affected by Scar Marking, due to Firelyx's explosion that had recently obliterated Albert. Figaro had jumped away and was equipped with a fire resistance accessory, so he hadn't taken that much damage. In fact, he was barely scratched.

That, however, was more than enough. Scar Marking had been activated the moment Figaro was touched by Firelyx's explosion.

Because of this, Albert could attack him even though he couldn't use his vision, hearing, or sense of smell.

This was exactly the strategy he'd used to defeat Drac-Mist. And unlike the dragon, Figaro couldn't sense a thing. The tide had turned overwhelmingly in Albert's favor.

"I am impressed how well he is handling it, though," Eishiro commented. Despite losing three of his five senses, and even though Albert could still see him, Figaro hadn't received a single hit yet. His evasive movements were timed as though he knew when the attacks were coming, and Eishiro was wondering why that was.

"It's the hat," said Tsukuyo as she used a fan to point at the feathered hat Figaro always wore. "It's an MVP reward, 'Avian Windwatcher, Weather Feather.' It's got a juiced-up version of Killing Intent Perception or something. I think it reacts to dungeon traps too."

"I see. That explains his skillful dodging."

A versatile danger-sensing item—it made sense that a solo dungeon explorer like Figaro would wear such a thing all the time.

"And, well... There's something else he's always got on hand, right?"

The moment Tsukuyo said that, Figaro switched his equipment.

There was now a chain in each of his hands. The Crimson Dead Keepers—some of his most-used weapons.

A hint of shock came over Albert's face. The two chains attacked automatically—not by vision, hearing, or smell, but by locking on to the opponent's vital signs.

Their aim was true despite the mist, and they struck out. Albert's heart and head were pulverized.

Albert staggered as metallic parts tumbled from his damaged body...

"γ: Phecda."

...but this activated his third healing and buff skill, immediately fixing all the parts he'd lost.

The two chains continued attacking him, but they now bounced off him without dealing any damage.

In exchange for defeating Albert once despite his inability to see, Figaro could no longer fight him using impact-based physical attacks.

Despite that, he didn't put the chains away, instead choosing to continue his attack—or maybe his inability to see or hear had prevented him from realizing that Albert had already been beaten once.

"Hmm?" As Tsukuyo watched this battle, a question appeared in her mind. It wasn't directly about the battle in the mist, though.

"I've been thinking this since the fifth battle, but...that one's kinda fragile, huh?" She was referring to Albert. Though they'd been launched by Figaro, who empowered all his gear, it was still surprising that the chains had dealt fatal damage to Albert, since they weren't MVP awards.

His skills that granted resistances made up for that, but it was hard to deny that Albert seemed fragile.

King of Termination was a job that granted mainly HP and STR. While END certainly went up slower than those, it still felt like he was receiving more deadly injury-based debuffs than he should have.

"Machine parts fly off when he's damaged, so maybe he's a full-body replacement...? A Type Body, in other words. If that's true...it would explain a lot." Tsukuyo's guess was right on the mark: Albert's Septentrion was a Type Body Superior Embryo that replaced his entire body with a mechanical one.

While Embryos of this type were extremely rare, the few examples that did exist had several things in common.

One of them was that they applied a negative modifier to any stats increased by jobs. In exchange for his transformation ability and the properties of a slime, King of Crime had a negative modifier on all stats, for example.

Similarly, Septentrion also had such a stat penalty—especially for END. As a Superior Job with a high level, he should've been extremely tough, but he was actually so fragile that even Bishmal—a mere high-rank job—could strangle him to death.

Some might have argued that Septentrion's resistance-granting skills made this flaw more like a feature, but...

Sechs gets negative stat mods in return for gaining the properties of a slime and the transformation thing, Tsukuyo thought. It would make sense if this one gives him the resistance power, but also the properties of a machine.

There actually was some evidence to suggest that. Albert could activate his skill even when his head had been crushed or he'd been turned to stone. The mechanism that allowed that might've been related to how his body actually functioned.

However, just watching the battle from the box seat wasn't enough to let Tsukuyo figure it out.

In fact, even Figaro didn't know that, and he was the one fighting Albert.

"Hmm..."

"Kage? What's wrong?" Tsukuyo asked, sensing that Eishiro had a question.

"Figaro must've realized that his opponent is fragile by now."

"Well, of course. He's got Reveal and all."

"Then why is he not switching out the chains?" Now that Eishiro had brought it up, it was strange that Figaro did not seem to have realized he'd already destroyed Albert.

And yet, despite having already granted him resistance to his chains, the duel champion continued the attack.

"What's he trying to do?"

"He has also removed his footwear and is now barefoot," Eishiro commented. Indeed, Figaro had removed the Unbound Sabatons MVP reward that protected him from binding effects and was now fighting on his bare feet.

While lowering the amount of things he had equipped empowered his remaining items, it seemed like that wasn't his intention here.

"...No way." Tsukuyo realized what Figaro was doing, and it made her break into a cold sweat.

No way he's trying to pull something that absurd, right? she thought.

But she was exactly on the mark.

A moment later, despite having lost three of his senses, Figaro ran toward Albert.

He zigzagged to avoid the cannon fire, but he was definitely approaching him. He shouldn't have been able to see, yet it was as if he knew Albert's location with perfect accuracy.

Albert seemed a tiny bit shocked. He couldn't actually see Figaro's approach, but Scar Marking made it clear that Figaro was closing the distance between them.

How did Figaro know where he was?

Albert assumed that it was because of the attacks Figaro had been making with his chains—or what Albert figured were chains, anyway, based on prior information.

Because of this, Albert changed into a coat-like MVP reward that released a shock wave around him and used it on the chains attacking him. This reward also didn't consider the safety of the wearer and would've pulverized himself too, but he already had resistance to physical impacts.

The chains that must've been guiding Figaro were shattered as they struck the shock wave barrier around Albert. If he came too close, Figaro would meet the same fate.

Blind, deaf, and unable to smell, Figaro charged toward Albert, only to stop right before the shock wave.

Scar Marking told Albert what he'd done, and the fact that Figaro had stopped moving right outside the shock wave's effective range really threw him for a loop.

He'd lost three of his senses—how could Figaro know Albert's location and predict his attacks with such precision?

The answer to that resided in things he hadn't lost.

Figaro had continued attacking with his chains even after Albert had become resistant to their damage in order to measure the distance between him and his opponent, based on the feel of the chains as they pulled him along.

As he did that, he also made himself barefoot to feel the vibrations on the stage.

Was Albert moving? Was he firing? Did his method of attack change? Figaro answered all these questions using only these vibrations.

Indeed—though he'd lost three of his senses, he was able to measure the opponent's location using only the sense of touch.

"HYAH!" And using this absurd tactic, the duel champion caught up to his opponent and equipped two new MVP rewards.

In his left hand was an Ancient Legendary MVP reward, the "Glacial Burstlance, Jökulhlaup."

Aiming this weapon—perhaps best described as a "gun lance"—at Albert, Figaro pulled the trigger.

The man was instantly overwhelmed by immense frost.

He couldn't fend off the cold with his shock waves. The coat MVP reward, the cannon he was holding, the Drac-Mist on his wrists, and his own body were all Frozen in a split second.

Stepping on the freezing stage with his own two feet, Figaro thrust at the icy sculpture with the lance.

With Albert's toughness greatly reduced by the ice, Figaro's empowered attack instantly shattered him, reducing him to pale dust.

"δ: Megrez."

As the MVP reward's mist cleared, Albert used his fourth heal and buff skill.

However, Figaro was right in front of him, brandishing his next weapon.

Having equipped it alongside the lance, he was holding the Ancient Legendary "Scattering Spellblade, Paledin." This was a shapeless energy blade that inflicted dark damage and a curse-based damage-over-time debuff, and Figaro used it to slash at Albert.

He was aiming to take advantage of Albert's cooldown.

The Rear Soldier's Last Stand skill couldn't be used for five seconds after its effect expired. If brought to 1 HP within this interval, Albert wouldn't be able to survive.

That was what Figaro was attempting to do.

Normally, killing Albert in just five seconds after he was fully healed was difficult. HP was easy to increase as far as stats went, and with him being an HP and STR-focused SJ, Albert's HP easily surpassed 200,000 even with the growth penalty imposed by his job. Because of this, many had tried to kill him by destroying vital body parts or suffocating him, but no one had managed to do it before he could use Last Stand again.

This didn't apply to Figaro, however.

Focusing his gear empowerment abilities on his weapon and AGI items, Figaro intended to use these five seconds to reduce Albert's HP to nothing.

Once again, Albert was shocked. Far behind his opponent in terms of AGI, he wasn't able to switch his equipment in time.

One second. Albert lost control of both his arms and a third of his HP.

Two seconds. Albert's head was disabled, and he lost two thirds of his HP.

Three seconds. Albert's torso was slashed horizontally, bringing his HP to 1.

Four seconds. Albert was split in half from the top of his head to the groin. This was an attack meant to take away that last tiny sliver of HP.

Five seconds. Albert still had 1 HP left.

Figaro's expression warped in confusion.

Albert hadn't activated Last Stand. After enduring all of those lethal attacks, there was no way he could have any HP left without using his job skill.

And yet, Albert still had 1 HP.

This could only mean that his combo didn't rely on Last Stand.

"ε: Alioth."

And so, he used the fifth heal and buff skill.

He'd come back yet again, as if nothing had happened.

"This is..."

It made no sense. Most members of the audience thought that Figaro simply failed to defeat him in time, but it was abundantly clear that he'd delivered more than enough damage to do that.

And yet, Albert had still survived with 1 HP and revived himself.

There has to be something more, Figaro thought. Albert's healing wasn't from the synergy between his Embryo and his job. Figaro was certain of that, and he guessed that it must be from yet another MVP reward—or something else entirely.

Having come back, Albert was as silent as ever, but he had leaped into action.

A new MVP reward had appeared right next to him. It was the item he'd tried to take out while being torn by Figaro's spellblade—a suit of armor as crimson as fresh blood, larger than even a man as imposing as Albert.

It had a different feel about it than any MVP reward he'd brought out so far. While it looked mechanical, it also gave off the impression of something that labored under a dire curse.

In fact, it was the Ancient Legendary "Crimson Armor, Exademon"—perhaps the strongest MVP reward in Albert's arsenal.

"Crimson-Stained Steel: Exademon."

For the first time, Albert spoke the name of a skill other than his Embryo skills.

"O o o r r r g h h..." Responding to the call, the armor made a growl reminiscent of a carnivorous beast, then opened up like a maw and engulfed Albert whole.

A moment later, red liquid that looked like oily blood flowed out from within.

Some shrieks could be heard in the audience. They couldn't understand what was happening here. Some even assumed that this was some kind of attack by Figaro.

However, Figaro himself knew that wasn't the case. His eyes then widened, and he jumped back at the same time as Albert made his move.

"ζ: Mizar." Even though he hadn't been attacked, he activated his heal and buff skill for the sixth time.

As he did so, though, he moved. Clad in the strange armor, Albert raised his fist high and brought it down like a hammer.

The next moment, the stage vanished.

A thunderous sound akin to a meteor impact echoed even outside the arena. The stone of the stage was shattered, blasting debris into the air with such force that it broke through several layers of the barrier.

Some screams resounded from the audience, but Integra's barriers were able to keep them safe from the rocks.

That obviously wasn't true for Figaro, though. Shards of stone too numerous to evade had sliced open countless small wounds on his body.

Following this first impact, the stage became a crater, and within it stood Albert, clad in crimson armor, and Figaro, covered in his own scarlet blood.

This damage would've been far worse if he hadn't retreated as quickly as he did.

"...I see." Figaro now understood how Albert's armor worked.

Neither Albert nor the armor had performed any special attack.

He'd only swung down his fist as hard as he could.

The effect, however, had been as powerful as a Superior Job's ultimate skill. The full body armor MVP reward, "Crimson Armor, Exademon," had only one skill on it—"Crimson-Stained Steel: Exademon." It dealt fixed damage that reduced the wearer's HP to 1, then converted the damage dealt into attack power and defense.

Many of Albert's MVP rewards were unwieldy, but this one was a whole new level of difficult to handle. Having just 1 HP meant that even a scratch could kill you.

But in Albert's case, it was nothing but an advantage. It guaranteed a near-death state, and granted him resistance to fixed damage on top of immense attack power and defense.

In fact, when combined with KoT's own stats, Albert's current attack power actually exceeded that of King of Destruction in his Godcloth. Even Figaro would die in one direct hit.

And this attack power was matched by his defense.

Faced with this, anyone reasonable would simply give up.

"...Heh heh." However, Figaro didn't look remotely resigned or despairing.

This was an extreme situation where even a single hit would kill him, and yet he was laughing.

All-out battles like this were exactly what Figaro wanted. There was no cowardice or compromise here.

After all, there was still something he could do. While he had countless MVP rewards, there weren't many that would work against his opponent's current defense, but there was still one option.

"This is a bit earlier than planned," Figaro said as he took out a broadsword.

It didn't look all that impressive, but its overwhelming presence felt like it could burn anyone to cinder.

Gloria α—the strongest weapon in Figaro's arsenal, and the one he'd used to defeat other Superiors like Xunyu and Tsukuyo.

It was the second time he'd equipped it in this duel. But this time, he wouldn't use it on a weapon, but on the armor the opponent was wearing. It would surely cut through not just the MVP reward, but Albert himself.

Instead of worrying about giving Albert a resistance to his strongest item, Figaro chose to focus on cutting him apart.

The Over Gladiator, brandishing a sword, and King of Termination, clad in armor.

The two faced each other as their battle entered its final stage.

Chapter 9: Paradigm Shift

Paladin, Ray Starling

We ran and ran down a long, straight passage.

Even though we were still activating traps, they were all the kind that came with the Depths of Jealousy. It didn't seem like we were encountering anything else that G added herself.

My guess was that since we got past the mid-boss, she had no intention of stopping us now.

It felt like she actually wanted us to reach the end of the dungeon—like she really did want us to come to her.

That was exactly what was strange about G—an ordinary thief would never act like this. If all she wanted was to complete her ult and take our arena, she could've done a lot more to stop us.

However, she'd set up the time limit and the obstacles in our way to make this as close as possible—almost like she was balancing a game.

I'd seen a few of her videos, and it never seemed like she was trying to create a situation where her enemies had no hope of winning. I got the impression that, while she didn't want to lose, she was also prioritizing something over certain victory. It was much like how her brother would do anything for his research.

But if that was the case, then what was G's main goal...?

"Hm?" As we proceeded, the passage drastically changed. Its cave-like appearance was suddenly replaced by man-made stone construction, and the lighting now came not from dimly glowing crystals, but magic lights that activated when we came closer.

The overall effect reminded me of a dark lord's castle from an old RPG, and the lights guided us deeper in.

"I didn't see this area," I muttered. One of G's videos I'd watched had been set in the Depths of Jealousy, but the Masters she'd picked a fight with had all been defeated by the fearsome traps and the rest of G's clan.

At the end of the video, she'd said something like, "The defense has too much of an advantage here! I should really be more cautious about using this place!” It seemed like she’d decided we were the right opponents to challenge the Depths of Jealousy.

“Hmm... Lights and stone,” said Nemesis. “I do not see any traps here, but this is quite a view...”

“This must just be what G likes,” said Juliet. “It does look really good.”

She wasn’t wrong. If this hadn’t been a path leading us directly to an enemy, I would have stopped to admire the style and beauty on display here.

The passage soon ended, though, and we arrived at our goal—a strange room that seemed like a mix of the natural and man-made sections of the dungeon. The floor and walls were entirely covered in dark-gray rectangles of stone, and the light of the eerie chandelier hanging from the ceiling disrupted the shadows cast by the tapestries on the walls.

But where the wall farthest from the entrance should have been, there was instead a plunge pool with a blue waterfall endlessly flowing into it.

And enshrined right before it, there was a throne too large for any human.

“Greetings, brave intruders! I bid you welcome! You are the first to ever make it to my throne room!” Overlord Invidia, G was waiting for us. Her legs dangled as she sat on the oversized throne and looked at us in glee. “Well? What do you think? Me and my clan worked so hard to renovate this place, but no one could make it this far, so I haven’t even gotten to reveal it until now! Thanks for the opportunity!”

“Um... Uh... You’re welcome?” G’s genuine happiness made Juliet a bit perplexed. “Ummm... If you’re satisfied now...could you please stop trying to take Ray’s arena...?”

“That is one thing! This is another! We’re playing this out until the bitter end!” G denied Juliet’s request with a smile. “You got about twenty minutes left! That’s enough time for a good climax! You’ve got a dungeon! You’ve got an Overlord! It’d be a waste to end it now!”

G then hopped off the throne, stood up, and took out her weapon.

My eyes widened. It was a sinister-looking trident, perfectly suited for a devil.

However, it was absurdly large.

Its length exceeded five metels, making it over three times larger than the girl who held it. The edges and the grip were appropriately thick too—it seemed far too unwieldy for someone her size.

"What's her fighting style, anyway...?" Juliet wondered, and I couldn't blame her.

The Overlord series of jobs could be acquired by anyone who cleared the associated dungeons. This meant they had no prerequisite jobs, which made it difficult for Juliet to guess her powers. I'd seen some of her videos, but I wasn't that much better informed than she was. All I knew was her basic combat style and the fact that she stole locations and added them to her Embryo.

Based on the video of her breaking into Titania's live concert, her stats were about on the same level as a vanguard SJ, and she was a well-rounded combatant who fought using a mix of weaponry and magic.

But that also meant that she didn't have the kinds of standout combat abilities you'd expect from a Superior...and I hadn't seen her use that huge trident in any of the videos I watched.

"Well, I don't think the Embryo itself is the type that contributes to the battle directly..." I said.

"Oh? So you didn't watch all of my videos?" G asked, tilting her head.

"Sadly, I only started watching recently. I only managed to watch the newest ones."

"So... That means you saw the band battle and the recent dungeon raid I set up when I was bored. Well, that's understandable, then. I get it," she said as she let out a sigh, then smiled again. "That means...you'll get to see everything live!"

The relaxed atmosphere instantly became one of extreme tension.

The aura of powerful creatures was something I'd encountered many times in this world. This Overlord had it too, and was directing it right toward us...

My eyes widened. Right—while she seemed like a fun-loving, mischievous type of person, someone we could have a casual chat with, there was now no doubt that she was also an Overlord.

There weren't even double-digit numbers of her kind in the world, and she—Overlord Invidia, one of Desire's Superiors—was among the most powerful.

"Action!"

With that word as the signal, G made her move.

She swung her treelike trident as if to sweep us away. As the massive weapon hurtled toward me at the speed of sound, I swung my halberd up to meet it.

I was empowered by seven buffs, but the weight of the attack still pushed me backward. It wasn't enough to break my stance, though.

But as if taking advantage of this moment, Overlord Invidia held up her left hand and cast some sort of dark magic, firing ten projectiles of black light toward me.

"Blackwing Requiem!"

They all failed to reach me. As I was pushed backward, Juliet fired a volley of her own dark magic, canceling out G's.

While their magic clashed, Juliet moved at supersonic speeds to close the distance between them.

The sight made G's eyes widen.

Juliet had great combat instincts even by duelist standards—only the likes of Figaro could match her. Even other SJs would have a hard time countering her movements. Now, she was trying to land an attack on G before she could swing that trident again. The Overlord didn't have enough time to intercept it.

"Ah ha ha ha ha! In that case... Take this!"

But it was Juliet's turn to be shocked as her flight trajectory was abruptly changed.

I noticed a thread of light extending from one of the three points of the trident.

"Got you, little fishy!" G taunted, and the thread of light began winding back.

Juliet was forcefully, at a high speed, being dragged toward the tip of the trident.

"It pulls enemies into it!" That meant they could effectively negate the distance between allies and enemies—very useful in any battle.

Juliet flapped her wings, trying to fight against the pull, but then G pulled the trident back, preparing to skewer her catch.

"Not happening!" Using my enhanced leg strength, I stuck out my left hand and rushed toward G. "Purgatorial Flames!"

The bracer opened its maw, releasing scorching flames from within.

"Whoa?!" G jumped away before they could reach her, but that made the thread of light vanish, freeing Juliet.

"That was enough to break it?" The thread of light had appeared without even a skill declaration, and it had disappeared just as easily. Maybe it was the type of thing that only activated under certain conditions?

"It probably requires her to look at her target or stay still herself... I think." Juliet answered my question.

She'd actually experienced it, so she could probably feel a little bit of how it worked. The flames had blocked G's vision of Juliet, and she'd moved away to dodge them. It seemed pretty likely that either of those things had interfered with the thread's effect.

"That's a good guess, Julie! You're right! Harodihg Gnik's 'Attraction Anchor' requires line of sight to work!" And with that, G herself once again revealed the nature of her power to us—as well as the viewers who would watch the video.

It's rare to see people who reveal their hand so casually, I thought.

"'Harodihg Gnik,' though?" I said, after a moment. "That name's pretty hard to say... Hold on! Is that seriously what it's called?!"

When I realized what the name was when you read it backward, I couldn't help but make that comment.

"Hey, this was made for me by my clan members. What's your problem with the name? You're being rude."

"I'm being rude?! Tell that to whoever named it!"

"Hm?" G and even Juliet both tilted their heads, clearly not sure what I meant.

"You don't even get the reference?! Damn it! First the monsters, now the weapon... Do you have anything with a normal name?!"

I mean, I get that these weird names might spice up the video, but still...!

There was one conclusion we could draw from the battle so far, though —that G actually was a combatant who used both weapons and magic, much like Juliet. She wasn't the type who was impossible to counter on the first try, and she didn't have any gimmicks that made her pretty much unbeatable. Sure, she had advantages like R'lyeh blocking all attacks from the outside and her ability to choose our location when we went inside, but they were irrelevant now that we were inside and fighting her.

Though, again... If she really wanted to have the arena, she could've just dumped us right into some instakill traps.

It really did seem like the arena and avenging F weren't actually her top priorities.

"I already knew this from your videos, but you make a good comedic straight man! You'd be a great addition to my work. Would you like to appear in more of these? Julie can join too!"

"Nope."

"Huh?" I sure as hell don't wanna deal with a mischievous criminal more than I have to, but... Juliet, why do you sound a bit disappointed?

"Okay! I guess I'll have to make the most out of...this!"

Laughing at my answer, G charged at me.

"Juliet!"

"Oh. Right!"

Juliet instantly understood what I meant and released a barrage of dark magic. Launched toward G's head, it completely obscured her vision.

"You sure think fast! Already countering Harodihg Gnik, huh? But...!"

Though her threads of light were disabled, G didn't falter one bit. She used dark magic of her own and swung the trident at Juliet, who met it with her sword.

G's eyes widened. Her trident clashed with Juliet's blade—but unlike me, she wasn't sent flying backward.

"That sword...!" G said. While the two of them were locked sword to trident, G and I both noticed that Juliet had at some point switched her weapon.

It was a sword of a pure black color—the new weapon she'd won in her Tournament.

Its name was "Spiritblade Gleam, Gradsoul," and it had come from Spiritblade Rider, Gradsoul—Juliet's reward for Tournament day four and an Ancient Legendary UBM that converted grudge into power, just like the Revenant Ox-Horse, Gouz-Maise.

Adjusted to suit Juliet, the dark blade Gradsoul had two skills.

First was Curse Conversion. When cursed with the Fallen Knight's "Darkness of Valediction," it converted it into a buff for Juliet, giving a fifty percent increase to all her stats except HP, MP, and SP.

Clad in a dark, cursed aura, the sword had already activated this skill, empowering Juliet and giving her stats that brought her up to the Overlord's level, if not higher.

"I saw you use that while sparring! It looks really useful! I'm kinda jealous!"

"Th-Thanks...!"

Now that Juliet was buffed too, we had the upper hand. G's stats were very high. She was on about the same level as Juliet right now, as well as me with all my Reversed debuffs.

However...stats weren't everything.

"G herself is not that skilled," said Nemesis. Indeed—she was nothing like Figaro, Kashimiya, or other ranking duelists.

From our battle so far, I could tell that her fighting ability was limited by her use of sense skills—it was something that any regular player could have. Even if she had high stats, in practice she would lose against Juliet, who had both an SJ and excellent combat instincts—and her Embryo, R'lyeh, could hardly contribute to battles like this.

If we both attacked G now, we'd definitely overpower her.

Juliet demonstrated this fact by slashing close enough to slice off a bit of G's hair.

G backed away, touching the now-shortened lock of hair. Her eyes widened as she looked at us.

"Yeah! This could be pretty bad for me!" G casually admitted that she was at a disadvantage.

"Could you stop this, then? If you turn off the ult..."

"Hm? You misunderstood, Julie. I said this could be bad for me. Not that it is." G shook her head as she denied Juliet's suggestion. "If anything, the fun is just getting started."

Her smile grew wider, and a moment later, she jumped even farther back.

She was headed behind the throne—to the blue waterfall endlessly flowing from the ceiling.

It had just looked like part of the decor at first, but it turned out that it was more than that...

"Ah ha ha ha ha!" G jumped into the plunge pool, and her skin started melting away.

It didn't end there either. According to Reveal, she was now afflicted with seven debuffs—Poison, Magic Drain, Soul Drain, Weakness, Lethargy, Paralysis, and Frailty.

“These debuffs... Wait, that waterfall is...!”

“Yes! It’s a source of the debuffs flowing through the Depths of Jealousy! R’lyeh could only take one of those sources... But that’s more than enough! That’s exactly why this place is the goal!” Despite being afflicted by so many status effects, G was still laughing. Like an ascetic meditating beneath a waterfall, she exposed herself to the deadly torrent.

The scene made Juliet’s eyes widen and her face turn pale. It felt like she couldn’t wrap her head around what G was doing or why.

“When I first watched the Unbreakable fight the Hell General...” The Overlord didn’t seem to care about her awful condition. Instead she just kept talking to me, or Juliet—or maybe to the cameras that were probably installed all over the place here. “This was before the Unbreakable’s fight against my brother, so I watched it like anyone would watch a viral video about a newbie. And it made me think...”

G placed her left hand on her chest and cracked a smile that only grew wider and wider.

“‘Oh, someone’s doing the same thing as me.’”

My eyes widened as I instantly understood those words.

“By the way,” G continued, “do you know what dark lords in RPGs always have?”

“What?”

“Ah...!” Juliet seemed confused, but I knew exactly what she was saying.

The bad feeling I had quickly turned to panic, and I rushed toward G.

I got to the plunge pool, but before I could swing my halberd...

“Paradigm Shift.”

...Overlord Invidia’s form was engulfed in a sinister light.

◇◆◇

Altea, The Royal Capital, The Royal Castle

That evening, after having dinner, Third Princess Theresia was sitting alone on her bed. She was thought to be sickly, so neither the maids nor the knights who protected her questioned this.

However, she did have a specific reason for being alone now.

Both Altimia and Integra—Altar's strongest tian and most skilled caster—had left the castle to go to Gideon.

Situations like this were convenient for Theresia in many ways.

"You're here, aren't you? Come out."

She clapped her hands, prompting a man to appear in her room.

For a moment, he looked like a mix between a bat and a person, but he soon took the form of an ordinary human.

His name was Morter Cortana, and he was the former King of Raids, as well as a former Idea working for IF.

And now, he was a Dependent of the current The Evil—Theresia C. Altar.

"Did you finish the job?"

"The scary women leave, and you tell me to bring the info I've gathered so far... What's this about?" Grumbling to his boss, Morter took out an Inventory full of documents and handed it to Theresia. From the outside, it might have looked strange that an adult was being ordered around by a child, but Theresia could actually kill him without breaking a sweat. In fact, she was so much more powerful that she might as well have inhabited a different dimension.

Also, it had been Morter himself who'd chosen to stop being human and obey Theresia to survive—he had no right to complain.

"Thanks. I can now make better future plans and think of something more specific."

"That so?"

"I could call you here more often if Altimia and Integra weren't around so much... Can you do something about that?"

"Please. They're really powerful even by Superior Job standards. The only reason I could come here safely at all is because they're both in Gideon now... It's a real pain in the ass that your room is so deep in the castle."

"Heh heh. Sorry. I'm all sickly and weak, you know?"

"As if. You're like one of the most overpowered beings in the entire world..." The Dependent wasn't amused by her joke. "Oh yeah, by the way, I heard in town that there's been some trouble in Gideon," he said.

"Oh? Do tell."

"A Caldinan Superior joined The Tournaments. The gossip's all about how he's gonna end up fighting Figaro."

"I see... I wonder if that's another one of her plays. With all the scheming she does around me, I can't help but find her troublesome."

Theresia let out a sigh as a certain woman came to mind. She didn't know the woman's face, but she knew what she was all too well.

"Should I do something?" Morter asked.

"I don't know what should be done, so no. And if the matches progress as normal, the Over Gladiator will certainly be winning this. Shu has often told me how strong he is. Though, this world is full of things that one simply can't expect, so I suppose I can't be too sure about that."

"...You're not wrong." Through involvement with things he didn't even want to think about, Morter had fallen from grace, become a criminal, been captured, been turned into an Idea, and then become a Dependent of this girl before him.

He was starting to take the unexpected for granted.

"It is quite impressive, though," said Theresia. "Figaro became the Over Gladiator without taking any other Superior Jobs... All that really did for him was remove his level cap and give him some extra item slots."

"What do you mean?"

"The Over Gladiator is The Hero's prototype Superior Job."

"Prototype?"

"Yes. The prototype for The Hero, who can take lots of jobs and sub-jobs, then use them all together. Similarly, the Over Gladiator can use the skills of multiple Superior Jobs without regard for their groupings."

The Hero's "Almighty" skill let him take a hundred high-rank and hundred low-rank jobs, and on top of that, it allowed him to use all of their skills.

The Over Gladiator's "Complete" skill didn't add any job slots, but it allowed him to freely use the skills of his subbed Superior Jobs, and anyone could have as many of those as they wanted.

However, Figaro had no other Superior Jobs, so the job's biggest advantage was not currently active.

"Superior Jobs had prototypes?" Having been King of Raids, Morter was intrigued by this new revelation regarding jobs.

"All Special Superior Jobs have prototypes. No exceptions. For example, the 'General' series of jobs—oh, with the exception of Hell General and Heaven General—were all prototypes for Conquest General."

"No exceptions? Does that include your job?" Morter asked as he looked at the girl—the youngest and most fearsome Special Superior Job of all.

"Yes. My Special Superior Job is the key to The Demise, and my prototypes are the Overlord series of jobs."

As The Evil, Theresia couldn't reveal much to other people.

However, that didn't apply to her Dependents. She could tell Morter the many secrets she knew—and that might've been why, when they were alone, they always seemed to have conversations like this.

"The Infinite Jobs—the creators of this world—prepared those jobs to create and individually test the many functions of The Evil. The power to turn inorganic things into monsters that I showed when fighting you is based on Overlord Acedia's 'Enthrall,' while the power that made your body into what it is now is based on Overlord Luxuria's 'Progress.'"

"I see..." Morter said as his gaze shifted toward his hand. He currently had the form of a person, but if he wanted, he could become something that was neither human nor monster. And this was made possible by that Overlord's...and The Evil's power. "So The Evil has the powers of all seven Overlords...?"

"Yes. Well... Actually, it's not quite that simple."

Theresia nodded for a moment, but then seemed to remember something.

"What do you mean?"

"There's one function that changed between the testing and the implementation, so I have the powers of six Overlords and one power that's entirely new."

"So there was one prototype that turned out to be no good?"

"More or less." If the purpose of a prototype was to pinpoint any problems in a design, then that one was a success in its own way.

"So, which Overlord job had its function replaced?" Morter asked.

Theresia let out a sigh...

"Overlord Invidia."

...and spoke the title of the very Overlord currently fighting in the depths, ready to use the power of her job.

"Overlord Invidia's skill is called 'Paradigm Shift.' It's a power that strengthens you the more status effects you have and the more cornered you are. Envy from the depths... It turns all status effects into inverted and empowered buffs."

It was essentially a direct upgrade to the Flag Halberd's "Like a Flag Flying the Reversal."

"I can think of lots of insane uses for that. Why didn't The Evil get it?"

"Honestly, I wonder about that myself sometimes. If I had it, I probably wouldn't have gotten kidnapped by Sechs... Though, that's how I met Shu, so maybe it was for the best."

As Theresia reminisced, Morter looked at her in shock and thought, The boss of my old group kidnapped...this? Insane.

"Though, the reason I didn't get it is simply because we'd never get the chance to use it."

"Never?"

"Things were different when we were younger, but once The Evil has grown enough, it's pretty hard for us to get status effects. We have really high stats and resistances."

By the design of the Infinite Jobs that created this world, The Evil and The Demise were a hurdle that those who lived here simply had to overcome. They were the final bosses, after all, and they were not made weak enough to be debuffed and turned into punching bags.

"It would've been completely useless as it was. That's why the Infinite Jobs didn't use Overlord Invidia's function and changed it, replacing it with a skill specialized against a status effect so bad not even The Evil could negate it—Death."

"Ohhh. So that's why..."

"Yes. That's why The Evil grows stronger after every death."

"I see. That sure seems different from the prototype."

"It is. Though, because of this difference..."

The Evil—the culmination of Overlord skills—looked at her hand...

"...Overlord Invidia is the only Overlord that's not just a weaker version of me."

...and spoke of the sole exception.

◇◆◇

Paladin, Ray Starling

"Paradigm Shift."

Following that skill declaration, a burst of light in hostile colors like red, black, and purple enveloped the Overlord's body like a cocoon.

The light didn't last long, however.

As I tried to stop this with a swing of my halberd, a hand reached out from the cocoon and grabbed it.

"Ah...!"

"Eh heh heh heh. You can't rush or interrupt moments like this," she said as she tossed me away along with the halberd.

I flew in a completely straight line toward the wall opposite from the pool.

"Ah?!" She'd thrown my body with strength that was simply unbelievable. I desperately hooked my halberd into the floor to slow myself down and just barely avoid crashing into the wall.

"Ray...!"

"I'm fine! But...!"

G's transformation wasn't over yet.

The cocoon unraveled, starting from the point where her hand peeked out, and what was inside was now bared for us to see.

"AH HA HA HA HA HA!"

What emerged from the cocoon...wasn't the Overlord she had been before.

But she also wasn't in a disguise like the one she'd shown me or Chelsea.

She...

"You gotta dress well, you know?"

...she looked like a real dark lord...an Overlord straight out of a story.

The horns that had just been a tiny accessory had become larger than her head. The impish tail had grown to one that was dragon-like in size. The skin on her entire body had assumed a blue-purple hue that was truly inhuman. The clothes she'd been wearing were replaced with a bondage dress that had a bewitching gleam even in this dark seabed.

And her frame had grown to over three metels in size, while her shape became more feminine.

"Eh heh heh heh heh. Ah ha ha ha ha! Surprised? Of course you are! I like those faces! This is so fun!"

If it weren't for certain familiar features on her face, you'd hardly believe she was the same person. She'd changed that much.

It was almost like she shifted into her second form, like a classic evil overlord from an RPG.

"Ah...!" Using Reveal, we could see that the transformation didn't stop at just her appearance—her stats were also completely different. She was affected by seven debuffs, but all of their effects had been inverted.

The HP, MP, and SP that she'd lost in the battle so far was regenerating, and the stats that the debuffs had greatly reduced were now over ten times higher than before.

"It's like our Reversal... No... It's stronger!"

"Ah ha ha ha ha! Like I said! We do the same thing!" Giving oneself debuffs, then flipping them for great power.

They were basically the same thing, but her buff multiplier was higher than mine...!

"So this is an Overlord!"

"Yes! Indeed! I am the Overlord! The most Overlord-ish of them all!" ZZZ's Dreamland let him control both dreams and reality, making him nigh-invincible, and while not by the same means, she also reached the realm of Overlords.

This was the combat style—the second form of the Overlord Invidia, G the "Bottomless."

Empowered and transformed by oppression and scorn.

As she was now, she was nothing if not an “Overlord.”

“Now! Let’s begin this! Let’s have fun!” She laughed heartily.

The liveliness and charm she’d possessed before had been replaced by fearsome, awe-inspiring power...

“Let’s enjoy this climax!”

...and the Overlord called us to dance with her.

Chapter 10: Star of Death

Past, Earth, Somewhere in Germany

Albert's "mother" was known to be a highly capable engineer. She specialized in artificial intelligence—specifically, the technologies surrounding the so-called "control AIs."

Her technological genius had once led a criminal organization to kidnap her, intending to use her knowledge to develop new weapons, but she and Albert had both been rescued by someone described as "a female agent with a first name containing a number and a last name referencing a type of bird." Ever since then, they had led an ordinary life in Germany.

Albert's "mother" put long hours into her research but still made time to play games with him.

But as they were living this peaceful life, a particular game rose to prominence.

Infinite Dendrogram—a true dive-based VRMMO claiming to offer unmatched realism.

Albert had taken notice of it himself, but his "mother" was even more interested in it than he was.

"There's clearly something bizarre about the technology they're using," she said. "But when I asked the higher-ups if we should look into it, they said they didn't have the funds. Maybe Germany's involved in this too?"

As Albert listened to her in silence, he couldn't help but wonder if their country really was part of some conspiracy, or if her bosses had just refused because investigating a video game wasn't part of her job description.

"There's been some strange rumors about it too. You know the US-based company Technorock? The massive game developer? They actually tried investigating Infinite Dendrogram at one point, but they never dug up enough concrete info to even analyze. They couldn't even find any servers."

Albert found that very curious. What MMORPG had servers that couldn't even be located?

"Apparently, even their communication system itself is unconventional technology... It's not the usual electronic stuff. That's why even Technorock couldn't analyze or track it."

This surprised Albert even more. How could this company have access to technology like that, but sell it so cheaply that even children could buy it?

"The team from Technorock could log in just fine, but they couldn't bring in their analysis equipment. That's why they decided to do something a bit forceful."

Still, Albert listened intently.

"No one's sure who exactly developed Dendro, but there are multiple companies scattered across the world that handle its sales and hardware production. In the US, it's a pretty small company called simply 'ID Supplier,' so Technorock set their sights on them."

The phrasing "set their sights on" made Albert expect they'd done something drastic...

"They hacked the company using Overture—their company data control AI."

...and it turned out he was correct. A large company had hacked a rival firm.

Control AIs were supercomputers with processing power so immense they could manage all the data necessary to run a country or megacorporation. Hacking a smaller company that didn't have one would be child's play for them.

However, no matter how easy it was, it was definitely a crime.

"Was it the blueprints? The server location? I don't really know what they were after..." Albert's "mother" continued.

It was an under-the-table, underhanded, unfair approach.

But hearing all this brought a question to Albert's mind. This was most definitely a peek at the dark side of Technorock—something that they simply couldn't allow to come to light.

How did his "mother" know all this, then?

"And this is what happened next," she said as she lightly waved her hand to turn on the TV, which happened to be showing the news.

"Technorock, a massive US-based game developer, is currently in a state of collapse." Albert watched in shock as the news announcer revealed the details.

Recently, there had been trouble in their network which resulted in a leak of classified files stored on their servers. These files had contained not just the details of their latest hardware, but also evidence of the many cybercrimes they'd committed against rival companies.

This had resulted in the management being arrested and had flung the company into chaos from top to bottom. Their stock prices had plummeted, and today the business had finally fallen apart.

"And while the heart of the trouble was Technorock's control AI, Overture, the classified file leak was followed by an explosion of uncertain origin that—" That was where Albert's "mother" turned off the TV.

"So there you have it." Based on what she'd said thus far, Albert assumed that this must have been the result of a counterattack by ID Supplier—or more specifically, by Infinite Dendrogram.

But how could they have done something like this?

"Well, all this means is that the people behind Infinite Dendrogram have a control AI that can counter-hack and even break current gen corporate control AIs. Maybe it can even take on the cutting-edge stuff used by government agencies... Did the higher-ups not give me permission because they knew that? Or perhaps... Perhaps Infinite Dendrogram has something fundamentally different from the control AIs that we know?"

Her voice dropped to a whisper, and Albert couldn't hear that last part.

However, he had some thoughts about her idea that even the most cutting-edge control AI couldn't measure up. It made him wonder whether there existed something beyond that... Or something of a different kind altogether.

"Oh. I'm not letting you hack them, okay?"

It was as though she read his mind.

Albert had suspected she would say something like that. However, he couldn't have anticipated what she followed it up with.

"I just want you to play the game normally."

"...Huh?"

◇◆

Past, Infinite Dendrogram

A week had passed since his "mother" had told Albert about Infinite

Dendrogram.

Now, he was inside the game.

Since he was somewhat differently shaped than the average user, connecting him had required some hardware modifications, but he'd been able to make it in.

He was now in a place that looked much like a lab. Ahead, he saw a man with a strange silhouette doing some sort of work. Although he had several inhuman features, he was humanoid in overall shape and wore glasses that gave him an air of intelligence.

"Hm?" The spectacled man noticed Albert, looked at him for a moment, then pensively laid a hand on his mouth and looked up at the ceiling.

"I'm surprised... Truly, I am."

Those words seemed to come straight from the heart.

"How much time has passed since No. 0 compensated them with those key technologies? They actually created an information entity capable of logging in, and that's even compatible with Embryos? I understand that they were provided some knowledge, but this... Even our own technology is partially... Wait. According to No. 10, the current publicly available technology is quite far behind this. Is it all due to this entity's creator, then? Is it the work of someone extraordinary?"

Voicing his astonishment at the sight of Albert, the man seemed to be gathering his thoughts.

"First the outsider welcomed by No. 3, now this... The environment there is quite different from that in our homeland... Hm?" The spectacled man then seemed to regain his composure and looked at Albert again. "Apologies. This unexpected phenomenon had me a little shaken."

The word "unexpected" made Albert a bit concerned. While he himself didn't have a strong desire to play, his "mother" had asked him to provide reports about it.

"Oh. No need to worry. You logged in, which means you have a person's... Well, the same qualifications as any other person. Let us proceed with the avatar creation."

A few windows then popped up in front of Albert, allowing him to set his appearance.

He could hardly envision an avatar like himself, so he simply based it on a character from an old movie his "mother" had often watched.

Thus, he created a muscular man, received the necessary items, and had his Embryo implanted in his left hand.

But the moment he received his avatar, his entire body began telling him that something was really wrong.

An awful sense of discomfort consumed him.

"It will be difficult for you at first," the man said. "But you are a rare entity indeed, so I personally hope that you will continue in spite of that. Though, being a Master, that decision is entirely up to you."

The spectacled man—control AI No. 4, Jabberwock—spoke as if he knew what Albert was feeling.

"Regardless, welcome to Infinite Dendrogram. We truly appreciate your arrival."

Following those words, Albert was flung into the air and plummeted toward the country he'd chosen as his starting point—Caldina.

◇◆

Thus, like many other players, Albert landed near Caldina's largest city...

But he was overwhelmed by shock as the sensation from earlier not only did not go away, but actually got worse.

His sense of smell taking in the air, the tastes in his mouth, even the feeling of the wind caressing his skin—all this impossible information distorted his world.

The people behind Infinite Dendrogram claimed that it was profoundly realistic, but Albert's problem was far more fundamental than that.

Many users suffered immense discomfort while playing NEXT WORLD, but none of them had felt anything close to what Albert was currently experiencing.

The five senses themselves—the fatal error that we call a human body—had rendered him unable to even move.

Albert Schwartzkaiser was an anomalous electronic life-form, and to him, the very flesh and blood avatar he'd received was a source of errors that tortured his senses.

In real life, he was a mechanical computer that simply contained the information that made up his mind. With his avatar granting him sensations he simply couldn't have, Albert was overcome by a sense of discomfort that rendered him unable to even stand, and he collapsed on the sandy ground.

Assaulted by these unknown senses and unable to even activate the log-out process, Albert spent several hours like that.

However, the pain eventually vanished.

This was because his Embryo hatched, replacing his entire body with one that was fully mechanical.

The errors subsided as soon as that occurred.

Albert once again only had vision, hearing, and a degree of pressure sensitivity—senses he already knew well.

Thanks to the Embryo that had become his body, he was able to adapt to this world and overcome his suffering.

Having thus gained the ability to move, he proceeded to practice it. After about a week of such training, he could move as well as any other person and began operating like any other Master.

He engaged in the extermination of harmful monsters, tested himself in duels—he did much of what anyone might expect a Master to do.

Throughout all this, his body—Septentrion—evolved into a Superior Embryo. This caught the eye of Caldina's president, and he was invited to join Sefirot. Since then, he'd followed her orders and continued to hunt UBMs, as well as battle wanted Masters.

The final and greatest exception to such work was his participation in The Tournaments.

◇◆◇

Gideon, City of Duels, Central Arena

Figaro was now wielding the strongest sword from his expansive arsenal.

Albert was clad in the most fearsome armor from his massive collection.

The two clashed, but Albert had the upper hand.

Though wielding Gloria α, Figaro couldn't use its Overdrive without getting close to Albert. If he used this powerful skill from a distance, he would have to fire horizontally—but with the barrier being right behind Albert, it was possible that it would break it and harm the audience.

Indeed—Albert wasn't the only one who had to worry about his MVP rewards causing damage to the spectators. That was exactly why Figaro had defeated Xunyu by firing the weapon vertically at point-blank range.

He would have to do the same thing with Albert, but getting close to him meant being in range of his fists. Even if Figaro used Overdrive first, the briefest pause during the firing would allow Albert to reach him.

And Albert could come back at least one more time. If he committed to a desperate retaliation, that would be the end of the battle right there.

Of course, even without its Overdrive, Gloria α was an awfully powerful blade that could be empowered with the heat of light.

Figaro might have been able to evade Albert's attacks and simply cut him apart—though that wouldn't change the fact that just a single hit would be enough to kill him.

A single impact—no, a single scratch—would be fatal.

To make matters worse, Figaro didn't know the extent of Albert's resistances. He'd already been brought near death by both fire and physical damage, granting him resistance to both. Light and slashing damage were both adjacent to those types, so Figaro's chances of a successful attack depended on how broad Albert's damage resistance actually was.

Regardless, each of them had fangs aimed at each other's throat.

All that really mattered now was how well they wielded them.

While Figaro silently tried to chart his path to victory, Albert took to action immediately.

This was an obvious move. Albert still had a life left, so if they clashed as they were now, he would most certainly emerge victorious. If anything, giving Figaro any time to find a way out of this predicament would be an awful idea.

"O o o r g h..." With attack power that exceeded even King of Destruction's capabilities, and with the defenses to match, the armor let out a devilish groan as Albert charged ahead—an all-consuming, devastating sprint, each step of which left cracks and craters in the remnants of the arena.

He wasn't even using any other MVP rewards.

Was that simply because nothing he had surpassed Exademon in pure attack power? Or was there some other reason for it?

For a moment, it looked as though Albert was going to charge directly at Figaro, but then Albert kicked a stray rock.

It shattered under the immense force, but the kinetic energy from the impact sent its shards flying ahead at supersonic speeds.

As though they were fired from a shotgun, they flew toward Figaro, leaving him nowhere to run.

Though his eyes widened, Figaro didn’t even try to dodge.

Instead, he imbued Gloria α’s blade with searing light and swung it, precisely cutting down and destroying all the rock shrapnel flying toward him. As unavoidable and deadly as it seemed, Figaro was able to defend himself against this dangerous attack.

However, this was well within Albert’s expectations. In the brief time Figaro focused on defense, he closed the distance between them.

Just a few more steps until the armor’s fists could reach his opponent.

If Figaro met the punch with his blade, both their bodies would shatter—and only Albert would be left standing.

That was what the entire audience expected, and when their eyes focused on Albert’s raised fist, not even a tenth of them noticed how Figaro’s appearance had changed.

“That’s...!” What the more observant spectators saw was a new piece of equipment Figaro had put on using Instant Wear.

Actually, it wasn’t quite accurate to call it “new.” After all, it was one of the items that defined his appearance.

It was his blue coat—“Rendshield Cloak, Closer.” Left behind by the first UBM he’d ever defeated, it had been with him longer than any other item in his vast arsenal.

One of its skills...

“Rendshield.”

...briefly but completely shut off any attacks coming from the outside.

The barrier that went up was immediately struck by a blow so powerful it surpassed even King of Destruction.

The impact shook the very air as the shock wave spread throughout the entire venue.

However, the barrier didn’t even shake. Despite the incredible power it had just been subjected to, it remained completely unaffected.

A split second after the impact, Figaro deliberately dropped the barrier...

“Fang of Gloria: Overdrive.”

...and, just as he’d done against Xunyu, Figaro swung the sword upward to deliver the Overdrive to his enemy.

He'd retaliated against Albert's attack with his ultimate firepower, and everything was executed with flowing perfection. He'd negated the damage at the moment the punch had landed, canceled his defense right after the clash, and gone in for his slash without leaving any openings to take advantage of.

It was a technique much like Ray's Impact Counter but possessed of even greater finesse.

Shock overcame Albert. He couldn't even react. Though his attack and defense were greatly increased, Figaro still had higher AGI, and the counterattack had been executed too brilliantly. He didn't have time to back away, launch another attack in response, or deal with the Overdrive in any way.

Though they both were entirely capable of killing each other in theory, in practice Figaro was simply on another level.

And so, unable to do anything about it, Albert was pierced by burning light.

It shot through the first layers of arena barriers, then the ones added by Integra, creating a pillar of light reaching toward the sky.

Any parts of Exademon that were caught in its wake evaporated, along with any of Albert's body that was inside.

It was as though his fire resistance was powerless before this scorching light—as though the difference in how the heat was delivered was paramount.

Whatever the reason, Albert's HP instantly fell to 1...

"η: Alkaid."

...and he finally used the seventh—Septentrion's final heal and buff skill.

"The Seven Stars—Septentrion."

But this time, it was followed by another skill declaration.

Figaro's eyes widened as he heard Albert's voice—and because he heard it, he instantly flew into action.

Figaro had let Albert use this final regeneration on purpose, hoping to use his speed advantage to finish Albert off immediately after.

Albert's body was now restored, and though clad in half-destroyed armor and empowered by a resistance to light-based heat, he couldn't stop a slash from Gloria α's naked blade.

Tsukuyo had called him "fragile," and he could do nothing to resist the attack aimed straight for his throat.

Shortly after being restored—before he could even move—Albert was decapitated.

Thus, King of Termination was defeated. Everyone was certain that Figaro had emerged victorious.

But then, he was attacked from six directions.

Figaro’s eyes widened. A bursting net of flames, a cannonball, a shock wave, a frigid blizzard, a dark mist, a fixed damage projectile...

The moment Figaro thought he had defeated Albert, six kinds of attacks rained down on him.

Even Figaro couldn’t respond to all of them in time, and he was soon consumed by this storm of destruction.

◇◆

“Huh?!”

Sandalphon—the Superior Embryo tasked with security—was watching the duel as well. This was only natural, as the man his Master loved was one of the combatants. Thus, as he made sure the venue was safe, he watched the duel alongside Hannya.

And of course, right when he thought Figaro had won, the battle was flipped upside down.

“What is this...?” There was perhaps no better reaction than that. It felt as though it wasn’t just the battle that had been overturned, but the very rules of the engagement itself. The scene before him was simply that shocking.

There were now six Alberts standing on the stage.

Albert had already used his final revival and had his head severed from his body, but there were now six of him.

This reminded the audience of a certain high-ranking duelist—Tom Cat, the ex-champion who dominated the battlefield using an ultimate skill that let him multiply and revive without limit.

However, what Albert had done wasn’t quite the same.

The Seven Stars—Septentrion. That was the ult of Albert’s Superior Embryo, Seven Star Turnover, Septentrion.

It could only be used after seven revivals, and its effect was to present the results of his learning and overcoming all at once.

The six doubles of Albert who were still standing and the one who had been decapitated were based on the skills he’d gained, starting with α: Dubhe and ending with η: Alkaid.

The fire-resistant Albert Dubhe.

The Petrification-resistant Albert Merak.

The physical-impact-resistant Albert Phecda.

The frost-resistant Albert Megrez.

The dark-resistant Albert Alioth.

The fixed damage-resistant Albert Mizar.

The light-resistant Albert Alkaid.

Turned over to reveal seven stars—seven bodies that had different resistances and means of attack.

This also gave Albert extra attack power. By having each version of himself wield weapons with penalties that were canceled out by his resistances, he became an even greater force of destruction. He didn't seem to have anything that took advantage of Petrification specifically, but every other weapon the duplicates wielded was much like the ones that Albert had used before—high-power MVP rewards that disregarded the wielder's safety.

Even Figaro would have a hard time if exposed to such fearsome attacks from basically every direction.

"Lady Hannya...! Umm, Master Figaro is..."

While Figaro's fiancée stared intently at the stage, silently clasping her hands together as if in prayer, Sandalphon gave her a sympathetic, almost panicked look.

"Calm down, Sandalphon."

However, the one to respond to him first was the person standing on the other side of Hannya.

It was another Superior tasked with security—Shu Starling.

"That's the kinda move Sechs would make, and it caught me by surprise, that's for sure... But Figgy hasn't lost this yet." As though to prove Shu right, the dust from the destruction began to clear.

Behind the curtain, Figaro was still standing. Though wounded all over and leaning heavily on Gloria α for support, he was still upright.

The outcome of this duel was yet undecided.

However, his situation was dire. Figaro was seriously hurt, and defeating the remaining six Alberts would be a challenge even for him.

"That just leaves five." But Shu's count of Albert's duplicates didn't match the number visible on the stage.

A moment later, one of them—the one with fixed damage resistance, Albert Mizar—swayed where he stood and collapsed backward.

Without even changing his pose, he shattered into pieces and became nothing more than a pile of rocks.

"What...?"

"Figgy's counterattack," said Shu. "When the six attacks came in, he fired that gun toward one of ’em.”

Why had Figaro thought that Marbledrop would have any effect when Albert already had resistance to Petrification?

It was because he’d realized Albert’s resistances had been scattered the moment he felt his blade sink into the seventh duplicate’s neck.

Albert was supposed to have resistance to physical impacts, but Figaro had not felt any when slashing him. Combined with the fact that he’d instantly been targeted by six separate attacks, Figaro’s instincts had worked faster than his mind to conclude that Albert had split himself into seven forms, each bearing a different resistance and mode of attack.

And so, with two Alberts having projectile attacks, Figaro spotted them both and retaliated against them with Marbledrop’s bullets that passed through all inorganic material.

One of the Alberts he’d shot was the Petrification-resistant Albert Merak, so the attack was negated, but the other was Albert Mizar, who was only resistant to fixed damage.

It was this decisive action and reaction that allowed Figaro to survive.

Albert stared at him in silence. He’d realized that Figaro was still alive when he noticed that the barrier was still up. But after having timed his attack so perfectly and still suffering a loss to Figaro’s retaliation, Albert decided to refrain from attacking further and assumed a more cautious approach.

This was the opposite of what he’d done earlier, but it was the correct decision now. The situation had shifted, and the barrage had left Figaro with multiple injury- and curse-based status effects. The Bleeding and Burning debuffs were steadily lowering his HP, while the Magic Drain and Soul Drain curses sapped his MP and SP.

The many items that Figaro could use to resist such effects only worked if he’d put them on ahead of time. With duels forbidding the use of recovery items, there were very few ways to remove a debuff that had already been applied.

Time was on Albert’s side now, and he outnumbered Figaro five to one. Even if Figaro retaliated and destroyed one Albert, the remaining four would overwhelm him.

And that was exactly why Albert took the safe approach. Figaro might have managed to survive Albert’s first barrage, but he had no means of turning this around. The countdown to his defeat had already begun.

The scales of victory were tipping in Albert’s favor.

“Umm...” At that moment, just as the entire venue fell silent at the realization that their champion was going to fall, Sandalphon spoke up.

His Master, Hannya, still had her eyes fixed on Figaro with hands clasped as if in prayer.

“What?” Shu asked.

“Can he still win? Does he have anything to turn this around?”

Shu fell silent for a moment at Sandalphon’s question. He knew that the Over Gladiator’s job ult was useless for someone who had no other SJs, and he knew that Figaro wouldn’t use Cor Leonis’s ult here either. With how severe Figaro’s injuries were, using it would only kill him.

“Will he... Will he lose...?”

Did all that mean that Figaro would be defeated?

“I dunno what he’ll do about this... But there’s no way he’s losin’.”

And yet, Shu still denied that possibility.

“But how...?”

Shu was really confident, but that wasn’t a question for him to answer.

“Because...he’s him.”

Finally, Hannya broke her silence with an explanation.

It wasn’t a reason that would make sense to anyone else. However, Figaro’s friend, sitting by her side, thought she was completely right.

“Vincent will win this.”

Hannya spoke with certainty as she declared that her beloved would emerge victorious.

◇◆

A question appeared in Albert’s mind as he faced Figaro in this five-on-one battle.

Time was on his side, but as it flowed by, he couldn’t help but wonder why Figaro wasn’t doing anything.

The Over Gladiator must’ve been aware of the debuffs draining his HP, MP, and SP. Death drew closer every moment, and more and more of his skills became unusable.

Why, then, was Figaro maintaining this deadlock?

Albert had a guess, of course.

He knew that Figaro's equipment enhancement became more efficient as more time passed.

However, Figaro was barely going to last even a few more minutes. Just how great of an improvement could he expect in this short amount of time? And even if he was greatly empowered, what would be the point of it if he couldn't even use his skills?

Because of this, inaction had to be the wrong decision. Figaro had to defeat Albert while he still had the power to do so.

Figaro must've understood this—and yet he wasn't doing anything. Albert couldn't help but wonder why.

"...Phew." Breathing raggedly, Figaro seemed to be observing the Alberts surrounding him.

Was he preparing to respond in case they took action? Or was he searching for a path to victory?

The champion slowly looked around as if trying to sense something.

I can't see it. I can't feel it. It really doesn't seem like there's anything there. But...

Figaro was lost in thought. Defeat was drawing closer by the second, and he was searching for a way to repel it.

I couldn't see the moment he split into seven. I didn't even realize he was doing that. I didn't look away from the seventh for even a moment...but next thing I knew, I was surrounded.

Figaro was thinking as hard as he could. He replayed the flow of events that had led to this situation in his mind and let intuition do its job.

He firmly believed that that was where he would find his chance at victory.

Right. The very first attack. He was turning the flamethrowers.

When using Firelyx, Albert had turned the fires to target Figaro, licking the entire stage with its tongues of flame. Figaro had managed to evade them, but it was still an area attack that was blasted in every direction indiscriminately.

I didn't see anything strange about the shape of the fire. There was nothing in its way. That means...

Figaro finally reached an answer.

"I see how it is."

His sudden words caused a stir in the five remaining Alberts...

"I finally see the last part of your trick."

...and the word "trick" caused a murmur to ripple through the audience.

If this was about Albert's healing and buff skill, then its workings had been clear for a while now.

If it was about him splitting into seven parts, then that was an ult—hardly a "trick."

What was Figaro referring to, then?

"Anyway... It's time to end this."

And then, the Over Gladiator took action.

The time that had passed, though, had ravaged Figaro's body. He could no longer use his devastating Overdrive.

Instead, the move he chose to make was...

"Liferend Shield Formation."

...another skill from Rendshield Cloak, Closer.

It was the ultimate move of the UBM it came from, and it created countless shield blades that both protected its wielder and sliced anything that came too close.

However, using it in this situation seemed like an awful idea. While it wasn't as costly as Overdrive, using this rendered Figaro unable to use any other skills. It also wasn't enough to block the Albert duplicates' immensely powerful attacks, nor did it have enough offensive power to destroy them.

No matter how it was used, the skill would not be enough. It didn't make sense.

"HIII-YAH!" Figaro swung his arm, sending the countless blades flying like a winter hailstorm.

They ricocheted within the arena, dealing damage to the five Alberts.

But just as he and everyone else expected, the firepower just wasn't enough.

Though frail as far as SJs went, Albert was still a combat-focused Superior Job. The blades did little if Albert just assumed a defensive stance, and each duplicate had high enough HP that most of this damage was irrelevant.

Most importantly, the attacks simply weren't concentrated enough. Split between the five Alberts, the blades simply weren't able to deal enough damage to end this.

In fact, despite all the Alberts being on the ground, some of the blades had been launched into the air.

The audience tilted their heads in confusion, the hardened fighters watched in disbelief...and Albert changed his expression for the first time.

Figaro's seemingly meaningless area attack made all five Alberts open their eyes wide.

They prepared to shift from defense to attack in order to stop Figaro's blades...when a light thud could be heard amid the chaos. One of the airborne blades had struck something.

"Oh. Guess I was right." And with that, Figaro instantly leaped into the sky.

This was something he'd done in his fight against Gloria.

Using the shield-blades as platforms, he rushed upward.

◇◆

There were a few things that Figaro had found strange in this duel against Albert.

The first was his second heal and buff.

Despite having been Petrified and shattered, Albert was able to declare the β: Merak skill and revive.

That had made Figaro wonder how he'd been able to speak the skill's name despite being turned to stone.

Next were Albert's fourth and fifth comebacks. Figaro had most certainly delivered fatal damage to Albert while Rear Soldier's Last Stand was still on cooldown.

Despite that, Albert still survived with 1 HP and bounced back from it.

Figaro had been pondering how he was able to accomplish that when the job skill that supposedly made it possible was inactive.

And finally, it had been the ultimate that split Albert into seven.

Figaro had defeated Tom Cat, and he knew about King of Crime. Because of this, he was aware that duplicates created by such skills usually split off from their source.

However, that hadn't been the case for Albert.

Figaro had been entirely focused on the Albert that had possessed all the resistances to his attacks—but before he knew it, Figaro had been surrounded.

This untelegraphed split was the third thing Figaro found strange.

Only one thing could adequately explain these three phenomena.

Albert's main body had to be elsewhere.

Everything would make sense if he had a separate body with only 1 HP.

If his main body was elsewhere, he could declare skills despite Petrification.

If his main body was elsewhere, he would have 1 HP left even when he couldn't use his job skill.

If his main body was elsewhere, Figaro's focus on the opponent in front of him would have caused him to miss the split.

But if there really was such a main body, then where would it be?

It was Albert's own actions that had provided a hint.

While he used Firelyx to spread flames in every direction, covering the entire stage, it didn't seem like anything had been caught in them. That could only mean one thing—the main body had to be somewhere the flames hadn't reached. The only option was up in the air.

Figaro had used the Liferend Shield Formation to confirm this.

And now, having pinpointed its location, he used the blade shields as platforms to reach it.

◇◆

Albert—in other words, his main body—looked down at Figaro in silence.

The Over Gladiator's intuition had been right.

g: Alcor. It was a barely visible star close to the Big Dipper—Septentrion. Its name had roots in the Arabic "al-khawāri," meaning "faint one," and some cultures claimed that anyone who could no longer see the star was fated to die.

It was the skill that pointed to Albert's nature as a mechanical being, as well as the brain—the core—that existed outside his human-shaped body, Septentrion.

Being a machine enabled him to split his brain and his body. About the size of a golf ball, this metallic object floating about was where Albert's mind resided.

He had used all five accessory slots to both cloak himself visually and obfuscate his skills, and he'd used damage reduction to keep him safe from weak attacks like the blade shield strike.

Indeed—this was the truth behind Albert's near death and healing buff combination.

The job was a decoy. While Albert did have Rear Soldier, it was merely a bluff to lead his enemies to a false conclusion.

In reality, Albert would have survived death even without Last Stand. The secret behind his survivability wasn't that skill, but the way his own body worked.

This was the trick Albert used to become the powerful Superior that he was.

But now, the trick was exposed.

And Figaro, the one who'd seen through it, was now charging toward him, Gloria α in hand.

The Over Gladiator shouldn't have been able to see his main body at all, but there was no hesitation in his dash.

The moment one of the shield blades touched the core, multiple other blades swarmed to surround and cage it. Albert had nowhere to run.

The five bodies looking up at them all fired everything they had at Figaro.

This was an extremely close game. Would Figaro reach and split the core in time? Or would Albert's attacks finally bring him down?

Only one Superior could win this, and every single second counted.

But Albert soon realized that he was going to emerge victorious. Figaro was injured, so the speed of his ascent couldn't outrun the attacks from Albert's bodies down below.

Though the champion had made the first move, the gap was closing fast. Albert's attacks would hit Figaro before he reached the core.

And Figaro didn't have any means of attack besides Gloria α. He no longer had the MP or SP to use any other MVP reward skills.

Albert's victory was set in stone.

He calculated this future in the blink of an eye—but then he noticed something odd.

During this brief moment, something had changed about Figaro again—the weapon in his hand was different.

It wasn’t Gloria α, or some MVP reward, but a long chain wrapped around his right hand.

A Crimson Dead Keeper—one of his most favored weapons, known for its immense reach. It could most certainly land a hit on the core before Albert’s attacks touched him.

Albert knew that it wouldn’t matter much if it did, though. Unlike the seven duplicates, the main body had all of its previous resistances. An attack from the Crimson Dead Keeper couldn’t even take away its 1 HP.

With Figaro’s final move rendered meaningless, Albert’s victory would be completely certain.

And yet, it wasn’t.

The moment the chain reached, Albert noticed...

Gloria α was tied to its tip.

Shock overcame King of Termination. An unorthodox use of weaponry—combining two items that were never meant to be combined.

The gladiator grouping granted multiple weapon slots for each hand.

This was Figaro’s strongest weapon, combined with his most-used weapon.

Perhaps because of that, despite the bizarre arrangement, there was no flaw in the trajectory of the slash.

It was a brilliant move that rendered irrelevant the distance, the time, and the inherent weakness of his chains.

Albert was in awe. When had Figaro gotten the idea to do this?

When he realized that Albert’s attacks would reach him first?

Or maybe when he dashed into the sky?

Or perhaps the moment he used Liferend Shield Formation?

Regardless, Albert hadn’t seen this coming and could do nothing against it.

Though swung on the end of a chain, Gloria α carried more than enough power for this task.

Albert’s core had no resistance to slashing attacks, and this blow would no doubt take away its 1 HP.

Figaro had used his own prowess to flip the scales of victory in his favor.

How? Because he was him, of course.

“Good game. You are the winner.” With a mechanical voice praising his opponent in English, Albert's core was split in two, and all five of his remaining duplicates on the stage vanished.

Reward: Mythical "Night Sky General, O'oimimaru."
Core traits: Unknown (Space alteration?)
Winner: Over Gladiator, Figaro.

Chapter 11: Bringing the Climax

About G

Overlord Invidia, G. Real name: Ginga Fujiwara.

She was born in a rather ordinary Japanese household, but one could easily say she led a charmed life, as she had many friends and got along well with her entire family, including her older brother.

However, starting when she was very young, this same brother had given her a bit of an inferiority complex.

He wasn't exceptionally smart, nor was he terribly athletic. If anything, Ginga was the more capable one.

However, there was one thing that set them apart: Her brother had been recognized as a novelist at a very young age. He'd made his debut in his teens—when Ginga was still in elementary school—and his talents as a writer were immediately made clear.

Her brother might as well have inhabited an entirely different world, shining almost like a star, and looking up at him always made her feel jealous and miserable.

On an exam, a perfect score was the best you could do. Gym class wasn't exactly a place for breaking records and standing out, no matter how much effort you put in. Ginga was envious of her brother for having a talent that allowed him to go beyond what most people his age could achieve and shine so much brighter than she did.

He was a wonderful sibling, and she certainly didn't hate him—quite the opposite, really.

But that didn't stop her from feeling jealous all the same.

She wanted to shine brighter than he did—no, brighter than anyone in the world.

That was how she ended up on the path of a content creator fairly early in life.

She'd tried being a writer just like her brother, but she couldn't reach his level, and she didn't think she was beautiful enough to make it as an idol or a movie star.

However, Ginga did have a talent for photography and film. She was a natural at bringing out her subjects' charms in her photos and videos, and she found she could easily hone this skill further.

Perhaps if she just focused on the path of cameraman or director, Ginga thought, she might be recognized artistically at a young age, just like her brother had.

But that wasn't what she really wanted either.

Though she did have a knack for making others shine, she wanted to be the brightest star in the sky herself. The problem with that was that there simply wasn't anything exceptional about her.

But that didn't stop her from trying—struggling, even.

A few people called her voice cute, so she tried to harness that. Eventually, Ginga looked into all the related technology she could find and eventually became a devil girl VTuber—G. She streamed gaming content, did karaoke, and made videos using her photography and editing skills.

While that did earn her some recognition, she never reached the level that she wanted.

No matter how she tried to shine like her brother did, he only grew brighter by the day.

She just couldn't reach him. As more time passed, the gap between them widened, and her jealousy deepened even further.

One day, for a change of pace, Ginga went on a trip to the sea and took a photo of it in the evening. The setting sun and its faint reflection upon the water made for a fantastic shot.

But the sight of it made a thought spring to her mind.

"...This sea is me."

No matter how beautifully it shone, it was just a reflection—the sea had no light of its own. Even the light it reflected never reached the bottom—all that was there was stagnation.

No matter what the sea did, it would never reach the stars above.

With that thought, she was about to give up on ever matching her brother...

"Infinite Dendrogram will provide you with a new world and your one and only possibility!"

...and that was when she heard an advertisement for a certain game.

This new world—this new stage—would prove to be a turning point for her.

Ginga's Infinite Dendrogram avatar was more than just a virtual form. It allowed her to live in this world as herself, but with an appearance completely unlike her own.

This was the chance to shine she'd always longed for.

G learned to use the magical filming equipment within Dendro to plan out and execute productions that she starred in.

R'lyeh—her studio—assisted her by painting the world as she wanted it to be.

As her Infinite Dendrogram videos gained a lot of popularity, she eventually joined a clan and started participating in various in-game activities with them.

She garnered more and more popularity, and eventually, the site she was active on sent her something—the silver award given to those who reached one hundred thousand subscribers.

The moment she saw its shine, Ginga—the girl who had always wanted to shine brighter than anyone else—felt as if everything had finally paid off. The next time she logged in, her R'lyeh had become a Superior Embryo.

It was as though that feeling had been the trigger for it.

That was how she became a Superior.

However, both the silver award and the Embryo evolution were nothing but milestones to her. She'd once considered giving up on her dream, but now she wouldn't even consider it.

Becoming a Superior had given her new powers, and at some point she was made leader of her clan. She intended to use everything she could get her hands on to make videos that would make her shine.

For that purpose, she did a lot of things she had never done before and recorded it all.

She'd braved the Depths of Jealousy to become Overlord Invidia and claimed the throne.

She'd orchestrated plans to fight the corrupt order of Legendaria and rebelled against it.

She'd formed an alliance with other anti-Legendaria Superiors and collabed with them.

She'd challenged Legendaria's idol and head of state and battled her with song.

And now, she had picked a fight with the world's most famous newbie and tried to avenge her brother.

A girl who would do anything to promote herself—to make herself shine.

That was Ginga Fujiwara—Overlord Invidia, G.

◇◆◇

Encroaching Sea-Altar, R'lyeh, Depths of Jealousy

"Ah ha ha ha ha! Let's go! Let's do this! Here I come!" Brandishing her trident and filled with fighting spirit, Overlord Invidia charged at Juliet.

The girl's eyes widened. Juliet had a wealth of combat experience, but the largest opponents she'd faced thus far were the Armordragon King she'd battled during the Exodragon King incident and Rosa after using her ult to create an exoskeleton.

However, G was now larger than either of them—and had stats that surpassed them both. Her trident thrusts were more like the charge of a battering ram. They left her completely open to attacks, but the overwhelming strength of her massive form shattered the stonework whenever she moved. She was like a natural disaster in human form.

But she also had a technique that no natural calamity could possibly possess.

This was demonstrated by the thread of light extending from the tip of the trident and connecting to Juliet's body.

Ah...! The pull's even stronger than before! Juliet thought. Harodihg Gnik's force apparently scaled with the wielder's STR. Held by G in her second form, it could attract its prey with over ten times more power than before.

The fearsome pull left Juliet so unbalanced that she couldn't even cast her dark magic to block G's sight.

That thread of light was now a nigh unavoidable death sentence.

"Purgatorial Flames!"

Ray, however, would not let that sentence be carried out. Extending his left hand, he made his Miasmaflame Bracer spew its fire.

With G's vision blocked, the thread of light was severed, allowing Juliet to escape the charge.

But a moment later, the trident was swept sideways, tearing through the fire as it flew in Ray's direction.

His eyes widened. G's thread of light had only been a feint, intended to bait Ray into trying to block her line of sight.

Not minding the flames whatsoever, she broke through and closed the distance between them.

"Ah ha ha ha ha! What're you gonna do now?!" As her reversed and enhanced Poison debuff regenerated her bunt flesh, G swung her trident at Ray.

He didn't have the time to meet her weapon with his—and her mighty sweep would've simply shattered the halberd in any case.

"Counter Absorption!"

Instead, Nemesis quickly transformed into her greatsword form and blocked the attack using her barrier of light. Though the barrier creaked at the impact, the Overlord's trident didn't break it.

"There's more where that came from!"

But the moment both of them stopped moving, G reactivated the Attraction Anchor, connecting it to Ray this time.

Ray was abruptly dragged out from behind the barrier of light and flew straight toward the tip of the trident...

"I won't let you...!"

But this time, Juliet attacked G with her magic, severing the filament of light.

Ray used the opening to switch back to Nemesis's Flag Halberd and backed away from the Overlord.

"Ah ha ha! Almost nobody lasts this long after I transform! You two are pretty good!" G laughed and praised them, but neither Ray nor Juliet were in a state to appreciate it.

One wrong move and a single hit would break them. G's massive stat increase had also made Harodihg Gnik far more fearsome than before.

If Ray and Juliet didn't coordinate to block G's vision continuously, defeat was inevitable.

"Your party's gotta be in perfect sync or you wipe," Ray said. "What is this, an MMO raid?"

"Huh? It kinda is, isn't it?" G asked.

“...Yeah, you’ve got a point.” Dendro was definitely an online RPG, and G was very much like a boss monster, so Ray couldn’t help but agree. “I can see why she’s called the most Overlord-ish of them all.”

“She really does look the part of a horrifying monster,” said Nemesis as she looked up at G, now standing three metels tall—not quite sizable enough to be truly monstrous, but enormous for a person.

As though she’d heard that, G froze as if shocked and laid a hand on her chest.

“I mean, it depends on how bad my debuffs are, but this is generally how I end up. Whenever I transform, my clan and all the comments on my videos often tell me to change back. Personally, I think both my forms are fine...”

“I-I do think it looks cool and sexy, though...” For some reason, G was starting to look a bit sad, so Juliet couldn’t help but share her honest thoughts in the hope it would make her feel better.

Ray, however...

“I mean, if they like the cute design of your first form, of course they’d want you to turn back. You really don’t pass as a ‘charming devil’ right now. You’re more like some kinda hulking demon or something.”

...wasn’t as kind.

“Thanks, Julie! Unbreakable, though... You’re dead meat!”

“As if you weren’t trying to kill me anyway! Bring it on!” G was in the middle of trying to PK Ray and taking his arena. His rebuttal was entirely reasonable.

But unfortunately... he thought. Fighting her head-on might be a bit hard now.

They had about ten minutes left until the arena was taken.

G had grown a lot stronger, and she quickly regenerated most damage done to her. If there was any way for Ray to defeat her, it was by using Counter Absorption to stock up damage for a fatal use of Vengeance, or...

Wait. If all I want is to prevent her from taking our arena, I should forget about G herself and go for...

“Oh? Are you looking for the trapezohedron?” G asked, noticing that Ray was looking around.

Ray’s eyes widened. Indeed, that was exactly what he’d been thinking—if they just needed to stop her ult, they could ignore G and for that instead.

"If that's what you're planning, then I'll do..."

Reading his intentions, G took the trapezohedron from her chest...

"This."

...and swallowed it whole.

"Huh?!"

"Wha—?!"

"Aaand nooowww... You have no choice but to fight me! There's no escape!" As Ray and Juliet were struck dumb with shock, G flashed a mischievous—but belligerent—smile. "Now! Let's go! Let's do this! It's bombing time! Ah ha ha ha ha!" With a loud laugh, G resumed the battle, firing countless black light projectiles.

It was the same low-rank spell she'd used before, far from the strength of a job ult, but...

"Ah!"

"There's so damn many...!"

When released by G's second form, there were too many projectiles to count—easily hundreds of them. Ray's and Juliet's eyes widened as the projectiles flew toward them. Dark magic could only be blocked by dark or its opposite—holy.

Juliet began to throw out every dark spell she had while slicing at the bolts with her Gradsoul empowered by Darkness of Valediction, while Ray fought the barrage with his halberd imbued with Purifying Silverlight.

"I can keep this up all day! How long will you last? What will you do next? I'm dying to see it!"

However, just neutralizing the attack didn't do anything to stop it. There was simply no end to G's hail of darkness, even without any chanting and with the ever-increasing MP cost she must have been incurring to bypass the skill declaration.

Normally, such careless magic would quickly use up the caster's MP, but she was an exception. As Overlord, she had high MP to start with, and not only had it been enhanced further by her transformation, but her MP was constantly regenerating thanks to the reversed Magic Drain.

Her spending and regeneration were perfectly balanced, enabling a perpetual barrage. They might've been low in power, but the volume of these projectiles made them into something fearsome indeed.

This is bad...! A cold sweat started to bead on the back of Juliet's neck.

However barely, she was still holding on.

But if this went on for much longer, she would run out of MP long before her opponent, and the rain of projectiles would grow even more intense. Neither Ray nor Juliet would be able to withstand that—they would quickly be overwhelmed.

And this wasn't even the only thing G could do.

"Is it too much?! You can handle this, right?! I'm sure you can!" Still firing the dark magic barrage with her left hand, she used her right to ready Harodihg Gnik.

Judging by the way she charged forward, the buff from Paradigm Shift had only made her more excited.

Their hands full with the dark magic, Ray and Juliet were unable to dodge, and Nemesis's Counter Absorption would surely be wasted on the projectiles.

The Overlord cackled as she approached, looming over Ray and Juliet like a towering bear. She swung her trident at them.

As death drew closer, Ray prepared to make his final gamble...

"Maddened Blade, Sip Their Blood—Ipetam."

...but then, a hundred blades sliced through the air, aimed straight at the Overlord.

"Oh? Oh my." The blades failed to even pierce G's skin, but she still stopped and looked at where they'd come from—the mouth of the passageway leading into the throne room.

"Kept ya waitin', didn't we?"

"So she's not just stupid huge, but stupid tough now too! And I thought the octopus was bad!"

The two figures who appeared were people Juliet knew very well.

"Chelsea! Max!" The moment the barrage stopped, Juliet and Ray backed away from G.

The Overlord didn't mind and looked over the four with a smile.

"You took care of the mermen?!" Ray asked.

"Yeah!" said Chelsea. "They just stopped comin'!"

G had been manually sending out the APMs using R'lyeh's powers. However, when she started fighting Ray and Juliet, she wasn't able to keep the process up, and as a result the flow of mermen stopped. This allowed Chelsea and Max to finish any that were left and come to help Ray and Juliet.

“Eh heh heh. This is good. This is great, even! Things are heating up!”

The enemy received reinforcements, but the Overlord wasn’t flustered in the slightest. The shallow wounds opened by the hundred blades had already healed, leaving only small drops of blood that she licked away with a smile.

“Everyone’s here! The party that will fight the Overlord is complete!” Despite the fact that there were more enemies now, a change in circumstances that was entirely a disadvantage to her, G laughed as if she were truly happy. “Now! You have five minutes left! Gather your courage and fight me!”

At the peak of excitement, she shouted out loud.

“This is the climax!”

The preface was over—this was the real start of the battle.

G welcomed her enemies—her costars on the stage—with nothing but pure glee and anticipation.

This was her territory, and the pressure of the power she wielded as Overlord made her a match for any Superior. Her voice alone was enough to shake the air and send chills down the spines of those before her.

“...Yeah.” However, Ray remained unshaken, prepared to face her directly. “The arena, getting back at me, and turning all of that into content... You really just do whatever you want, huh?”

He held up a finger for each of G’s goals...

“But you’re right—this is the climax. The curtain’s ready to fall on your stage.”

...but in the end, he curled his hand into a tight fist.

“We’re winning this game. I hope you’re ready, Invidia.”

“You’re the best, Unbreakable!” G heard his declaration loud and clear. He was meeting and exceeding her expectations.

Thus, the final battle began, and G made the first move.

“Leeet’s gooo! Harodihg Gnik... FULL DRIVE!” Three threads of light extended from the tips of the trident, capturing Ray, Juliet, and Max.

Their eyes widened. This was the weapon’s secret trick—Attraction Anchor could be used on several targets at once. G had kept this hidden while fighting just Ray and Juliet, but she’d decided that now was the time for the big reveal. She knew how strong those two were, and she knew that

Max had cut down her Cthulhu in a single slash, so she chose to pull and bind them by force—an effective move.

However, this could only bind three people at most...

"Ohhh? You're leavin' me free? Really underestimatin' me, aren't ya?"

And she had four foes.

G's eyes widened. She'd seen Chelsea's sparring and knew her strategy. Because of that, she didn't think that the pirate would be much of a threat where there was little water and she couldn't summon her ship.

It was important to remember, though: Chelsea hadn't needed those things to become eighth in the duel rankings of Altar—the holy land of duelists. Water or not, there were plenty of things she could do.

"Golden Bull Tsunami—Poseidon." A crushing waterfall of liquid gold flooded over G's head.

"This is pretty! A bit light, though, don't you think?" Despite sustaining a direct hit from an ult, though, G barely even missed a beat. Her immense STR and END made her far too powerful for this volume of gold to crush her. Its nature as a pure physical attack rendered it incapable of doing much damage here.

However, damage wasn't what Chelsea was aiming for.

"Next up... World Reversal Waterfall!"

"Oh?"

Chelsea topped off her ult by surrounding it with an upward waterfall veil. G's threads of light were undone, making it difficult for her to lock on again... But that wasn't all Chelsea had done.

The attack had reduced G's vision in every direction, giving Chelsea's companions a chance to land their most devastating attacks.

"Eh heh heh. It's...a bit too basic, I think!"

However, G remained unshaken. She held the trident by the butt end and spun it for one massive swing.

In one gigantic sweep of her oversized trident, the veil of water around G vanished. Anyone caught in the trident's arc would surely have been obliterated.

However, it was only water that sprayed in every direction. There was no blood to be seen.

"Your feet are wide open, ya big baddy!"

A voice rang out from the lower half of the scattered veil.

Accelerated by Ipetam's blades, Max approached G from a low trajectory, allowing her to avoid the trident's sweep and get close.

Then, she used Bladecloud Convergence to empower Sekiun and slash at the Overlord.

The Famed Blade sunk into G's lower leg...

"Not bad!"

...but it was stopped yet again by her muscles and tough skin—STR and END.

Max quickly let go of her weapon, but she was blown away by a trident strike. Sent flying to the wall, she suffered an impact powerful enough to shatter her Brooch.

However, Sekiun was still stuck in G's left leg, hindering the Overlord's movements.

Now, if Maxie went for the legs...

The real attack would surely come from the other two.

"Here...!" The first of the two to take to action was Juliet. Brandishing her sword, she flew in for close combat.

"That's! A bad idea! Doncha think?!" G faced Juliet head-on, swinging her trident to meet Juliet's blade, and the two weapons clashed.

As a result, the sword began to creak.

Juliet's eyes widened. "This is obvious! It's just what you'd expect! My buffs are way superior to yours!" Forged by G's clan, Harodihg Gnik was designed to be tough enough that she could wield it after using Paradigm Shift. That was also the reason for its massive size.

And Paradigm Shift's buffs were far greater than that of Gradsoul's Curse Conversion.

Despite her lower stats, Juliet continued to struggle, avoiding the fatal trident strike, but this accumulated damage upon her weapon, and finally...

"Oh my..."

With those words from G and a widening of Juliet's eyes, the sword reached its limit and shattered.

Though a bit disappointed that it had ended this way, G knew what she had to do. She launched a finishing blow straight toward Juliet.

The battle between Overlord Invidia and the Fallen Knight was about to meet its expected end—with the latter speared upon the former's trident.

"I remain unbroken."

But that would not come to pass.

A moment later, with a roaring, metallic impact, the trident was knocked aside.

What had parried the fatal strike was...

"It's fixed?"

...the same blade that had broken just moments ago.

It was now completely restored, seemingly without a single scratch. In fact, it now shone with a light more sinister and powerful than before.

This was Gradsoul's second skill, "Unbreakable Blade." When it was destroyed, the wielder could pay half of her HP to instantly restore it.

"I didn't break it during the sparring match, did I?" said Juliet. G had watched Juliet spar, but this feature was still unknown to her.

No matter how many times it shattered, Juliet's sword would remain unbroken and rise again. Reminiscent of a certain someone, it was Juliet's new partner.

"That's a great weapon! Also..." The unexpected restoration had caught G off guard and allowed Juliet to deliver a hit.

A deep wound had opened in the Overlord's left side.

"Oh...! It's stronger too!" G said.

Indeed. In exchange for making Juliet unable to heal the HP she'd used to restore Gradsoul, Unbreakable Blade increased Curse Conversion's stat bonuses from 50% to 200% for ten minutes.

Juliet's weapon had shattered and she'd lost an enormous amount of HP...but this had only made her more powerful.

High risk, high reward builds—there were many RPGs that rewarded this kind of dangerous play.

"I can do this!" Juliet now had three times the stats of a typical vanguard SJ. Though she still didn't reach Overlord Invidia's level, her combat experience allowed her to come close.

"Not bad, Julie! You surprise me, Julie! But..." Though shocked that Juliet could keep up with her despite the vast gap in stats, G was still confident that she would win.

The wound in her left side had already closed. The reversed Poison was now a healing-over-time buff. While Juliet had lost HP to pay for the skill and was gradually losing more as they fought, G was quickly regenerating all the damage done to her.

It was simply impossible for Juliet's blade to outpace the healing and defeat G before her own life expired. Juliet's HP was critically low—it had dipped down to just ten percent of her total.

"Looks like you're still fated for defeat!" G said. It almost felt like there was a question implied by her words: "What will you do, then? Can you still shine on this stage?"

"Even if I am fated to fade..." Juliet replied as she deflected G's attacks. "Even if the ending of my tale has already been penned..."

She had only one response.

"That is merely one wave upon the vast sea of possibility."

She wouldn't even think of giving up.

"And beyond that...is the possibility I truly seek."

Juliet's shining eyes never wavered, fully fixated on the horizon past what was possible.

"Thus, here and now, upon this battlefield...the flames of life burn ever bright!"

And with that cry, something on Juliet's chest began to shine.

It was a necklace hanging from her neck—the MVP reward she'd acquired in the event alongside Ray, before she'd even obtained Gradsoul.

It was the Ancient Legendary "Light of Finality, Climax."

Once belonging to the Sacred Blazer, Aslan Faldreed, it was an accessory that could only be used at less than 10% of your total HP.

It had only one skill, "Like a Flash: Climax."

Usable only in the most dire of situations, the skill tripled the final number of all the user's stats, and dropped the MP and SP cost of skills to zero.

It was perhaps the ultimate ability for a risky low HP build like Juliet's.

And now...

"What...?!"

"I can reach you...!"

...the Fallen Knight was finally on the same level as the Overlord.

Now evenly matched, their battle accelerated. Though Juliet had barely enough HP to survive another hit, with their stats being equal, she could now use her battle prowess to its fullest.

This was the biggest difference between them. Juliet was a natural duelist, standing next to the likes of Figaro and Kashimiya.

Meanwhile, G's talents didn't lie in combat. Her fighting abilities were on the same level as that of most players—simply something given to her by high-rank sense skills.

So now that their stats were matched...

"HHAAAAAAAGHHH!"

...G's system-limited strength was outmatched by Juliet's system-surpassing skills.

Juliet's HP stopped decreasing, while G's HP began falling faster than it regenerated. The tables were turned. If this battle continued like this, Juliet now had a chance of winning.

"Ah ha ha ha! This is amazing! But is it enough to finish me off in time?!" G still thought that she could survive long enough for her ult to complete, winning her the battle.

But she also thought that would be boring.

Winning and losing was secondary—she wanted this to be even more exciting.

This stage was superb and the cast second to none. An anticlimactic finale was simply unacceptable.

"Not yet! It's not over yet! More! MORE! You still have something, right?!" The Overlord continued to insist that they all could shine even brighter.

"Yeah. We do."

It was the other knight who responded.

G looked up to see Ray, galloping through the air astride Silver.

"Juliet!" As he called out, Juliet backed away...

"Hellish Miasma!"

...and Ray closed the distance, taking Juliet's place as he held up his right bracer and released a dark-purple poison mist.

That's the... Well, it doesn't matter. It can't do anything to me now, G thought.

Indeed, this meant nothing to Overlord Invidia. The mist had three debuffs: Poison, Weakness, and Intoxication. She'd already taken on the first two herself, while Intoxication wasn't worth worrying about.

Hellish Miasma wouldn't do anything to her.

"Ah! Wait! This is a smoke screen...!"

But the fact that it was a colored mist made it capable of blocking her vision. That made it effective at preventing Harodihg Gnik's Attraction Anchor.

But what will he even do if he gets close?! My stats are way higher than his! And I made sure not to give him ammo for his special counterattack thing!

G had only hit him once, when Nemesis had put up her Counter Absorption. Doubling that damage would barely scratch her.

Is he playing this like his other battles, then? Looking for an opening to take advantage of...? With that thought, G prepared for whatever trick Ray had in store for her.

However, there was no trickery here. None at all.

If anything, it was the opposite—he was fighting her face-to-face.

"I'm a bit late in saying this, but... Thanks for the buffs, Overlord."

And with that, Ray broke through the dark-purple curtain, equipped with a gas mask—his Storm Visage.

In his left hand, there was the Flag Halberd...

"Thanks to you, I can use this at least once!"

And in his right, there was the nameless axe, wrapped in curse-cloth, fresh out of his Inventory.

It was Ray's strongest weapon, and the world's greatest double-edged sword. When he'd tested it in the arena, simply holding it up was enough to tear his arm to pieces.

He was doing the same now—but although the flesh on his arm cracked and bled, it wasn't fully destroyed. Reversed by Nemesis's skill, the seven debuffs of the Depths of Jealousy enabled his body to withstand the price of wielding it.

Continuously bleeding, but healing just enough to keep going, Ray held up the axe...

"EAT THIIIS!"

...and swung it down as hard as he could.

G's eyes widened. Whether she actually felt the axe's power or if her sense skills had simply forced her to act was unclear, but she held up her trident to defend herself—only for the axe to cleave straight through it and sink into her right side.

"Ah?!" The axe opened a wound on her right shoulder, slicing through her arm, the right half of her torso, her right leg, and even split the stonework beneath.

Ray gritted his teeth—the price he'd paid to destroy the Overlord's weapon and flesh was the absolute pulverization of his right arm.

But his eyes were still burning.

He knew what he had to do next—and who to call upon.

"JULIEEET!" "Right!" The unbreakable knight's call was answered by the knight with ebony wings.

At some point, she'd become surrounded by a vortex of countless black feathers. It was a sign that she was using her ultimate, but something was different this time.

Normally, Juliet's ult would release these black feathers after they circled her arms. Instead, the feathers now surrounded her as she flew through the air.

"Corpse-Eating Bird—Hræsvelgr..."

It was as though she herself had become the black wind.

"PENETRATOR!"

Putting all her power into the tip of her blade, she became an umbral vortex.

Her target no longer had a weapon to turn Juliet's sword aside. Faced with the vortex coming to pierce her, the unarmed Overlord...

"AH HA HA HA HA HA! YOU'RE ALL THE BEEEST!"

Even as she threw her left fist toward Juliet, she laughed and laughed.

The wounds—the injury-based debuffs—she'd received empowered Paradigm Shift further, making her fist even stronger than her trident.

This would no doubt be her last stand—the final exchange of the battle. Whoever's attack landed would shatter the other.

And so, not even a moment later, blade met fist.

It was an immense impact that shook not only the surrounding air, but all the waters of R'lyeh.

A knight and an Overlord. A pre-Superior and a Superior. Two girls shining with a dazzling light.

Only the Black Crow kept on flying beyond the horizon.

The dark vortex shattered the Overlord's fist and pierced through her torso.

And, after a brief silence, R'lyeh collapsed.

Epilogue: Sea Light, Star Light

Paladin, Ray Starling

Right after Juliet fatally wounded G, we were sent straight back into the Eighth Arena.

Both the cylinder around it and the rising water were gone now. There was also no sign that the place had been submerged mere moments ago—it wasn't even damp.

And in the middle of the stage stood Overlord Invidia. She was back in her original form, but the damage she'd sustained was still visible.

"I looost... That really did feel like a true boss monster's defeat, though..."

She's got no arms and a hole where her heart should be. How is she so lively? I wondered—before an answer came to me. "Do you have Death Soldier?" I asked.

"I do. I took it so I could be sure to save all my footage before I die."

Well, that explained why she was still alive.

Wait, I just noticed that she's using her legs to operate the magic camera console. Man, she's dextrous.

Then, I realized that Juliet looked somewhat sad. G seemed to notice it too. "Oh? What's wrong, Julie? What's the matter, Julie?" she asked.

"I... I gave you the death penalty... That means you're going to the gaol..." That clearly explained what was bothering her. While fighting G, Juliet must've been completely focused on the battle—the time limit and the circumstances didn't allow her to think about anything else.

And now that we'd won, she'd realized what beating G really meant, which had made her upset. She felt guilty about sending her friend to the gaol.

There was one small issue with that, though...

"She's not going to the gaol," Chelsea and I said in perfect unison, denying Juliet's concerns.

"Huh?"

“What? She pulls this kinda shit and she’s not wanted?” Juliet tilted her head, while Max became confused. I couldn’t blame them. I wouldn’t have known this either if I hadn’t watched her videos.

“Oh, she is,” said Chelsea. “She’s like public enemy number one in Legendaria.”

“Then why’s she not goin’?”

“She’s got an MVP reward that lets her bypass her wanted status and come back from her death penalties,” I said. If my memory served me, it was a mobile save point called “Sevenfall Eightrise,” and it let her come back from her death penalties eight times per year. I’d seen the video where she fought a music battle against Titania—she’d lost and died after it, but ultimately it had all ended with her coming back like nothing mattered.

“If you wanna know more, check out my video, ‘Super Useful Item! G Tries Something New!’”

She’s trying to get viewers even now! She’s really on that grindset! I thought, but then I realized something. “Wait. Why are you still alive? We Death Soldiers don’t get to live this long.” I was pretty sure that a minute had already passed.

“I got someone to make me an accessory that extends the duration by minutes!” First Harodihg Gnik, now this... Underground Sanctuary seemed to have some pretty good crafters.

“I’d actually love to have that too...”

“Our desires align... (Me too...)”

“You’re both way too excited about builds that involve dyin’.”

C’mon, Chelsea. Juliet’s a low HP build, while I’m, well...me. It’s pretty important that we get to stay around for a long time once our HP’s gone!

“I could give you some if you ever come hang out with my clan!” said G. “Consider it payment for today’s performance!”

Wait, really? I thought. Honestly, that might be enough for me to forgive all this.

“I must say,” Nemesis spoke up. “For someone who was just soundly defeated, you’re acting quite upbeat...”

“I mean, I had fun. We were all shining bright. It’s normal to feel good after something great happens, right?”

The Overlord—G—said those words with an expression that showed she was telling the honest truth.

That basically confirmed my suspicions about her...

"Hey, G," said Chelsea. "You could've destroyed us easily, right?"

"Huh?"

"Whaddya mean?" Juliet and Max seemed confused by Chelsea's accusation, but I knew what she was saying. While G had fought us with all she had, she wasn't putting everything she'd got into winning, exactly.

"I mean, R'lyeh's got way worse places than that dungeon inside it, right?" The Depths of Jealousy was a terrifying dungeon and could be easily flooded with her monsters. However, the very fact that she'd picked a place that was possible to clear at all told me that she wasn't just trying to kill us outright. R'lyeh could easily hold a lot of places where just surviving would be borderline impossible. I mean, if she'd dumped us into the deep sea, we wouldn't have even been able to breathe.

The only reason we were able to win in the first place was because the dungeon she'd given us had both a start and a goal.

"Also... You're holding up pretty well even at 0 HP. There's something you could do even now, right? Something that would take us all out?" I asked. The damage to her torso might've destroyed the trapezohedron, but though her ult was canceled, it's not like she had to take us outside like this.

If she really wanted to beat me, she could've used the time given to her by Last Command to do something else—maybe even that classic load-bearing boss move where you destroy the dungeon to take the heroes down with you.

Her answer to that...

"I didn't want that. I mean... It would've been boring."

...was brief and straightforward.

"Nobody wants to see a video where I just beat the crap out of someone who can't fight back. And I clearly lost, so of course I'm not going to turn the tables and just make it a draw. I'm against that kinda stuff."

Indeed, the reason she did what she did—and didn't do what she didn't—was that she was a content creator.

For her, all of this was just a gaming video recording session.

G's attempt to steal the arena had just been a way to enable the game between us, while the stuff about avenging her brother was nothing more than something to spice up the narrative.

At the heart of it all, G wanted to make a video featuring herself.

To put it simply, if the resulting video was interesting and exciting, to a content creator like her, whether she won or lost was irrelevant. It was a victory regardless.

And her good mood told me that the battle we just had must've greatly exceeded her hopes and expectations.

"This turned out better than the stuff I made with Legendaria's Superiors. I honestly wanna say thanks. Seriously, I'm bursting with gratitude!" she said with a bright, blissful smile as Chelsea, Max, and I looked down at her with conflicted expressions.

Getting caught up in her shenanigans had been a pain, but she honestly didn't seem like that bad of a person.

"But if you'd lost, she would have taken your arena. Does that not make her a proper enemy?" Nemesis asked.

Well, I guess, I replied. She's not bad at heart, but she is a real handful... I guess that makes her kinda like Miss Eldritch?

"I don't mind being your enemy, but I will come back to record another video sometime!" G said. "Oh! But I want you to see through my disguise, so let's become friends!"

"What a wild thing to say..." Not seeing through her disguise seemed like it could be bad, though, so I just did as told and put her on my friend list.

"Friending someone who just tried to kill me and take my arena makes no sense," I muttered, "but it feels like it'd be worse if I didn't. Scary stuff."

"Don't worry about it. This is pretty common in Legendaria."

Seriously? That's actually kind of terrifying. Legendaria might be a match for Tenchi.

"Suppose it's almost time." G's extended Last Command then expired, and she started to transform into motes of light. "Oh. Right. I almost forgot." As if she'd just thought of something, G turned to me with a cruel smile. "Heh heh heh. Don't think this is over... You may have defeated me, but I'm not the only Overlord you must face..."

Silence settled over the arena in the wake of G's stereotypical evil Overlord line.

Well, I get what she's going for, but there's one small issue...

"Umm... You're actually my second Overlord," said Juliet.

"Mine too," I added. That line only worked if G was the first we'd fought.

"Huh?! Can I ask who your first was?"

"Uhhh... I got caught up in a fight between Dis and Sechs..."

"I recently fought ZZZ..."

"Oh. So that's why he made that request. That explains it." G looked like this had made everything clear to her. "What a bummer, though," she continued. "I've been wanting to say that at least once ever since I became an Overlord..."

"S-Sorry," said Juliet.

"It's fine. I'm over it," G said, letting out a sigh and smiling at Juliet. "Let's play again sometime, Julie."

"Okay."

And with that, the last bits of G became light and vanished.

"She really did whatever she liked until the very end," said Nemesis.

"Well, I guess it's good to find out that there's Masters like her too." As far as Superiors went, she was honestly pretty all right.

"She did not endanger the country or any tian lives either..."

I feel like the arena's disappearance would've knocked Count Gideon out from the stress, though.

Anyway, that concluded the trouble at our base...

Which made me start to wonder how things had turned out at the Central Arena.

◇◆◇

Gideon, City of Duels, Central Arena

"...Heh heh."

"What? Why are you laughing? It's creepy."

The intense duel at the Central Arena had just ended, and F, seated in the Death Period box seat, let out a chuckle that made Marie look all weirded out.

"Oh, I just felt that I'd witnessed some excellent fighting." Using his own eye and Zodiac both, F was able to gather inspiration from two battles at once. Both were exhilarating fights and hardly everyday occurrences.

However...

"The fighting today was friendly, fun, and generally splendid..." F said of the battles at the two arenas. "But not more than that."

"What are you talking about?" Marie asked.

"Are you saying you don't agree? If it doesn't involve something that can be lost forever—tians, for example—then no matter how intense the battle, it's never more than a game, is it?"

Figaro vs Albert. Ray's party vs G.

While both battles had been truly something to behold, neither of them carried the weight of something that might be truly lost.

"Tragedies happen only when there is something that cannot be undone," F said. With mere games, an observer might find the tension somewhat lacking—but Dendro was both a game and a world, so it could offer a kind of heightened spectacle that could not be experienced anywhere else. And yet, F felt that there hadn't been much of that special tension in the battles he'd just witnessed.

It was as if they'd received perfect scores, but nothing more.

"Perhaps if only Masters are involved, their conflicts can never be deeper than simple fun," F concluded.

"You know you almost ruined a relationship, right?" During the Love-Duel Festival, F had nearly broken up a pair of Masters, and Marie couldn't help but point that out.

"Oh my. How harsh. But in hindsight, I really only helped bring them closer together, didn't I?"

"You've got a lot of nerve, saying that... Should I split your head open?" Marie clicked her tongue as she loaded Arc-en-Ciel with La Gravelle.

"Heh..."

Despite what F said, he had gained something from the incident at the Eighth Arena. He was sure that the Ray he knew wouldn't have been able to fight as well as he did today. F could tell that in the short amount of time that had passed since their last meeting, the young man had experienced some tremendous growth.

Learning of this change in his research subject was certainly a good thing, but...

"Then again, neither you nor I will get what we want from mere games, will we?"

Marie said nothing in response. She couldn't deny that the two of them were cut from similar cloth.

"I want to read more of your work, so please pick it back up as quickly as you can...Nagisa Ichimiya," F said, flashing a mischievous smile before standing up.

Marie frowned—that had hit where it hurt—but just as F was about to leave...

"Yeah, yeah. You keep up with your own writing too...Seigen Kato."

...she addressed him. Not by his avatar name, nor by his real name, but by his pen name.

It was the name of a certain author who'd participated in a publisher get-together from some time ago.

Marie was obviously trying to tell him that she'd realized his true identity.

"...Of course." Grinning wryly at the unexpected counterattack, F walked away.

Paladin, Ray Starling

Once that thing at the Eighth Arena was taken care of, I headed to the Central Arena to see how that had panned out—only for Shu to tell me to come right to the conference room. There, I found Shu, Figaro, Hannya, Azurite, Azurite's bodyguards...and Figaro's opponent in the final duel: King of Termination, Albert Schwartzkaiser.

Apparently we'd all been gathered for questioning.

KoT's intentions were still completely unclear. It just didn't make sense for a well-known Caldinan Superior to suddenly join Altar and instantly be allowed to participate in The Tournaments.

The questioning had been postponed until after the event to preserve fairness, but it was now time to hear what Albert had to say.

The Superiors who were already in the city were present, as well. Shu had dragged me in here too, but that seemed to be at Azurite's request.

That made sense, though—I was the leader of their clan as well as her friend.

Honestly, I wasn't sure if it was a good idea for Azurite to be here at all, given we didn't know what KoT's intentions were, but she insisted on interrogating him herself. That was just how she was—in fact, that was exactly how we'd met at Quartierlatin in the first place—but if KoT was planning to assassinate her, this gave him a golden opportunity.

Though, we accounted for that possibility too.

In addition to the three Superiors that were visibly present, Fuso and Tsukikage were also hiding in the shadows, just in case. If something happened, she'd use Faint Light to cut Albert's AGI and they both would get involved.

With such preparations in place, Azurite began the questioning.

"Now, let us begin."

Silence.

"What is your reason for participating in The Tournaments... For joining Altar?" Azurite went straight for the big one. With Truth Discernment in place, KoT couldn't lie...

"Can I have an answer?"

...but that meant nothing when faced with someone who wouldn't say anything at all.

With a face that was almost robotic in how emotionless it was, KoT remained completely silent.

That made me realize that even in his duels, he hadn't said anything besides skill declarations and a short phrase at the end of his matches.

"Are you Contract-bound to not say certain things?" Azurite asked. I'd forgotten to consider Contracts, and yeah, that would certainly explain why KoT wasn't speaking. If he was Contract-bound to keep secrets, he'd have no choice but to remain silent.

Would breaking the Contract actually kill him, though? I wondered. Wouldn't he just gain Contract resistance or something?

However, as that thought was running through my head, KoT shook his head in response.

It was a gesture that clearly meant "no."

He and Azurite looked at each other in silence, but then the latter broke it.

"Did you come to Altar by the president's order?"

A nod—almost certainly a "yes."

"Why did she send you here?"

KoT tilted his head—probably the gesture meant "unknown."

"Oh..." I said. Now I understood—

KoT didn't speak, responding only with three gestures that meant "yes," "no," or "unknown."

Azurite's first question couldn't be answered by any of those, and that was why he'd shown no reaction to it. But why was he doing this, anyway?

"Are your answers limited by some sort of skill or Contract?"

He shook his head.

"You cannot speak?"

He shook his head.

"Are you just doing this because you want to?"

He nodded... Wait, nodded?!

"I see." Azurite placed a hand on her temple as though suddenly exhausted and slowly reached for Altar—the sword by her side.

"Whoa whoa whoa! Don't try to cut him down for that! Calm down!" I interjected.

"Oh. Sorry. For a moment, I felt like Caldina's president was using him to mock me..."

Well, I get she's the one who sent him here, but still...!

This felt like it was getting nowhere. We could ask just yes-or-no questions, but there was no telling how long it would take for us to get anything useful out of him.

"Oh," said Shu. "Looks like the help I called fur is here."

"The help?" The moment he said that, there was a knock on the door. It was followed by the voice of a knight from the outside.

"Rook, a member of Death Period, has arrived."

"Rook?"

Azurite gave permission, and he entered the room. His face and gear were a bit dirty, so I guessed he'd been doing a little training even though there was a big dueling competition going on.

"I'm sorry for the wait."

"It's cool. Anyway, we could use some interpretation." With those words, Shu moved a bit away from KoT's side, giving his position to Rook.

"Interpretation," though? How do you interpret someone who doesn't even talk?

"Fur now, continue the questionin' as you were."

"Very well," Azurite said as she resumed her interrogation.

Nodding, head shaking, tilting, silence... The questioning continued, still awkward and mostly uninformative, for nearly ten minutes until...

“I think I understand now,” Rook said. “Please ask something other than yes-or-no questions.”

Azurite gave a slightly puzzled expression before posing her first question again.

“What is your reason for joining Altar?”

“‘I have concluded that if I want to gather information and test myself in various environments, staying in one place is suboptimal. The four years I spent in Caldina were more than enough, and I am now considering a stay of similar length here in Altar. The president also directed me to participate in The Tournaments, which made this transfer all the more convenient. I intend to assist the kingdom in hunting dangerous monsters and pursuing wanted Masters as I have in Caldina. I hope we have a productive relationship.’ That’s his answer.”

Rook’s sudden speech made everyone except Shu look shocked.

He seemed to be directly reciting KoT’s words.

Rook was almost like a mind reader sometimes and often knew what was going on in our heads, but it looked like the past ten minutes of questioning were enough for him to figure out Albert too.

Wait, I could kinda understand if Rook was observing someone who talked a lot, but how’s he doing it with a guy who doesn’t say anything? And how’s he getting so much out of him?

“Is that all correct?” Azurite asked. KoT nodded in response, and you could tell by his raised eyebrow that even he was surprised by Rook’s feat.

“He says ‘More or less,’” Rook translated.

“Why do you not speak for yourself?”

“‘There are personal circumstances that make it somewhat difficult for me to present information using voice. I am capable of it, but my efforts are inefficient. Even after several years here, I cannot say more than a few words at once. Additionally, the nuances of my language may cause difficulties with communication. Even if I were to write, my original language would be incomprehensible to tians. In the common language, all I can give are names and a few words. Because of all that, I generally communicate using gestures.’”

He sure says a lot for someone who doesn’t talk! I thought.

“Did the president give you any other orders?”

"'No. I was only ordered to participate in The Tournaments. I was not even told why. She said I was free once it was over. Additionally, she said that if I went to the reception at her designated time, I would win the Tournament lottery.'"

His answer made Azurite fall silent, deep in thought. The president had sent him here almost like a blank slate, and had given him orders as if she knew the exact timing he needed to win.

That was just baffling.

"Do you know if there is anything else Caldina is doing in Altar?"

"'Fellow Sefirot members, Carl and Yumeji, accompanied me on the way here, but in Caldina's west, we encountered Legendaria's King of Curses and Summon Princess. The resulting trouble separated us, and I have been operating on my own ever since. I am not involved in nor do I know anything about the orders the president gave to them.'"

"I see." Two more Superiors had approached the kingdom. That was important information, and it felt like a strategic move by Caldina.

It was strange, though, that he was giving us all this information without even attempting to obscure it.

KoT wasn't hiding a thing, but the president's intentions weren't becoming any clearer.

Also, I couldn't understand how Rook was picking up specific names and stuff like that.

I ended up asking about it, and it turned out that the deduction skills he practiced in real life had been greatly enhanced by Dendro's mechanics. Rook regularly leveled up before I even realized he'd gotten stronger, but it looked like it wasn't just his stats that were improving. Honestly, this was basically another superpower at this point.

"If a war broke out between Altar and Dryfe, could we expect you to fight on our side?" Azurite asked.

"'I belong to the kingdom now, so I have no objections about aiding them in their effort. Though, war or not, I would like to refuse actions that cause tian casualties.'"

"What if only Masters participate?"

"'Then there would be no problems. I would gladly assist Altar.'"

After saying that—well, having Rook say that—KoT gave a nod.

That was nice to hear.

Based on Rook's translations, KoT seemed like a good-natured and diligent individual despite his stern appearance. Honestly, if you ignored the fact that he didn't speak, he might've been the most normal Superior in Altar.

"'Speaking of which, if I am to participate, I believe I need to join a clan. Is there any you recommend?' Oh, you can come to our Death Period. We're second in the rankings," Rook interjected before continuing. "'Thank you. I will gladly join.'"

"Hold on!" Basically talking to himself, Rook had casually made a pretty big decision for us.

We're getting another Superior*?!*

"Oh? Do you object? I assumed you would approve."

"I do, but still!" Rook was reading every inch of my mind and personality! This really is a superpower!

"No it's not. Anyone can do this with enough training. It's similar to how you understand what Juliet is saying."

"But Juliet talks out loud! Normally!"

"Huh?"

That aside...

I really did have nothing against him joining our clan.

The Tournaments' goal was to keep the participants from committing crimes and attract foreign Masters to increase Altar's forces in the coming war.

For some reason, there were fewer foreign and freelance Masters than expected, but KoT was a skilled Superior who could hold his own against Figaro, and him joining Altar would be a great asset. While we didn't know what the Caldinan president was planning, I felt that we could trust Albert just fine. Rook and Shu would surely notice if he had some ulterior motives.

Azurite still seemed to be pondering something, though. She'd been lost in thought ever since Albert said how he ended up in Altar, and I could hear her whisper something like "When did...?"

"Azurite?"

"King of Termination... I have another question... When did you depart from Caldina?"

"'When?' Is that important?" I asked. "I know Caldina's pretty far, but still." Crossing the desert to travel all the way to Altar surely wasn't an easy task. AGI builds could get through it at supersonic speeds, but based on his duels, Albert seemed pretty slow. Did he travel in some sort of vehicle?

"Huh?" That voice of confusion came from Rook, and I assumed it was caused by Albert's answer to Azurite's question. With a dubious expression on his face, he went and translated it. "...'In terms of time on this side, I was ordered to go to Altar about a month ago.'"

Shock filled the room. I finally understood what had Azurite so lost in thought.

A month ago in Dendro time... That was before even the peace talks—before Altar had even gotten the idea to hold The Tournaments.

Despite that, the president had already sent Albert to participate in the final day, and even given him the time that would let him win the no-show slot lottery.

Maybe she really could see the future...and that prospect made us all shudder.

◆◆◆

A Month Ago, Drac-Nomad, The President's Residence

Some time before Altar and Dryfe had their peace conference, in the president's residence atop the Caldinan capital of Drac-Nomad, a man and a woman were having a conversation.

Or rather, a woman with a thin veil over her face was talking to a large man who responded only with subtle gestures.

"Here are the documents to change your affiliation. Give them to the person you're supposed to meet in Altar, and you will belong to the kingdom," said the woman. The man responded with a nod.

The woman was the president of Caldina, La Place Phantasma, while the man was Albert Schwartzkaiser.

"You may be wondering how I did this. It's simple. There happens to be a territory-owning Altarian noble who borrowed money from me, so now they are in my debt. This gives me indirect authority to have a Master—even you—change affiliation. And make sure you go through the lottery reception at the precise time I gave you. You will make it in."

Albert nodded.

"Yumeji and Carl will accompany you for a while. Their goal is different from yours. Oh, and you will get into trouble with Legendarian rankers on the way. Make sure they do not kill you, and refrain from killing them as well."

Albert nodded.

"After The Tournaments...you will be free. Live in Altar as you will."

Albert...didn't nod.

"You don't have to worry about Sefirot losing a member. You came here to gather information and carry out some tests, didn't you? You don't benefit much from staying in a single country. You learned all that you could learn in Sefirot. This is my last quest for you—consider it your final operation test here in Caldina."

"I am grateful for your support," Albert said in English as he nodded.

"Good work on everything thus far. And good luck in your future endeavors, Albert."

"Thank you." Expressing his gratitude again, Albert left the room.

"That was the first time he's said two sentences in a single conversation. I suppose it just goes to show how grateful he was," La Place said with a wry grin before turning around to gaze off in another direction.

At some point, she was joined by a man of a darker complexion and clothes characteristic of a desert nomad.

"Are you sure you should've let him go? He's strong."

The man was the strongest wide-scale exterminator—Fatoum, the "Magical Apex."

"Yes. This is for the best. Keeping him around wouldn't be very beneficial for us," La Place said, not even slightly surprised by Fatoum's presence.

"It wouldn't?"

"If sent to fight Granvaloa or participate in the battles that would follow, he would likely switch sides or refuse to follow orders."

"Oh dear." Fatoum gave a wry grin, but he didn't disagree. If anything, it seemed he also suspected that that was exactly what would happen.

"He seems to think such actions are completely unlike dueling or fighting monsters and criminals, even though the only difference is that tians die."

Sefirot was a collection of oddballs, eccentrics, fiends, and superhumans, but if you ignored Albert's origins and Embryo, he was easily one of their most normal and good-natured members. Even more than their leader, he served as the group's conscience.

"He's powerful, but too pure. How curious that a nonhuman would cling to humanity as he does."

"That might be the very reason he does it. His lack of humanity could be what is driving him to behave as human as possible. If a nonhuman was instructed to act like a human, I imagine that directive would not include the uglier side of humanity."

A nonhuman entity who looked at humanity with a positive eye, focused on its good side. Fatoum thought that if something like that learned what it truly meant to be human and tried to behave like one, it would most likely become someone virtuous—and La Place felt that he had a point.

"Regardless, sending Albert to Altar is enough to drive a wedge between Altar, Dryfe, and the rest." It would definitely shake the kingdom and make Dryfe feel uneasy. The increase to the ranks of Altar's Superiors would make the other countries look at them differently too. "This will also make it easier for me to crush the fools trying to attack me from the inside."

Being the president of Caldina—a city-state union—she had many enemies who wanted to claim her wealth and authority for themselves. However, whenever such characters appeared, she quickly mowed them down, increasing her own influence in the process.

The recent Cortana incident was a good example. With its mayor having essentially destroyed himself, Caldina's largest city was now fully within La Place's grasp.

"By the way, why did you send Carl and Yumeji too?" Fatoum asked.

"Their role is negotiation. They will talk to the powerful Masters who are considering going to Altar and offer them a better deal if they join Caldina instead. They are already willing to switch and have no attachment to Altar yet, so this is a great opportunity to expand our forces. I will not let it pass by."

"That makes sense."

"I would want a Superior most of all... Someone to replace Albert. Despite what I said to him, 'Sefirot' does refer to the ten sefira. It feels wrong to use that name when there are only nine."

Even if they'd already joined Altar, until The Tournaments happened, the Masters were functionally freelance, and La Place didn't hesitate to claim them for herself. Excessive interference with Altar's attempts to grow their forces would negatively affect the war, so she had gone and given them Albert—someone who would eventually stop working for her regardless.

In a way, it was a win-win situation. With Albert, Altar would gain the forces they wanted, while Caldina would get someone to replace the Superior they were about to lose anyway.

Caldina would likely also get some pre-Superiors and ex-rankers, though, so they were still the bigger winner in this exchange.

"I wonder if Albert will find his place there..."

"He's an honest sort. I believe he will fit in well, even in Altar." Albert was an agreeable person, but more importantly, he wasn't involved in any conspiracies. Nothing could be gained from interrogating him, and he possessed no secrets he could leak.

In terms of help Caldina could send to the kingdom, he was the best option they could ask for.

"When he enters The Tournaments, he will show his powers too. Though I suppose his victory is unlikely."

Albert was going to the same Tournament as Figaro, who was said to be Altar's strongest. If he won against Figaro, his power and value would become undeniable.

However, there was little chance of that.

"Well, as far as duels go, Figaro isn't a favorable matchup for him," said Fatoum. "It could honestly go either way, though. If we ignore the old-timer who changes the very rules of combat, Figaro is probably the only duel champion who can beat Albert."

"He does have a lot of weaknesses. That is exactly why I had him participate in that particular Tournament."

An Embryo focused on scouting would instantly notice Albert's main body, although those were admittedly somewhat unusual to see in duels, and outside of duels there were many ways to circumvent Albert's powers. For example, one could simply gather eight Masters, each with their own means of fatally wounding him.

Albert was certainly useful, but these flaws meant he could easily be replaced. And that was the reason the president had sent him to The Tournaments.

He was now effectively a foreign asset they would never get back. Her last quest took him to The Tournaments specifically so he would reveal his many weaknesses.

By taking part in the competition, Albert would establish ties with the kingdom and gain their trust. That would make it easier for him to operate there, and it would certainly be a positive for him.

However, other countries would learn how to defeat him. That would obviously include Dryfe, and since Caldina wanted the Dryfe-Altar war to be as close as possible, that was a positive outcome for them.

“Not having Yumeji and Carl around might make some things a bit hard for us, though,” said Fatoum. “Though I suppose that cannot be avoided right now. If we did not do this, it’s likely that very few people would agree. If we use them as messengers, offer funding, provide a favorable environment, and have Sefirot help them hunt UBMs that I am aware of, they will be more than likely to accept our offer.”

The reason La Place had used Superiors as headhunters was to give the offer more credibility, as well as make the Masters think that Caldina truly valued them and was serious about wanting their allegiance.

That wasn’t the only reason La Place had sent Superiors to the west, though.

“This is no issue,” she said. “Even if something unexpected occurs—something beyond my calculations—we can simply counter it with excessive force. And if we play all our cards, you and I alone can deal with anything.”

“You think so?”

“Yes. If we are together, there is no tian or Master... No...” La Place paused for a moment. “There is no outsider Infinite... No Incarnation we can’t win against.”

She mentioned the Infinite Embryos—the strongest of all possible entities, hiding in the background of this world—and still claimed that she and Fatoum would win.

“That is why I chose you, after all,” she said.

“It’s an honor. As both a warrior, and your husband,” Fatoum said as he smiled at his wife.

“Nothing unexpected will happen for a while, though. The changes to the peace conference, as well as the Eltram and Vennsayle incidents, will be very few. The same goes for The Tournaments after that. There will be some deviations, but they will be negligible overall. I had to be especially careful while calculating the time for Albert to join the lottery, though.”

Altar and Dryfe would hold a peace conference. It would break down, leading to conflict which would end with Claudiah suggesting a Master-only war, which would in turn cause Altimia to set up The Tournaments to prepare for that.

At that point, there did not exist a single tangible sign that these Tournaments would even happen—and yet La Place was making plans as if they had already been announced.

However, Fatoum didn’t even think of arguing against her idea. La Place was often called a witch who could see the future, and he had absolute confidence in this power of hers.

“I will not be wrong about this. Things are different this time.” The smile on her face vanished before she continued. “A piece as eccentric as Ray Starling will not appear again.”

A strong enmity could be seen in her eyes as she spoke that name.

“Are you still bothered by that?”

“Of course I am. It’s rare for me to calculate so thoroughly and be so wrong.”

La Place reached into an Inventory she had on her and took out some documents with text on them, reading things like “Altea Blockade Project” and “UBM Release Project.”

Going through these documents, La Place continued talking.

“I consolidate all the information I receive and use it to paint an image of the future. I am confident that my overall world prediction ability rivals that of the Incarnation of Influence.”

She then brought up one of the custodians—the twins claiming to be control AI No. 11. The power they’d demonstrated two millennia ago was immense, yet La Place casually claimed that she was on their level.

“But there are some that render my calculations meaningless.” Her fingers stopped as she came across a photo. It showed a single Master—a young man raising his right arm high before a creature engulfed in flames. "Those without vessels for me to read, and Masters who entered this world after the calculations—those who didn't even exist here—simply could not be included in the equation. Naturally, I failed to consider them. However, such entities usually did not have enough influence to affect my results...with some exceptions."

She glared at Ray's photo, clearly displeased.

"This is who we have to blame for the divergence of the Gideon incident, as well as the immediate disappearance of the Monochrome I had you awaken... Actually, he's also the reason the Altea blockade ended a few days earlier than planned."

La Place and her Sefirot clan had multiple schemes in place for the kingdom. Some revolved around Dryfe's acts of terror, while others were of their own devising. However, a good few of them—some of them very important—had been ruined by Ray Starling.

First had been Dryfe's plot to assassinate the Grandrear sisters. While their deaths wouldn't have had much of an impact on the war between Altar and Dryfe, they were qualified to inherit the Granvaloan pirate fleet, so their deaths would've exacerbated the turmoil that would occur there after the war.

That would have been successful, and all Caldina had to do was watch.

However, Ray's involvement had turned the assassination into a failure.

Next was the Altea blockade. Caldina had arranged this act of terror to make Altar's situation worse.

But after Ray's death, Shu had gone out to Noz Forest to avenge him. Then, thanks to Ray meeting Figaro in the Tomb Labyrinth, the blockade at the Sauda Mountain Pass had also been broken earlier than planned.

He was actually somewhat responsible for the destruction of the western blockade too. When Lei-Lei learned her friend's little brother was having a welcome party, she chose to stay at the capital longer than originally planned. And then, when her order for the party was stolen by Goblin Street, she went to the Wez Sea Route to get back at them.

And while the east blockade hadn't been broken because of Ray directly, it was still the PK of a newbie faithful that had caused the Lunar Society to take action, creating a result.

It went without saying that the same applied to the events surrounding the Gouz-Maise Gang, Gideon, and Monochrome.

"Because of him, my calculations have been thrown off even now. The damage to the world has been less than it should've been."

She'd had a hand in many of the incidents in the kingdom—yet through Ray Starling's involvement, some of the more important ones had ended differently than she'd calculated.

"The worst of it was Altar refusing Caldina's cooperation offer. According to my calculations, they should have accepted it. And yet they didn't. It's as though Altar still stands unbroken."

That had been Ray Starling's influence. Through the battle in Gideon, he'd shown them hope, and through the battle in Quartierlatin, he'd formed a bond with Altimia. Without him, the board would have played out closer to how she predicted.

Her stern expression made it clear just how much this irritated her.

"It's not like you to be vexed by the past," said Fatoum. "You have always been someone who looks toward the future."

"...That is true." Her husband's words made her relax a tiny bit.

"Speaking of, what do you believe the future will be like?" he asked.

"The ramifications of that miscalculation and the overall increase of variables in the world means that our window of prediction has been narrowed, but I foresee some significant incidents in the near future. Though, I have already told you about most of them."

La Place nodded before continuing.

"The ones that involve us the most will be the Eltram incident and the events at Vennsayle. And even with three members of our clan sent to the west, we can still direct these in our favor. If anything, we won't even have to employ the two elders or Rainbow...our Prismatic Fortress."

"That is good to know."

"IF is involved in both, but I say we let them do as they please. Many of their activities are positive in terms of world damage."

"Should we tell that to Moneygold too?"

"No. All that matters is that he does not encounter the Irregularity there. We don't have to tell him to be considerate. He won't end up killing The Weapon, Murder Princess, or the Great Soul Daoshi regardless. I see the shadow of death upon him, though. You might get to see him lose all that weight," she said with a smile, presenting her prediction in a joking manner.

"Now that's something to look forward to," Fatoum said with a chuckle.

Her words would come true—Splendida would kill Moneygold shortly after the Eltram incident.

"So, what are the 'things that do not involve us' and the 'things you haven't told me about'?" Fatoum continued, noticing that his wife was omitting something.

La Place responded with a mischievous smile. "I saw something very interesting. It isn't confirmed to happen yet, but it would be good news for us if it does."

"Do tell."

"I looked into the future of Altea...and saw a large crater," she said with a hint of delight.

"You don't mean the King of Blaze incident?"

"No, it's not the act of terror during the peace conference. That one is bound to fail, anyway. Now, the disappearance of Altea would destroy both the save point and the barrier there. On top of that, it would cause many deaths and allow countless Resources to flow toward the vessel without any needless obstruction. If the vessel doesn't die when the capital vanishes, our victory might be guaranteed then and there."

"Perhaps I should head west too?"

"No. I'm already having you work against Granvaloa. If I changed your objective now, I'll be unable to do much calculating for a while after that. Altea's disappearance would be simply a nice bonus... Ngh."

As she spoke, La Place clutched at her head as though struck by a sudden pain.

"...So there," she managed. "The three we sent will be our final interference with Altea... With the west. Once Albert's Tournament ends, Dryfe will surely swing into action. That High-End's...final struggle is..."

"La Place. It might be time to switch."

"You're...right. I might've done one too many repeats... I'll let the device...the brain get some rest."

La Place then sat down on a chair and closed her eyes. Fatoum watched over her, and it looked as though she had fallen asleep.

About a minute later, her eyes opened.

"...Oh. She went to sleep. I see she worked quite hard today as well."

There was something strange about La Place's words. Her manner of speech was different, her very presence had changed, and she spoke of herself as if she were someone else.

"She did. Does your head hurt, Shashie?"

As though it were the most obvious thing in the world, Fatoum called his wife by a different name.

"Oh, my brain is only a link... She does the calculations herself from the far-flung place where she resides."

"But none of this is within the capabilities of normal people. It burdens your brain too. You should rest... Do you think you can eat? If you can, shall we go have something together?"

"My... I would be happy to," La Place said, smiling like a cheerful young woman.

She had the same face as the cold and calculating clairvoyant witch she'd been moments before, but her behavior was nothing like it had been.

"Let me take the lead. I reserved a table at our leader's business."

"Oh my... I cannot wait."

Fatoum treated both of them the same way—it was as though to him, both these personalities were one and the same.

After Story: The Viewer and the Streamer

Reality, Kurosaki Household

Right after the battle at the Eighth Arena, Juri logged out.

Her mother returned from work soon after that, so she just barely evaded being caught playing Dendro.

The cold she'd caught was making her feel pretty bad all over. Her head was hot and felt like it was stuffed with cotton, as though her body were basically begging her to get some sleep.

However, there was something she wanted to do before passing out.

"Umm... Japanese works for this, right?" Juri took her mobile device in hand, went to a video-sharing platform, and ran a search.

She found what she wanted right away.

"There... That's done. I'll do more...after I wake up..."

Finally, she'd reached her limit, and she fell asleep.

The mobile device was still in her hand, its screen showing a channel with a freshly clicked subscribe button.

Reality, Fujiwara Household

"Yeah. This is good! It's done!"

G—Ginga Fujiwara—finished her work and stretched as if tired.

After she'd gotten the death penalty, she'd spent the entire day editing the footage she'd created in Dendro.

The fact that she could do this on zero sleep was a show of just how immersed she was in her work.

"This video's crazy good! And making it was so much fun."

Those were her honest thoughts as she looked over the recordings and what she'd built from them.

The video had plenty of intense action, emotional moments, even some comedy from the Unbreakable's reactions. It was exciting all throughout.

She'd lost and hadn't managed to steal his arena, but she was more than glad that she'd gone to Gideon.

The actors had flourished on her stage, and she was shining bright even in defeat.

It was easily one of the best videos she'd ever made.

"Hrmmm... I'm still a bit upset that I lost, though. He did beat my brother, so if I'd beaten him, I would've finally become the better sibling... Well, come to think of it, he lost a one-on-one fight, while they outnumbered me four to one, so...maybe I'm still better than him?"

With those words, she set the finished video up for a premiere.

"Well... At least I made some new friends. That's something to be happy about."

A good video and a longer friend list—she'd gained more than she lost, so she couldn't complain too much.

"I got a good story to tell Shousen too... Aaaahhh..." G mentioned her clan's sub-leader—a name that might have rung a bell for Ray—before letting out a yawn.

Having been up since logging in for the recording, Ginga had finally reached her limit.

There was still time until the premiere, so she'd decided to get some sleep. She checked on her channel one last time and went to bed.

The subscriber count that she saw was slightly bigger than it had been yesterday...

Afterword

Cat: “Time for the afterwooord. Brought to you by Cheshire the ‘Cat’ and...”
Bear: “Shu Starling the ‘Bear.’”
Cat: “Anyway... I’m exceedingly sorry for the waaait!”
Bear: “An apology, huh? A beary good way to start this.”
Cat: “Heh... We said that this volume would come in the first half of 2024 and acted like there’s no way we’d miss that deadline...”
Bear: “But it ended up comin’ out a whole year after the last one, deep into the second half of 2024. It feels like every recent afterword announcement just keeps pushin’ the date further and further back.”
Cat: “The author never missed a deadline, though...”
Bear: “Books are made through cooperation between beary many people. Sometimes stickin’ to your own deadline ain’t enough.”
Cat: “The author came to understand that things can be delayed even if no one’s at fault and nothing bad happens...”
Bear: “We got some good news too, though. Fur real.”
Cat: “Yes. There was the delay—but during the wait, we were able to try something new. Those of you buying from stores may have noticed that we released two volumes at once!”
Bear: “The other one is Infinite Dendrogram SP 1: The Southern Cross Part 1, where I’m the star of the show.”
Cat: “We’ll let the author tell you more about that.”

Dearest readers, thank you for your purchase. I am the author, Sakon Kaido.

Let me echo Cheshire and extend my sincere apologies for the long wait on this volume. While certain circumstances greatly delayed the release, through some discussion with the editor, we were able to use that time to start doing something new.

We took the anime Blu-ray exclusive Southern Cross side story, gave it the subtitle of “SP,” and released it separately from the mainline story.

Thanks to Eri Kuroda, the illustrator we got for SP, we were able to do something we’ve never done before—releasing two volumes at once.

Additionally, we are planning to release part 2 of The Southern Cross fairly shortly after this, and we are working on a continuation to the e-reader exclusive EX series.

I intend to do all I can to provide you with new stories to read and hopefully make up for the long wait for volume 22.

Now, with those announcements and advertisements out of the way, let’s talk about this volume.

Those who read both the web novel and the light novel surely noticed, but this volume contained quite a few changes from the original. G’s surprising appearance at the end of the previous volume allowed the creation of a new story that was centered around Ray, reminiscent of how King of Light appeared in volume 12. In fact, it was somewhat of a continuation from that storyline.

With the LN introducing F during the Love-Duel Festival—earlier than originally planned—G’s introduction was also pushed to the forefront and happened during The Tournaments.

It was kind of like how an event in a video game sometimes requires a prerequisite event to trigger.

Thanks to Taiki, this volume also did an incredible job portraying G as both charming and a true Overlord. The work on the other characters was excellent too, and it made me really appreciate our illustrator.

Now, this volume will be followed by volume 23, which will take us back to Caldina for a continuation of the story from volume 20.

And just like volume 22, I hope that it presents you with something unknown and unexpected.

Please continue supporting Infinite Dendrogram.

—Sakon Kaido

Cat: “Anyway, it’s time to wrap this up, but...”

Bear: “But...?”

Cat: “...You think we should announce when the next volume’s coming out?”

Bear: “Ohhh. The delay this time was so bad that you’re beary scared of doin' that, huh?"

Cat: "I mean, it feels like there's a jinx making it so we always miss the time frame we set!"
Bear: "Hey, the aufur said they're gonna pace their releases better now. Have some faith."
Cat: "O-Okay... Here I gooo...! VOLUME 23 IS COMING OUT WITHIN A YEAR! PLEASE LOOK FORWARD TO IT!"
Bear: "Hmm. Not saying which year, huh? So you went fur a wide range while also minimizing the damage even if it's late again."
Cat: "We'll still do our best to release it within a reasonable time frame...!"

Bonus Short Story: G Channel: Job Build

An Unspecified Day, A Certain Streamer's Channel

"All eyes on G! Welcome to my channel!" Accompanied by dazzling effects, a devilish girl appeared in a CGI room and announced the start of the show.

It was nine o'clock in the evening, so it was time for her weekly chat stream. Once she was done with the greeting, G began answering questions.

"First one! 'They say that it doesn't matter what job you had before taking an Overlord job. What were you as a high-rank?' Watch my older streams to find out!"

Her words sparked a fresh flow of comments.

```
Lmao
Looks like we got more newbies who don't know...
Oh c'mon, tell them
```

"Okay, fine! My main high-rank job is Magic Spearmaster, while my sub is Shadowmancer!"

```
Never heard of those...
Holy low profile
How'd you clear an Overlord dungeon with that scuffed build???
Obviously because she's G you donut
```

"Magic Spearmaster is basically just Magic Swordmaster for spears. It lets me add my magic elements to my weapon and use my sub-job spells, plus I get sense skills for melee combat. I don't really fight using IRL techniques, so I really need those abilities.”

`Makes sense`
`You say that like there’s people who DO fight using their IRL skills`
`There’s a buncha ppl like that in Tenchi`
`Those lunatics don’t count`

G’s explanation was generally met with understanding, but there was another question mixed in.

`But swords are more popular and would give you more options, wouldn’t they?`

“Well, yeah, there’s more people who make and use swords, but I’ll always use spears instead.”

`Ohhh?`
`Why the fixation...?`
`I sense a deep conviction here`

“I mean, I can use them to poke my enemies from inside R’lyeh! And if they get annoyed and jump in, they’re sitting ducks! People know not to do that now, though, so these days it only really works on monsters!”

`LMAO devious`
`That’s basically an attack from out of bounds`
`D-Deep conviction?`
`Uh, G friends? Is this really your great Overlord?`
`This was her playstyle before she got the job. It’s all good.`

“And Shadowmancer lets me suppress light levels! I can even block lasers!”

That’s...pretty limited
Girl, save yourself from low-rank spell spam and grab Umbramancer instead
If you need defense, isn’t Wallmancer the better choice?
I’m sorry, did you just call her chest a wall?
Hey, she’s well-endowed... In her second form, at least

“Oh come on, you guys,” G said with a chuckle. “You’re making fun of it, but Shadowmancer is great! It’s a must-have for me!”

But why?

Seeing that question—and a lot of similar ones—G replied, “It lets me easily manage light levels even when I’m recording outside.”

...Those eyes are 100% serious
Well, recording is kinda her thing
G is so cute

“Also, it gives me an advantage against King of Light. If I take care of his lasers, it ends up just being a battle between our summons. That’s a pretty equal fight even without my R’lyeh.”

KoL? Did something happen between you two?
Did you get caught up in some trouble he caused?
Aren’t you the one who usually causes trouble, though?

The audience wanted to know more, but she couldn’t elaborate on this point. She wasn’t lying about Shadowmancer being helpful for recording, but another significant reason she’d taken the job was to oppose King of Light, F—her older brother, Seiga Fujiwara.

Even though she’d evaded the question, she had once again held a successful stream for her audience of enchanted fans.
